Though held in midsummer the reception to our National superintendent in Gleason Hall at headquarters was a great success. Everybody came and everybody enjoyed the address, the refreshments and the sociability. Mrs. Wellington, the president of the Daughters of Massachusetts, and a member of the Cambridge W. C. T. U., expressed the sentiments of all the listeners when she said: "Mrs. Thacher's address has revealed the wide scope and great need of this welfare work for the soldiers and sailors. With all our hearts we must enter into the wonderful opportunities for service now opening."

In the enforced absence of Mrs. Stevenson, who was called away to speak at a sad memorial service, Mrs. Ella A. Gleason presided at the meeting and reception. She made a brief and enthusiastic address. Mrs. Arabella W. Wilson, state superintendent of the department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, Professor Nicholls, Mrs. Rice, Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Howland, Miss Nelson and the writer participated in the program and reception. The admirable plans already made by the state president received hearty endorsement.

Visit to Commonwealth Pier and the Navy Yard

Through narrow streets lined with saloons and filled with offensive odors of whisky and beer the official party from headquarters motored the next day to Commonwealth Pier, where 3,000 men are on the "receiving ship." Chaplain Ribot and the Y. M. C. A. secretary cordially welcomed the visitors and gave them every opportunity to see the yeoman busy with clerical work, the men in high spirits at the noon mess (consisting of soup, meat, vegetables and pie) and the enlarged quarters of the Y. M. C. A. The Y. M. C. A. secretary, a graduate of Dartmouth, is a native of a western state and his mother is an officer of the state W. C. T. U. This notice posted on the bulletin board is a hint to white ribboners: "Boys Look Tonight—Pie Eating." Comfort bags were given out to two hundred of the highly gratified men who lined up for the occasion. On a previous occasion three hundred had been distributed. Mrs. Stevenson had the imagination and nerve to promise a comfort bag to each of the remaining 2,500 men.

At some future date it is hoped that Mrs. Thacher and Mrs. Stevenson will address the boys. Entertainments and talks all come in the evening. The calendar for that week advertised movies, an athletic night, speakers and entertainments. An excellent extract from the chaplain's sermon filling one page of the calendar contained this helpful truth: "You cannot trifle with sin, trample all good influences under your feet, give loose reins to your passions, run through the whole or any part of the course of sinful pleasures —and then—by any act of yours, or by any mercy of Almighty God regain what you have lost!" The entire sermon was entitled "A Gospel Sandwich."

In the afternoon Chaplain Stone did the honors of the Navy Yard. The W. C. T. U. guests were taken on board the "Virginia." They saw several submarines, also ships that safely convoyed troops to France and men busily at work in various industries. As the opportunity to hold conferences with the chaplains and officers was the main object of both these visits, the W. C. T. U. leaders were well satisfied with the results.

Conference at Ayer

In response to a call sent out from state headquarters, white ribboners rallied the next day in the Congregational church at Ayer. The official party motored from Boston and found the church well filled with white ribboners and friends who listened with pleasure and profit to Mrs. Thacher's earnest and timely address. Led by Mrs. Stevenson a lively discussion followed. State officers and superintendents participated in this and a vote to secure a house or rooms near the encampment was unanimously passed. A woman with all the smiling and sensible qualities of the ideal mother and white ribbon leader is to be discovered and placed in charge of the rooms. Here the boys will be welcomed. Facilities for writing letters will be furnished and they will enjoy many a good time and uplifting song service. Culinary treats in the way of cookies, doughnuts, and pies will be sure to come their way.

Mrs. Harriet D. Sawyer of Clinton, president of Worcester county (North), is an influential member of the committee appointed to bring to pass this much desired white ribbon center for the soldiers at Ayer. Many who attended the conference responded to her cordial invitation and motored to Clinton, where a banquet and after dinner speeches made the occasion a memorable one. Public sentiment for this new enterprise is rapidly being made.

An appeal for $10,000 is being sent out from headquarters. This will be a small sum with which to meet all the needs of the work at Ayer, Framingham and Commonwealth Pier. It surely will be given, for Boston has "interned for the period of the war all isms except patriotism." A homesick boy at Newport wrote Mrs. Thacher: "The Y. M. C. A. fathers us but we need mothers and the W. C. T. U. is our mother."

For the first time in its history Harvard University gave its graduates and undergraduates a commencement week free from the use of champagne and cocktails. The influence of this splendid stand for total abstinence has been widespread. It helps make strong sentiment for the protection of the boys in camp.

"MODEL LICENSE BOSTON" AS THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE SEES IT

License Chicago recently sent a committee to Boston to study the Hub's methods of regulating the liquor traffic. The following editorial comment of the Tribune throws light upon Boston's "model" system:

"Our aldermanic committee on wines, liquors, malt beverages, and the control thereof have reached Puritan Boston, where wisdom abounds, and they are expected to imbibe much. Pray sample it.

"The Puritan barroom has no screen. Puritans say the absence of screens discourages drinking. But Tom outside sees Jerry inside, and joyous is the union of kindred souls.

"The law restricts drinking on Sunday —thus: Swathed in sheets, the bar resembles a spook. Nothing must go over it. Only out from behind. You enter, seat yourself at a round table, and say to a waiter, 'Bring me a Manhattan cocktail, and, now that I remember, a ham sandwich.' Waiter replies: 'Sorry, boss, can't serve you. You say drink first, food afterward.' Rushing to the sidewalk, you hastily reënter. To the same waiter you shout, 'Bring me a ham sandwich and a Manhattan cocktail!' He does it. The law and the prophets are fulfilled.

"In Boston liquor must not be sold within 600 feet of a schoolhouse. The dining room of the Touraine was within 600 feet of the Winthrop school, so you gave your waiter money and a written order and he trotted to a part of the Touraine 601 feet from the school and there made the purchase. This custom is now abandoned. Boston removed the school.

"They are wonderful Puritans in Boston. The governor of Massachusetts appoints the police commissioner, who enforces the law as interpreted by the courts. He receives help from all Puritans who aspire to open saloons, for the number of saloons is fixed and whoever can get a saloonkeeper deprived of his license may annex it himself. But somehow—perhaps because polished sinners from dry towns round about are always pouring Bostonward to give the place a bad name—the drunkenness in Boston probably far exceeds the drunkenness in Chicago. One comes away with the impression that the Puritans are a happy, carefree race who pass their time in riding in one another's patrol wagons."

"RED" RONEY'S HEART

Yes, "Red" Roney has a heart. I wish to make the statement emphatic, despite the broadening grin with which it would be received by our village wit.

"A heart!" I can hear him drawl. "Why, all old 'Society Red' carries in his manly bosom is a great big thirst!"

He is clever, our village wit. Therefore we do not show him our hearts. In return for the rare entertainment provided by his droll tongue, we tell him our alleged funny stories. Yet doubtless he has a heart, too. So have "Old Jack" Brennan, and Patsy Donnell, and the rest. But I outrun my story, if story it can be named.

You will have guessed that "Red" has hair of that hue which the poets and the artists and I like, and which boys hate. And that the sobriquet "Society" arose from the polished manners and pure English which "Red" Roney can assume upon occasion. They say he has an equal command of sulphurous expletives for other occasions, but, being a woman, or, as we always say in the village, "a lady," I never have had any proof of said unholy proficiency, and never shall have.

Not many people know that his name is Roney. It isn't, in fact. But that is the name he uses for every day. On election day he responds to another name, of a more stately sound, one not common enough to serve for hiding a wounded and broken life. Seldom have I been more greatly surprised than when, as a member of the election board, I saw "Society Red" take his ballot under that strange name, which I already had noticed on the registration books. Yet there was something in his face that day which accorded well with the name.

Once, in a town hundreds of miles nearer the Atlantic, there lived a rollicking but well-reared Irish lad, loved of everyone, with but one fault—a weakness for "the craythur." He was of that temperament which John Barleycorn loves best—the high-strung, generous, companionable sort for whom J. B. shows his most attractive face and does his deadliest destruction.

The lad had friends high in railway circles, and the romance of world-highways fascinated him. A few years later, then, having "cut out the booze," and having worked his way up, albeit rapidly, because the eyes of his friends were upon him, and because of a series of brilliant deeds, the lad grown older clicked his key in a division office, the crack train dispatcher of his road.

The rest of the story I will not try to tell you, partly because I cannot—no one can except one who has lived it—and partly because it is too common. Yes, God help us, the unthinkable paradox is that but for the commonness of this story the good citizenship of the world would long ago have risen in its wrath and hurled the creator of so much agony into the outer darkness. If you, my patient reader, could comprehend for the first time a history like "Red" Roney's, you would cry out with indignation and horror. You would never rest until such a thing could no longer be. But it has happened so often that your sense of horror and indignation is paralyzed. See, for illustration, how little you are impressed by these sincere words of mine. And the rest of the public is like unto you.

"All that liquor can do to a man, it has done to me," "Red" Roney says.

On the evening of the day when "Red" was told of his coming promotion to the coveted post of chief dispatcher, certain well-meaning friends gathered in his room to celebrate the great event. John Barleycorn got "Red" Roney by the arm that night, despite his protests, under the guise of good-fellowship. The expected promotion never came. From that day on, unwilling, fighting, holding back with slowly ebbing strength, "Red" Roney was dragged by J. Barleycorn along what a certain good exhorter in our village calls, in appropriately sepulchral tones, "the downward road to ruin."

"I've fallen down, dead drunk, on the railroad tracks," says "Red," "and been nosed aside by a passing train, picked up next morning and carried to the hospital, more dead than alive. I wanted to die, but they wouldn't let me. I've tumbled off the docks into the Sound, drunk. The shock of the cold water half-sobered me. Ever try to climb up on a dock out of icy water in the dark? Take my advice—don't. Wet piling is the slipperiest stuff in creation. I got out—I don't know how. If I had been quite sober, instead of only half so, I wouldn't have taken the trouble. I've been beaten, robbed, kicked out of saloons, arrested—I know all there is to know about being a drunkard."

All this, and more, "Red" told one day, in the "general store" kept by our village philosopher, and in the presence of "Old Jack" Brennan, and Patsy Donnell, as well as of several presumably better citizens, my good comrade among them. This, of course, is how I came to know.

"Old Jack" Brennan, half-drunk,—his usual state—was one of the best log-drivers on the river. A little more than half drunk, he was the village terror—a fighting, cursing demon, from whom women and children hastened away in fear. Next day, he was a weeping penitent, begging that someone tell him how to let liquor alone. Yet once, John Brennan was the president of a college, the husband of a pretty wife, and the father of two dearly loved little daughters. The pretty wife played him false. J. Barleycorn offered him solace. You know the rest.

As for Patsy Donnell, I do not know his story, except that he is one of a score whom I could name who came to our village when it was new, believing there would be no saloon here—that here they could begin anew and live sober, decent lives. Also he is one of more than half a score—the same score—whom our respectable, well-kept saloon caught and dragged down again, one by one.

One day one of our good "dry" voters, chancing to be at work along the road near these two, thought to find out how they might be expected to vote in the coming county election. They were wary, so he drew them out thus: "Well, the saloon never hurts me. Neither my boys nor I ever go into it."

The two "old soaks" were incensed at once. Brennan was the quicker to put their protest into words. "Suppose you and your boys don't drink," he almost shouted. "Don't you care anything at all about the likes of us? Here's two of us here, and you know well enough where to find more like us, who might be men among men, if the drink were kept out of our reach. But as long as good church members keep the smell of the stuff under our noses, we are—like this. Why, man alive!—"

But our good citizen relented at this, and told them his real sentiments.

It was on the day of this county election that the ladies of the Union kept "voters' headquarters" in the church. And it was to Aunt Janie, their leader, that "Red" Roney came, in tears, pleading that they strive their utmost to put the saloon out of the village, that he and others like him might have a chance to escape from the clutches of liquor. Drunk? Hardly—just drunken enough to shake him out of his customary reserve, and make him reveal the heart usually so well concealed. If the saloonkeeper had known what would be the effect of his election-day gift-liquor upon "Red" Roney, he would have given him less—or more.

Yes, it was the law that saloons must close on election days. And the saloon was closed and locked, front door and side door. But there were offices in the basement, and ways thence to the room back of the bar.

"Red" had his wish. The county, outside corporate towns, went "dry." But straightway, by methods that would never have borne the light of investigation, and under the tutelage of a man whom we knew to be a liquor organization's agent (though of this we had no legal proof), the village became incorporated. The saloon was closed for one month. Imagine the rage and the despair of "Red" Roney and the others.

Not many months later we were plunged into a campaign to make our whole state "dry." Some enthusiasts asked "Red" to tell on the lecture platform what he had told in the philosopher's "general store." They said that was the best temperance address they ever had heard. But he could not be persuaded. The instinct to hide his wreck of a life away from the public gaze, was greater than any glimmer of faith he may have had in his power to help in the campaign, however great his desire to aid may have been.

It was shortly before this election that "Red" brought his pay-envelope to the philosopher—not for the first time. "Keep it—lock it up," he said. "Don't let me get it anyway at all. You know as soon as those hellions down there get two or three drinks into me, I'll be up here trying to invent some pretext to get hold of that money. And if you let me have it, they'll get it all."

The philosopher promised, but with less hope than on previous similar occasions. "Red's" half-drunken invention of pretexts was exceedingly good.

But this time another plea followed the request for the safe-guarding of his pay. "I wish," said "Red," "that somebody would get hold of me the night before election, and keep me out of reach of that gang till I get a chance to cast my 'dry' vote."

When my good comrade told me that, I said, "Crowded we may be, in this tiny house, but there'll be a couch in a corner somewhere for 'Red' Roney the night before election."

But there was no need. The philosopher "got hold of him," and somehow—God, whose work it was, knows how—kept him out of harm's way. I myself saw him, as I have told you, go into a voting booth, sober and resolute, his ballot in his hand.

Well, we fought, and we won. And when the year of grace (save the mark) allowed the liquor sellers was past, our state closed its doors upon John Barleycorn and as many as possible of his works. That year was a hard one for "Red" Roney and his kind. More than one of that score of men I mentioned awhile ago, who thus far had "held out faithful," succumbed in that year to the redoubled wiliness of the liquor sellers, who were seeking to lay up for themselves a store of new "friends" against the hoped-for day of their chance for re-instatement.

But, though our village wit, and others from whom we hide our hearts and our hurts, did not know it, "Red" drank no more. How did he resist? Again, God knows—and the philosopher, too, perhaps.

MINNESOTA LIQUOR TRAFFIC FEELING THE PRESSURE OF INCREASING PROHIBITION SENTIMENT

BESSIE LATHE SCOVELL

At the annual session of the National Editorial Association held in Minneapolis during July, President E. H. Tomlinson in his annual address said: "Just so surely as in Russia autocracy was doomed when sobriety was enforced and as the first quavering articulate cry of its newborn democracy was an instinctive call for international peace, so a real stable world democracy will be possible only as it is based on the enforced sobriety of all people and the enforced peace of all nations. Without these foundations it will, I warn you, be as a house built on sand."

The supreme court of Minnesota recently sustained a district court verdict in Stearns county, giving Mrs. Frank Porch a judgment of $2,000 against the bonding company that went surety for the good conduct of Nick Schwientek's saloon. Her husband came to his death through intoxication. This means that saloonkeepers who permit men to become intoxicated in their places and who help or allow their bartenders to ply men with liquor are liable for damages for death or injuries that may result from the consumption of liquor.

There were but a few wet towns left in St. Louis county, when Duluth, the third largest city in Minnesota, closed its 69 saloons, July 1. About 10,000 sworn signatures have been secured for a county option election which will occur September 10. State Senator Richard Jones is managing the campaign from the city of Virginia, a large mining town. Plans are made to organize every town and village for the dry campaign. A dry St. Louis county means a long step toward statewide prohibition.

Citizens of Martin, Faribault, Rock and Pipestone counties recently brought complaints before the Minnesota Public Safety commission asking that the saloons at Ceylon, Welcome, Triumph and Trosky be closed. These are the only saloons in a radius of seventy-five miles. The Trosky saloon pays a license of $8,000 and does an enormous business. Complaints allege that these saloons are demoralizing the whole countryside and roads are made unsafe by drunken auto drivers going from these towns. The brewers also appeared before the Public Safety commission asking time to improve conditions. The saloonkeepers have formed an association and hire motorcycle policemen to enforce the automobile road laws in southwestern Minnesota. The proprietor of the Trosky saloon pays one of these men. The brewers' law enforcement committee advised the saloon men not to sell to persons from Iowa, to men under the influence of liquor or to soldiers whether in uniform or not. Governor Burnquist has appointed three commissioners to survey the situation in southwestern Minnesota. The brewers and wholesale liquor dealers made pledges to the Minnesota Public Safety commission that they would stop supplying blind pigs, yet between May 1 and July 7, according to railroad records, 163,721 pounds of liquor were received at small towns of Beltrami county from St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth brewing firms. Shipments have been seized by local authorities and reported to the Public Safety commission, as the county is dry. All goes to show that the word, pledge or promise of brewery and saloon organizations cannot be taken on oath. Minnesota's "war lid," closing saloons in the large cities at 10 p. m., one hour earlier than the state law requires, and forbidding all women to enter saloons, is in full effect. Arrests have been made for selling liquor in the Gateway district, Minneapolis, where the Public Safety commission stopped the sale of all liquor.

The dry town of Fairmont in a special election voted two to one against Sunday movies.

PROHIBITION A SETTLED POLICY IN VIRGINIA

The prohibition law of Virginia, in effect little more than nine months, has proved so beneficial that the number of its friends is rapidly increasing. The News Leader of Richmond in a recent editorial utterance tells of the assured position of prohibition. "All of us are of one mind on this question," says the above mentioned daily. "Press and people approve the law, are gratified at its operation, and will uphold its enforcement. Changes in the law may be necessary in certain minor respects and will be made without question. Changes in the policy that led to the enactment of that law are at this time inconceivable. Nowhere in Virginia will be found a handful of decent men who would countenance for a moment any effort to upset the law or to evade its requirements."

"CLOSED ON ACCOUNT OF DEATH"

E. E. V.

Dr. Greatheart made great haste along the city street. He always rushed; it was his business to try to outrun death, death swift-footed, blood-thirsty, and hard to overtake.

Much concerned over a patient he had just left, the physician hardly noticed his surroundings. As he slackened his speed, however, at a street crossing, to decide his course, his eye fell upon the corner building—a saloon, upon the door of which was displayed a wreath and the sign, "Closed on account of death."

He wondered, professionally, who was dead, and what was the cause. It might be the proprietor—perhaps he had been caught in the trap of his own setting. If not he, it was probably one of his immediate family.

The physician's thoughts then turned to his next case. He was going to the bedside of a young man upon whom a proud father and mother had builded high hopes before John Barleycorn had robbed him of every prospect of success.

The avenue down which Dr. Greatheart turned was a quiet, shady place; and the house he soon approached was of the kind belonging to the moderately rich.

"John Barleycorn is not partial," muttered the doctor grimly, as he rang the bell. "He enters beautiful homes, as well as tenements."

The hall into which he stepped was spacious and inviting. The mother, who came quickly at the maid's call, was tastefully dressed, and the room to which he was taken was well furnished and sunny. It was presided over by a stiff-capped, efficient nurse. But the figure on the bed was thin-faced and haggard-eyed. The boy's chances for recovery to health were slim.

As the doctor looked at the face on the pillow, and at the mother's yearning expression, he felt "choky." But, as doctors and nurses must, he speedily turned his sympathies into a more practical channel. He examined, prescribed, advised. To be sure, it was of little use, but one must do something—till there is nothing left to do.

He attempted his usual cheerfulness, but a smile, to say nothing of a jest, seemed out of place this morning; and the mother, whose quick ear had noted his more serious tone, anxiously followed him into the hall.

"Is it to be—no hope, doctor? You said you would tell me today."

"I'm afraid it is, Mrs. Lawrence," he said reluctantly.

She tried to meet the news bravely, but for an instant her sorrow broke bounds.

"How can I bear it? So young! And—oh, he must not go this way!"

"I know—" The inadequacy of his words was offset by the understanding in his tone. Then, with a hand-clasp, he was gone. One whose business it is to hunt down death cannot pause long—not even to comfort the afflicted.

As he closed the door softly, he thought, "Sad! sad! Yet it might have been worse—if there had been another—to have had her heart broken."

But the doctor's round had brighter spots. At the very next place a smiling little convalescent, whom he had drawn back from the dark valley by patient perseverance, would greet him from the window.

"After all," he told himself, "I have one of the greatest jobs on earth. Going after cold dollars alone, cannot be compared to the realization that one has helped to bring the glow of health to little cheeks, and hope to older hearts. Even if death does occasionally beat one to it, as the boys say, we sometimes get the best of him and then comes our joy."

He swung around the corner—there was the saloon again with the wreath, and the notice hanging on the door, "Closed on account of death." "It's a pity," he sighed, as he read it again, "that there are not a lot more of such places closed—closed on account of the deaths they have caused. If others could see what I have seen; if they could hear the sad stories I have heard,—how they would fight against these treacherous traps, the poor victims of which are from all kinds of homes—rich or poor, it matters not. I long to give more help to the prohibition cause, but I'm so busy looking after the victims of drink."

"But," the doctor reflected more hopefully, "others are doing what I am not free to do." The words of an earnest and forceful speaker he had heard the evening before came into his mind. "I had a brother, an only brother," the man had said. "I loved him as much as David loved Jonathan. He died—a boy merely, slain by drink. My mother died with a broken heart, and kneeling by her bedside I promised her that I would never rest while a saloon was left in this land. I, and many much more brilliant than I, have done the best we could and now we are in the last struggle. We are beginning the last onslaught. A few more years—and we will win."

"With such leaders as the prohibition movement has," mused Dr. Greatheart, "and with its steady and determined soldiers of temperance on the firing line, it will not be long till all these places will be closed—on account of death. May the demise of the liquor traffic be swift and sure."

And as if to assure him that victory would soon come, the doctor looked up to see the little convalescent smiling at him from the window.

THE BATTLE IS ON IN NEW MEXICO

LORA S. LA MANCE, National Organizer

New Mexico is the land of the sun. It is a unique member of the sisterhood of states. The first Spaniard came into New Mexico 378 years ago, after a cheerful tramp of 10,000 miles. Fifty years later an imaginative Spaniard wrote a book on "Nieue Mexique" that was soon translated into various languages. In glowing terms he told of the wonderful plains and the fields of corn. He declared gold and precious stones were so plentiful that the Indians made arrow tips of turquoise and agate. But, said he, to get into that land one has to cross a desert, "forty days' journey wide."

That there might be no mistake, this keen old chronicler gives the boundary of "Nieue Mexique." Florida joined it on the east. The Pacific Ocean was the western boundary. Mexico was at the south and the northern limits in that day must have been the North Pole!

New Mexico belonged to Spain and then to Mexico. It passed to the United States in 1848. Fifty times in sixty-two years it asked to be made a state before Congress would consent. Even today sixty-five per cent of the people are Mexican. There is a Spanish element, also, that speaks the purest of Castilian, and all of the official reports and notices are printed, in parallel columns, in both Spanish and English. In the population are many miners and cattlemen. There are more health-seekers and tuberculosis patients than in any other state in the union. The tuberculosis patients are familiarily known as "T. B.'s."

New Mexico was the last state to adopt the public school system, which dates from 1891. It has comparatively few Protestant churches, only about 250 for 450,000 people, and 72 per cent of these are supported by home mission funds. Three-fourths of the surface of the state is sun-baked plains or valleys, rainless, sometimes, for a year, and in the southern and central part, the day heat is terrific, from 100 to 110 degrees in the shade.

In this land of contradictions the earth teems with plenty wherever the life-giving water of irrigation flows. The unexpected is always happening. In a month's journeyings your scribe once saw an eighteen-inch long Gila monster, so ugly, vicious and diabolical in appearance that he might have been taken for the pet lizard of the Evil One himself. Once I saw a rattlesnake and once, on cactus-raiding bent, I was myself unmercifully raided in turn by a colony of giant red-headed ants that pinched, or bit, or gouged—whatever the fiery process is called—until I fled. The country is a paradise for cacti, some of which grow ten feet high. At another point was a thicket of the so-called flowering willow. There had been no rain for a year. The ground was as hard as a brick. But these bushes were covered with beautiful catalpa-shaped blooms, white, pale lilac and lavender, with a lovely mottled purple lip like that of an orchid. These shrubs begin to bloom in May and continue until October. I believe one would bloom on a red hot cook stove!

New Mexico, conservative and progressive by turn, is to hold an election on state-wide prohibition next November. It has the fewest temperance organizations of any state except Nevada. The Anti-Saloon League is weak, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has only 411 members. It has the least money of any state to spend on a campaign. Even South Dakota had more. Yet when the "wet gang" in Texas sent in $300,000,000 to influence New Mexico's legislature and keep the election from being called, they met ignominious defeat. Governor Lindsay is a strong prohibitionist and his wife is the vice-president-at-large of the state W. C. T. U. He soon showed the liquor lobby that he meant business, and that the capital was not a healthful place for them. He vigorously informed luke-warm Albuquerque that it would dry up or the training camp for soldiers would be taken from it. When Texico voted dry he told its many saloonkeepers, who were bristling with defiance, that they must close their doors, and that at once, and they did.

The Spanish-American members of the legislature recognize that drink is the bane of their race. When it came to a vote they stood pat. The archbishop of Santa Fe was called in to help draft the submission bill so as to make it acceptable to Catholic citizens, who comprise three-fourths of the population. Plucky New Mexico, without money or experience, is in a campaign.

Miss Harriet Henderson, president of the state W. C. T. U., has spoken most acceptably in various places. Mrs. A. A. Scott and Mrs. S. C. Nutter, former presidents of the state W. C. T. U., are getting ready to go into the field. The National W. C. T. U. has stood behind three National speakers in the New Mexico campaign.

Mrs. Maude Greene, temperance chalk talker, has met with much enthusiasm in central and western New Mexico. Her home is in the state, and she knows the people and their ways, and they like her and her methods.

Mrs. Florence Atkins, "the whirlwind of the South," spent July in the state. Like every other worker she found trying conditions. She scored some real successes and was very well received. At Albuquerque she spoke to 1,000 soldiers in the training camp. At Santa Fe she held three rousing meetings.

The writer spent four weeks during July and August in the state, a trying experience, yet highly successful. Four unions and eight campaign organizations were started. Much enthusiasm was in evidence. About one-third of all the points visited made ready for the speaker before her coming. These places are bright spots in our memory. In most cases there was a W. C. T. U. already established in the town. The Spanish temperament can be summed up in one word, manana, tomorrow—no hurry, no move, no push. Eight times in the four weeks, appointments went to pieces in spite of all that could be done. Nine other times not a move was made, not an announcement given, or a poster put up until after the speaker reached the town, perhaps at three or four o'clock in the afternoon. But on the other hand the people turned out on the shortest of notice, and warmed up to fever heat after one address. They are so warm-hearted and so ingratiatingly friendly one can not hold their do-less-ness against them, especially as they go right to work after once getting the vision. They are planning to cover every town by house-to-house work, to train their children as Young Campaigners, to serve a dinner on election day in almost every town into which the speaker went. Some of the communities will get up a parade and in some the women will work at the polls. New Mexico's white ribboners only need training to develop into splendid workers. Although few in number, they are the cream of the land.

Nine times the writer spoke to audiences which contained Mexicans. They were most appreciative. I have never been in a state where the relations between Protestants and Catholics were so cordial. In every town I called upon the priest. In all but one case they promised to work heartily for the prohibition law among their people. The one exception shook hands upon the proposition that he would not raise a finger against prohibition, but he would not work for it.

Mrs. Minnie Johnson Grinstead, National W. C. T. U. organizer, is to spend the last week before the election at Tucumcari. A monied man of the place and a personal friend of Mrs. Grinstead's, R. P. Donaldson, is to pay the bill as his personal share in helping to make the state dry. New Mexico is thus starting a fashion of its own.

The state has been "dry" more than a year, now. John Barleycorn has made his first great attempt to "come back," and failed. "Red" Roney's lonely little cottage is neater than of old, and the roses in his garden bloom more freely. He keeps his own pay-envelope, and the mail-order liquor houses get none of it. Some of us who like all our real-life stories to end like those in books, hope that some day "Red" Roney will send "back East" a letter signed with the stately name we heard that election day—that he and his people may be reunited. Probably it is a vain hope. Possibly it is a foolish one. For life to "Red" Roney can never be other than a medley of haunting memories—a shadow of what might have been. For him, and for "Old Jack" Brennan, Patsy Donnell, and the rest, "what has been can never be." That which we—society—in our blindness, have taken from them is of the substance of life itself; it cannot be restored in this world. But we need no longer be blind.

Ah, citizen, citizen-to-be, you who read these words, by the broken hearts and lives of all the "Red" Roneys you know, I adjure you, place no such deadfalls—nay, more, make it impossible that they ever shall be placed—in the pathway of these little sons who play about my chair, whose sweet clear eyes look up into mine as once "Red" Roney's looked into his mother's face.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC MISREPRESENTING ORGANIZED LABOR great labor leaders of the world are today opposing the beverage liquor traffic, believing it to be the enemy of the best things in life.

In Great Britain men like Hon. John Burns, whose efforts unceasingly put forth to better the condition of the workers have given to him a world-wide reputation as a champion of labor's cause, are among the foremost antagonists of the liquor traffic. The Independent Labor party of Great Britain, at their conference recently held in Leeds, passed a strong resolution in favor of war prohibition, and at a recent prohibition demonstration in Albert Hall, London, striking messages from labor leaders were enthusiastically received. Mr. Thomas Richardson, M. P., made an eloquent plea for the abolition of the drink traffic. Speaking as a labor representative in the House of Commons, he said: "I want to see the total prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. I am one of those who believe that democracy ought to occupy the seat of government, of power and authority. But democracy will only ascend the throne when democracy is intelligent and educated, and has a disciplined will. The greatest hindrance to that intelligent, educated, disciplined mind and will is the continuance of the trade in strong drink. If the workers are to secure for themselves social justice and economic freedom, we must sweep away the strongest menace and hindrance to the onward march of truth and right." This splendid appeal coming to us from the other side of the Atlantic, finds an echo in the hearts of those of us in this country who are battling for labor's cause. Because it is the enemy of the toiler the liquor traffic must die.

WHAT "THEY SAY" ABOUT THE UNION SIGNAL

Clipped from Correspondence and Exchanges

Dear Local President: Please bring before your local union at the next meeting the importance of supporting our very own papers, THE UNION SIGNAL and The Young Crusader. I know our hearts and hands are full with work for our soldier boys and our country, but we must not neglect our regular W. C. T. U. work. When peace is declared, which please God may be soon, our organization will have much opportunity for service in the days of readjustment of conditions. To do this well we must keep ourselves fully informed of national and world-wide conditions along our own lines. And in our own papers alone is where we can get the needed information.—Hattie Wilson in Oregon W. C. T. U. Paper.

"I see my subscription expires this month. I discontinued some of the papers I was taking but I feel I cannot do without THE UNION SIGNAL. It has been a weekly visitor in our home for a long time, so here comes the dollar for its continuance for another year."

"I can do without potatoes more readily than without THE UNION SIGNAL."

"I am going to wear my last year's hat and go without a new one because I must have THE UNION SIGNAL."

"I am so very thankful that I have a dollar to send and renew my subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL. My paper is a very busy one. I read it, send it to others, then it goes to the W. C. T. U. wall pocket. When something is needed to help out a W. C. T. U. program, they come for my UNION SIGNAL. Long may it live and prosper!"

"Enclosed please find my subscription for THE UNION SIGNAL. I cannot imagine how a white ribbon worker gets along without its valuable aid. As prohibition advances it gets more and more interesting. My only grievance is that the censor, instead of letting us have it every week, keeps it back in his office until there are two or three copies to send. If he reads them, I have no objection to the delay, but I am dubious!"—Mrs. Beresford, Pt. Elizabeth, Cape Province, So. Africa.

"I am a woman voter of the fourth generation," said a speaker at a recent hearing on equal suffrage before a committee of the Massachusetts constitutional convention, as reported in The Woman's Citizen. "My mother, my grandmother and my great-grandmother voted upon all the questions on which the men of their families had the right to vote. With us the matter is absolutely settled. I have never heard a man say a word against it. When I was getting ready to come to this hearing, and my little boy learned that it was because Massachusetts women are not allowed to vote, he said:

"'But, mamma, why don't the Massachusetts women call out the state militia?'"

LABORERS ARE CLAD AS WELL AS BANKERS SINCE LIQUOR IS NO MORE WELCOME IN SEATTLE

(By JAMES A. DUNCAN, Secretary Central Labor Council, in Seattle Star.)

A year ago our enemies hoped and some of our friends professed to believe that when the state went dry the labor movement would go to the dogs.

These hopes and fears have all proved groundless.

True, this law had the effect of putting not to exceed 450 Seattle trade unionists who had been directly or indirectly connected with the liquor business out of employment, but, on the other hand, the membership of the garment workers' union has increased in the past year over 40 per cent, which equals more than one-fifth the number thrown out of employment, while the number of waiters losing their positions is to some extent offset by the additional number of waitresses put to work in places that have ceased to dispense liquor.

In addition to this, at least 3,000 more members have joined other unions not directly affected by the operation of the dry law, except, perhaps, in so far as some may now find themselves in a better position to pay dues. Some of the organizations report great improvement in this regard.

It is indeed encouraging to see men of such crafts as the longshoremen, who were content but a short time ago to walk around during their leisure in overalls, now dressed in such manner as would do credit to bankers.

It has been said by some officers of the longshoremen's organization that the splendid solid front and unwavering determination which insures victory in the present strike could never have been maintained if the saloons had been open, and much more serious violence and disturbances would surely have occurred.

A city of sober, organized workers means a city of workers earning fair wages within reasonable hours, with sufficient funds and leisure to take recreation, visit the stores to make purchases, and with the means to live under wholesome, sanitary conditions.

The prosperity of the present is being most largely enjoyed by the skilled workers, not because of indifference on the part of the skilled worker to the interests of the unskilled worker but because the skilled workers are the most generally organized, while it is a much more difficult matter to organize unskilled workers.

However, great strides are being made in the organization of the unskilled workers, and while it is not wise to advertise the details in connection with new organization work, it is safe to say that several organizations of unskilled workers have recently been organized, with excellent prospects for the future.

Prosperity for the workers, like prosperity for the business man, consists in grasping and improving every opportunity that comes along whether it be in the industrial field or the political, and the sooner the workers recognize this fact the greater and the more rapid will be their progress.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

That a most determined effort is being made to open up a revision of the War Tax bill in the Senate for the purpose of shifting the onus of taxation from the masses to war profits, large fortunes, and vast incomes, is beyond question. The subject received new impetus by the speeches delivered on Monday last, which opened the third week of debate in the Senate. Speeches advocating such increases were made by Senator Hollis of New Hampshire, Senator Jones of New Mexico, and Senator Johnson of California. The last mentioned Senator is a fine speaker and held the attention of a large company of his colleagues and well filled galleries, in an impassioned appeal for a further levy upon war profits and incomes. He assured the Senate that "we should take the money to carry on this war from the war profits made out of this great conflict. England takes eighty per cent of its war profits, while under this bill we take less than twenty per cent of ours." Senator Hollis of New Hampshire advocated taking from eighty to ninety per cent. Senator La Follette occupied much of the time on Tuesday, speaking along the same line, and presenting the minority plans of the committee on finance for higher rates in the war tax bill on war profits and incomes. He delivered his speech in his usual vigorous style, walking back and forth in the center aisle, pounding nearby desks, waving his hands, and running them through his hair. Several times he pointed to senators conversing together and asked them to stop, stating it caused him annoyance. His address was heard by a considerable number of Senators and it was seldom interrupted. Senator La Follette introduced two amendments to the income tax section, but both were voted down.

Senators who have been absent from the city are returning in response to telegraphic notice from party leaders to be on hand for the voting on the war tax bill's chief features in dispute. Final action on the bill itself probably will not come until the middle of next week.

Sweeping and absolute government control of the prices and the distribution of food and fuel products of the United States during the war is now an assured fact, President Wilson having signed the Food Control bill, the most drastic measure of its kind ever enacted by the Congress of the United States, and the Food Survey measure. The Food Control bill is designed to put food distribution under direct government supervision and a provision added as an amendment extends an even more sweeping control over coal and other fuels, including the power to fix prices and authorizing the government operation of mines. The Food Survey bill is intended to encourage production and gives the government authority to keep up a continuous census of the amount of foodstuffs in the United States. It will be administered by the Department of Agriculture.

Upon signing the bills the President immediately put into effect the provisions of the law by appointing Herbert C. Hoover as food administrator. Mr. Hoover at once set forth the aims of the food administration, declaring that its purpose will be to stabilize and not disturb conditions. The method of controlling wheat and flour will be the first to be outlined and will be announced in a short time. The next move of the Food Administration, after the changes in the system of distributing wheat and in the manufacture and sale of flour and bread, will be to take up the production of meat and dairy products. The trade commission has investigators now in the flour mills and in the meat packing houses.

It seems easier for Uncle Sam to get soldiers than it is for him to get the wherewithal to clothe them. The necessity of providing uniforms for the 687,000 men who will be drilling in the national army next month and the men who are joining the regular army and national guard, is taxing to the limit the resources of depot quartermasters. Outfitting one million men is only one of the many problems which faces the War Department these days. The quartermaster general has issued an order which will make it necessary for the enlisted man to give proof that all articles of clothing requisitioned by him are absolutely necessary.

During the past few months six nations have sent their representatives on a mission to the United States, as follows. England, France, Italy, Russia, Belgium, and now Japan's representatives are here, having arrived in Washington Wednesday, August 15, bearing a message of congratulation and appreciation to President Wilson from the Emperor and the people of Japan. At the Union depot they were met by the Secretary of State, the Japanese Ambassador, and many other notables. Passing through streets thronged with people, past long lines of school children dressed in white, with a red sun, the insignia of Japan, on the front of their gowns, the distinguished visitors were escorted by United States cavalrymen to the residence of Perry Belmont, where they will be the guests of the government during their stay in the city. The mission, it is authoritatively stated, has not come here on a commercial or political errand, but to greet the United States as a brother-nation fighting for a common end, and to decide, after consultation, how best the two nations can co-operate, both in an economic and a military sense, in carrying on the war.

A very interesting incident has been brought to my attention concerning Japan, that will, I am sure, be of special interest at this time. Away back in 1868, Hon. Townsend Harris was sent from the United States as the first accredited minister from this country to that then almost unknown country. He was an earnest Christian man, and when the Sabbath day came the gates to his compound were locked and all business affairs were laid aside. During that first day, some official business from the Empire was brought to the American office, but the gates were locked and no one was about to receive the message, although the American flag was floating over the building. The official was greatly surprised and did finally manage to make his way to the side of Ambassador Harris, requesting a reason for the unusual occurrence. Mr. Harris explained that he came from a Christian country, he himself was a Christian, and that the first day of the week was observed by his country as a holy day, and business must wait until the morrow. This position he maintained during his stay in Japan, and to his surprise and delight the Empire, which at that time was keeping every tenth day as a national holiday, changed it to every seventh day, to be in conformity with the day set apart by the Christian world. Public schools were closed and all public business laid aside, this not as a religious obligation, but to do as others were doing, and the custom has been continuously enforced from 1868 to the present time.

The war has created an unpreecedented demand for Bibles. New York publishers report their presses are running from fifteen to eighteen hours a day, but they are still several weeks behind orders already received.

There probably has been a query in the minds of Sunday School workers as to why the petition signed by tens of thousands of Sunday Schools scholars was not presented when the resolution for National Constitutional Prohibition was under discussion in the United States Senate. This is the reason: We want to make the most of that great petition, and believe it will be more effective to have it presented when the resolution is brought before the House of Representatives next December. This, too, will in all probability be at the time our great national convention is in session in the city of Washington, and when those two indefatigable Sunday School leaders, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, National superintendent of Sunday School Work, and Mrs. W. F. Crafts, World's superintendent, will be here, to listen to the discussion. At that time we hope, and pray and believe we will witness another victory for National Constitutional Prohibition by a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives for submission of the amendment to the people.

DISTILLERIES TO CLOSE SEPTEMBER 8

No Whisky to Be Made in the United States After That Date

The Food Administration has announced that all processes in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes must stop at eleven o'clock on the night of Saturday, September 8 Any effort to construe the law to permit the use after that of wheat, corn, rye and other materials which had been hoarded, it was made plain, would be met with firm action. It has been reported that some distillers have bought up tremendous supplies, especially in the corn market, in the hope that they would be permitted to convert these supplies into distilled spirits after the date set. The Food Administrator has received a large number of inquiries along that line and as a result Mr. Hoover decided to put an end to any doubt that may have existed. The ruling has nothing to do with spirits in bond, which will be considered later by President Wilson and the Food Administrator. As a result of the stand taken it is understood that a very great supply of corn and other foods which might have been turned into spirits will be diverted to other purposes, because it will be physically impossible for distillers to use all of the stock in hand in the manufacture of spirits by September 8.

Patriotic Membership Day, September 12, 1917

Dear W. C. T. U. Comrades:—

This is the day of big purposes, big plans and big achievements. We ask each white ribboner who reads this message to help us in a big concerted drive for National W. C. T. U. membership. The distraction of the war and the many appeals for aid from various relief societies might easily result in a temporary lessening of effort to recruit our ranks. With national constitutional prohibition in sight the W. C. T. U. division of the united temperance forces must continue to add largely to its numerical strength and its spiritual working force. We need thousands of additional members to help push regular constructive work and our comprehensive war service plans for soldiers and sailors.

The General Officers have selected Wednesday, September 12, for a day of concerted activity in securing new members. Let us strive earnestly and prayerfully to make it a memorable day in W. C. T. U. annals. Let us come to Washington in December for our National convention reporting the most wonderful increase in membership that our organization in any one year has achieved.

On September 8, 1917, whisky meets its "Waterloo" in our republic. On November 1, 1917, in the capital city of our great country, the beverage liquor traffic steps down and out forever. These big victories touch in their beneficence our entire republic. White ribboners of every state in the Union aided in bringing them.

On Wednesday, September 12, let the white ribboners of every state in the Union celebrate these glorious triumphs by joining heartily in this patriotic drive for 1917 membership.

PROHIBITION TO GO INTO EFFECT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA OCTOBER 1

Prohibition goes into effect in British Columbia, October 1. It will be remembered that the question was submitted to the people, with the understanding that the vote of the British Columbia soldiers overseas was also to be taken. The result of the vote at home was a large dry majority but for a time it looked as though the measure would be defeated by the reported wet vote of the soldiers in Europe. However, proof of fraud in the taking and counting of the soldiers' vote convinced the legislature that the action of the people should be ratified, and on August 17 the prohibition bill was passed by the legislature and signed by the lieutenant governor. Its passage through the house was very rapid. Upon the legislature assembling, it was moved into committee of the whole at once for a consideration of the prohibition bill. Amendments to give the liquor dealers time to dispose of their stock were defeated, and it passed by an almost unanimous vote. Upon the governor's assenting to the measure there was a noisy demonstration from the galleries and much applause by members from both sides of the house, says the Vancouver Daily Sun.

FOUR HUNDRED MEN AND BOYS SAVED FROM PENITENTIARY

According to the Spokane Chronicle the state of Washington is caring for 400 fewer inmates at the penitentiary and reformatory than when the saloon and brewery were operating. In other words, 400 men and boys have been saved by prohibition as assets in the commonwealth—enough from whom to recruit a company of first-class soldiers.

LOUISIANA LIQUOR DEALERS PREPARING FOR THE WORST

It is reported that the owners of two of the largest saloons in New Orleans have purchased property in the business section of that city and are installing therein expensive soda fountains, and that half a dozen other retail liquor dealers are placing soda fountains and other soft drink equipment in their places of business. These changes, it is believed, are being made in anticipation of action to be taken by the Louisiana legislature in 1918, in placing the state in the prohibition list.

CANADA'S FOOD CONTROLLER PROHIBITS USE OF WHEAT IN MAKING ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

The food controller of Canada has prohibited the use of wheat in the manufacture of spirits. The regulation reads: "No person shall use any wheat in the distillation or manufacture of alcohol unless such alcohol is to be used for manufacturing or munition purposes, and no person shall use wheat in the distillation or manufacture of alcohol for manufacturing or munition purposes unless such person has obtained a license therefor from the food controller of Canada. No fee shall be payable for any such license."

KENTUCKY'S NEW LEGISLATURE IN FAVOR OF SUBMISSION

As a result of the primary elections held in Kentucky on August 4, the next legislature will have a majority in favor of the submission of a prohibition amendment. This means that the people of the state will be given an opportunity to vote upon the question. Kentucky has been going dry by the county option route for many years and now has 108 dry counties. Although Governor Stanley is well known to be in sympathy with the liquor interests, he has recently announced that he will give his approval to the submission of the amendment to a popular vote, realizing that public sentiment is demanding it.

CORONER LOSES BUSINESS WITH PASSING OF JOHN BARLEYCORN

The coroner is one of the men who can reasonably blame prohibition for lack of employment. This is the record of the coroner of Salem, Ore., as reported in the Statesman of that city: Only half as many calls for the coroner during this year as compared with corresponding months in former years. The calls for emergency cases have been gradually falling off since local prohibition was enacted, says the paper, the number of deaths showing more pronounced decrease since state-wide prohibition went into effect.

PROHIBITION AND HIGH PRICES

HON. JEANNETTE RANKIN, Congresswoman from Montana

(Reprinted from Chicago Herald)

The progress of the food bill and its prohibition amendment in Congress has been watched by the men and women of the United States to see what would be the solution of a problem which, in its various phases, has vexed the spirit and mind and pocketbook of America for many years. Reformists, both social and economic, have been battling with the question for generations, and organizations contended on both sides of the question until it aroused the interest of the entire nation.

The campaign for prohibition has gone through the successive stages of all reform campaigns. The old sentimentalist who attributed an absolute and inherent righteousness to the idea of total abstinence long ago went his way to make place for the moralist.

Millions Going Hungry

The moralist in turn has given up the riddle as to whether the personal liberty of the drinker shall have preference over the personal liberty of the drinker's family or the social liberty of those who pay the public costs of drunkenness, and the scientist, following upon the heels of the moralist, has closed the discussion as to the possible medicinal value of alcohol by research which appears incontrovertible, and has left the field clear to the economist.

And now the cause of prohibition, stripped of its sentimental aspects and isolated from its moral and scientific aspects, has been before Congress, to stand or fall upon its purely economic merits.

This sort of consideration of the prohibition question has been forced by the immediate necessity of mobilizing the food resources of this country in order that we may feed ourselves and those nations which are depending upon us in the present war.

We have viewed our food supplies askance and have listened with enthusiastic ears to the cry for pinching economy in our kitchens in order that the extra per capita slices of bread and portions of meat on our family tables may feed several other countries, and meanwhile ten millions of our own people in America are going hungry and have been going hungry for years, while apples wither and dry on the trees in rural communities, while vegetables rot on the ground and while 3,603,900,000 pounds of corn, rye, and other grains and molasses are used in a single year in the production of liquor. And we are told to eat less at a time when we need more than ever before strong, well-nourished bodies and clear minds!

Would Facilitate Transportation

If instead of encouraging our children and our men and women to eat less we simply refused to allow any grains or foodstuffs to be used for the production

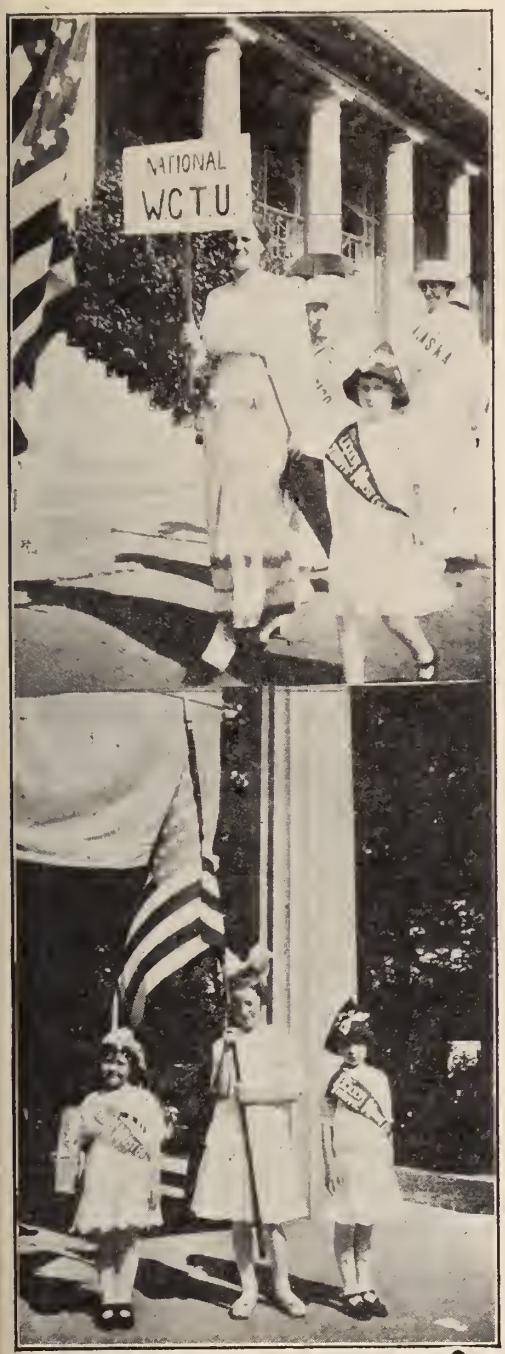
CHAUTAUQUA, THE BIRTHPLACE OF THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

Special Correspondence



Children Participating in W. C. T. U. Parade

A change in character that means progress quite in keeping with the advance step made by prohibition marked W. C. T. U. summer work at Chautauqua this year. Instead of the usual rest room for social intercourse and distribution of literature the space was occupied by a National W. C. T. U. exhibit, designed to educate and convince the skeptical that national prohibition is very much nearer than it was a year ago. The long line of pennants bearing the names of the twenty-six prohibition states, two territories and the District of Columbia called forth many exclamations of surprise, and the question, "Is my state dry yet?" from interested spectators.

An exhibit is always attractive, but the Chautauqua exhibit was made unusually so by very brilliant lighting and vivid coloring. The corn exhibit with its models of houses, its manikins, its wagons, cars and trees, attracted scores of children who in turn brought their respective families to see the toy houses. After some little explanation they learned not to touch the things, "'cause it isn't playthings; it's a zibit!" But they came in repeatedly to see the toylike attraction, which was displayed from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m. daily. Men and women, students and inquirers, visited the room, taking notes and carrying away literature. Eight hundred visitors is a conservative estimate, and this number included representatives from every state in the Union.

The constructively patriotic character of the summer program brought to Chautauqua the Speakers' Training Camp for National Defense, under the auspices of the National Security League, many organizations being represented by one or more delegates from all over the country. The National W. C. T. U. representative was a registered delegate.

For three consecutive mornings members of the W. C. T. U. were speakers on the program of the Woman's Club. Mrs. C. P. Lindsay, National superintendent of Fairs and Open Air Meetings, spoke on "Conservation of Babies." She said, "Every baby is a potential patriot, the conservation of whose health and welfare is of paramount importance to America," and urged that we remove "the mortgage on the cradle" by stamping out the liquor traffic. She exhibited a number of beautiful baby posters which delighted the feminine audience.

Mrs. Annie K. Weisel, president of the Alabama W. C. T. U., discussed "The New South." She said Alabama was the first state to have, by public enactment, a W. C. T. U. celebration in the public schools.

Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, president of the Indiana W. C. T. U., spoke on "The World Challenge to Woman." "One morning in May," said Mrs. Vayhinger "10,000 Russian ex-soldiers, all battered and maimed from two years of service, marched to the Duma when they heard that Russia was discussing a separate peace and declared, 'If you make a separate peace you will do it over our dead bodies. We are ready for service again.' This is the spirit in which temperance women have been working. . . . . It rests with women to create a sentiment that will demand a single standard of purity. . . . The world challenges women to a great task, not to a life of ease and idleness. . . . Home is more than four walls. Home reaches out wherever the boy or girl is found."

The W. C. T. U. held a rally in the Hall of Philosophy for four consecutive Thursday afternoons. The first meeting considered "The W. C. T. U., a Patriotic Organization," dealing with special work for soldiers and sailors. Comfort bags and contents were exhibited and comfort bag leaflets distributed. "Special Work at the Front." and "Food Conservation" were also discussed.

The second meeting considered "The Challenge of a Big Task." "Our Pledge" was presented by Mrs. Fanny Root Danser; "Our Do Everything Policy," by Mrs. Kathryn Warner, who gave a wonderful spectacular demonstration of some twenty departments, among them the Anti-Narcotic, by a string of over 1,000 anti-tobacco pledges which extended around the hall; "Our Young People's Part," by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. field secretary. The third meeting was a Y. P. B. demonstration in which many young women took part, and Mrs. Fannie Drummond, National W. C. T. U. organizer, was the speaker. The dry states in rhyme were sung to "The Wearing of the Green." The fourth meeting was given over to the reading of "The Man Who Forgot," by Mrs. Anna M. Sankey of the St. Louis School of Oratory, in co-operation with the Chautauqua School of Expression. The following day in co-operation with the community service motion picture bureau the moving pictures of "The Man Who Forgot," were given at Higgins Hall, thus doubly emphasizing the temperance lesson and creating a demand for the sale of the book.

Miss Gwyneth Fulcher and Mrs. Perkins, with Miss Helen Farquhar, Y. W. C. A. field secretary, planned a young people's party out of doors. More than one hundred attended and enjoyed wholesome fun and a social hour.

The annual "circus" of the Chautauqua season is the day when everybody participates in a parade for fun and frolic. This year the proceeds went to the Red Cross fund. Many different organizations were in line, and the W. C. T. U., led by Mrs. Perkins, received enthusiastic applause as the twenty-six dry states, two dry territories, and District of Columbia, represented by young women wearing pennants, marched by. Porto Rico was represented by a native girl of the island.

ONE MONTH OF PROHIBITION IN SOUTH DAKOTA

FORMER PRO-LIQUOR PAPER CONCEDES THE LAW IS A BLESSING

At the close of one month under the prohibitory law, South Dakotans appear well satisfied with the results. The Argus of Sioux Falls, heretofore one of the extreme pro-liquor newspapers of the state, comments as follows on the benefits already realized:

"The results achieved in this short period (one month) have been phenomenal. Taking the city of Sioux Falls as an example, the transition has come about so quietly that few realize the thoroughness of it. The figures tell a remarkable story. With but few hours remaining before the books for July are closed, the court records reveal but fifteen arrests for drunkenness for the thirty-one-day period. This total stands out in bold contrast to the data taken from the July records of the chief of police for the four years previous. Here they are:

"July, 1913; 128 arrests for drunkenness.

"July, 1914; 140 arrests for drunkenness.

"July, 1915; 155 arrests for drunkenness.

"July, 1916; 156 arrests for drunkenness.

"And this comparison tells but a part of the story. While in past years cases involving violation of the liquor laws were continually before the court, the calendar for this July has been practically free from them. There has been one arrest for furnishing intoxicating liquor; eleven have been haled before the magistrate for having liquor in their possession in a hotel or a public place; one is paying the penalty for soliciting the sale of intoxicants and one person has been charged with selling intoxicating liquor. The latter case is pending appeal and involves three separate charges. There have been but eleven arrests on the charge of transporting liquor into the city.

"The remarkable record made by Sioux Falls during the first month of the bone-dry law may be attributed principally to the fact that the people have taken the statute in good faith; have obeyed it because they preferred to do so and because they liked it. There have been a few offenders, but they have been promptly punished and in a degree that will undoubtedly command respect for the law in the future. Those who may have put in supplies prior to the first of July, in anticipation of the approaching dry spell, have been remarkably discreet in its use, if indeed such liquors have not actually found their way to the medicine cabinets, there to remain, unless actual necessity demands the use of them. But be this as it may, the fact remains that Sioux Falls is a cleaner and a better city under the bone-dry measure and the general spirit of respect for the law has made it so.

"Of the thirty or more buildings made vacant by the passing of the saloon on the last of June, a majority of them are already occupied and the others are being taken over gradually by other lines of business.

"And one of the outstanding results of this transformation is that the grocery and confectionery stores are already noticing increases in their sales—slight at first, but none the less a steady growth, however small. This shows that little necessities and even luxuries are being purchased now by people that did not have them before."

Now It's the Furniture Dealers

The furniture business is a reliable index to the state of business prosperity, says the News Leader of Richmond, Va., in an article citing the benefits of prohibition, and quoting furniture dealers as authority in part for the statements made.

"For the seven months before prohibition went into effect we averaged eighteen cases a month where we had to take back furniture on which people could not pay the installments due," said one furniture merchant. "Since prohibition became law, we have had only twenty-one returns, three a month. In other words, we had six times as many returns before prohibition as since the saloons were closed."

A second man in the same business said: "My books are open to inspection. They will show that since prohibition went into effect, my collections have averaged 60 per cent more a month than they did before November 1, 1916."

"Who can measure the happiness, the creature-comforts and the improvement in home-life these two statements disclose," queries the News Leader. "Who can gauge the waste prevented and the thrift encouraged? Who can reckon the children clothed, the homes made bright, the wives made happy, the burdens lifted?"

of liquor, we would not only avert the destruction which commonly results from the consumption of liquor but we would save enough grains to supply continuously the bread ration for our own army and the combined armies of our allies.

But the converting of grains into food products instead of into liquor would not stop in its beneficial results with the mere increase of food supplies. It would touch the heart of a problem of food distribution which has been long begging for solution. It would mean the release of freight cars which would facilitate the transportation of food with an effectiveness this country never before experienced.

For years we have known that the reason produce was rotting in the fields in one part of the country while men, women and children were starving in another part of the country, was because transportation facilities were inadequate to transfer all available food from its source of production to the consumer.

According to the United States statistical abstract for 1916, there are in this country 2,356,338 freight cars. There were consumed in this country in 1916 almost 500,000 carloads of liquor, including more than 35,000 carloads of wine and spirituous liquors and more than 363,000 carloads of beer.

Uses 10 Per Cent of Freight Cars

Of course much of this liquor was consumed in the same locality in which it was produced, so that perhaps one-third of it, or even one-half of it, never necessitated the use of freight cars for conveyance. On the other hand, every bushel of barley or grain used in the production of liquor has been hauled by freight in favor of grain that might otherwise have been hauled for the production of food. And it is conservative indeed to estimate that the transportation of liquor in the United States requires the use of ten per cent of the freight cars available for use in this country.

Two hundred thousand freight cars would go a long way toward relieving the transportation situation with regard to food products, and the release of these cars for this service would greatly augment the paring-knife campaign which the women of the country have been urged to wage in the interests of the war.

Inasmuch as the production of beer in this country has occupied just ten times the bulk of spirituous liquors and wines, the exemption of beer and light wines from the prohibition regulations would mean that less than one-eleventh of the possibly available freight cars (to say nothing of the grains used) would be released for food transportation.

Was Whisky Used by Captain Scott on South Pole Expedition?

It having been recently reported that it was Irish whisky which enabled Captain Scott and his party to reach the South Pole, the attention of Lady Scott was drawn to the statement. Lady Scott states that such an assertion is entirely erroneous. She further adds: "My husband regarded the use of spirits in the Antarctic as very dangerous on account of the reaction and deadly cold that sets in after the stimulant subsides. I think I am right in saying that whisky was absolutely prohibited on sledge journeys in the Antarctic. It is entirely untrue and most mischievous to say my husband praised the sustaining merits of whisky. On the contrary, he very often told me he regarded it as a most dangerous and undesirable thing for sledging."

Disturbers of Peace Depart With Advent of Prohibition

Ogden, Utah, is showing the usual improvement in morality which comes after prohibition has been in force for a short time. For the first week of the dry régime there were only thirty arrests as compared with eighty-five for the preceding week.

Of the eighty-five arrested the week prior to August 1, thirty were charged with being drunk, and of the thirty arrested after August 1, only four persons were charged with drunkenness. The charges against the twenty-six other persons arrested after August 1 were for minor offenses, such as riding on the sidewalk, speeding, disturbing the peace and neighborhood quarrels.

"The above figures are taken as evidence that the moral tone of the community will be considerably improved under the state prohibition law," says the Salt Lake City News, in commenting on the decrease of crime in Ogden. "Apart from the fact that there have been fewer arrests since August 1, there is a scarcity of the ordinary street loafer since the saloons were closed and the business district of this city has put on a far more respectable appearance than was evident in the old days when King Alcohol swayed his sceptre here."

THE CHILD IS THE PRIZE AT STAKE

It is essential to bear in mind that prohibition is not merely or mainly a matter affecting the adult. The child is the prize at stake. The social and physical well-being of the coming generation is of intense importance to all of us, and we are bound to consider with serious care any proposals which will substantially promote that well-being. Inasmuch as prohibition would undoubtedly save many thousands of young lives and make the environment of our boys and girls much less unfavorable, we are bound to give it our active support. It is imperative that the capital of the nation—its child-life—should be safeguarded and secured.—The Alliance.

"GOOD-BY, DEMON RUM!"

MARGARET B. PLATT

Those members of Congress who are so fearful that ill effects will follow national prohibition should give reasonable attention to the trend of public sentiment as voiced by the press in the states already dry. From the experience of these states may be judged in large degree the effects of national prohibition. Under the above caption the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, in a recent issue, says editorially:

"The action of the United States Senate in adopting the resolution for submitting to the states a prohibition amendment to the constitution presages a bone-dry nation within six years. The house has yet to take a vote on the resolution, but the best information obtainable is that the resolution will be before every legislature in the country two years hence for ratification.

"There will be no longer any force to the argument that it is bad for business to have one state dry and a neighboring state wet. The only question left is whether booze is a good thing for the country. That question has been settled in a decisive manner in twenty-six states.

"The war has been instrumental in changing the trend of thought in the world. The Demon Rum has received a setback everywhere, and the need of every ounce of efficiency has made it imperative that the armies be abstemious. A few years ago it was inconceivable that the leading nations of the world would seriously go about the task of restricting or prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors. The sentiment against booze has been piling up like a wave which threatens to sweep the world."

Here is no wail of discontent, no setting forth of the evils of prohibition, no statement of financial disaster following the elimination of booze factories, no threat of "rebellion" on the part of the laboring classes because they are reduced to the extremity of drinking milk instead of beer or rum, but a deliberate acceptance of the fact that the question "whether booze is a good thing for the country" has been settled decisively in twenty-six states and in Alaska and Porto Rico, and an evident purpose to accept world as well as national prohibition as an advance quite in keeping with the progress of civilization.

The pessimistic Congressmen who are so greatly alarmed concerning the probable effect of prohibition upon the nation are either uninformed or wilfully blind. No city, state or nation has ever been financially, physically or morally injured by ridding itself of the burdens imposed upon it by John Barleycorn. To free the entire nation from those burdens would be to afford opportunity to demonstrate the advance along every desirable line that can be made by a sober people.

COLORADO'S PATRIOTIC PROHIBITION ACTIVITIES

ADRIANNA HUNGERFORD, President Colorado W. C. T. U.

The observance of "Colorado Day," in celebration of the state's forty-first birthday, was unusually impressive because of the fact that many soldier boys from camp and post participated. Interest centered in City Park, where a tent city sprang up for the occasion, each civic or patriotic organization having its own headquarters. The state W. C. T. U. had one of the most beautiful tents decorated with red, white and blue, and United States and Colorado flags. The pictured faces of our great leaders, Frances E. Willard and Lillian M. N. Stevens, draped with "Old Glory," banners and posters greeted the eyes of visitors; couches, easy chairs and cold water added to their comfort. All details were carefully supervised by Mrs. R. K. Byles, state superintendent of the department of Fairs and Open Air Meetings.

A great street demonstration preceded the park festivities, organizations and individuals vying to show their patriotism. Troops, state and regular, constituted a very large section of the parade. The state W. C. T. U. was represented by appropriately labeled automobiles. Large canvas banners in patriotic colors, bearing the words, "Eighth District Woman's Christian Temperance Union," completely covered the back of an auto truck and its wheels—a very practical float, as it carried 550 boxes of lunch for "our boys." It was the envy of other organizations. Mrs. A. E. Disbrow, district president, and her helpers were well repaid for their effort by the gratitude of the soldiers, expressed in rousing cheers.

Longmont W. C. T. U. with the help of patriotic citizens provided a treat for the "home boys" at Camp Baldwin, Denver, on a recent Sunday. An auto truck loaded with eatables and several machines filled with people to do the serving, were pressed into service for the intervening thirty miles. There were 110 boxes containing fried chicken, potato chips, a pickle, an orange, biscuit and butter, cheese and candy. In addition, salad, cherry pie, ice cream, cake and coffee were served. A gifted speaker, Rev. Monroe Markley, gave a fitting address, appealing to the men's highest ideals. The mayor of Longmont, a former teacher of many of the lads, presided. The officers of the state W. C. T. U. were in attendance, the president extending greetings. The president of the hostess union, as a parting gift, presented a great white cake bearing the name of the organization and bound by a white ribbon. The hearty rally cries of the men indicated their pleasure.

The program of the annual W. C. T. U. day at the Colorado Chautauqua, Boulder, presented some special features of great value. The address on "Americanization" by Miss Emily Griffith, principal of the Opportunity school, Denver, gave a glimpse of practical training in making a living, making a home and making a loyal American. This wonderful school during the last year had 2,300 pupils, including both sexes of many races, old and young. Hon. Fred Farrar, who was attorney general during the first year of prohibition, delivered a great message on citizenship, challenging individuals to give their best. Our own specialists reminded their hearers of the world-wide progress of the temperance reform and emphasized the cigaret menace and the education necessary to win a prohibitive law; also the danger of neglecting organization responsibility when there are so many unusual demands. The noon hour was devoted to exchanging greetings, comparing notes, sharing lunches with friends and enjoying the hospitality of Rest Cottage, which has been state headquarters for the summer.

PATRIOTIC MEMBERSHIP DAY, SEPTEMBER 12

The most important message in this issue is the announcement of the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. that September 12 will be observed as Patriotic Membership Day. Do not fail to read it thoughtfully and prayerfully and to plan for the enthusiastic observance of the day.

NATIONAL PRESIDENT ASKS PRESIDENT WILSON TO CALL DAY OF PRAYER

On behalf of the National W. C. T. U., Miss Anna A. Gordon, National president, has appealed to President Woodrow Wilson to issue a proclamation for a national day of prayer for Divine guidance in the war crisis.

EXPLAINING THE COMBINATION NUMBER

In accordance with the plan previously announced of publishing only fifty numbers of the official paper this year, this issue of THE UNION SIGNAL is a combination number.

The expense of publishing the paper has increased enormously during the past few months and virtually all religious and reform papers have raised their subscription price. THE UNION SIGNAL will endeavor as long as possible to continue at the $1 a year rate for the weekly edition, and 35 cents a year for the monthly Campaign Edition, but the management deemed it necessary to cut down the expenses somewhat by eliminating two numbers during the vacation season.

GETTING ACQUAINTED WITH YOUR LEGISLATORS

A recent issue of the Northern California state W. C. T. U. paper contains two and a half pages of vitally interesting information—the record of the votes of the members of the two houses of the state legislature on the issues involving the liquor question during the recent session. The editor expresses the hope that the readers of the paper will carefully study the tables and engrave on the tablets of their memory just how each member of the state law-making body voted on the liquor question. She suggests that after studying the information it be preserved for reference so that when these men are again appealing for votes, their constituents will know exactly how they may be expected to cast their ballots on the all important issue. Good and sagacious advice, worth passing on to the women of every suffrage state, and of every one of the forty-eight states in the Union, for even where the women are not supplied with the franchise to defeat a vicious candidate, they have an indirect influence that can accomplish much. Begin now to think and plan for the next legislature. This is even more important than heretofore, as the question of the ratification of a prohibition amendment to the Federal constitution may soon be before the state law-making bodies.

SHOULD THE NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION MOVEMENT BE DEFERRED?

If any reform is vitally related to the success of the present war, certainly it is the movement to abolish the traffic in alcoholic beverages. Yet one of the leading weekly periodicals of America argues that the effort to free the nation of the alcohol beverage trade by an amendment to the federal constitution should be postponed until after the war is over, because "all reforms that have no relation to the vigorous and effective prosecution of the war should for the time being be laid on the table."

It will immediately occur to the most superficial reader of current history that if prohibition has no relation to the effective prosecution of the war the War Department would not have seen fit to prohibit the sale of all liquors to enlisted men; it would not have prescribed the establishment of saloonless zones around army camps and mobilization centers; and it would not have shown such marked preference for dry cities over wet in selecting the location of the thirty-two cantonments.

The serious student of the situation can arrive at only one conclusion, namely, that the present time is most opportune for pressing the movement for national constitutional prohibition, especially in view of the fact that Congress has not seen fit to enact a war prohibition measure.

1. It has been well said that the only proper way to deal with an organic disease is by organic treatment. Impatient of securing this through action by the federal government, twenty-six states and two territories, and a large extent of other territory have diagnosed their own trouble and administered the cure through popular elections and action of state legislatures. Certainly the population represented by these states, territories and dry communities has a right to demand of the federal government that it give the states the right to vote on the completion of the task.

2. Never has there been a time when the citizens of this country so keenly felt the need of nation-wide prohibition. The calling of recruits reared in dry states into liquor infested communities has led parents to take a new interest in the subject. Heretofore the question of making the whole nation dry may have been to them an impersonal one; today it affects the welfare of those whom they hold most dear.

3. The present situation offers a rare and unprecedented opportunity for America to lead the whole world in this great reform. Every one of the Allies is considering and looking forward to disposing, in some summary way, of the drink evil. The older nations are held back by century-old economic entanglements. The United States, still in its youth, is not yet so enslaved to King Alcohol that it cannot break its fetters. The way our government shall deal with this stupendous problem will mightily influence other nations.

4. The paramount argument urged at this and all times against national prohibition is the loss of revenue. Admitting that there will be an apparent diminution in revenue to the government, probably there never will be a time in the history of the nation when this decrease will cause less consternation than today. By sale of bonds and by taxation the government is raising money by the billions, and the people are responding generously. If the waste of the liquor traffic can be eliminated from our national life, citizens will be in a position to contribute even more liberally to a war fund. It is simply a question of getting the money directly from the people, or letting it pass from the people through the hands of the distiller and brewer, after it has performed its destructive work.

5. If there is a scintilla of value in the argument that a large army of men now engaged in distilleries and breweries will be thrown out of employment by national prohibition, it loses all its force at the present time, for the supply of able bodied men today is insufficient to meet the demands of army, navy and civil enterprises.

6. But after all the most forceful reason for promoting national prohibition as we never have before is the need of conservation of food supplies and man power. Anything that lessens the physical, mental or spiritual vitality of an American citizen today is a hindrance to the prosecution of the war. No one, not even the liquor dealer, will attempt to deny that the liquor evil does all of these things. National constitutional prohibition is the only successful way to deal with this vice.

7. If ever the nation needed to have its political life, national, state and municipal, made clean, it is in these troublous times. It is a commonplace to say that the greatest corrupting influence in politics is the liquor traffic. If this war is to make the world safe for democracy, what more direct road can be taken to secure that end than to eliminate from our political life, once and for all, the influence of the liquor politician. Certainly the only way to accomplish this is by national constitutional prohibition.

September 9 is Temperance Sunday. The day offers a rare opportunity for bringing the truth to members of the Bible schools, for special programs and the distribution of convincing literature.

Mrs. Edith Smith Davis' revised leaflet, "Subjects and Rules for Prize Essay Contests," is now ready and can be procured from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House. Price, 2 cents each; per 50, 20 cents; per 100, 35 cents.

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

LABOR SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 2

As has been its custom during previous years the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has prepared a special message for Labor Sunday, September 2, and urges its widespread observance. This year the message relates especially to war conditions and discusses in a practical way the social ideals of the churches applied to labor problems in time of war, based upon the sixteen principles of social justice adopted by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America at its Philadelphia meeting and re-affirmed at the subsequent quadrennial meeting. The message deals with the problems which are uppermost in the minds of the American people in an unusually suggestive manner.

It refers particularly to the need of protection of the individual and society from the social, economic and moral waste of the liquor traffic, and says: "In the face of the need of food by the Allied nations and the probability of famine over wide areas in Europe, it has become imperative for the nation to stop the waste of grain and molasses used in the production of distilled liquors. In addition to this economic waste, we call attention to the waste of life and labor in the workers engaged in the business. Workers in the liquor business lose an average of six years of life, making a total loss in each generation of 1,800,000 years for its 300,000 workers. This means a total loss in each generation of the complete working life—30 years each—of 60,000 men." The Strengthen America Campaign which is being conducted by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has for its slogan, "If you believe that the traffic in alcohol does more harm than good—help stop it."

The message also urges the abolition of child labor; the fullest possible development of every child, especially by the provision of education and recreation; and the protection of the family by the single standard of purity.

ENGLISH TRADE UNION PETITIONS FOR PROHIBITION

The London correspondent of the Glasgow Herald says: "That all working men are not discontented with what some regard as a beer shortage seems to be proved by a resolution which a large branch of an important trade union has just passed. By an overwhelming majority it was decided to 'petition Parliament to suspend the manufacture of intoxicating liquors during the war in order that ingredients used in the manufacture of the said liquors may be used for bread and other foodstuffs, which are much more needed.' They are, they go on to declare, 'amazed at the silly twaddle to be read in many of our leading newspapers concerning the eating of less bread, etc., while this evil is permitted to exist,' and they suggest that 'the numbers of underfed and half-clothed children give a fair idea of what beer and the monopolist legislating class have brought us to.' The resolution is a curious mixture of advanced trade unionism and orthodox teetotalism, but that it fairly expresses the real views of an organized body of working men cannot with safety be doubted."

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What day in September has been set aside by the National W. C. T. U. for specially important work. How should the day be observed?
2. Can the liquor interests be held accountable in part for the exorbitant prices charged for necessary commodities? Why?
3. How does a formerly anti-prohibition South Dakota newspaper describe conditions since the dry law went into effect?
4. Tell how the California women voters are preparing for the next election of state legislators.
5. What effect has prohibition had upon the coroner's office in a certain Oregon city?
6. Give the testimony of some Virginia merchants as to the destructive(?) economic effects of the dry law.
7. Name some of the specially significant features of W. C. T. U. work at Chautauqua, N. Y., the past summer.
8. In which of the Canadian provinces does prohibition go into effect October 1?

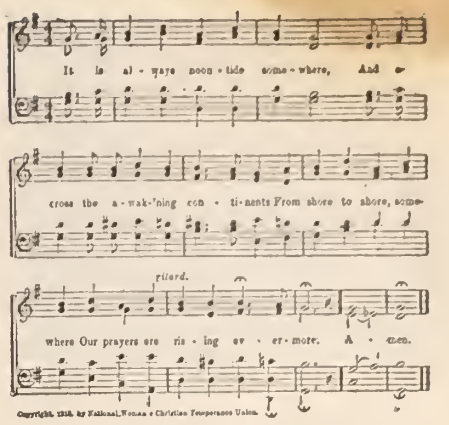
THE MAKING OF A SOLDIER

STELLA B. IRVINE, President Southern California W. C. T. U.

It has been well said:—"How is a soldier made? Whence comes the soldier in the man? A lad taken out of your street, dressed in soldier's uniform, fed on the soldier's rations, carrying a soldier's weapons and marching to music, is not a soldier—he is only a lad, clothed, fed, armed and marched like a soldier. The soldier in the man is generated by fierce processes; it is worried in by long marches, it is pressed in by long watches on the picket line, it is filtered in by the dews of night, it is washed in by the rains of heaven, it is starved in by a half biscuit a day, it is baked in by the fever on the hospital cot, it is blown in by shot and shell, it is thrust in by sabre and bayonet; that is how the soldier is made."

How have the real soldiers of the white ribbon army been made? The white ribbon host has as truly gone through the processes described above as any patriot who ever exchanged the softness of home life for the rigors of the field. It is this discipline alone that through the years has made white ribboners comrades: The bivouac out under the dark skies of apathy; the steadfast watch maintained in the trenches of the long adverse campaigns; the cannonade of criticism; the slow march retarded at every step by the ingenious attacks of a relentless enemy that never sleeps. All this has made us soldiers in our peaceful warfare. Our hearts are set as a flint; our eyes look straight on. All down the years of nearly a half century white ribbon soldiers have caught step, one with another, so that the march has been unbroken. Mighty inroads have been made upon the enemy, the liquor traffic. There have been no skirmishes or night attacks, for we have fought in the strong daylight of reason, conscience and faith. Our cause is divine and worthy of any sacrifice, even unto death.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE

The most important thing, which needs not only to be said, but also to be understood, is that life itself is the great school. Facts are teachers. Experiences are lessons. Friends are guides. Work is a master. Love is an interpreter. Teaching itself is a method of learning. Joy carries a divining rod and discovers fountains. Sorrow is an astronomer and shows us the stars. What I have lived I really know, and what I really know I partly own; and so begirt with what I know and what I own, I move through my curriculum, elective and required, gaining nothing but what I learn, at once instructed and examined by every duty and every pleasure.—Henry Van Dyke.

LOVE

Love is the filling from one's own
  Another's cup;
Love is a daily laying down
  And taking up.
A choosing of the stony path
  Through each new day,
That other feet may tread at ease
  The smoother way.
Love is not blind, but looks abroad
  Through other eyes,
And asks not, "Must I give?" but "May
  I sacrifice?"
Love hides its grief, that other hearts
  And lips may sing;
And, burdened, walks that other lives
  May, buoyant, wing.
Sinner, hast thou a love like this Within thy soul?
'Twill change thy name to saint, ere thou
  Hast reached thy goal.

—Pauline Frances Camp.

There isn't a day passes that we may not do something for the Master, if we will. Begin now. Do something for Him. Bring forth a little fruit at least. Ask God to help you bring forth some fruit today.—D. L. Moody.

LEGISLATING AND LECTURING IN OREGON AND MONTANA

ADAH WALLACE UNRUH, National Lecturer

Many months have passed since I have given an account of my work through the pages of THE UNION SIGNAL. They have not, however, been months of idleness. On the platform, with my pen and in personal service, I have been constantly busy for our beloved cause. All engagements outside of Oregon were canceled to enable me to help in the dry campaign and later to "mother" the bone dry bill through our state legislature.

A brief period of rest and then I went to Montana, where, as in every other state, the absorption of the women in relief work and the heartache of the wives, mothers, sisters and sweethearts over parting from their loved ones, made it difficult to secure attention. There were also during my stay several weeks of the hardest downpour of rain I have ever experienced. But in spite of all these difficulties the results were gratifying. The state W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Mary W. Alderson, who planned my itinerary, is a woman who never says "surrender" or forgets for one minute that the W. C. T. U. is primarily organized to secure the prohibition and annihilation of the liquor traffic and will not permit interest in any other work to detract from the zeal with which we continue to attack the drink evil.

WARTIME PROHIBITION IN KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI

SENA HARTZELL WALLACE, National Organizer

I wonder what the people who have been shouting themselves hoarse, saying, "Prohibition's no good! Prohibition doesn't prohibit!" will think when they learn that, because of the locating of a military camp in the downtown district of Kansas City, Missouri, a large section of that city has gone dry. This was brought about through the order of Francis M. Wilson, United States district attorney, who declares that the ruling is in accord with the proclamation of President Woodrow Wilson regarding the sale of liquors within a half mile of a military camp or rendezvous, and covers breweries, wholesale liquor houses, clubs, cafes and grocery houses selling liquors. The downtown districts became dry rapidly. Within thirty minutes after the force of the deputy United States marshal and the Department of Justice began business, hundreds of saloons were closed. Leading hotels also closed their bars. When the Federal officials finished their work August 13, 306 saloons had been closed. Two large breweries are prohibited from selling beer on their premises.

When asked if they expect to keep their saloons closed the men answer, "Of course we will stay closed; we are not going to take any chances with Uncle Sam."

Conspicuous in saloon windows are the following signs: "Closed—In War Zone." "Closed by United States Government." "We May Still Sell Lunches."

God speed the day when the war zone shall cover every foot of land in the United States.

PROMOTING PATRIOTIC SERVICE

The Georgia white ribboners contributed twelve times as much for the Ambulance Fund as was apportioned to them. The Fort Valley union, situated in the midst of the delicious Elberta peach section, sent $100. All contributions were accompanied by expressions of pleasure in giving.

Atlanta, Macon and Augusta will have three large cantonments. Preparations on a large scale are being made not only to clean things up morally but to furnish adequate recreation; not only to uproot the thorn, but to plant the rose.

Mrs. Mary Harris Armor has been invited to address the 5,000 soldiers now at Camp Harris, near her home. Special temperance music will be a feature.

Eight South Dakota unions have made a contribution of $128 to the Ambulance Fund although the apportionment for the entire state was but little more than $13. Beresford union alone raised $80, Presho rural union $25.

Local unions throughout Minnesota are making comfort bags and housewives. Already $150 has been pledged to the National W. C. T. U. Ambulance Fund. Soldiers are being entertained in the homes of white ribboners, and dinners and good times are being given to as many as possible. The annual Flower Mission day was observed at the state prison at Stillwater, August 5. Miss Rozette Hendrix, state W. C. T. U. president, preached the sermon.

The W. C. T. U. of Hudson, Mich., is busily engaged in making comfort bags, hospital envelopes containing clippings and doing other kinds of emergency work, including the holding of a series of porch parties under the direction of the superintendent of the department of Soldiers and Sailors, when the guests undertake various war tasks. People who are not members of the W. C. T. U. are invited to these parties and asked to join. Offerings are taken to purchase supplies for the comfort bags.

to our invitation to visit the exhibit, and after they had listened and looked and asked questions they learned to yell,

"Beer and whisky;
Both a curse;
I drink water,
Safety first."

We gave them a candy treat.

A Chautauqua Institution W. C. T. U. was organized with nearly fifty members. Meetings were held every Wednesday in Kellogg Hall, when women from many states met for conference along temperance lines. In all the National W. C. T. U. held twelve public meetings, entertained hundreds of visitors, and distributed thousands of pages of up-to-date literature.

Mrs. Carolyn P. Lindsay, National superintendent of Fairs and Open Air Meetings, prepared the exhibit and remained in charge of headquarters until relieved by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins. Miss Gwyneth Fulcher of Evanston was a most helpful assistant during the entire time.

The Chautauqua Daily was very generous with the space given to notices and more than once the W. C. T. U. was mentioned (and applauded) from the platform.

The influence of the Chautauqua W. C. T. U. headquarters is far-reaching and lasting, and the W. C. T. U. is an integral part of this great educational institution.

We record here the names of comrades and friends who have recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. EFFIE BURGAN, Minneapolis, Minn, a prominent W. C. T. U. worker of the state, for many years president of the Seventeenth District W. C. T. U. The great temperance parade in 1910, participated in by 10,000 people, was planned by Mrs. Burgan. She inaugurated the first missionary work among the logging camps of northern Minnesota in the early eighties, holding the state superintendency of Work among Lumbermen as long as her health would permit. She was a delegate to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, at Glasgow, Scotland, in 1910. Mrs. Burgan was a woman of rare and varied talents, a fine speaker and singer, a tactful presiding officer, possessed of rare intellectual attainments, and a gentle loving disposition, and with a strength of character which combined to give her a delightful personality.

MRS. L. E. WHITNEY, Whitewater, Wis., for many years treasurer of the local union, and an intensely loyal and helpful member.

REV. I. N. SMITH, Stevensville, Mont., husband of the late Mrs. I. N. Smith, who was prominent in W. C. T. U. work in Ohio and Montana, and the father of Mrs. Maggie Hathaway, member of the Montana legislature.

MRS. ADELIA COGSWELL of Hudson, Mich., a long time and faithful member and an officer of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Cogswell met a very sad and sudden death, being killed by a fast train. She will be greatly missed by her church and the union.

MRS. TEMPERANCE LONG of Deerfield, Mich., a devout Christian and a consecrated worker for the prohibition cause.

MISSOURI W. C. T. U. WORKERS FILL VACATION MONTHS WITH OUT-OF-DOOR ACTIVITIES

FANNIE L. TAYLOR

July and August are not vacation months with Missouri W. C. T. U. workers, but much of their work is carried on in out-of-door meetings. The second annual session of the state school of methods has been held and was very successful. The first occurred at Arcadia, Iron county, where one of the state W. C. T. U. bungalows is located; the second at Hollister, where the W. C. T. U. Rest Cottage provides a haven for white ribboners and their friends. The state officers, assisted by many of the state organizers, superintendents and county presidents, conducted the schools. The programs included addresses, contests, department symposiums, a model session, receptions, early morning prayer meetings, inner circle of prayer and vesper services, all of which were of great benefit. These summer schools are established as a permanent part of the Missouri W. C. T. U. work. They are held at the time of the state assemblies of the Methodist and Presbyterian churches and are mutually helpful and valuable to church and W. C. T. U. workers in every part of the service.

State Flower Mission Day

Mrs. Neva Thomas, state treasurer and lecturer, delivered the address at the state flower mission service at the state penitentiary, where United States flags and flowers were used in profusion in the chapel decorations. The prisoners gave a fine concert and enthusiastically expressed appreciation of the service. Twenty-seven hundred carnations and text cards were distributed. Only once in twenty years has Mrs. Georgia Blackwell, state Flower Mission superintendent, missed this state prison service. The honor system has been instituted with great success.

"The W. C. T. U. in War," was the large headline in the Kansas City (Mo.) Times recently, with the further words, "America Profits from the Union's Efficient Organization." The article gave in full the interview with Miss Anna A. Gordon, National president, published in the Washington Sun. Missouri W. C. T. U. women heartily appreciate the attitude of this great metropolitan newspaper in recognizing, as it often does, the value of the work of the W. C. T. U., state and National.

Patriotism and Prohibition

Notable among the many meetings held in the state in observanee of the National president's birthday, July 21, was the great open air meeting and W. C. T. U. day of the Kansas City district W. C. T. U. at Fairmount Park. Patriotic and prohibition songs and addresses by prominent speakers and singers were the order of the program. An interesting special feature was the presentation of a handsome flag from the Kansas City Woman's Advertising Club through their president, Miss Faith G. Slichter, who said in part: "Patriotism is the highest ideal of every true American citizen. All organizations, beyond every immediate motive, should hold this standard supreme. The W. C. T. U. in principle and practice is such an organization. Through its earnest endeavor to drive the menace of liquor from our land, by a wide educational campaign among both old and young alike, it has won the admiration and support of all serious-minded people. The flag, the emblem of our country, the badge of patriotism, is theirs by right of their unfailing devotion to so great and so splendid a work." At the close of the presentation service the great audience arose, saluted the flag, and sang in an enthusiastic chorus, "We Want Our Nation Dry." A basket dinner was spread and a profitable "get-together" time enjoyed. A neat sum was placed in the treasury as the W. C. T. U.'s share of receipts from entrance fees.

County Conventions

If it were only possible to mention even briefly each fine county convention it would give inspiration to white ribbon sisters of other states. Such enthusiastic gatherings, fine reports, educational contests and addresses, such inspiring patriotic and prohibition songs! Truly these made a most wonderful harvest time and round-up of the year's great activities. Each county is loyally striving to gather every cent of dues and make the twenty per cent gain in membership. Some unions have already reached the goal. The local unions are veritable beehives of industry, making housewives, comfort bags, surgical dressings, and knitting soldiers' sets. The fashion of the knitting bag swung from the arm is a very popular one with Missouri women. There are no shirkers in the Missouri white ribbon ranks.

That Dry Zone

President Wilson's order for a half mile dry zone around camps has closed 306 of the 536 saloons of Kansas City. Saloonkeepers would like to see some of these camps moved! The large hotel bars are affected. W. C. T. U. mothers and relatives of enlisted men are grateful for this protection and will redouble their efforts to win Missouri for prohibition in November, 1918.

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS DISCUSSED AT CALIFORNIA CONGRESS OF REFORMS

DORCAS J. SPENCER

The Congress of Reforms at Pacific Grove brings the faithful to that seaside Mecca annually, and with each recurring season the correlated interests of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union come up for discussion.

The Evangelistic element takes the lead, and the opening session on Sunday morning sounds the keynote of the week that follows. The pastor, Dr. F. K. Baker, was the preacher, his subject, "America's Larger Call in the New World Situation."

The evening address by ex-Senator Grant told "What the Law Enforcement League Has Done" and was a setting forth of the present status of the Red Light and Abatement law and efforts made for its enforcement. The speaker called to mind that it was just seven years ago, from that very platform, the movement to secure the law began. It has been a seven years' war and is not over yet. A campaign of education by the W. C. T. U. made its enactment possible, and the steadfast support of the organization has been a defense ever since, the state union having in one year given $1,000 to aid in its enforcement. It appears to be the object around which the forces of evil rally; in fact, the house of shame is the twin sister of the saloon; and Siamese twins they must be, the life of each dependent on the other. It cannot be doubted that the twins have had official support in the city of San Francisco, or that its police courts have been debauched by the unholy traffic.

The proximity of the great military encampment at the Presidio calls for energetic efforts, and saloon licenses are daily canceled for selling liquor to men in uniform. The orders of the Secretary of War are also aiding in the fight against the red light evil, and the protection of our soldiers may secure a safer environment for our homes.

Jury service was profitably discussed by the author of the law. He showed that service on juries was an advantage to women, while equally beneficial to the objects of justice.

The children are never overlooked, and the Loyal Temperance Legion had its part, always interesting, and like a rainbow of promise to the cause of prohibition.

Senator Kehoe came from a far northern county, Humboldt, to give a most suggestive address on "The Moral Measures of the Last Legislature and What Became of Them." Of twenty-eight bills referred to the committee on morals, only three reached the governor, and one of these met a pocket veto. Strong emphasis was laid on the importance of electing better legislators.

Following him in natural sequence was a deeply impressive presentation of the work of the Campaign of 1918 by Franklin Hichborn, a distinguished journalist who has for many years specialized on legislatures and their proceedings. He gave sound advice as to securing better material for future law-makers, urging immediate, persistent and systematic efforts to have names of reliable candidates in readiness for nomination, as well as a thorough, searching and continuous canvass of all voters, so that it shall be definitely known what may be expected of all.

Mr. Hichborn has for some years published a book giving a complete record of the individual votes of members of the state legislature on all important issues. This record should be a terror to evil doers, served up in cold type in a bound volume. The August number of The White Ribbon Ensign gives half its pages, including tabulated reports standing against the names of every legislator, to a full presentation of this accurate statement. Every member of the W. C. T. U. receives this, and has ample time to study, read, mark, learn and inwardly digest the knowledge before the next election, and cast her ballot for or against on the record of last year.

Rev. W. L. Stidger of San Jose gave a searching, thoughtful and impassioned address on the "Church's Care and the Church's Share in Labor Emancipation."

"The State Council of Defense in Relation to War Problems" engaged the hours of Wednesday, the vice chairman of the state organization leading the discussion. The most telling speech on the subject was given by Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, president of the Southern California W. C. T. U., who is also vice chairman of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense for California.

The Rev. Paul Smith spoke to a large evening audience on "The Modern Magdalene and her Exploiters," throwing yet more light on the matter of law enforcement in San Francisco.

Thursday was Americanization Day—another name for the distinctive work for our foreign born peoples. Dr. Arthur Briggs, Mrs. Irvine, Rev. Snyder, our own Miss Chase, and Miss Chickering, immigration secretary of the Y. W. C. A. all gave fine and strong addresses from their respective points of view, making an intensely interesting afternoon.

Following the same line of thought, the evening speaker, Rev. Vicente Mendoza, a Mexican pastor, showed how California can protect her Latin-Americans, a big subject and one of Califor-

A REMINDER OF MOTHER

JENNIE N. STANDIFER

Tale of a Soldier Boy Who had a Wholesome Fear of John Barleycorn

At the outbreak of the war with Germany, a company of soldiers had been stationed at G———— to protect the pier and important railroad bridges near the seaport town. One afternoon two women wearing white ribbon badges, motored to the camp and delivered to an officer a large package of literature.

"This is from the local Woman's Christian Temperance Union," they explained. "We hope you will be sure to read the prohibition papers and get others to peruse them."

"I will," agreed the soldier, with a light laugh.

This promise caused him an hour later to hand a copy of THE UNION SIGNAL to Dick Morton, who was just going on guard.

"I have given out everything else," said the officer. "Read it carefully and tell these good sisters, when they come again, how much you enjoyed it."

With a grimace Dick stuck the paper in his pocket and went on to join the detachment on duty.

Time hung heavily for the soldiers when on guard and an interesting paper or magazine was a luxury. This particular afternoon Dick was stationed where there was no one passing, and in half an hour he grew tired watching the monotonous loading of a ship with lumber. He took the paper from his pocket and glanced over several pages, his lip curling derisively as he read the headlines of articles declaring that prohibition is sure to come. He skimmed through an argument for war prohibition and turned to the story page. Under an attractive title was the name of a woman whom he had once known. Years ago, before he had run away from home, he had been proud of the fact that this celebrated writer was his mother's friend. During the years of his wandering he had forgotten her very existence.

As he walked his beat, keeping watch for passersby, he read the tale. It was sweet and wholesome with a strong plea for righteous living embodied in its plot. A scriptural promise of God's mercy and care, taught him in childhood, brought it to a close.

The story finished, Dick put the paper in his pocket and resumed his walk, a frown puckering his forehead. The reminder of his mother and the days when he was an innocent boy brought troublesome thoughts. He was not happy, but could he ever go back? Was there such a thing as real reformation for those who had wandered far from the straight and narrow way?

A man was coming down the pier. Dick called a halt and asked for his passport.

"Here it is," was the reply. "I'm out on a little private business that may interest you soldier boys. Some of the men in your company know about my place already, but you haven't been around. I only want to tell you where you and any of your pals can get something to drink when you're dry. I often see a lot of the boys at the picture shows in the evenings. It would be mighty easy for them to call at The Klondyke. A friend of mine will be ready to hand out the goods at a side entrance. I'll tell you where my stand is and give you the password so you—"

"I don't want it," interrupted Dick, sharply, as he turned away and took up his march.

"Beg your pardon. I took you for a dead sport," the man mumbled as he slouched away.

"Strange how that story has gotten hold of me," mused Dick as he paced to and fro. "I just couldn't patronize a blind tiger after reading that paper. Tom Walker is going to be disappointed if I don't go with him on that bum tonight, but I would feel as if I were hurting mother."

At six o'clock the guards were relieved and returned to camp. Dick Morton was met by Tom Walker, who began to tell of an escapade he had planned in which plenty of booze would be furnished.

"I'm not with you tonight, old fellow," said Dick gravely. "There are some letters I ought to write."

"Oh, any old time will do for those. We're all going to have a gay little time."

Dick again declined to yield to the enticement of his companion and that night, for the first time in years, wrote to his mother.

The following evening Dick Morton and Tom Walker were sent to take the places of the guards at a railroad bridge several miles north of the town. There had been attempts to dynamite other bridges and this, which spanned a wide, deep river, was watched with especial care. All travelers approaching the structure were to be closely catechised.

"Have something to make you happy, Dick," invited Tom when the two met a half hour after going on duty. He proffered a flask of whisky, saying: "Take an eye-opener, old man."

"I don't dare, Tom. Better cut it out yourself."

"What's the matter with you, Dick? Going to turn parson?"

"No, but I'm going to keep my wits about me tonight. I am not going to sleep on my job."

"Neither am I, but a finger or two of 'Old Rye' won't send a fellow to dreamland."

"There was a guard killed at a bridge above here last week. They say he was all seas over and the train ran over him."

"I don't propose to get drunk. Well, if you're going to be a mollycoddle, good night. Here's to your health as a bone-dry demonstrator!" He took a drink from the bottle and then slipped it in his pocket.

Dick struck a match to light a cigaret. In taking his package of "coffin tacks" from his pocket out tumbled THE UNION SIGNAL! That reminded him of his mother's many warnings as to the dangers lurking in nicotine. He tossed the package into the river, and began his lonely vigil with only thoughts as companions.

They were not pleasant thoughts. The heartaches he had caused his widowed mother, the opportunities he had failed to grasp, the indulgence in dissipations he knew to be harmful and the frequency of acts he would blush to have his mother know, brought a heaviness of heart he could not throw off.

Sleep? Who could sleep with such memories for company? He paused in his walk and standing in the shadow of the bridge, gazed down at the dark water below. He was aroused from his unpleasant revery by the sound of footsteps. Dick glanced down the railroad to discover a man carrying a bundle, slinking along by the side of the track. Instantly Dick called: "Halt!" and demanded the necessary passport.

The man stood as if dazed for a moment, then made a movement that indicated he intended flight. The soldier's gun, aimed at his heart, caused the trespasser to stop.

"Show your passport," commanded the soldier.

The man was silent. Dick decided this must be a suspect worth capturing. He fired his gun in the air—a signal for his fellow guardsman to come to his aid. A full minute passed with no response from Tom.

The rumble of the south bound passenger train caused him anxiety. Again he fired his gun. Still no answer.

In a few moments the train had reached the bridge—and stopped. Dick commanded his prisoner to move further from the railroad track. The man stupidly scrambled down the embankment to a safe distance. The train did not come as expected. Dick realized that there was something exciting going on at the other end of the bridge, but he was too intent on holding his prisoner to look in that direction.

Presently the conductor came along and called:

"You asleep, too, guardsman? No—I see you are on to your job and have a suspect in charge. I hate to tell you, but that poor fellow over there was killed. An empty flask tells the tale. I wanted to be sure you, too, were not on the track in a drunken stupor."

The daily paper which chronicled the unfortunate killing of Tom Walker, and praised him for being a brave soldier, also gave an account of the arrest of a foreigner carrying a bag of potatoes, which Private Morton, who made the arrest, mistook for dynamite.

"But for the timely reminder of mother and what she and other good women stand for I might have met Tom's fate," thought Dick. "With God's help, never again shall there be occasion for sorrow over an act of mine."

WAR RELIEF WORK OF GEORGIA W. C. T. U

LELLA A. DILLARD, President Georgia W. C. T. U.

When the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense was organized in our state, June 26, the president of the W. C. T. U. responded to the call of the state chairman and attended the initial meeting and has since sent in a report, giving a brief summary of work done in the past, and a detailed account of present activities, pledging loyalty in further service to our government.

Although our women have joined the Red Cross society we are following the "team work" plans made by our National officers, and at this time are making comfort bags for the Georgia boys in training at the naval training station at Norfolk, Va. Mrs. Julius Magath, our corresponding secretary, is assembling the bags at Oxford. Our plan is for the local unions to make the bags and furnish everything but the Testament, the song book, the pledge card and the leaflets. To save expense these were ordered in large numbers and will be placed in the bags by Mrs. Magath, the local unions sending twenty-five cents for each bag to cover cost. Besides making these blue denim bags, many unions have made, or are making khaki bags or "kits" for our boys at Camp Harris, Macon. One of the secretaries at Army Y. M. C. A. headquarters was one of our Loyal Temperance Legion boys, and will take charge of all bags for distribution. He has asked us to send good magazines, books and papers to be kept at headquarters.

Our L. T. L. children are raising a fund for the support of a French orphan and this money, and the jelly they are making for the base hospital at Ft. McPherson, will be sent to our state superintendent of Flower Mission and Relief Work to be forwarded to the proper destination.

Our state superintendent of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors has opened her home at Brunswick two days in each week for the making of comfort bags. Some of our unions through her have furnished bags to boys from their home towns, and she has made a bag, very simple in design, that she recommends and which is very pretty and inexpensive.

Recently we have asked for freewill offerings to support French orphans, but as yet it is impossible to state for how many we will be responsible. We made a call for freewill offerings for the ambulance fund and on August 1 our contributions had amounted to $323, and some good unions had not yet reported.

Work Among Colored People has for some time been on the hearts and consciences of our white ribboners, and at our official board meeting in March we decided to invite Mrs. Eliza E. Peterson, National superintendent, to our state for at least a month's work. When we saw that there was to be an enlargement of the department of Work Among Foreign Speaking People under the classification, "Americanization," and we realized how comparatively few foreign women there are in Georgia, it seemed fitting that at this time we take as our part of the patriotic program Work Among Colored People.

In arranging for Mrs. Peterson's work in our state there has been the most cordial co-operation of the presidents of our local unions, and the leaders among her own people have been diligent in making plans. The pastors of churches for the colored people are opening their churches and arranging for her entertainment and the teachers are co-operating. Dr. J. W. E. Bowen, dean of the Gammon Theological Seminary; with Mrs. W. K. Fountain of Morris Brown College, are arranging for meetings in Atlanta and the first engagement will be under the auspices of the City Federation of Colored Women's Clubs.

The safety of our Soldiers and the welfare of our Nation, both now and after the war, will depend in no small degree upon the campaign of temperance education to be carried on in the training camps.

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY:

"Beer is a far more dangerous enemy to Germany than all the armies of France."
—VON MOLTKE.

"The next war, the next naval encounter, will demand of you sound nerves. These are undermined by alcohol, endangered from youth up, by its use. The nation which drinks the least alcohol will be the winner."
—KAISER WILHELM, 1910.

WHAT OUR SOLDIERS WILL FACE

Ernest Gordon in his book, "The Anti-Alcohol Movement in Europe," says that "In France as a whole there is a drink shop to every 82 persons. Rouen has one for every 60 inhabitants; le Nord one for every 38. There are certain streets in Paris with a saloon to every three houses."

WHAT OUR ALLIES SAY:

"We are fighting Germany, Austria and Drink; and, as far as I can see, the greatest of these three deadly foes is Drink."

"Give me a teetotal army and I will lead it anywhere."
—LORD ROBERTS.

"Drink is as much your enemy as Germany."
—RAYMOND POINCAIRE. President of the Republic of France.

M. Joseph Reinach, the French statesman, says: "Of our half million drink shops, one-tenth provide at the same time alcohol and women. There are in France fifty thousand of these cabarets furnishing filles en carte."

That there may be no waste or duplication of effort, the eighteen leading temperance and reform organizations named below, for the purpose of work in the Training Camps among the soldiers, have combined into the United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy.

DO YOU KNOW, "MOTHER UNIONS?"

Mother W. C. T. U.'s, are you being a true, cherishing mother to children of your union? How many Young Crusaders are taken in your union? Are your children taught to look forward to receiving THE UNION SIGNAL? Are those of the Y. P. B. age waiting for it to see what is in it which will help them in preparing their English themes? Do you know, Mother unions, that when our president, Mrs. Barr, visited our city last year she furnished data for a history of the temperance movement in the United States? Our president was the last resort. Mrs. Barr supplied all the material needed to produce a "double A" paper. The senior sought not in vain when she came to the W. C. T. U. for aid. This spring a junior in college wanted data for a thesis on "Food Conservation." Long and vainly she searched for brief, concise, authentic material for her article. She, too, turned to the W. C. T. U. and there in the dear old UNION SIGNAL "just the thing" was found. No one questioned her statements, for facts are facts, and we surely find them when we refer to THE UNION SIGNAL.

Many of our own boys and girls are past The Young Crusader age. Well, we can subscribe for our grand-children, or our little nieces and nephews. Just twenty-five cents, and our little ones are reminded of us twelve times each year. What better Christmas or birthday present? It will help them to remember grandmother, auntie, their little white bows and the fact that now big brother, uncle or cousin will soon be safeguarded from the demon drink wherever duty calls him.—Minnie D. Ageton in the East Washington White Ribboner.

W. C. T. U. ACTIVITIES

Hillsdale and Lenawee county (Mich.) W. C. T. U. held its annual picnic at Manitou Beach on the shore of Devil's Lake. Members and friends came from many towns. A fine program was given, consisting of readings and addresses. Mrs. Jennie Wilcox of Jackson was the speaker of the day. Rev. Kuhlman of Addison led in devotions. Mrs. Matie Kirby was elected president for the ensuing year.

Schuylkill county (Pa.) W. C. T. U. recently held a most successful and enthusiastic institute and picnic combined at a grove near Tamaqua. Mrs. Sylvia B. Norrish, corresponding secretary of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., in addition to delivering an inspiring evening address, gave valuable aid and counsel throughout the day. Work for soldiers and sailors was presented by Mrs. Gertrude Wagner. Other speakers were Mrs. Lauterbach, Mrs. Elizabeth Schaeffer, Mrs. Simmons and Miss Martha Price. These numbers, interspersed with music and readings, constituted a most helpful program. Representatives were present from nearly every town in Schuylkill county.

The Richland county (O.) Dry Federation conducted a most successful campaign on the "Fourth" at Mansfield with a record-breaking parade of autos and marching delegations from the various townships. Several thousand people assembled for the afternoon program at South Park. Interesting features were a flag drill by seventy-five boys and girls conducted by Miss Rose Leiter, the flag processional by standard bearers, the boys' drum corps, the prohibition yell, the final salute of the flag by the large company of children, and a masterful patriotic address by Mrs. Florence D. Richard, president of the Ohio W. C. T. U. The liquor interests tried to outwit the prohibition forces by arranging for a "community parade." They engaged every brass band and musical instrument available in the county. When their purpose became evident the chamber of commerce, the Elks, the G. A. R., the Federation of Woman's Clubs, and others declined to cooperate. The openly expressed opposition of the liquor men won many to the cause of prohibition.

The Georgia W. C. T. U. continues its activities for war prohibition and for national constitutional prohibition. It is also working strenuously for the following state measures: Anti-cigaret, age of consent, temperance day and against a repeal of the law to prevent freight trains running on the Sabbath.

nia's problems deserving far more attention than it has received. The speaker paid a glowing tribute to the work of Mrs. Addie Fields, a former W. C. T. U. missionary in Mexico and spoke hopefully of Mexico's future. Mexico now has three dry states, and dry Porto Rico is the triumph of the Latin-Americans of today.

Dr. Sara E. Wise was Friday's chief speaker on "The Second Line of Defense—the Home." Earlier in the week she had given, in connection with her community lectures, a baby clinic, in which a large number of babies were examined, and valuable hints given to their mothers. Dr. Wise is doing a wonderful work for mothers, children, and purity, and is kept constantly in the field by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Anna E. Chase, W. C. T. U. lecturer on Scientific Temperance Instruction, has also been continually in the field lecturing in schools. The vice-president-at-large, Mrs. Estes, has been doiug her part as organizer. The president, Mrs. Sara Dorr, presided at nearly every session of the Congress, and besides filled every chink "between meetings" with extra sessions of the executive committee, for the gathering of this Congress affords opportunity for considering, from day to day, the plans to be brought before the coming state convention. From the daily prayer meeting at seven in the morning until the evening benediction, there was no surcease of "meetings"—and that is the way our women go to the seaside and rest. Happily, there is a rest that remaineth.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

Wednesday, August 29, Senator Brady, a Republican of Idaho, during the opening hour said, "Mr. President, I hold in my hand the reply of President Wilson to the suggestions of the Pope, relative to the terms of peace, and I am going to ask that this reply, together with an editorial and certain comments of the eastern press, be printed in the Congressional Record." He then went on to declare: "I believe that reply will take rank in the world's history with Lincoln's address at Gettysburg, and Washington's farewell address to the Army and to the people. This reply of the President to the Pope is the beginning of the end of autocracy in the world." Senator Brady intends to have this page of the Record printed and distributed to every leading citizen in every county of his state.

Senator James of Kentucky also made request that a signed article and a report of a speech recently delivered by William Jennings Bryan be printed in the Record, saying, "The sentiment expressed is so genuinely patriotic, so thoroughly American, and breathes in such a splendid way the real spirit of devotion to our country, it should be given as wide publicity as possible." This is considered a marked honor, and for these two prominent men to be so honored at the same time, is a well deserved tribute to two loyal Americans.

The Senate is still debating the War Tax bill, this being the fourth week of the discussion. On Tuesday, by a vote of 39 to 29, the provision in the bill to increase letter postage from two cents to three cents was stricken out. The provision giving American soldiers and sailors abroad the privilege of mailing letters free, was retained.

Two days were spent in the discussion of the periodicals tax provision. Senator Weeks of Massachusetts advocated its elimination, asserting it was unjust and oppressive. Amendments were introduced by Senator Hardwick of Georgia and Senator McKellar of Tennessee and on Wednesday by a vote of 40 to 35 the Senate adopted the McKellar amendment relating to the rates on second class mail matter. It establishes a zone system. The existing one cent a pound rate is retained for the first three zones; in the fourth zone the rate is fixed at two cents, and increases one cent a pound in each zone up to six cents in the eighth zone. A unanimous consent agreement was reached to take the final vote on this measure not later than 4 o'clock on Monday, September 10.

Japanese Envoys Royally Entertained

The Japanese envoys have been royally entertained during their stay in Washington. On Thursday they were received with considerable formality by the United States Senate, Viscount Ishii, the special ambassador and head of the delegation, addressed the Senate in most excellent English. In a statement to the Associated press soon after their arrival here, Count Ishii explained why they had visited this country: "First, to convey to the President and to the American people the appreciation and congratulations of the Emperor and the nation of Japan for the entrance of the United States into the war as allies of Japan and the other nations now waging war against the enemies of freedom; second, to determine how best to co-operate with the United States in carrying the war to a triumphant conclusion. Having determined in what manner Japan can use her resources and strength to this end, it is the purpose of the mission to further aid the allied cause by showing what she can do with the help and co-operation of the United States. Japan is entirely unselfish in her aim. We are fighting for a common end and we wish to aid in the common efforts."

Federal Child Labor Law in Force Sept. 1

The new Federal Child Labor law became effective Saturday, September 1. Under its provisions no child under fourteen may be employed in any factory, mill, workshop or cannery whose products are shipped in interstate commerce, and no child under sixteen may work in any mine or quarry. The law also provides that children of fourteen and fifteen years may not work longer than eight hours a day. To question the constitutionality of this law injunction proceedings have been instituted in Greensboro, N. C., before Federal Judge Boyd. The importance of the suit is indicated by the imposing array of counsel. The Department of Justice (which has retained Prof. T. I. Parkinson of Columbia University as leading counsel), the national Child Labor committee, the cotton manufacturers, in addition to the petitioners, a father and two sons, both minor children, one under sixteen the other under fourteen years of age, are represented. Their father contends that he has a right to their wages until they are twenty-one, and that as the North Carolina law allows eleven hours as a working day, the older boy has the right to work more than eight hours a day, while the younger has a right to work in the mill although under fourteen, because the state law permits it. This case will be watched with great interest by those interested in the welfare of children. From the beginning of the effort to protect boys and girls from the hardships of long and cruel hours, manufacturers, especially those in the cotton states, have fought it. In this connection I want to mention a very commendable plan which has recently been inaugurated for the benefit of children. The elementary schools reach one hundred per cent of the 35,000,000 children of school age; ninety-three per cent go out to become bread winners; seven per cent enter the high school. When the apprenticeship system was abolished nothing else was substituted. Children were taught that textbook training was the only thing worth while and that to labor with the hands was degrading. Today we hear the same statement everywhere: "Our schools are not educating our children; when they leave school they know little or nothing which helps them to earn a living."

Patriotic
Membership Day
September 12

National Conference for Elementary Education Formed

To offset this a national conference for elementary education has been organized for the purpose of aiding in making the basic schools of the country of more practical value. The members of the conference, which comprises many notable and earnest workers along other lines as well, believe that through thorough organization, lecturers, and other propaganda it will be possible to so change the curriculum as to make textbook work more thorough, insure character building and inculcate respect for parents, for age, for infirmity, for office, in the impressionable years of the child, and at the same time provide training in the shop, in farming, gardening, canning, preserving, cooking, sewing, etc., etc. The plan of the organization is to establish demonstration schools in which industrial, vocational and literary training will be given, these schools to be used as models to contrast the inefficiency of the present system with one which meets the needs of today. Mrs. Gregory, wife of the Attorney General, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Mrs. Champ Clark, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Henry T. Rainey, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, Mrs. Wm. Butler Bonham, and others are endorsers of the movement.

After a three days' struggle, the price of wheat has been fixed at $2.20 per bushel by President Wilson for the 1917 crop, as recommended by the wheat price committee, Dr. H. A. Garfield, son of President J. A. Garfield, chairman. The committee was unable to agree and at one time it looked as if it would be unable to come to a conclusion, but just before six o'clock yesterday, August 30, a compromise was reached and the last vote was unanimous. Representatives of the producers began by voting for a price at $2.50 per bushel, and labor's representatives for $1.84; the two extremes eventually narrowed down until the votes were only a few cents apart, when finally a compromise was agreed upon, and the President notified as stated. It is hoped by the committee that the fixing of a price will stabilize the market, and keep prices within moderate bounds for all transactions during the current year. Great pressure was brought to bear on the committee from many quarters, to set the price at a higher figure than that named, but the final decision it is believed represents a majority opinion of what is fairest to all the interests of the country.

Women Organize as "First Aid for Damaged Clothes"

Word comes to Washington that twenty-five women of East Orange, N. J., have organized as the "first aid corps for damaged clothes," and have left to report at Sea Girt, where many New Jersey boys are in training. They have volunteered to repair the uniforms and clothing of state troops encamped there.

About one hundred soldiers were entertained at the rest and recreation rooms by the Chapin union on Wednesday evening. The rooms are well patronized and the men appreciate the kindly care bestowed upon them by the members of the different unions, and especially the kindly hostess, Mrs. Cusick.

St. Louis, Kansas City and St. Joseph Saloons Ordered Closed as Soldiers Entrain

St. Louis, Kansas City and St. Joseph are to have a short term of prohibition. On September 5, the day the first of the drafted men of Missouri entrain for Fort Riley, and on the two later dates, probably September 19 and October 3, when the remainder of the men leave their homes, the saloons of these cities are to be closed for twenty-four hours. Acting Governor Wallace Crossley has issued a proclamation to this effect, in which he urges that the three days of entrainment be made three days of inspiration. "Let us accord the young Missourians who have been called to the colors the honor they deserve," he urges. "Let us applaud their patriotism and make the three days designated above days of inspiration to those who go and those who remain behind. May the spirit of true Americanism, thoughtful, dignified and impressive, prevail upon these occasions, so that we may all feel the solemnity of the hour—the beginning of our sacrifice, as we send forth our pledges in this struggle for national honor, even for national life. There will be heavy hearts and lonely firesides, and it will be a time of trial as well as of pride and patriotism.

"With these ideas in mind, impressed with the importance of providing against any untoward incidents, and in order that the assembling of the young men may be decorous and unattended by boisterous or unseemly conduct which would mar the memory of the occasion for citizens and soldiers, I, Wallace Crossley, acting governor of the state of Missouri, have this day directed the officials vested with enforcement of the excise laws in St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Joseph and St. Louis county to see that all saloons and bars remain closed upon each of the three days set for the departure of Missouri's quota, due notice of which will appear in the public press, and I hereby request that all county and city authorities having local jurisdiction lend their necessary aid in enforcing the spirit and letter of this proclamation."

Cabaret Business Menaced by Prohibition

Cabaret owners and managers see in the progress of prohibition the destruction of their business. According to Frederic J. Haskin, special correspondent to the Chicago Daily News, the cabaret interests are watching the dry movement with breathless concern, seeing in its advance their doom. "One Chicago cabaret," says the writer, "has even taken the precaution to insert in its contracts for Broadway attractions a cancellation clause, which reads, 'providing the city does not go dry in the meantime.'" In explanation of this fear, Mr. Haskin remarks, "It is impossible to see how anybody could enjoy this (the average) type of cabaret while thoroughly sober and the fact of the matter is that he does not.

"Not long ago, prohibition was established in a town which was known for its riotous cabarets. Three weeks after it went into effect most of the houses closed their doors, but one endeavored to lengthen its life by the sale of soft drinks. In three nights it entertained just twelve persons."

Australia Prohibits Importation of Beer

The commonwealth of Australia is reported to have prohibited the importation into its territory of beer, in accordance with the recommendation of the Luxuries Board, which included beer with other luxuries which in its judgment should be prohibited.

Chicago Dry Federation to Find Employment For Liquor Men

The Chicago Dry Federation is making the statement that it will find positions for any men engaged in the liquor business who may lose their jobs through prohibition, or for any men who desire to leave this business before the advent of prohibition.

General John F. O'Ryan, of "Bone Dry" Fame, Made Major General in U. S. Army

General John F. O'Ryan, commander of the National Guard of New York, who fearlessly blazed the "bone-dry" trail for soldiers, by last year putting his 20,000 New York troops on the Rio Grande "on the water wagon," wiping out drunkenness, prostitution, venereal disease and lawlessness, from his division, has just been commissioned by President Wilson and the Senate as Major General of the United States Army.

He is one of only two of tens of thousands of National Guard officers to be so honored.

Major General O'Ryan will take a "bone-dry" division of 37,000 men to France. In an address just issued to every man, from brigadier-general down to private, General O'Ryan says:

"You are about to engage actively in war, the greatest war in the world's history. The majority of the soldiers of the division are young men. Their future careers are to be affected mightily by what they do and how they act during the period of the war. Right among your comrades in the ranks of the division today are future leaders in public life—governors, mayors, ministers, financiers, manufacturers, educators, and great soldiers. In all probability there are some whose lives will be complete failures. In which group do you propose to be? Have you thought of this? The subject is an important one for you. It is because of this and because of the effect of your attitude and habits upon the efficiency of the division that I am addressing you in this personal way.

"This cannot be if we are to permit 'booze' in any form in our military machine. Alcohol, whether you call it beer, wine, whisky, or by any other name, is a breeder of inefficiency. While it affects men differently, the results are the same, in that all affected by it cease for the time to be normal. Some become forgetful, others quarrelsome. Some become noisy, some get sick, some sleepy; others have their passions greatly stimulated. When you stop to consider the thousands in a division, do you not see how vital to efficiency is the elimination of liquor? If one officer or man is permitted to use liquor, then others will claim the right to do so. How can a division of troops be ever ready—ever up on the bit to drive ahead or thrust back the enemy's drive—if through the presence of this insidious evil some soldiers forget their orders or become noisy when silence is essential, fall asleep when every faculty should be alert, or are absent from their posts?"

Brewery to Make Syrup

The making of syrup and stock feed from watermelons is now under way at the plant of the Dixie Fruit Products Company at the old Mobile (Ala.) Brewery, it is reported.

Brewery Employs Fifty More Men to Make Soft Drinks

The Deppen Company, one of the five big brewery firms in Reading, Pa., has installed a well-equipped soft drinks department in its plant. The management predicts that prohibition will not injure the business of the company, and it is planning to enlarge the working force by fifty men to take care of the soft drink trade.

LEADING MEN OF ALL CLASSES STAND FOR EQUAL SUFFRAGE IN MAINE

VOTE TO BE TAKEN SEPTEMBER 10

The men citizens of Maine vote September 10 on whether or not the women of the state shall be given full suffrage. Statesmen, educators, publicists, authors and leaders in church and commercial life have outspokenly advocated ballots for women. In a recent issue of the Lewiston Journal are published articles and letters from some of Maine's most prominent citizens.

President George C. Chase of Bates College says:

"I believe in suffrage for women in Maine and in our country.

"The Consent of the Governed"

"1. Because I hold this truth to be self-evident, that 'governments instituted among men derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.' There can be no doubt that the women of Maine are included among the governed.

"2. Because the rights and the welfare of women in their social, civic and industrial relations with their fellows cannot be assured to them unless they have a share in the making and the execution of laws that will recognize and maintain these rights.

Women Needed in the Wider Sphere of World Home-Making

"3. Because the welfare of society demands that women have an opportunity as voters to care for great interests that they are peculiarly adapted to protect and to promote—such as temperance, social purity, domestic sanitation, the health of women wage earners, and the guarding of children against the danger of premature and excessive work harmful to their development and to the future of the race.

"4. Because an interest in the great problems of our country, problems to be solved by appropriate legislation which women may share in securing, will contribute powerfully to their own intellectual and moral development by imparting to them a deep sense of responsibility that will lift their thoughts and activities above the trivial and belittling amusements and avocations that are unfavorable to moral earnestness, high conceptions of duty and the consecration of their lives to the promotion of human welfare.

"5. Because the quickened and increased interest in the affairs of government, municipal, state and national, that would result from giving women the ballot would render them more alert and more effective in training their children wisely and conscientiously to meet the responsibilities of citizenship and society."

Insistent Demand for Woman Suffrage by Both Men and Women

"I shall vote for the amendment and hope to see it prevail at the polls," are the words of Senator Bert M. Fernald.

"It has become a settled policy of our state that when there is a demand for a change it shall be granted. No one can deny that there is a demand for this change in Maine. Today, we have a strong demand for the vote for women in every part of the state. It is not confined to our women, but the men share the sentiment. The Republican party has endorsed the sentiment and declared for it.

"Under such conditions how can any of us go to the polls at the special election and not vote for the amendment which is to extend to our thousands of women the right to exercise the franchise on election day in the future."

"The basic principle of democracy is that government derives its just powers from 'the consent of the governed,'" says Prof. Frank E. Woodruff of Bowdoin College. "How can we as a nation champion democratic government for the world, if we are not willing to apply its principles consistently at home? 'Consent of the governed,' if carried to its logical conclusion, cannot stop short of full suffrage for women, full participation in the government which makes the laws, collects the taxes, and by its requirements for the common good regulates the conditions of life for the community and the home. Not until women are permitted to do their bit will our government be in the full sense 'broad-based upon the people's will.'"

Bishop Benjamin Brewster is an outspoken champion of suffrage. "On general grounds, I am frankly in sympathy with the movement for equal suffrage," says the bishop. "Women in these days have practically the same opportunities for education that men have. They are more and more showing their ability in lines of business activity. The holding of property carries with it logically the right to vote on questions involving taxation and the expenditure of public funds.

Woman Suffrage Not an Experiment

"The interests of woman wage-earners can be understood naturally by women better than by men. Moreover, the responsiveness of women, generally speaking, to high moral, civic and industrial ideals is an argument, in my mind, for extending the ballot to women in this age of industrial progress, when human values must be watchfully conserved. I will add that an experience of over twenty years' residence in states where equal suffrage prevails, has strengthened my opinion about these matters. Nor do I think that the enlargement of woman's horizon by the possession and exercise of the right to vote in any way tends to weaken family ties, or to the neglect of the home."

Economic Reasons Forcing the Issue

Dr. Augustus O. Thomas of Augusta, formerly of Nebraska, and now state superintendent of the public schools of Maine, says: "It would hardly seem necessary for one to declare his allegiance to equal rights when he comes from a state which has recently granted all the rights of suffrage to women possible under the constitution of the state.

"Modern conditions are forcing equal representation upon us very rapidly. We do not need to deal with the moral side of this question any longer for economic reasons are forcing the issue.

"The women of our country should have the right of suffrage. They are entering practically all of the professions and occupations, earning, accumulating and handling property, and require such representation as suffrage can give as a social and economic necessity."

John Kendrick Bangs, the popular humorist, declares, "I am heart and soul in favor of woman suffrage. I am for woman suffrage as a matter of simple justice to women." "The thing is coming as surely as tomorrow's sun," he adds, "and in my judgment the sooner we get it the better, not only because we shall have settled a question that is breeding a deal of unnecessary acrimony in the world, but that we shall thereby have taken another step forward in the full democratization of the race."

THE UNESCAPABLE

He took his paper up to read,
And saw in big type, "Women Plead
For Rights," threw it down in rage,
And sought a magazine's fresh page,
Yet the same thing stirred his ire,
"Women to Politics Aspire."
And when he looked a new book o'er,
He stormed when "Mothers' Votes" he saw.
And so eschewing print he went
To walk the streets on pleasure bent,
And straightway to a crowd drew near
In time a suffrage speech to hear.
Then full of wrath he fled the town
To pace the white sands up and down,
And listen to the waves, but there
He found a tent with banners fair,
Another crowd, another speech,
Which sent him flying from the beach,
To seek the country roads talk free,
Yet there he met a company
Of suffrage hikers on their rounds,
And so he fled from nature's bounds,
But found that movie, church and maid,
Press, parlor, club and street and glade,
All flaunted votes-for-women wide—
So to escape, he went and died.

SUFFRAGE CANS—USE NO OTHER

Suffrage Can Protect Children

Out of eleven full suffrage states of the Union 72.7 per cent have good child labor laws, and 100 per cent have compulsory education laws.

Suffrage Can Protect the Family

Ninety and nine-tenths per cent of the suffrage states have mothers' pension laws.

In 90.9 per cent mothers have equal rights with fathers over their own children.

Suffrage Can Protect the Working Women

In 63.6 per cent of the equal suffrage states there are minimum wage laws.—Woman Citizen.

HOW THE NAVY CAME TO BE "BONE DRY"

A HUMAN INTEREST INSIGHT INTO THE WINE MESS ORDER

In a thrillingly interesting article in the Sunday School Times of August 25, Mr. Howard A. Banks, former private secretary to Secretary Josephus Daniels, tells of an interview with the head of the Navy Department. In it is related, in Secretary Daniels' own words, the incident which led to the issuance of the famous Wine Mess Order:

"One day, shortly after I had become Secretary, a gentleman came into the Department to plead for the restoration of a young relative of his, who had been dismissed from the Navy for intoxication. I showed him the record, which proved that this young officer had not only been drunk, but had at the same time made a public exhibition of himself. I explained that there was no course to be pursued but to act firmly and finally in approving the court martial which had recommended the young officer's dismissal.

"When I made it plain that the young man must inevitably pay the penalty, this gentleman protested earnestly and with much feeling against what he insisted was the injustice his young relative had received at the hands of the Navy. 'Now that he is the product of your system,' said my visitor, 'you have turned him out in disgrace.' He then went on to tell me the following story of the young man's life. Said he:

"'I am a Friend, a Quaker, and the boy's father was a Quaker. He was a little shaver when his father died, and the lad came into my home, and has always been to me as a son. I never even had so much as a glass of wine in my home, and when the boy left for Annapolis to enter the Naval Academy he did not know what the taste of liquor was like. I gave him to the American Navy, pure-hearted, unsullied, believing absolutely in the old-fashioned Quaker ideas in which he had been reared.

"'In the seven years you have had him in the Navy you gave him wrong ideas about drinking. You taught him that it was all right for a gentleman to have his toddy. You legalized the Wine Mess. You had a code that made a youth feel that he was narrow-minded if he turned down his glass at the table; but now that my boy has been ruined by you and your system, the Navy kicks him out, and puts a stigma on him.'

"Much more than this he said, but this is the substance of his strictures. He was a strong man, and his feeling for the youth whose drinking had wrecked his life was pathetically deep and genuine. When he went out, I could not throw off a stinging sense of justice in his accusation. All day it haunted me that in the discharge of my official duty I had been compelled to approve a decree for which a Navy practice was largely responsible.

"For days I was oppressed by the thought that every young man in the Navy, many coming from homes like that described by my Quaker visitor, was subject to similar temptation.

"As time went by there were more court martials—not many, but enough to add to my profound conviction that the old Quaker had pointed me out unerringly the path of duty.

"I knew very well what the issuing of the Wine Mess Order meant. I counted the cost. I knew that many officers in the Navy, temperate, honorable, as high-minded as King Arthur's knights, without fear and without reproach, would resent it, resent it bitterly; they would feel that the order would convey a wrong impression to the world.

"I realized that the order would be assailed by a multitude of people who would regard it as puritanical. I anticipated that the protest against it might reach into the house of Congress. But if I was at any time tempted not to take the step for any of these reasons, the reflection that every year there came into the Navy hundreds of young men, some of whom might find their undoing in indulgence, made my duty plain. If I had not issued it I could not have rested with a clear conscience unto this day.

"As you know, the storm did break. Some naval officers did fear that the order was a reflection upon them. The penny-a-liner considered it a windfall for them, and much cheap wit was indulged in at the expense of the order. The cartoonists of some big dailies also considered it food for thought. Tragic pictures they drew of Mumm's Extra Dry, with a frightened look on its face, 'walking the plank,' to take its doomed plunge into Davy Jones' locker, from the deck of a warship, while I, depicted as a tyrant as relentless as Nero, was standing on the bridge surrounded by weeping officers.

"The approval, however, outside of these restricted circles, was general. The order was hailed with so much satisfaction by the fathers and mothers of the country that my mail was doubled and trebled for a month or two. By the time Congress assembled, those who had thought to attack the order upon the floors of Congress found there was not a man in either House who ever raised the issue. By that time, too, the Navy officers learned that it was far from any thought of mine to reflect upon the service. I took occasion to let the public know that so far as the mass of the officers were concerned there was no need for the order. It was issued to safeguard the young men who were coming into the service. The public well understood that that was the reason, and heartily approved it.

"As the days went by, the order increasingly won over the approval of the officers themselves. To illustrate, one of the ablest Admirals of the Navy, a man whose name is known in naval circles all over the world, who is always frank and genuine, told me that he had never known such a revolution in the Navy as had been brought about by the Wine Mess Order. Said he:

"'When you issued the order, I deeply resented it. I felt that the public would take the view that Navy officers were given over to indulgence, and that some formal action was necessary to keep them sober. That is the only reason I would have advanced against issuing it, if my advice had been sought.

"'On the very day that you issued the order I had stocked up my closet with the usual wines and liquors, as was customary, to be used when I entertained guests on board ship. I had never been either a drinking man or a teetotaler, but enjoyed a glass of champagne at a dinner-party, and on a frosty morning I occasionally took a nip; but I should never have carried intoxicants upon any ship I ever commanded, except to entertain some guests in the same manner as they entertained me at their homes or clubs.

"'I did not, therefore, like the order. But when I first read it, I immediately called the steward and told him to pack up all drinkables and remove them from the ship. To me an order is an order. In my long service, whether I liked it or not, my loyalty to lawful commands has never failed.

"'I have had a rare opportunity to observe the feeling of the officers. My own opinion is that the Wine Mess Order is the wisest thing you have done as Secretary, and if its future were committed today to the officers of the fleet the Wine Mess would never be restored.'

"The statement of this Admiral is typical, I am convinced, of the opinion of the vast majority of the commissioned personnel of the Navy."

ALCOHOL INTERFERES WITH MENTAL PROCESSES

FRANK R. KEEFER, M. D., Lieutenant Colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army

The use of alcohol results in much inefficiency. It is well understood by all who control large bodies of men that alcohol and effective work are incompatible. Abundant liquor means a full guard-house and many court-martial cases. In the matter of target shooting, careful experiments conducted in Sweden showed an average of forty per cent fewer hits by marksmen after one drink of brandy. Since alcohol markedly interferes with the mental processes, it is plain that decisions in military crises are apt to be faulty. Alcoholism and venereal diseases are closely allied.

BALANCED BILL OF FARE ONE MEANS OF CO-OPERATION WITH GOVERNMENT FOOD CONSERVATION PROGRAM

FRANCES WAITE LEITER, National Superintendent Health Department

War, with its woeful carnage, is bringing some measure of compensation. The upheaval of nations in bloodshed is becoming truly a "house cleaning" of the economics of the world. It has required these overwhelming contingencies to awaken American people to the fact that more intelligent knowledge of foods is imperative if we are to escape the shortage in supplies which is being experienced in countries suffering the throes of actual and deadly conflict. Hunger may yet face us.

The first lesson we are learning is the necessity for the elimination of the waste in the home handling of foods, as well as the waste occasioned through the consent of our national government to allow millions of bushels of grain products, needed for bread, to be diverted into the manufacture of drinks which destroy instead of feeding the people.

Now that the possible deficiency of our food products is seen to concern not only America, but through America the entire world, a more serious and farther reaching necessity is coming to light. To utilize our food supply to the best advantage we must learn the value of foods according to the elements which the human body needs, and from this knowledge determine what will best supply the physical demands of every member of the family, without over-indulgence at the table. This is what is meant by a "balanced bill of fare." The time is at hand when economy, in its strictest sense, must become the slogan everywhere.

The lack of physical efficiency which prevails is largely due to ignorance regarding the relative value of foods from the standpoint of the actual needs of the body, and the proportion of the various food elements which should appear in the daily menu.

Nothing is strictly a food which cannot be converted into human energy, or made a part of the human organism. Many dishes found on the home table simply gratify the palate, too frequently taxing the system in an effort to get rid of them. We have departed from the simple nourishing diet of our ancestors. Too many kinds of food are served at the same meal, thus seriously burdening and retarding digestion.

What the body actually needs can be found in eggs, milk, grains, fats, nuts, vegetables, fruits and sugars, without the concoctions of the prevailing dietary. Eggs, milk and grains, are termed perfect foods, because they contain some of all the elements which the body demands for nourishment, namely, fats and carbohydrates furnishing heat and energy; protein or body building material, and certain necessary mineral substances.

During the developing period, up to maturity, more body building food (protein) is required than later in life when repair only is involved. It is not easy for the layman to figure out, as the scientist can, what and how much food is necessary for repair, energy, and heat. We can, however, bear in mind that the sedentary man and woman need less protein than the laborer whose constant expenditure of strength is breaking down tissue which must be restored; and that surplus protein which the body cannot appropriate remains in the digestive tract, generating poisons, seriously affecting physical efficiency, while excess of carbohydrates (starch and sugars) is stored in the body for future use. More food than the body can appropriate is not only extravagance, but a hindrance to efficiency. True food economy adjusts the gratification of appetite to the ability of the body to utilize food, after which, supply at hand must be reckoned with.

Only perfect health can make practical a standard bill of fare for the people at large. This, unfortunately, does not prevail. What is food for one may be poison for another with disabled digestion. Desirable food must be both palatable and nutritious. Too great bulk, as well as too highly concentrated food, must be avoided.

Specialists have advised for any principal meal two dishes of carbohydrates (starch and sugar), and one in which protein prevails. Legumes (peas, beans, lentils, etc.), rich in protein, are called the poor man's meat. Vegetables supply minerals, which, with fruits, make up the bulk necessary. The main supply of fat needed is found in cream, butter, nuts, vegetable oils, etc.

While the amount of food required by individuals varies, scientists have determined that relatively the daily demand should be in about the following proportion: Fats, one-tenth; protein, two-tenths; carbohydrates and the small amount of minerals, the balance.

War limitations, in this as in other countries, will likely make it necessary to enforce economical diet. It may seem starvation to the epicure, but it will, indeed, prove a "new science in living," overcoming superfluous avoirdupois and intestinal derangement in the heavy meat eater, and making for efficiency. A substitute diet to meet war exigencies may prove the physical regeneration of the nation, replacing weakness with strength, and eradicating disease. America must learn what other warring nations already understand. that the health of the human body can be maintained on the protein found in grain.

Dr. Hindhede, by scientific test in the experimental laboratory furnished by the Danish government, claims to have demonstrated that a diet of meat costs twenty times as much as a diet of cereals.

The Maker of that wonderful mechanism, the human body, has furnished physical machinery to carry to completion the process of nutrition, and has installed appetite to aid in meeting the demands of the body for food; but the selection and preparation of food has been left to the individual. This responsibility is truly a moral obligation and should be conscientiously met.

Normal appetite means the natural craving of the body for nourishment. Appetite which demands food of such kinds or in such amount as to be detrimental to the body is abnormal. More frequently than is known, men have been led to drink because the home has not provided the necessary nourishing food.

Domestic science in the schools should early teach food values, and what constitutes balanced rations, omitting, if necessary, instruction in dishes which cater to the appetite without regard to body nourishment.

Striving for physical efficiency for both the soldier and the reserve citizen through the use of the least expensive foods which meet the demands of the body, is conservation of the vital resources of the nation which, if war continues, may be tested to the extremity. Working toward this end on the part of the women of every community, is patriotic service.

THE CRY OF THE MOTHERS TO THE BREWERS

B. L. COWIE in The Vanguard of Australia

We come in our sorrow and anguish,
We are coming again and again,
You are the makers of money,
We are the mothers of men.

Sons and brothers and fathers
Do you hear the wail of our woe?
We gave up our boys for the empire
We called on our men to go.

We knew they would come to us shattered,
Limbless and blind and lame,
But we gloried that God allowed us
A share in our country's fame.

But they came to us shattered and crippled,
Not by bullet or deadly ball,
But for sake of a wicked traffic
You caused our laddies to fall.

Stricken, diseased, unholy:
Withered in body and soul
The brewers returned our bairnies,
The boys we had given up whole.

In camps with the barbed wires guarding
Things of disease and shame
Were the loving boys we had given
To die for an empire's name.

And we cry with ten thousand voices
Your gold is accursed by them,
You are counting your blood-stained money
We are counting our blood-stained men.

And the weeping eyes are looking
For the God who will judge by fire
To crush this vicious traffic
In the might of His holy ire.

And we'll never cease our wailing
For the blood so vainly spilt
Till the God of the Helpless hear us
And avenge us of your guilt.

Let the Heavens before be opened,
Let the whole earth shake and reel,
You shall feel the wrath of the mother
Though you case yourself with steel.

We'll fight for the babe on our bosom
Like a lioness in her den,
Ye have slain and shamed our first born
And aroused the mothers of men.

You laughed and mocked at the women,
Our hearts were the paths you trod
When to pile up your awful profits
You wrecked the Temples of God.

But the prayers of ten thousand mothers
From mountain and city and glen
Shall prove to this deadly traffic
We're coming to save our men.

"Guerra al Alcohol," Slogan of South American W. C. T. U. Workers

Special Correspondence

Leaders in the South American Anti-Alcohol Campaign

Miss Hardynia K. Norville, World's W. C. T. U. Representative to South America, Mrs. Carrie van Domselaar, President of the Uruguay W. C. T. U., and Other Prominent Workers in the Group.

Miss Hardynia K. Norville not long ago held a temperance meeting in Buenos Aires in a beautiful hall of the President Bocas school. The meeting was so crowded as to overflow into the large patio beyond. Dr. Ernesto Nelson gave a fine address, with the idea of interesting the teachers, more especially, in temperance work. It was a most able speech, dealing with the question from the scientific and medical side, especially as regards children, mentally and physically. Dr. Nelson, who was in the United States last year, having been appointed by the Argentine government to represent the educational system of the Argentine schools at the Panama Exposition, has consented to serve as president of the men's committee appointed to support the women in their work. His wife, a university woman, wields a wide influence over the young women.

Dr. Alfredo Palacio, who was also present, and is one of the most beloved workers for the poor, will fill the post of vice-president. The secretaries of the Y. M. C. A. are also included in the committee.

Sra. Julia Moreno de Moreno, who excites interest and admiration because of her resemblance to Queen Victoria, was the representative of the committee of six ladies appointed by the National Council of Women.

Cinematograph views of the fiesta at Theatre Colon were presented for the first time to a Spanish audience. Miss Norville had shown them in the hall of the American Methodist church two weeks previously. Many of the children who actually took part in the representation were present and naturally were highly delighted to recognize themselves.

The boys of the Rodiquez Peña school were grouped outside the hall and sang the national anthem and gave their whistling choruses. A little gaucho (cowboy) from Villa Ballester recited as the films were displayed. Great enthusiasm was aroused among the teachers and distinguished educators in attendance.

A beautiful festival was held in the Zoological garden at Montevideo, called "Villa Dolores," about forty-five minutes' ride from the center of the city. Two thousand public school children were invited and came in very large numbers. A celebrated musician and leader of the largest municipal band composed the music for the occasion and himself taught it to the little people. The manager of the train company furnished twenty-four cars, all of which were decorated by the white ribboners with the name of the league in large red letters on white. The children carried banners which said, "Guerra al Alcohol" (war against alcohol). It was a beautiful sight to see them marching up the wide avenue. All the little girls wore white ribbons on their hair which gave them the appearance of butterflies. A splendid program of songs and recitations was given.

A New Year's letter to the women of South America from Miss Anna A. Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U., has been translated into Spanish and widely circulated throughout the land. Everywhere it has met with an enthusiastic reception.

Demonstration of Montevideo Temperance Workers

This demonstration took place in Montevideo under the auspices of the Liga Nacional contra el Alcoholismo, 3,000 children from public and private schools and other centers of education participating. They were marshaled by their professors and principals, each school carrying a flag and temperance banner and the children wearing badges of white ribbon. The executive committee of ladies headed the procession, preceded by the municipal band and a mounted police guard. Members of the Y. M. C. A. and of the Methodist church were of great assistance in organizing the demonstration.

"God is working marvelously in our behalf during these last few months, both in Uruguay where the government is now giving financial support and in Argentina where recent victories have surpassed the fondest dreams of the workers," writes Mrs. Carrie Van Domselaar, president of the Uruguay W. C. T. U.

Sra. Alvira von Praet de Sala, president of the Consejo Nacional de Mujeres, the first woman's organization of South America outside the church benevolent societies, in accepting the position of honorary president, after some hesitation said, "The work is of God. I can't refuse. Count on me to do all in my

Procession Marching Down One of the Principal Streets

The procession marched seventeen squares along the principal streets and took its stand in front of the old Cabildo on the plaza Matriz. Senators and deputies who are on the committee to study the question of alcoholism in the country were in waiting when the petition for the closing of all drinking saloons and bars on Sunday and holidays was presented. The children sang temperance songs and the national anthem. The demonstration made a profound impression on the general public and was most favorably commented upon.

GENEROUS CONTRIBUTIONS TO AMBULANCE FUND

Gifts for the purchase of an ambulance for the French front have far exceeded our fondest hope. Does it surprise you, great-hearted, generous white ribboners, to learn that the treasurer reports to date an amount sufficient not only to cover all expense of our ambulance, but enough to enable the National W. C. T. U. to send a second ambulance on its merciful mission either to France or to Russia? The prompt and sympathetic response to our appeal is deeply appreciated and the donors have our sincere thanks. Next week's paper will publish our treasurer's statement of funds received and a picture of the ambulance.

"DON'T LET THE BOY TOUCH LIQUOR"

The other day in Chicago a victim of John Barleycorn, as he was preparing to end his life, penned a letter to his wife asking her forgiveness and in impassioned language making this request, "Don't let our son know the taste of liquor." This pitiful appeal of the recreant father was intended for the mother alone, but every American citizen who has a vote or an ounce of influence ought to feel a personal obligation to help this bereaved parent safeguard her boy. What hope has this woman, who must be both mother and father to the young lad, of keeping her offspring from the temptations of liquor surrounding him in a license city honeycombed with dramshops? When a little later he starts to school, he will be compelled to traverse streets reeking with saloons. As he goes out upon errands for her, he will continually pass liquor emporiums with poison drinks temptingly displayed. With the keen eyes of youth he will note that the politics of the city and of the state, yes, and of the nation as well, are controlled more or less by the liquor politicians and those who manufacture and sell the very poison his mother warns him to shun. As he reads the newspapers of the day he will learn that even the benevolent Uncle Sam, whom he is taught to venerate, is willing for revenue to tolerate the continuance of traffic in the strong drink that ruined his father and which his mother tells him will ruin him if he does not keep from it. Can this mother hope to save her boy from the clutches of a traffic so closely woven into the commercial and political life of the nation? When she turns expectantly to the city fathers, she discovers that it is through them that the licenses are permitted; when she appeals to her state legislators she finds them voting for laws at the behest of the liquor politicians, and when as a last resort she appeals to Uncle Sam, she discovers that he is in partnership with the distillery and the brewery. But, thank God, she is not waging alone the battle for the safeguarding of her son. Men and women by the thousands are working with her tirelessly to educate the boy to avoid the dangers of the saloon, and to make the adult see his responsibility to protect the lad by prohibiting the iniquitous traffic in alcoholic beverages. As she agonizes in prayer for her son she may have the consciousness that a great army of other mother-hearted women are praying with her; as she endeavors to shield him from the dangers of the liquor traffic, she may be upheld and strengthened by the realization that in ever-increasing numbers the Christian men and women of this nation are standing back of her and investing their strength, their time and their money that her boy and other mothers' boys may grow to manhood without passing through the scorching fires of temptation to drink. Speed the day, and it is not far distant, when not only the good citizens, but the governments of our cities, states and nation, shall say to every mother and father, "Our first and foremost interest is with you to put around your growing children a protective zone where the liquor dealer shall have no power over them."

STRENGTHEN THE WHITE RIBBON BOND

The love and sympathy of members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for one another can find a new avenue of expression wherever the forts, training camps, cantonments and navy yards of our Army and Navy are located. Let one member of a local union near each government reservation be appointed as a special correspondent to whom white ribboners whose husbands, sons or near relatives are in or near these camps can write. This correspondent might secure needed helpers, but her address alone should be given to all state W. C. T. U. papers as the one ready to render any possible service to "our" boys or to carry out any commission on their behalf.

By this plan white ribboners would have the comfort of knowing that their loved ones would be invited to the homes of comrades and if ill, lonely or homesick would be shown special kindness. THE UNION SIGNAL will be glad to publish names of such women correspondents appointed for the various camps and stations of the United States troops.

Miss Agnes E. Slack of England, one of the honorary secretaries of the World's W. C. T. U., and other English comrades will be very thankful for opportunities to show kindness to United States white ribboners' sons who are in England. Miss Slack, whose address is Caxton Buildings, Ripley, Derbyshire, England, will be glad to receive from our W. C. T. U. members the addresses in Great Britain of these boys. A great deal of this altruistic and beautiful work has been done by English white ribboners for Canadian boys in training camps and base hospitals, and they desire to extend similar courtesies to our boys from the United States. Such ministries are a balm to our aching hearts. They help us realize the consoling truth that we are one great household closely united in our supplications for one another and for the coming of permanent international peace.

"HIS PERSONAL CONCERN"

Upon the eve of the going into effect of Utah's state-wide law, a prominent business man who had opposed prohibition, announced that he intended to make it "his personal concern" to see that the law is enforced and to help put behind the bars anyone guilty of selling liquor. "I have a relative who is a member of a club," he remarked, "and although I respect its membership and hold in high regard its objects, I would not hesitate to inform on all involved if I discovered that the club was being used to clandestinely serve intoxicants."

Citizens possessed of such fine spirit insure the perfect enforcement of good laws and help to silence forever the liquorites' threat that "Prohibition doesn't prohibit." Prohibition commissions and commissioners, law enforcement provisions and penalties are helpful and necessary, but the support of public spirited men who make it their business to see that the law is kept inviolate as far as in their power is one of the chief requisites to its successful operation.

Heretofore the weakness of the movement in prohibition states has been that when the last ballot in the campaign was cast, and the last vote in the legislature counted, the good citizens believed the enemy forever conquered. As a matter of fact the battle is only half won. To achieve anything worth calling a victory the campaign needs to be continued until at least the majority of the citizens have determined, as did the good brother of Utah, that the enforcement of the prohibition law should be their personal concern. As there has come to be among states of the Union that have not yet parted company with the legalized liquor traffic a friendly rivalry to outdistance each other in securing prohibition legislation, let it also be the fashion among dry states to engage in an amicable race to raise the condition of their commonwealth from the positive degree, "dry," to the superlative, "dryest."

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

COULDN'T FIND A SECOND-HAND HAMMER

If you want evidence that men don't think after they drink take this from a Spokane, Wash., paper after the dry law went into effect. A citizen of Spokane went out to buy a hammer in a second-hand store, but ran into a new angle of the temperance question. He couldn't find what he wanted, so visited one pawnshop after another, and still failed to make a purchase. His curiosity was aroused, as he had been accustomed to pick up valuable mechanic's tools in this way for a mere song. So he said to one pawnbroker, "Let me see your entire stock of tools; I may find something that I want."

The man replied, "I have very few now."

"What do you mean? Don't working men come in to pledge their kits for money to tide them over?"

"Not since the state went dry. Men mostly are sober, and have good jobs, and want to hold onto their tools."

It was a case of not drinking and sensible thinking.—Christian Endeavor World

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What new form of service to the enlisted "boys" is suggested by our National W. C. T. U. president?
2. Tell the incident that led Secretary Daniels of the Navy to issue the famous Wine Mess order.
3. How do naval officers now regard his action?
4. What military officer of "bone dry" fame has been recently made Major General of the United States Army, and how does he characterize alcohol in its relation to the military machine?
5. In what way does prohibition affect the cabaret business?
6. Explain the special significance of the memorial recently erected to Lillian M. N. Stevens at Portland, Maine.
7. Does the attitude of prominent men in the state of Maine indicate defeat or victory for woman suffrage September 10?
8. How will attention to a balanced bill of fare help the food conservation movement?
9. Name some of the advantages of preserving fruits and vegetables by the drying process. Explain how it can be done with a minimum of expense.
10. What methods are being used by South American white ribboners to bring the evils of the liquor traffic and the value of prohibition to the attention of the people?

ARKANSAS CAMPAIGN BUGABOOS NEVER MATERIALIZED

The prohibition states are largely populated these days with men who are working for nation-wide prohibition because they know from experience in their own states that prohibition, more than any other one thing, is what the United States needs. An Arkansas automobile distributor, E. N. Pettit of Little Rock, is such a man. This is what he says about prohibition in his home state:

"Arkansas will never go back to the saloons. Most of the predictions as to what would happen if liquor were thrown out of the state, have been pure bunk.

"During the campaign it was asserted strongly that the state would be over-run with illicit distilleries. This has not happened yet and elimination of saloons has solved some serious problems for us in the town of Helena, for instance, which is below Memphis, Tenn., on the Mississippi, we had, in the saloon days, a pretty tough problem.

"Hardly a day passed but some one was killed in a drunken brawl. Officers never were able to cope with the situation because they were handicapped in their attempts by the saloon element. Helena is now cleaned up. Frequent statements from citizens of the town show that they never want to go back to saloons again. The place is safe for everybody and the rough element has gone to work. Some of them are even acquiring homes and are taking care of their families which formerly had to shift for themselves because the head of the house was on a drunken debauch.

"People are producing more. Undoubtedly the absence of saloons has done more to help food preparedness this year than any other thing. Arkansas, which produced mostly cotton, has gone in this year for corn and potatoes pretty strong. We will make a good showing because nobody is loafing around the saloons. Prohibition has solved the help problem for the farmer and the farmer himself is getting away with more work.

"Prohibition is good for any state if you have a bone dry law. You will find that your production all along the line will be greater. But in order to have a bone dry state you must have co-operation among officers whose duty it is to enforce the law. Many business men in our state who were rabidly against prohibition, have discovered that they had been frightened by bugaboos raised during the campaign by the distillers. Many of these business men now are behind the movement for national prohibition. This is coming, as sure as you live, because folks under bone dry laws know that they are the right kind of laws and should apply nationally."

power to advance the interests of the holy cause." Since that the wives of the ministers of state and others have gladly given their names so that there is now an honorary national committee of about seventy-five of the most distinguished ladies and gentlemen of the nation.

One of the committee made a speech in Congress the day after giving his name as an advocate of the work. Soon afterward he secured the passage of the Sunday law and as a result of the bill all grocery stores that sold liquor and even the cigar shops where drinks could be had, have been closed and a heavy fine imposed for violation of the law. The petition presented making scientific temperance instruction obligatory in all schools and authorizing the organization of L. T. L.'s, and the publication of the temperance manual in the monthly teachers' magazine, has met with approval. A temperance committee of fifty of the most prominent teachers has been invited to submit other lessons with a view to publishing them as an aid to teachers.

The new English W. C. T. U. of Argentina, the Argentine National League, has elected as its president Mrs. W. F. Oldham, wife of Bishop Oldham. Miss Hardynia K. Norville was invited to represent the World's W. C. T. U. in the first woman's evangelical congress convening in Buenos Aires. This congress has promised to name a temperance committee to affiliate with the Argentine National League.

AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

TRUTH NEVER DIES

Truth never dies. The ages come and go,
The mountains wear away, the seas retire;
Destruction lays earth's mighty cities low,
And empires, states, and dynasties expire;
But, caught and handed onward by the wise,
Truth never dies.

Though unreceived and scoffed at through the years,
Though made the butt of ridicule and jest,
Though held aloft for mockery and jeers,
Denied by those of transient power possessed,
Insulted by the insolence of lies—
Truth never dies.

It answers not, it does not take offense;
But with a mighty silence bides its time,
As some great cliff that braves the elements
And lifts through all the storms its head sublime
And never dies.

As rests the sphinx amid Egyptian sands,
As looms on high the snowy peak and crest,
As firm and patient as Gibraltar stands,
So truth, unwearied, waits the era blest
When men shall turn to it with great surprise.
Truth never dies.

RED LETTER DAYS

September 12—Patriotic Membership Day
September 28—Children's Harvest Home (Birthday of Frances E. Willard)

PRESIDENT INDIA W. C. T. U. COMPLAINS THAT UNION SIGNAL IS VERY "WEIGHTY," BUT PAYS COST OF EXCESS BAGGAGE RATHER THAN BE DEPRIVED OF IT.

In a letter recently received by Miss Anna A. Gordon from Mrs. Margaret B. Denning, president India W. C. T. U., she tells in her characteristically breezy style how highly she values the official paper. We quote her letter in full:

"Loring Villa, Ootacamund, Nilgiri Hills, India, July 10, 1917.

"DEAR MISS GORDON:

"You speak in one of your letters from Washington of the welcome visit of THE UNION SIGNAL. That is the way I feel, and I am sending this message to be put into the paper I love so much—That Weighty UNION SIGNAL. If you, while in Washington, find THE UNION SIGNAL a welcome visitor, I wonder if you can imagine what it is to me away off in Asia? But up here in the southern mountains of India I find it a very weighty paper, indeed. When I am to give an address (and that is whenever I have an opportunity) I sort over my pile of UNION SIGNALS, knowing full well I shall find in it international, as well as American, matter.

"But here is the difficulty, as to its weight: I am about to start on a two thousand mile tour in the interests of the W. C. T. U., making the cities of Coonoor and Kotigiri, and then on over the plains to Coimbatore, a busy center where we have a small W. C. T. U., and then to the Kolar gold fields, where temperance teaching is needed for the large numbers of English managers; thence to beautiful Bangalore in the Mysore state, where, in response to a petition presented through the W. C. T. U. of Bangalore, the Rajah has recently put a stop to the sale of intoxicants at Hindu festivals, in restaurants, and even in the charming English garden called Lälbagh (Ruby-Garden); from there on to Madras, where three or four enthusiastic W. C. T. U. ladies are arranging meetings for me to address; finally arriving at Coconada, where we have a good W. C. T. U., and at Calcutta, full of temperance workers, but still so much in need of all efforts for total abstinence.

"And here are the UNION SIGNALS, waiting to be sorted out, as I must have with me some of them to fill up my cistern of information, from which I shall be drawing so constantly.

"But they are so weighty—twenty or thirty of them is too much for my luggage on such a long journey; yet each item is so full of merit, each article so packed with rich temperance kernels, that I simply must have every one of them.

"No use to try cutting—there is always so much on the other side of the page, and then along the journey there are many English-speaking Indian gentlemen who welcome such a paper, so I leave off cutting and make a big bundle, not counting the cost of excess baggage, but determined to use all the good things I possess.

"I may take a little biscuit tin for my lunches, but I dare not risk starving for temperance facts or depriving others of these rich morsels.

"Sincerely yours,

"MARGARET B. DENNING,

"President National W. C. T. U. of India."

AMONG OUR WORKERS

Mrs. Mamie M. Claflin, president of the Nebraska W. C. T. U., was one of the speakers at the thirtieth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of her home county, Lancaster. Mrs. Allie Jackson, for ten years the active president of the county organization, was chairman. The main thought of the convention was the necessity for maintaining the organization now that Nebraska has joined the prohibition ranks. Speaking on this subject, Rev. Mr. Fike told of the great possibilities of the W. C. T. U. in a dry state. The symposium, "Why is the W. C. T. U. Now Needed in Nebraska and How May We Gain Members and Increase the Power of Our Organization," included among the speakers, Mrs. Claflin, the retiring county president, Mrs. R. D. Licklider, the newly elected president, and other workers of prominence in the county.

The annual convention of the Mitchell county (Kans.) W. C. T. U. was held recently at the Girls' Industrial school at Beloit, on the invitation of Mrs. Lillian Mitchner, president of the Kansas W. C. T. U., who is also superintendent of the school. Rev. L. B. Parker made the chief address of the day. A flag drill by girls of the seventh grade, music by the school chorus, a solo by Mrs. White, musical director of the school, and addresses by honorary members of the county union, were interesting numbers. Dinner of the pot-luck variety was served on the lawn, and notwithstanding the name it proved a feast worthy of the occasion. Mrs. Thomas Broadbent was re-elected president for the ensuing year.

The Piscataquis county (Maine) W. C. T. U., on August 15, held the first services of the season at the camp ground, Mrs. Alice Bigney, county president, presiding. The devotional services were conducted by Mrs. E. R. Lewis, the Scripture lesson and prayer were given by Rev. W. Z. Genge, and a solo was sung by Mrs. E. E. Bragg. The address of Rev. H. C. Vrooman, "In the Light of the World's Crisis," led the audience backward through the misty ages when all men partook freely of intoxicants and reviewed the progress of the anti-alcohol movement. The talk on equal suffrage by Rev. Lee Anna Starr was unusually forceful and scholarly.

Miss Louise Hollister, National organizer, was the speaker at the Delaware county (Ia.) W. C. T. U. convention, held in Hopkinton, August 22. The address of the evening, in which she explained the liquor situation in the warring countries of Europe, was a revelation to her audience and proved a most acceptable feature of the program. The daylight hours were filled with necessary business and the consideration of up-to-date methods of temperance warfare, music, readings and helpful addresses and papers being blended in exactly the right proportions.

DEDICATION OF LILLIAN M. N. STEVENS MEMORIAL FOUNTAIN AT PORTLAND, MAINE

Special Correspondence

Waiting at the state W. C. T. U. headquarters at 150 Free St., Portland, Maine, on the afternoon of August 14, were the motor cars which were to convey to the scene of the dedication of the Lillian M. N. Stevens Memorial fountain those who for various reasons composed the dedication party.

As Chandler's Band took its position beside the fountain and began to play patriotic airs, the procession started. When the party in autos turned into High street the band changed to "Hail to the Chief," and the six cars lined up facing the fountain.

The first car was occupied by Governor and Mrs. Carl E. Milliken, Mayor and Mrs. Wilford G. Chapman, and Mrs. Althea G. Quimby. The autos following contained Mr. and Mrs. William Leavitt, Mr. Ralph Ames Leavitt, Rev. C. M. Woodman, Mrs. Augusta M. Hunt, Architect Frederick A. Thompson, Mrs. Abbie E. Shapleigh, Miss Amelia Shapleigh, Mr. Shapleigh, Miss Clara M. Farwell, Mrs. Vena L. Johnson, state W. C. T. U. recording secretary, Miss Sylvia Vaughan, Mrs. F. C. Payson, Mrs. F. L. Bates, Miss Gertrude L. Bates, Miss Margaret L. Sargent, Miss Elsie Hannaford, Mrs. Vaill, Mr. Clarence P. Quimby, Mrs. Ellen R. Richardson, president of the New Hampshire W. C. T. U., Mrs. Elizabeth C. Knight and Mrs. S. M. Grant, president and vice-president, respectively, of the Cumberland county W. C. T. U.

Rising from her place in the mayor's car, Mrs. Althea G. Quimby introduced Governor Carl E. Milliken as presiding officer. Governor Milliken said he considered it a privilege to preside at the exercises for he believed the occasion, from the point of view of a citizen, was most significant. "We seldom erect memorials to the living, but there has already been erected in the hearts of all of us a memorial to Lillian Stevens more enduring than bronze," said Governor Milliken. He paid Mrs. Stevens an eloquent tribute as one of the great citizens of Portland and of the nation.

The invocation was given by Rev. Charles M. Woodman, a former pastor of the Friends' Church, and well known as an advocate of those high principles for which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union ever stands.

In the absence of Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Augusta M. Hunt spoke of the history and purpose of the fountain. She told of the plans for its erection which originated with Miss Gordon and were developed by the committee that had the matter in charge. She spoke lovingly of Mrs. Stevens' service to her city, her state, her country and the whole world, and told touching incidents to illustrate the patriotism and devotion of the great woman whose life the fountain commemorates. "No one is dead as long as she is remembered," quoted Mrs. Hunt. "The reformers of one age are the heroes of the next, and Mrs. Stevens will always occupy the position accorded a hero."

Mrs. Quimby then formally presented the fountain to the city. As she was speaking Ralph Ames Leavitt, grandson of Mrs. Stevens, pulled the cord which held the American flag covering the statue, and the water was turned on.

Addressing Mayor Chapman Mrs. Quimby said:

"Mr. Mayor, in tender memory of a great life devoted to Christian service, the Maine Woman's Christian Temperance Union presents to the city of Portland this memorial fountain. That this expression of our devotion is symbolized by a child is most fitting. Because of love for such as these Mrs. Stevens dedicated her beautiful life to public service. May this little figure freely offering its sparkling water, represent, in some small measure, to the city of Portland, the service to the state and nation so loyally rendered by her most illustrious daughter, and may it keep fresh the memory of this sainted woman who ever gave hope and inspiration to a thirsting humanity."

Mayor Chapman, in accepting the gift on behalf of the city, expressed his appreciation in gracious words. "We have heard Mrs. Stevens on legislative platforms and before committees and she never forfeited the respect we had for her," said Mayor Chapman. "She was as firm as the great base of that monument, but she was gentle in the best sense of the term. She exemplified in her public life constructive statesmanship. She saw the sorrows brought on by the liquor traffic. She foresaw what we now see, that the issue is sharply drawn and can be settled in only one way. We accept this fountain as a memorial to a noble woman who gave her best, and may we take home with us a renewed interest in this woman's life and influence. This city is better, cleaner and happier because she has lived."

The exercises closed with the singing of "America," to the accompaniment of the band.

The fountain is a replica of the Frances E. Willard fountain in Chicago, and was designed by George E. Wade of London. It is made of bronze with a base of Maine granite.

Many visitors from out of town, as well as a large concourse of Portland people, listened with respectful and rapt attention to the exercises. The beautiful day, the appreciative words and the loving memories of a devoted life enveloped all as with a benediction. Much regret was expressed that Miss Gordon was unable to be present, for in her loving heart originated the thought of the fountain, and her life and words seem linked very closely to that other life in whose memory the fountain stands.

It was greatly regretted also that Mrs. Emma E. Watts and Mrs. Edna Rowan Harvey, members of the fountain committee, were unable to be present, and that Mrs. Whitman Sawyer, chairman of the committee, was delayed by motor trouble and did not reach the spot until after the unveiling.

Many from all parts of the state who had expressed a desire to be present at the dedication were unable to attend. However, whenever any white ribboner comes to Portland she will find the fountain with its "cup of cold water" ready for her, and as she stands by the side of the charming figure of the little child who offers the sparkling water, she will feel that the memorial is a beautifully fitting expression of love and loyalty to our great white ribbon leader.

LIQUOR SELLING NOT A BUSINESS BUT A CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY

There seems to be something about the liquor business so bad that men who engage in it lose all respect for law and order. Actually the worst indictment against the saloon is the saloon itself; it no longer has any respectable sponsors; those who formerly championed it now condemn it.

The saloonkeeper himself admits that there is no good reason for the existence of the saloon. He does not undertake to make an apology for it. He sees the product staggering away from his bar every day, and every saloonkeeper that has been able to get out of the business feels like a convict just released from a prison sentence. He tells you so, and with such earnestness that you are bound to believe him.

Instead of making his place as decent as possible by refusing to allow men to debauch and carouse in it, the average saloonkeeper will deal out his poison just as long as a man can stand on his feet and pay for it, and if he can not stand on his feet and still has money he can buy the vile stuff until he falls out of a chair and is kicked out of doors. The saloonkeeper presents every inducement to get drunk to the man who goes in to buy a drink.

Men are permitted to stand at bars and treat each other until they are all thoroughly soused, reason gone and nerves and muscles paralyzed.

Walking along the streets every day are to be seen the wrecks created by the saloon and the saloon system.

Fully fifty per cent of the bad government in cities is the result of the graft and blackmail which the saloon has long stood for—license to break laws and degrade the people.

And every inch of the way the saloonkeepers and drunkmakers have fought against the enforcement of any kind of law which would make their haunts anywhere near respectable. At no time or place have we found this institution of iniquity favorable to any kind of regulation. Occasionally there have been saloonkeepers too respectable to be in the business at all, but that kind of a saloonkeeper gets out of the business at the first opportunity, ashamed of the company he has been keeping.

At its very best, the saloon depends on drunkenness for its support. If all drinkers were moderate drinkers there would not be one saloon where there are now ten.

No man can continue to stand every day in a place of business and see the human derelicts coming and going on their unsteady legs, and realize that his business is killing men, that it is destroying homes and starving innocent victims, and count himself a good citizen. This is the plain truth, and it shows us the type of man the saloon turns the saloonkeeper into, even though he start out with respectability and good intent. This is not an unfair or unjustifiable estimate of the saloon. It is what every frequenter of these places knows the institution to be.

When it comes to obeying closing laws, there has never been any history written of saloonkeepers in a city of any size pretending to keep within the spirit and letter of the law.

Refusing to be regulated, insisting on liberty to break all laws, regardless alike of decency and morality, the saloonkeepers have themselves to blame for the great wave of suppression that is sweeping over the country.

And it is these plain truths, truths to which every drinker and every drunkard can certify, that make us believe that if we want to reform and redeem the saloonkeeper himself, we must suppress his business.—Cole's Review.

THE PLANNING OF ESTHER

DAISY HUGHES PHIPPS

Unexpected company had arrived at the Carters. Already there was plenty to do, for tomorrow was the day of the old settlers' reunion, the great annual event of the county.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union had planned several things for the occasion. There were to be a decorated float, a tent fitted up as a rest room, and quantities of literature for distribution. A committee was appointed to look after each item.

At three in the afternoon, Esther Carter was summoned to the telephone.

"Mrs. Bailey has called at the last minute to say she can't serve on the decorations. We have the float but lack the horses and driver. Can't you get them? And the streamers haven't even been painted. Can you see after them, too? Let me know as soon as possible. I'm waiting to hear before I start to town after the rest room furnishings."

Esther pledged her best effort to the president's requests and turned to the task with a will. Her first step was to whisper a little prayer for help to the Friend who never fails in any emergency. The second thought was to confer with her mother. But Mrs. Carter was entertaining her guests. It seemed hardly proper to disturb her enjoyment of the first visit Cousin Kate, the companion of her girlhood, had made for years. Esther glanced out of the window. Mr. King, a stump speaker for prohibition, was passing.

"Wait a minute, please," called Esther, advancing nearer, her hand extended.

"How do you do, Mr. King. Our union's in a dilemma and I thought perhaps you might help us. We have our float for tomorrow, but no horses and no driver."

"I'm certainly sorry my horses are at work." The speaker's voice was sympathetic. "But couldn't you get a team from the stable?"

"Probably so," answered Esther, "but Mr. Ervay is so bitter against prohibition, his prices for us have always been exorbitant."

Slowly she walked away, disappointed, it is true, but with a determination in her heart that was greater than any possible discouragement. Presently Bobbie, aged seven, was dispatched to the livery stable with a note.

Suddenly from out the deep blue sky there came a clap of thunder. Darkening clouds began to gather. Flashes of lightning followed. The rain fell in torrents.

A cold and dripping Bobbie returned a half hour later with a reply that spelled disaster to Esther's plans. Meantime she was concentrating arduously upon the problem. Suddenly the solution dawned as clearly as the rainbow that appeared after the storm.

"Get Cousin Robert's car," was a first-aid suggestion.

"O Cousin Kate," cried Esther excitedly, "excuse me a minute, but I've just thought of something. Could we use your car for the parade tomorrow? We want to decorate it for the W. C. T. U."

"I'm sure you could use it, Esther, if we stay, but Robert spoke of going to Crystal Springs tomorrow. He wants to try the water there."

"I have a bottle he can have. We must beg him to stay. It's very important for us to be represented. The election will be held in four weeks and every effort must be made to win prohibition. I heard yesterday that the saloonkeepers are making great preparations but we must make even greater." Esther's enthusiasm was contagious.

"I'll insist on Robert's remaining," promised Cousin Kate. "We must do all we can for prohibition," she added emphatically.

"Yes, indeed," agreed Mrs. Carter. "I feel that large issues depend on our activities tomorrow, so many of the voters will be there."

"I'm certainly glad to get a car," Esther was speaking with evident relief. "But what about the streamers? They haven't even been painted!"

"I'd get a sign painter, dear." The idea was advanced by Mrs. Carter.

"Perhaps I can. I'll go to see about it myself."

A moment more and the swift-footed messenger, regardless of the muddy streets, was on her mission, the motto of the union, "Never give up," ringing in her ears. "I won't," declared Esther stoutly, "until I see this thing through."

"Just rushed to death," was the wail of the first sign painter she visited. "Crowded now with orders," came from a second. She was about to consult a third when Archie, the bootblack, appeared. "Shine?" he was calling lustily.

There was something strangely pathetic in his wan face, particularly to those who knew his history. His father a few years back had been a successful merchant,—nearly every man in the country knew Henry Cross. But drink had played havoc with his prosperity and poor Henry passed out of life by the crimeward route.

The affair created quite a sensation and yet the unfortunate man's sympathizers went right on licensing the drink trade that left Henry's wife and children with no other heritage than a tarnished name and a dowry of poverty-in-plenty.

Archie perhaps was more robust than the other children, yet his small, underfed body, clad in ill-fitting, patched garments, stirred Esther's heart to pity. She watched him an instant; then a happy thought occurred to her.

"Archie, I want to buy a bottle of shoe polish, and wouldn't you like to make a dollar?"

"Yes'm, I would," he answered promptly, his eyes dancing at the prospect.

"Well, if you'll march in the parade tomorrow, I'll give you a dollar." The boy agreed heartily.

"Needn't mind about dressing up," Esther ventured tactfully. "Just wear what you have on."

The meeting place and other arrangements having been completed, Archie went on with his "shines" rejoicing.

After purchasing a supply of bunting and coarse domestic, the girl went in search of flags. These were kindly donated by a friend of the cause. Posters were next in order. They were found at the church where they had been used on World's Temperance Sunday. It required time and effort to remove the tacks, and when Esther reached home, completely tired out, the old town clock was striking six.

"Did you get the streamers painted?" inquired Mrs. Carter.

"No, mother, the sign painters were too busy. But I'll have them painted yet."

"You haven't much time."

"No, but I'll try my hand on them." Esther smiled in anticipation of the task. After supper Cousin Kate followed her into the yard. Soon the two were working away with a zeal characteristic of loyal white ribboners.

The domestic was stretched firmly on an old table. Tacks held it in place. Then Esther opened the bottle of shoe polish, applied it with the brush, and presto—the streamers were painted!

First there were large box-car letters, "W. C. T. U." Then, "Clay County Dry, September 19." Lastly, there was Archie's sign, "Vote for Mother and Me."

Fair weather, wide-spread advertising, and the promise of free entertainment, brought large crowds to the reunion. Everybody and his brother seemed to be there. The parade was a mile and a half long. Near the head was the white ribbon automobile, gracefully adorned with streamers, flags, bunting, bows and posters.

Directly in front marched Archie clad in patched garments, holding high his banner, "Vote for Mother and Me." Though eyeing him curiously, the master of ceremonies allowed him to proceed unmolested. As they passed a downtown corner, a loud voice rang out, "Hurrah for the W. C. T. U.!" "Hurrah for Prohibition!" "Hurrah for Clay County Dry!"

The rest room at the grounds was appropriately labeled as the property of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Cots, chairs, ice-water and toilet accessories composed the furnishings.

A veteran white ribboner, grown gray in service, was chairman of the committee on the distribution of literature. Approaching a man, she would say pleadingly, "Wouldn't you like to help with the Lord's work? Then read this and vote for Clay County dry."

More than one "hardy son of toil," looking into her sweet face replied, "I believe I will, since I saw the little chap today." "I came here against prohibition," was the reply of one man, "but when I saw that car and the ragged boy—"

The next afternoon there was a meeting of the union.

"Well, what about yesterday? Did we make any gain?" The question asked by the president was open to all for answer.

"I think we made decided gains," answered one member. "Everybody was touched by Archie's banner. His sad history made it wonderfully effective."

Another member volunteered: "A voter told me he left home, a strong opponent of prohibition, but he said he couldn't go against the women and children, so he changed his mind."

"Our car was voted the most beautiful," ventured a new enthusiast. "Three cheers for our efficient sign painter, Miss Esther Carter!"

In a body the union rose, giving Esther the Chautauqua salute.

"I don't need any thanks," she murmured. "If only our county shall vote dry, I will be happy."

"I've saved the best news for the last," declared the president triumphantly. "The mayor told me this morning that Dry Federation clubs are to be organized in every precinct of the county!"

For three months, Alford, the county seat of Clay, had had prohibition. The town was enjoying unparalleled prosperity. At a meeting of the board of trade the president referred to the marked increase of business, then animated by a spirit of generosity, suggested, "I feel that we ought to do something worth while for the town."

The "something" was quickly discovered by the W. C. T. U.: "Pension the Cross family; see that the children are educated." Two weeks later a happy little procession of the Cross children, four in number, was marching to the public school. Esther Carter was leading them. Archie, spick and span in his first whole suit, was keeping step to the joybeats of his heart. With a confused mingling of past and present he whispered confidingly, "Miss Esther, I sure am glad they voted for 'Mother and Me.'"

O bright flag, O brave flag,
O flag to lead the free!
The hand of God thy colors blent,
And Heaven to earth thy glory lent,

To shield the weak, and guide the strong,
To make an end of human wrong
And drain a hundred million human hearts
To follow thee. —Henry Van Dyke

HOW BERT DID HIS BIT

MRS. CARL M. BILBY

"Oh, well, Bert is left, mother," half-laughingly, half seriously responded Douglas Brooks to his widowed mother's trembling and tearful question, "But, Douglas, what will I do?"

Just that morning at the breakfast table the mother had read the list of young men who had volunteered for hospital service and had found in it the name of her own son. "Douglas, why didn't you tell me that you were going to enlist?" she asked him reproachfully.

"Because I knew, mother, you'd be worried if I did, and I thought I'd save you at least a few days of distress."

Mrs. Brooks choked back her tears and tried to keep her voice free from emotion. "But with Ralph in the Navy it seems to me we've done our bit," she managed to say.

"That's Ralph's bit, mother; I want to do my own. Uncle Sam's needing registered pharmacists for hospital service right now, so Bob Drexel and I both decided to go."

"Who will be here to help me bear life's burdens?" his mother asked. It was at this point Douglas had responded, "Oh, well, Bert is left." Mrs. Brooks' troubled, tearful blue eyes turned upon thirteen-year-old Albert. "Yes, I have Bert yet. He's too young to go to this awful war!" She buried her face in her arms and gave way to the grief and heartache she could no longer control.

"Please, please, mother, don't do that. I'll get back all right. Why, there's no danger where we're going. I'll come home all in one piece with medals and medallions pinned all over me, big as sunflowers."

But it proved sorry business, this trying to inject humor or even cheerfulness into such a situation, and Douglas with strangely bright, moist eyes, hurried down town.

Shy Bert, pale and slender, hesitatingly placed his hand on his mother's hair.

"Don't you cry, mother. If they all go away and leave us I'll take care of you."

"Yes, yes, my boy, I know. You'll do everything you can to help mother, but that isn't all that worries me."

"Well, Dug and Ralph are both enlisted now, so I guess, mother, we'll have to make the best of it."

For some time Albert had had a newspaper route, expecting to use toward his next year's school expenses the money thus earned. With the funds in his possession he purchased vegetable seed and with hard work had soon transformed the Brooks' back yard and two vacant lots into flourishing gardens. To pay for the use of tools borrowed from a neighbor, he mowed his lawn. Others, passing and seeing him at work, secured his services and it was not long before Bert was regularly caring for half a dozen front yards.

Bert lived in a community where there were many children and poor street car service. "My, I'd give anything today for some good home made ice cream for us all, but I'm too busy to make it myself and it's so far to go down town after it," Bert heard a lady remark. This gave him an idea. Why not gain mother's cooperation and make and sell ice cream? Mother, as usual, proved a good partner and on the following afternoon, which was a decidedly warm one, they tried the plan, realizing such a snug little profit that they decided to engage in the business regularly.

A classmate, Arthur Biggs, and his family were going to the country for the summer.

"Say, Bert, do you want to buy my pony?" he asked the Brooks lad.

"Can't do it now, Arthur. I'd like to have it mighty well, though, to cart my vegetables and ice cream around. If you can't sell it I'd take good care of it through the summer for the use of it."

Arthur didn't succeed in selling his pony, so he decided to accept Bert's offer. The boy arranged a cozy stall for it in the coal shed and fed it the grass mown from lawns.

Mrs. Brooks had always kept a few hens because, as she said, she wanted to use "real, home-layed eggs." One day she remarked, "We'll have to give up the chickens, Bert."

"Why, mother?"

"Feed is so high that I just can't afford to buy it any longer."

"Why can't we give them our table scraps?"

"Why, they wouldn't keep a sparrow any more, my boy. Since Ralph and Douglas have gone I don't do nearly so much cooking, and we must be very careful now of our grocery bill and help the country, too, that way."

Very dear to Bert's heart were the six hens he had named, "Speckle," "Prim," "Topknot," "Neaty," "Big-Foot" and "Golden."

"Mother, we could get enough scraps from the neighbors' tables to feed them. Why, I just saw 'oodles' of them, bread even, in Mrs. Antrim's garbage can. I'll run and ask her."

"Yes, of course, I'd rather give the left-overs to you for your chickens than to throw them away," Mrs. Antrim told Bert. Bert picked cherries and did other tasks to repay any time or effort spent in saving the chicken feed, which proved quite a satisfactory arrangement all around.

One day Grandfather Brooks drove in from his home five miles in the country to visit Bert's mother. He took Bert in his "flivver" to see several litters of young pigs which with their mothers were being kept on a five-acre lot at the edge of town by Hixon's mill.

"Well, young man, I hear you've got more business now than a peanut merchant! Getting rich fast, eh?"

"I can still manage to count my money," laughed Bert.

"Any unoccupied time on your hands?"

"Guess I could find a little."

"Well, you see, I have a good many pigs here and they need a fine boy to give them fine attention. I can't spare the time from the farm to attend to them through this hot weather, or any other weather, for that matter. Do you suppose you could get out here twice a day and give them the feed I'll order from the mill, and pump plenty of fresh water for them?"

"Certainly, grandpa."

"Bert, I've just thought of something. There are only two of one litter left, fine pigs, though. Suppose we re-name them, and instead of calling them Berkshire pigs, call them Bert's pigs. How'd that suit you?"

"That's a fine change and thank you, grandpa."

"Shouldn't be surprised if before fall they'd bring enough money to buy a certain pony and cart, should you?"

Bert plainly showed his delight by a murmured, "O, do you think so?"

"I know so," replied grandpa, emphatically, laying his hand affectionately on Bert's shoulder.

HOW TO DRY VEGETABLES

FORESTALL A WINTER OF DISCONTENT BY PROVIDING A GENEROUS SUPPLY OF DRIED FOODS

With the shortage this year of tin cans and the consequent unusually large demand for glass jars, many housewives will be glad to solve the problem of preserving food for winter use by a return to the old time method of drying fruits and vegetables. The drying process is comparatively simple. It may be accomplished by means of artificial heat or the sun's rays, and homemade outfits serve as well as commercial dryers, and can be prepared at a slight outlay of time and expense. Good Health Magazine for September gives full and complete directions for this work in an article, "How to Dry Vegetables," by J. A. Morton. We quote in part from Mr. Morton's suggestions:

"The first step in drying vegetables is a blanching process. Blanching gives more thorough cleansing, removes strong odors and flavors, and softens and loosens the fiber, allowing quicker and more uniform evaporation of the moisture. It is done by placing the vegetables in a piece of cheesecloth, a wire basket or other porous container and plunging them into boiling water. The time required for this is short and varies with different vegetables.

"Blanching should be followed by the cold dip, which means plunging the vegetables into cold water for an instant after removal from the hot water. Cold dipping hardens the pulp and causes vegetables to retain their original coloring. After blanching and dipping, the surface moisture should be removed by placing the vegetables between two towels or by exposure to the sun.

"In preparing the foods for drying they should be cut into slices an eighth to a quarter of an inch thick. Root vegetables should be peeled. Make sure the knives and other instruments are kept clean, so as to prevent discoloration of the food. Root crops must be washed so thoroughly that no earthy flavor or smell will remain. A single decayed root will injure the flavor of a large quantity of prepared material.

"For sun drying, choose days that are bright and hot, with a minimum amount of moisture. The drying vegetables must be taken in during a rain and also before sundown. Also there must be a covering of cheese-cloth for the purpose of keeping out all insects. Once or twice a day the product should be turned over or stirred, and the thinner pieces removed as fast as they become sufficiently dry.

"The simplest form of dryer consists merely of strips, full length if desired, of muslin, or of heavy paper. The slices should be placed on this one layer thick. They could be laid on boxes or stretched between posts. A common method in the country districts is to lay them upon roofs with a low slope. This is all right, provided there is sufficient protection underneath from insects.

"The easiest method in drying is to use trays. These can be made inexpensively by using strips of lumber three-quarters of an inch thick and two inches wide for the sides and ends. To form the bottom laths should be nailed to these strips, with spaces of one-eighth of an inch between laths to permit air circulation.

"A length of four feet, corresponding to the standard length of laths, is economical. Instead of the laths galvanized wire screen, with openings of one-eighth or one-quarter of an inch may be used. In using wire, the size of the tray should be regulated by the width of wire screen obtainable. The trays should be of uniform size in order that they may be stacked together for convenience in handling.

"One must exercise his judgment to a great extent in determining the point at which the product is sufficiently dry. If any moisture remains upon the surface of the fruit or vegetables, it is a sign that drying should continue. For drying in artificial heat, the ordinary baking oven may be used. Place the sliced fruit or vegetables upon plates or trays, and put them into the oven, with a slow heat. The door of the oven should be left slightly ajar.

"Convenient trays may be made by using galvanized wire screen and bending the edges up for an inch or two on each side.

"Where a coal or wood range is used, large trays, either of wood similar to that already described, or of galvanized screen, may be used. These are suspended from the ceiling, one above another, if desired."

Great care must be taken, Mr. Morton warns, to protect the drying fruits and vegetables from flies, moths and other insects whose eggs, developing a few months later, will utterly ruin the product. Before storing the dried material he advises subjecting it to a heat of 160° F., which if allowed to penetrate to infected parts will kill the eggs. Another important item is to be sure that foods are sufficiently dry before being stored. Before finally storing for the winter it is well to "condition" the dried foods. That is, they should be placed in boxes and poured from one to another once a day for three or four days. If any part of the material is found to be too moist return to the dryer for a short time. The foods should be stored in tightly covered pasteboard boxes, preferably paraffined. Strong paper sacks may be used, and in parts of the country where the air is very moist a coating of paraffin over the bags will help to preserve the food. The bags may be put into tin pails with good effect.

HARVEST BEER "A JOLLY BAD CUSTOM"

At a meeting of the National Farmers' Union held in London recently a resolution was submitted requesting the food controller to allot a supply of malt to the farmers for brewing harvest beer. "Unfortunately," the resolution concluded, "so much of the beer now brewed is consumed by the loafer and the drunkard that none is left for the thirsty harvest laborer." In the course of the discussion a Shropshire delegate's remark that it had been the custom for generations in his part of the country to provide beer at harvest was met with cries of "A jolly bad custom," and "The sooner you get out of that the better." An East Sussex representative said that it was a great shame, under present circumstances, that good wholesome barley should be wasted in beer, that he had abolished the practice of giving his laborers beer many years ago and although they objected strongly at first, they thanked him at the end of the first season. They did better work and saved money. There was a great majority against the resolution.

ALCOHOL

ITS RELATION TO HUMAN EFFICIENCY and LONGEVITY

By Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk
Medical Director of the Life Extension Institute, and author, with Professor Irving Fisher, of "How to Live." Revised and criticized by the Members of the Hygiene Reference Board

An absorbingly interesting study of alcohol and its effects upon humanity which should be read with profound attention at this time, when the evidence that society is paying a heavy bill for its indulgence in stimulants can no longer be disregarded by thinking men and women. The author examines the question from the point of view of life insurance statistics, of laboratory tests, of the clinic, and of the sick room, and in other ways, and gives it as his cumulative judgment that alcohol is a destructive force, wholly evil in its total effects.

DOES THE UNION SIGNAL HELP IN THE PROGRESS OF PROHIBITION? IS YOUR UNION MAKING THE GREATEST POSSIBLE USE OF IT?

Read the following:

Why will we live beneath our privileges? The one thing we crave for our unions, after the blessings and guidance of the Holy Spirit, is an intelligent, workable knowledge of the propaganda of this world-wide reform. No wonder unions who know only their own small corner grow discouraged and die. How like a strong stimulating draught is the news of such victories as THE UNION SIGNAL brings every week. One feels that one has touched elbows with the notables of the earth and has had an invisible connection with the triumphs, because one has been steady in her own place.

These are troublous times, but we must not play "penny wise and pound foolish." Let's keep information and inspiration abreast our patriotism, and one important means of grace must be THE UNION SIGNAL.—The Nebraska Union Worker.

I should like to tell you that we had a prohibition campaign in Johannesburg last October and found the latest facts from THE UNION SIGNAL of great use in fighting the liquor people.—Mrs. A. A. Campbell, Parktown, Johannesburg, Transvaal Province, South Africa.

"During the Civil War we used to call the Chicago Tribune 'Mother's Political Bible'—she was so anxious to get the war news. And now I feel THE UNION SIGNAL is my 'Prohibition Bible.' Last evening I heard this illustration: Wellington said to his men just before a battle, 'What will England think of you men if you falter now?' We must not falter now, even though we do not understand why Congress takes no decisive action to prohibit the liquor traffic."

"I feel I must have my personal copy of THE UNION SIGNAL. For nearly a year I have read our local president's paper. There are so many articles I wish to preserve that I must have my own copy. So I have greatly economized in order to subscribe."

"I have been unable to take THE UNION SIGNAL for several years, but my heart has been true to it all the while. I want it to come into my home again and pray it may prove to my children as great a blessing as it was to me in the past."

VODKA PROHIBITION THE BEGINNING OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION

"It is hardly possible to estimate how much the abolition of vodka has contributed towards the saving of Russia," says Mr. Stinton Jones in his book on the Russian Revolution. "The good effects of its abolition soon became apparent. Where previously the lower classes had spent all, or the greater part of their earnings upon drink, and thereby sacrificed the health and comfort of themselves and their families, now they are able with their minds clear to realize the terrible effects which it had upon them. Last year not only did the peasants begin to realize the advantage of saving money, but from all over the country there was a cry of 'What are we to do with our money now?' This appeal was immediately answered by the inauguration of banks, which accepted the peasants' small savings on deposit at a reasonable interest. Such banks the state was forced to start, and now there is hardly a small town or village throughout the whole country without a bank of its own."

The prohibition of vodka not only allowed the working classes to enjoy a surplus of money they had never known before; it enabled them to think. For once they realized to the full extent the terrible oppression they had so patiently endured for centuries. Before the war the masses hardly dared to dream of politics, but once the people were able to recognize that the Government was not working in the interests of the nation, the revolutionary movement, which had been gaining strength for years, came rapidly to the front. The Revolutionists were never once inspired with a desire to stop the war.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

On every side are evidences of the "day of doom," November 1, for the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia. Saloonkeepers are making every effort to dispose of their stock on hand, but a fifty-mile dry zone about the District makes the sale in quantity a doubtful problem. God be praised. May liquor never come back.

Thursday, September 6, the House of Representatives without a roll call or a dissenting vote passed the great war credit bill authorizing $11,528,945,460 in bonds and certificates. This is the largest amount ever authorized by any nation since time began. Action by the Senate as soon as the pending war tax bill is disposed of, is planned by administration leaders. Not a material amendment was added by the House. Representative Moore of Pennsylvania led a group of Republicans in a futile fight for consideration of his proposal for a war expenditure committee, which was thrown out on a point of order.

Former Speaker Cannon persuaded the House to exempt from taxation forever interest on bonds not in excess of $5,000. Speaker Clark took the floor and in a vigorous speech favored a fifty-fifty proposition. "I am opposed to saddling this debt on future generations," he said. "This generation entered into this war, and it should pay its share of the debt." A declaration by the Speaker to the effect that he would "if necessary, as a temporary proposition, agree to raising the tariff" aroused laughter and applause. "As a rule, as you know, I am against raising the tariff, but rather than issue these bonds and pile them up on my children and my children's children, I would increase the tariff, but praying all the time to be forgiven."

The Senate's bitter fight over war profits taxation virtually ended late Wednesday afternoon, September 5, with the adoption of the Finance committee's compromise provision for a total levy of $1,260,000,000, or about one-third of this year's war and normal excess profits. This is an increase of $1,060,000,000 over present taxes. The high tax advocates failed to secure a single amendment. The vote on the Finance committee's draft was 72 to 7.

The fight was continued on Thursday for heavier income taxes, but the decisive rout of the day previous, Senate leaders say, forecasts defeat of this particular measure. The final vote on the entire bill is to come Monday next.

Washington on Tuesday, September 4, wrote a memorable chapter in the nation's history. It paid sincere and reverant tribute to its young men who will shoulder arms at the country's call. But the great procession for its selective service men was more than a civic event. The nation's leaders seized the occasion to pay their tribute to the new National Army.

Commander-in-Chief of New National Army Heads Washington Parade

For the second time since he became President, Woodrow Wilson marched afoot along Pennsylvania avenue. He did it first when he headed the preparedness parade. For him it was a new kind of inauguration, marking his advent as commander-in-chief of an army which, for the first time in the country's history, will fight on European soil. Carrying a silk American flag and attired as were hundreds who marched along the avenue, in blue coat, white trousers, white shoes and stiff brimmed straw hat, he walked with a quick easy stride, which set a fast pace for the procession. The President was cheered lustily along the line, but for once he and men of national note were overshadowed. Every eye was watching to catch sight of the first of Washington's drafted men to qualify for service and the chief demonstration, which was as unique as was the parade, was for them. No cheering crowd was this. It brought a lump to our throats to see mothers, wives, and sweethearts, bravely smile and wave their hands as the boys they loved went by. As soon as they had passed out came handkerchiefs and the tears flowed freely. Probably no parades except inaugurals have drawn bigger crowds to the streets, and even inaugurals fail to bring forth the personal and intimate interest evidenced by those who watched on Tuesday. Spectators jammed the sidewalks, crowded the windows, climbed to roofs, and posted themselves in unexpected places of vantage along the line. A man who walked along the entire route of the parade failed to note a single person who was boisterous or noisy. The nearest approach to it was when "Uncle Joe" Cannon came along, jaunty and spry, despite his eighty-one years and carrying the flag we all love. Again and again was heard the cry, "Hurrah for Uncle Joe," or "Three cheers for Uncle Joe." The former Speaker of the House marched beside Speaker Clark. Then came the United States Senate, seventy members being in line; only a few were absent who were not sick or unable to make the long trip. The House was represented by 260 of its members. The flood of men that poured by was clad in khaki, with the exception of the 900 drafted men who in spite of their civilian clothes marched proudly along. Behind the troops were the government departments headed by the respective secretaries. The Navy clerks carried a half dozen banners with legends that are watchwords in the American navy. "I have not begun to fight" was one. Hundreds of women from the departments were in line. Herbert Hoover led the food division, followed by fifty women dressed in blue uniforms and white caps who carried flat a monster flag. Union veterans in blue, and Confederate veterans in grey, marched side by side, with the banner in front of each division bearing the words in large letters, "The United States." One of the features that brought the crowds up cheering was the hundreds of little children who represented the Washington playgrounds. The foreign visitors seemed particularly interested in a monster float on which all the nations in the war against Germany were represented. Twenty-eight thousand were in the parade, and 200,000 witnessed it. "Onward, Christian Soldiers" ran head and shoulders above every other march in popularity. Of the fifteen bands in line, five played this martial hymn while passing the reviewing stand.

DEATH KNELL OF DISTILLERY BUSINESS SOUNDED SEPTEMBER 8

All the distilleries in the United States stopped the manufacture of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes at eleven o'clock Saturday night, September 8, in accordance with the clause of the Federal Food Control Act providing, "No foods, fruits, food materials or feed shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes."

One Buyer Only in Chicago's Wheat Market

Word comes to Washington that there was just one buyer in the Chicago wheat market one day recently, and he didn't visit the board of trade. He was Uncle Sam, or the great United States. One basic price, $2.20, was fixed by President Wilson. The method pursued was very simple. The man who brought the wheat had it placed in an elevator, obtained a receipt, took it to the Otis building where the United States has an office, and got his money. Through a misunderstanding a little of the wheat sold at slightly above the government basis, but the local representative of the food administrator issued a warning that there must be no repetition of the offense.

Representative Keating of Colorado brought to the attention of the House yesterday the fact that Europeans are buying war bread more cheaply than Americans. With flour milled from American wheat bakers of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium are selling bread at from 60 to 100 per cent less than this country's white loaf commands. In Great Britain, 32 ounces of bread sell for 11 cents; in France 35 ounces for 9 cents; in Italy 35 ounces for 8 cents; and in Belgium 35 ounces for 11 cents. In Washington, D. C., 14 ounces sell for 10 cents. "Remember," said Mr. Keating, "that the grain which goes into this bread was raised and sold by American farmers, that speculators and middlemen made their regular profits, that freight was paid to the seaboard and the highest cargo rate in history expended for its shipment across the Atlantic. What reason can be assigned, then, for the fact that bread is sold 5,000 miles away from the original wheat field cheaper than it is at home?"

Methodists Lay Plans for War Camp Ministry

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for war camp ministry to Methodist soldiers is being asked of the Methodist Episcopal Church through its board of home missions and church extension. The survey of churches in the neighborhood of the cantonments and other camps shows that in the main a majority are not fitted to meet the demands of the 150,000 Methodist soldiers distributed throughout the camps. This $250,000 will be used to equip regular Methodist chaplains, to support and equip volunteer chaplains, for officers' training camps, etc. The very strongest men in the denomination will be sent to serve as pastors or associate pastors at these camp churches.

ALL DISTILLERIES CEASE MANUFACTURE OF ALCOHOL FOR BEVERAGE PURPOSES SEPTEMBER 8, BY ORDER OF GOVERNMENT

OVER 600 WHISKY MILLS AFFECTED BY PROHIBITION CLAUSE OF FOOD CONTROL ACT

On Saturday night, September 8, at eleven o'clock, by order of the Federal Government, all distilleries ceased the production of beverage liquors. While the action of Congress in dealing with the liquor question for the period of the war leaves much to be desired, the closing of the distilleries for the manufacture of beverage alcohol is an event of national significance. Although the law is in force only for the war, no student of the prohibition question believes that these alcohol factories will ever again be permitted to engage in business. The temperance forces generally observed the occasion by renewed efforts to further the movement against the legalized liquor traffic. The Chicago Dry Federation celebrated the death of the Bourbon business by beginning in earnest the circulation of their petitions and pushing their campaign work. White ribboners observed the day in perfecting their plans for the great membership drive on September 12, believing that in no way can they so effectively promote the national prohibition cause as by increasing their membership in every state of the Union.

Iowa to Vote on Constitutional Prohibition on October 15

The allied temperance forces of the state of Iowa are engaged in a strenuous campaign for constitutional prohibition. Well satisfied with the results of prohibition, they intend to make the state permanently dry by placing in the constitution a prohibition amendment. They believe that by so doing they will prevent the prohibition issue from being a disturbing question in state politics. They also believe that a victory in Iowa, which votes October 15, will give an impetus to the movement in Ohio and New Mexico, which vote at the regular November election.

One of the speakers who is addressing large audiences is Hon. James R. Hanna, ex-mayor of Des Moines, who did so much to help clean up that city. Mr. Hanna in his speeches calls attention to the following convincing facts:

"During the last year of license in Des Moines there were eighty-six saloons which took in $3,000,000, at a conservative estimate—$500,000 more than it cost to support the city government, and all its institutions, including the fifty-five schools with their little army of teachers and more than 25,000 pupils. During the first year of prohibition the court costs were decreased more than fifty per cent, arrests fell off forty per cent and even the cases of larceny decreased one half. These figures are moderate and conservative. Statistics as to insanity tell a similar story. People with drink-befuddled brains stand no show whatever in the stress and strain of modern life. Then, so long as the temperance question remains unsettled it will be a bone of perpetual political contention. Iowa has done pretty well in the past forty years, but the best state in the union ought to do still better. We can't afford to do just average things in Iowa. If we cannot do better than states less blessed we are not living up to our high inheritance. On October 15 next it should be our duty, as it may be our high privilege, to take the great question of prohibition out of politics and write it into our state constitution, for keeps."

Real Estate Business Prospers Under Utah's Dry Law

Utah's prohibitory law has been in effect since August 1. The Salt Lake City Tribune reports that the first three weeks of the month recorded an active time in the real estate market. The Associated Investment Company says a review of the month's business shows increased trading in small modern homes located in some of the better residence districts. V. H. Ritchey, general manager of the Wellbilt company, expresses the opinion that the prohibition measure will ultimately have a marked effect in increasing all branches of the realty business in Salt Lake City.

President Wilson Endorses New York Suffrage Campaign

A letter from President Woodrow Wilson endorsing the fight of New York state woman suffragists to obtain the enfranchisement of women through a constitutional amendment at the state elections in November was read the other day before the New York state woman suffrage party, in conference in New York City. President Wilson's letter follows:

"I learn with sincere pleasure of your impression of a growing sentiment in the state of New York in favor of woman suffrage, and I shall look forward with the greatest interest to the results of the state conference. May I not express the hope that that conference will lead to a very widespread interest in your campaign and that your efforts will be crowned with the most substantial and satisfactory success.

"I hope that the voters of the state of New York will rally to the support of woman suffrage by a handsome majority. It would be a splendid vindication of the principle of the cause in which we all believe."

Life to Cut Out Liquor Advertising

No more liquor advertising for Life, the periodical that deals exclusively with the humorous side of life, and heretofore has given generous space to liquor advertisements. The Continent, in commenting on this change of policy, remarks, "The advertising manager informs us that from this present August henceforward forever Life will live guiltless of commending to its readers the stuff that enters their mouths only to steal their brains—those indispensable brains without which Life cannot be appreciatively perused."

No Alcohol or Tobacco for New Mexico Teachers

The assistant state superintendent of Public Instruction of New Mexico is the leader in a movement against the use of alcoholic drinks or tobacco by public school teachers. The Christian Science Monitor states that as a result of his efforts county boards of education in practically every county have extended the rule against the use of alcoholic drinks by teachers to include the use of tobacco in any form.

Harvest Beer Not Needed

The Alliance News quotes from a London paper the following interesting letter from a Canadian farmer:

"As a Canadian, I can say that during the harvest in the great wheat fields of Northwest Canada beer is unknown. 'Milky tea' is all the boys ever get. I have pitched twenty-six loads of sheaves on it in a day."

"WIND THE RIBBON ROUND THE NATIONS"

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. ACTIVITIES IN THE EASTERN AND WESTERN HEMISPHERES

Making Temperance Sentiment in Italy

Madame Marie Camperio of Milan writes appreciatively of the "interesting and well translated" Italian temperance leaflets received. Madame Camperio, leader of our white ribboners in Italy, is optimistic about the general work which even the war has not hindered. "We are making temperance sentiment," she writes, "among the workmen in the factories, printing sentences on alcohol on the envelopes in which they receive their wages. My secretary, Miss Bersani, is charming and is a teacher in a girls' school. She is doing a great work among the children, securing them as members. Once a month she invites to the school the mothers of her pupils and explains to them the danger of using alcohol. We are publishing many leaflets and lately have issued a little book to help the school teachers."

China Menaced by Imported Liquors

Mrs. Chauncey Goodrich, the general secretary of the W. C. T. U. work in China, is preparing a leaflet about white ribbon activities in China. During the past year more letters than usual have come to Mrs. Goodrich from missionaries who see the need of active temperance work and who desire helpful literature. In answer to these requests Mrs. Goodrich has sent to the mission stations a large quantity of excellent leaflets. She is to be especially congratulated on her up-to-date temperance work with the Chinese parliament. The members of that dignified legislative body, eight hundred in all, received from the W. C. T. U. of China a letter enclosing a leaflet on beer and one on Russia's temperance experiment, the latter prepared by Mrs. Goodrich. China, though emancipated from opium, is in great danger from the importation of alcoholic liquors. Mrs. Goodrich writes: "Merchants tell me that in Shanghai all kinds of foreign drinks are served by Chinese when doing business. On the dining cars nearly all Chinese have foreign liquors served with their meals. Beer and other alcoholic liquors are being given away to well-to-do Chinese to establish the habit." One million dollars' worth of cigarets have been given as samples to the Chinese in order to create an appetite. Mrs. Goodrich prepares the temperance programs for the monthly meetings of nine different societies located in Peking. She also arranges for special meetings, lectures and talks in the city schools. The Commercial Press, a large Chinese publishing house with branches all over the country, has lately sought help from the W. C. T. U. in the publication of temperance leaflets.

It is so gratifying to receive from China the news of five "brand new unions," organized by Mrs. Renyin Mei, the gifted native general traveling secretary of the W. C. T. U. of China. Mrs. Mei's three weeks' successful itinerary included addresses in large schools, and the new unions are all located in these educational centers. She wonderfully appeals to thinking men. At the Union Theological Seminary in Nanking the students were "wildly enthusiastic" and pledged their loyal support to the temperance reform, not only for the present, but also in their future church work as native pastors. Mrs. Mei's devotion to the work is realized by all she reaches. She writes: "I feel that the great need for China is this temperance work. It is God's call to me. It will be a fight with the people who are in the habit formed of these things, drinking, gambling, smoking and vice. It will be very hard work indeed for any human being to do. I shall need your prayers so much." Miss Jennie V. Hughes writes of a stirring address given at the Knowles Bible Training School at Kiukiang, in which Mrs. Mei stressed the evils resulting from the enormous amount of tobacco in every form that for years has been sent from America to China. The audience was greatly impressed when Mrs. Mei exclaimed: "Let us have a motto which is of God, not of the other like this one of the American tobacconists. Their motto is: 'In ten years' time tobacco in the hands of every Chinese in the land.' Let our motto be one of faith in God who has overcome the world: 'In less than ten years no tobacco, no wine, no opium in our great republic.'" In response to this enthusiastic appeal, 153 men and women solemnly took the pledge.

Miss Yu Ling Chen, Young People's secretary, has an earnest, convincing way of speaking which quickly wins her Chinese audiences. One of the missionary teachers writes that Miss Chen is a wonderful girl and has made a splendid impression. At morning devotions this friend's cook offered the following pathetic petition: "Out of a land where women have been considered of no importance, we thank Thee, O Lord, that thou hast given us this kind of a woman."

Australian States Campaigning for Prohibition

Lady Holder, president of the Australasian W. C. T. U., has a son in active service in France; another son is in the war zone in Palestine, and her third boy expects to leave home this month, having just reached the age of nineteen years. The government of South Australia has appointed several policewomen and a large number of justices of the peace. Lady Holder, one of the new justices, hopes, in this capacity, to be able to do much helpful work for women and children.

The corresponding secretary of the Australasian W. C. T. U., Mrs. W. H. Carvosso, reports an enthusiastic meeting of the executive committee in Sydney, New South Wales. A prohibition campaign in which the six Australasian states will work unitedly is the aim of our Australian comrades. They have appealed to the Australasian prime minister in regard to prohibiting the sale of grain to breweries and distilleries. They have petitioned for an anti-shouting (treating) bill as a war measure. Queensland white ribboners are again beseeching the premier to grant a referendum to the people on the question of six o'clock closing. Australian white ribboners have sent to Hon. Lloyd George an appeal for the protection of their boys in the Australian training camps through the prohibition of liquor canteens and of the rum ration in the trenches at the battle-fronts.

Mrs. J. W. Copeland writes from Victoria, Australia, that the six o'clock closing of the liquor bars in hotels has been a great boon. It has removed the temptation in the evening from young men, especially the soldiers. The measure is a law in four out of the six states of Australia. Mrs. Copeland writes: "I much appreciate THE UNION SIGNAL which I have taken and read for twenty years."

Great Britain's White Ribboners Absorbed in Relief Enterprises

"There is a great scarcity of young women workers," writes Mrs. Gemmill, honorary secretary of the Scottish branch of the British Woman's Christian Temperance Union. "Our best and brightest are either busy at home in war service or are engaged as nurses—all over the field of action. Our little new 'Y' secretary and others are at Salonica doing magnificent work. We provided and have kept up at a cost of $525 monthly three motor ambulances which have done much good work in connection with the Scottish Women's Hospital on Foreign Service. I have been absorbed in looking after temperance canteens which we started and carried on." The Glasgow union has conducted for over two years a large soldiers' club which is much appreciated.

Madame Yajima, Eighty-five Years Young, Active in Field Work

Mrs. Ochimi Kubushiro, in a letter from Akasaka, Tokyo, tells of the successful field work accomplished in the northern and southern districts. "When the call for a speaker came to headquarters," writes Mrs. Kubushiro, "our beloved president, Madam Yajima, courageously exclaimed, 'I have lived eighty-five years already and I can die anywhere, so I will go wherever needed.'

"Accompanied by the matron of our headquarters, our president went north to Sendai where she made four addresses to great audiences consisting each time of several hundred people. Miss Hayashi of Osaka and Miss Totoki of Kure accompanied Madam Yajima on her southern trip. They visited eleven towns and cities. Members increased in each local union and a new 'Y' and L. T. L. are going to be formed. Yesterday a letter sixteen feet long came from one of the local presidents, who was so happy that she could not keep silent about the effect of their tour. And don't you think how happy we feel when these trips were supplied by the fund we got from that little five cent bag.

"Miss Strout's stay and her work were effective. I am sure something will be done in the future. Mrs. Gauntlett worked so hard in company with Miss Strout, visiting and interpreting. Today we are going to dedicate one of the buildings of Jiai Kwan, our rescue home. I have read through your 'Frances Willard.' How human she is. When I was in America I used to read her 'Glimpses of Fifty Years' every Sunday afternoon. I cannot help but be inspired when reading her writings."

"AMERICA, SAVE OUR BOYS"

JEAN CARR WRIGHT, Lincoln University, Pa.

(Adapted from the popular song, "America, Here's My Boy," to be sung to the same music)

A million mothers knocking at the nation's door,
A million mothers, yes, and there are millions more
Have said good-bye and sent their boys away;
But one and all, they to this nation say:—

CHORUS

"America, we've raised our boys for you;
America, you'll find them staunch and true,
The defenders of our country,
They are ready to die or do,
America, you have an enemy
Right at your very doors,
The awful liquor traffic and 'tis killing men by thousands.
America, save our boys."

We've raised our boys to lead a life that's clean and true;
It's nothing more than you've expected us to do;
But now these precious lives are in your care,
Exposed to licensed evil everywhere.

Old Glory floats o'er many brave young hearts tonight;
And mothers pray that "right not might" shall win this fight.
Oh, listen to the mothers' pleading cry,
Don't lose this chance to make the nation dry.

For liberty this country fought long years ago;
But now we fight a strong-intrenched and fiercer foe.
Away with drink that steals the strength and brain
Of men who fight a lasting peace to gain.

SIDELIGHTS FROM SHAKESPEARE ON THE ALCOHOL PROBLEM

CHRISTINE I. TINLING

FOREWORD

My Shakespeare!
Thou art alive still, while thy book doth live,
And we have wits to read and praise to give —Ben Jonson

Alcohol is on trial. It has been arraigned before the bar of public opinion on at least a dozen counts. It stands accused of murder in the first degree and of every other crime. Many are the witnesses who bear testimony every day to its evil deeds; on the other hand there are those who argue in its defense.

Let us hear a few of these as they speak to us from the pages of the immortal Shakespeare, giving faithful testimony to their innermost thoughts and feelings on this important subject. Do not let us imagine that because they belonged to the society of three hundred years ago, they are not qualified to express an opinion, and have not any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun. They are as much alive as they ever were. We pass them on the street, we live with them in the home, we do business with them in the busy mart.

Human nature remains ever the same, and as for Shakespeare, it has well been said of him, "He was not for an age, but for all time."

It is true we cannot call these witnesses into any court of law. Did we attempt to detain them, they would vanish into air, into thin air, and like the baseless fabric of a vision leave not a rack behind. They are of such stuff as dreams are made of, but they are none the less real for that. Nothing is more real than thought; it remains as strong and vital as ever when the brain that gave it birth has been mouldering for centuries in the dust.

In order to secure the testimony of these people we must catch them unawares. We must wait our opportunity and listen to their speech as they talk among themselves of their joys and sorrows, the "mingled yarn" that forms the warp and woof of life.

Let us take five witnesses for the defense and five for the prosecution and listen to them with an open mind, considering carefully, not only each individual testimony, but also the character of the witness. If we have learned the priceless lesson "to delight no less in truth than life," let us weigh the evidence pro and con as fairly and dispassionately as we may. Then in our own minds let "even-handed justice" prevail, as we pray that it may ever prevail in the greater court of our national government.

Caliban and His God

"That's a brave god and bears celestial liquor; I will kneel to him"

Caliban has been sent by his good master Prospero to fetch some wood. As usual he goes slowly and unwillingly for he hates the duke for having dispossessed him many years ago. Formerly he lived here alone with his mother, a foul witch who for mischiefs manifold and sorceries terrible was exiled from Argier and took refuge on this desert island.

He is a strange looking object as he waddles along; dwarfed in stature, "legged like a man" but with fin-like arms, and with long claws for nails. When Prospero and his little daughter, Miranda, cast adrift by their enemies, were stranded here, the duke pitied Caliban and took him to live in his own cell. The creature could not even speak in those days, but only gabbled like a thing most brutish. Prospero, however, did not let an hour go by without teaching him one thing or other, so he gained after a while such simple knowledge as how to "name the greater light and how the less." Prospero allowed him to share such scanty comforts as he himself enjoyed. He trained him on the other hand to build the fire, bring in the wood and make himself useful in various ways.

The kind man's efforts, however, have been in vain. Caliban is incorrigible; he cannot take any print of goodness, being capable of all ill. He is one on whose nature nurture will never stick, and as with age his body uglier grows, his mind cankers in like manner.

As he loiters along bearing his load of wood he suddenly sees a man in an odd variegated costume advancing towards him. But as no one lives on the island except himself, Prospero and Miranda, and as he has never seen any human shape except these and his witch mother, he thinks this must be a spirit sent to torment him. He falls flat on the ground hoping thereby to escape notice.

This is no spirit, however, but the jester of King Alonzo's company. They have all been wrecked and cast upon the island and are scattered here and there. A thunderstorm is brewing and a huge black cloud is ready to burst, so this fellow Trinculo looks round for a shelter.

There is not a tree in sight, no, not so much as a shrub, and he knows not where to hide his head. Suddenly turning, he espies Caliban. "What have we here?" he cries, "a man or a fish? Dead or alive?" Though the form is suggestive of a fish, the dress makes him conclude this must be an islander recently killed by a thunderbolt. The "monster" is a curiosity surely, and if Trinculo can only take him to England, he will make his fortune. But his immediate concern is to shelter from the storm, so he creeps under the creature's rough cloak or gaberdine and hides there. There they lie, presenting the appearance of a four-legged animal and looking between them even more monster-like than Caliban did before.

Soon there comes along the drunken butler of the ship's company, Stephano by name, bottle in hand as usual. He pours some of his liquor into the mouth of the strange animal, with what object we shall consider later.

Let us see what impression it makes upon him. This is of interest to us, because Caliban is no mere ugly oddity; he stands as a type of man at his lowest, only slightly raised above the brute. He is of the earth earthy, and represents the animal nature, just as Ariel stands for thought and rejoices in the free air as his natural element.

Caliban is delighted with the draught. Hear what he says: "That's a brave god and bears celestial liquor; I will kneel to him. I'll swear upon that bottle to be thy true subject, for the liquor is not earthly. Hast thou not dropped from heaven?" he cries. "Out of the moon, I do assure thee," says Stephano. "I was the man in the moon when time was." "I have seen thee in her," replies the credulous Caliban, "and I adore thee; my mistress showed me thee and thy dog and thy bush."

Caliban cannot do enough for this lord of liquor; he promises to show him every fertile inch of the island, pluck berries for him, catch fish, dig for pig-nuts, in fact, do everything in his power for the "wondrous man" who has brought him this celestial boon, this more than earthly beverage, tasted and enjoyed now for the first time in his existence.

No wonder that a poor monster, more like a tortoise than a man, is amazed when he first makes acquaintance with alcohol. It mystified the alchemists in the Middle Ages, who at first thought they had discovered the elixir that would give perpetual youth. They called it aqua vitae or water of life. The name "alcohol" was given to it because of its volatile nature. It is from two Arabic words signifying "most subtle." A few drops poured out would almost immediately disappear. Surely it was a strange substance! It gave peculiar sensations, too, a feeling of exuberance that was very pleasing. So, like Caliban, they considered it a celestial liquor, a beverage fit for gods.

The Arabians appear to have practised in early days the art of distillation, that is, the extraction of what they called the "spirits of wine" from a fermented liquid. It is probable that the Chinese also were

RALLY FOR YOUR COUNTRY AND YOUR GOD

MARY FRANCES WILLARD ANDERSON

Rally month is here again. There have been many changes since last September. Many young men from our Young People's Branches have responded to the nation's call for service abroad, and we shall miss them in our Y. P. B. activities. God bless and keep them wherever they may be.

To the thousands of young men who remain at home we issue a special appeal to join with us; take the places of those who have gone and help us fight our nation's greatest foe—the liquor traffic.

Surely we can depend upon the young women of this land to join us and serve under our Y. P. B. banner! The world war has undoubtedly prepared the youth of America for just the instruction given in our Young People's Branch. There is a thoughtfulness among young people which was absent in the days of ease and quietness. They know that world tasks confront them and we Young People's Branch members must seize this opportunity here and now to rally the young men and women in our communities. To do this successfully we must HUSTLE.

"To hustle when you want to
And to hustle when you don't;
To say, 'I can, I must, I will,'
When you want to say, 'I won't!'
To push with all your might and main,
And to stop with nothing less,
Will swing that heavy gate ajar
That leads to true success."

Dear young people, this rally month is your open door. If God opens the door, enter it. Do not let any power on earth keep you back. Never miss an opportunity for service. It is a great honor to be a co-worker with God, and surely we who are fighting one of His greatest enemies are fighting with Him.

If we are to expect great results this rally month we must make great efforts. Then

MISSOURI'S STIRRING Y. P. B. CONVENTION

Missouri's state Y. P. B. convention held at Columbia was soul-cheering and inspiring. The state has a splendid lot of gifted young men and women who bring honor and distinction to our cause. Mr. D. B. Curtiss, as presiding officer, reflected credit upon the organization by his strict adherence to parliamentary rulings. Officers and delegates transacted business with precision and dispatch and kept the program right up to the minute. We are so thankful for these splendid young people. Under the wise direction of Mrs. Mary Esrey and the efficient corps of state officers, they will do valiant service in our 1918 campaign.—Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, President Missouri W. C. T. U.

A CALL TO COLLEGE COMRADES

CHRISTINE I. TINLING

The college year is about to open and we need to prepare immediately to utilize our opportunities. As the National W. C. T. U. Convention does not meet this year until December we shall have almost three months of fall work. A great deal can be done in that time if we only begin promptly.

The plans for college work have been printed in THE UNION SIGNAL so I will not repeat them. But I have sent an extra copy to every state Y. P. B. secretary and more may be obtained from National W. C. T. U. Headquarters, Evanston, Illinois, for postage only.

It is pleasant to hear of New York state offering a set of books to every college and Normal school. Could not other states follow this good example? If the Y. P. B. has not the funds with which to do it, would it not be a good investment for the state W. C. T. U.?

Several wrote me in the spring that nothing could be attempted at that time but in the fall they would be ready to begin organization in the colleges. I hope all these workers are planning to get busy in September.

Some state presidents wrote that they hoped to appoint a college secretary before long, perhaps at the mid-year executive or after their spring conventions. I am eagerly awaiting their decisions.

One of the first things we ought to know is the number of college Branches at present in existence. I have asked every state secretary for this information about her own state. Two have replied. I should love to hear from the other forty-nine.

This is the "last call" for this year. Down in Mississippi in a country hotel where I happened to be one night, a traveling man asked the waiter, "Do you ring two bells for dinner?" "No, suh," was the reply, "I rings de same bell twice." I am sadly conscious that I have rung this bell of mine a good deal more often than that. If you are tired of hearing it, I am sorry. Pardon one more peal. Ding, dong! Ding, dong! Get busy! Organize the Y. P. B. in every college and Normal school! Ding, dong! Ding, dong! Last call!

FOOD OR NARCOTICS—WHICH?

H. G. GUTHMANN, Instructor of Economics, Syracuse University

Food is now the chief concern of America, for with her lies the responsibility of supplying not only her own needs but those of her allies. Much can and is being done through governmental regulation. It is upon individual economy, however, that most depends in making this work effective. By purchasing food wisely the supply may be made to satisfy a greater number, and by discouraging unnecessary and harmful goods producers will be forced to change to the production of necessaries. At this time it were well to examine our national weaknesses.

Americans have a weakness for tobacco which costs them at least $1,000,000,000 annually,—an amount which merits our consideration when looking for leakages. This sum represents the consumption of valuable labor and garden soil. Federal figures for 1916 place the tobacco acreage at 1,411,800 acres, which almost equals the total area of improved farm land in the state of Massachusetts. This item is of no small importance when we recall how strongly the public has been urged to do their "bit" by cultivating small back yard gardens, and other plots of doubtful fertility.

The labor side is no less important. For the same year 210,894 persons were reported employed in the manufacturing of tobacco products. This must be added to the farm labor consumed. The sales organization also adds another quota to this small army, which might well be employed in a useful field of production. Why should it not be so employed?

All such data as is available points in one direction,—a greater or less degree of impaired effectiveness among the users of the narcotic. In the business world it has resulted in the closing of many desirable fields of employment to the cigaret user. The experiences of recruiting officers with "tobacco heart" is but another pointed illustration of what an increasing number of medical and even business men are coming to recognize. The example serves, however, to re-emphasize that whatever injures the individual impairs national efficiency.

If Food Commissioner Hoover finds it worth while to ask housewives to save "a slice of bread a day" worth a fraction of a cent, a cigar representing five cents worth of material and labor may also be a worth while economy. It means just so much natural energy saved for other kinds of production. Indeed at such a time the tobacco fund of a certain New York daily for the soldiers takes on all the aspects of the work of those well intentioned folks who used to send cordials and brandies to the one away from home.

Tobacco is neither food nor drink. It remains to be seen whether America can afford its billion dollar narcotic.

Evanston, Illinois, September 13, 1917

National W. C. T. U. Convention, Washington, D. C., December 2–7, 1917

Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, left Evanston, Friday evening, September 7, for Iowa, to confer with Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, state W. C. T. U. president, concerning the state-wide campaign now in progress. The people of the state vote on constitutional prohibition on October 15. While it is generally conceded that the amendment will carry by a large vote, there will be nothing left undone to make assurance of victory doubly sure.

MRS. LOYNE'S DAUGHTER TO BE ACTING SUPERINTENDENT OF WORK AMONG LUMBERMEN

Mrs. Etta L. Davis, of Methuen, Mass., daughter of our promoted comrade, Mrs. W. A. Loyne, has been appointed acting superintendent of the department of Work among Lumbermen and Miners for the remaining months of the National W. C. T. U. year. Mrs. Davis is very familiar with the department, having assisted her mother on many occasions. She feels it a sacred privilege to take up the work so ably carried on by her mother.

"SIDELIGHTS FROM SHAKESPEARE ON THE ALCOHOL PROBLEM"

We publish this week the first in a series of twelve articles, "Sidelights from Shakespeare on the Alcohol Problem," by Christine I. Tinling. The series deals in an original and delightful fashion with certain Shakespearean characters, through whom the great dramatist presents vital truths concerning the demoralizing, degrading and deteriorating effects of the alcohol habit. The sketches are especially adapted for use in the W. C. T. U. programs and will serve the purpose of instruction as well as entertainment.

HOW ABOUT YOUR COLLEGE?

Last spring the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America requested the presidents of the various colleges and universities to communicate with their respective alumni associations urging that the use of intoxicants at their meetings be done away with during the commencement season. The responses received were most hearty and appreciative, according to Mr. Charles Stelzle of the council. They showed a strong sentiment against the use of liquor at social affairs. One president wrote: "We have never had intoxicating drinks at any college function of any sort from the beginning until now. Our college sacrificed the friendship and the gifts of a man who has $3,000,000 because we were opposed to the liquor trade." Another wrote, "Almost without exception the faculty and students are for national prohibition."

That in this enlightened age any higher institution of learning should permit the use of alcoholic beverages at any of its social functions is difficult to understand. The radical change in the attitude of the faculties of colleges and universities is gratifying, but we look forward hopefully to the time when every institution will not only be outspoken in its advocacy of prohibition but will include in its curriculum a special course on the alcohol problem. Such courses are being introduced in not a few colleges. During the coming year in the Economics department of Syracuse University is to be given a course of lectures on "America's Parasitic Industries—Tobacco and Alcohol." Why is it not possible for other colleges to give similar lectures?

It is admitted that the teaching of scientific temperance in the public schools has created the sentiment which has driven the saloons from three-fourths of the territory of the United States. A continuation of this study in the higher institutions would do much to hasten the completion of the task. Such courses will be established as soon as there is an expressed demand for them. Would not concerted action on the part of parents of the sons and daughters who attend college bring about the desired end? The young people themselves would second such an effort with enthusiasm. One can think of no endeavor that, if successful—as it is certain to be—would do more to enlighten the future generation and assure the permanence of national prohibition.

"KEEP THE HOME FIRES BURNING BRIGHT"

One of the most popular songs in the army camps overseas, we are told, is "Keep the Home Fires Burning Bright." We know not what may be the thought of the boys as they sing it, but surely the words are a ringing challenge to those who are left at home. We are told that we are in a world-wide war for democracy; that for the sake of establishing this great principle our boys and men are abandoning their careers, putting aside their ambitions, and risking their all on the battlefields of Europe. What an unspeakable calamity if these champions of civic liberty and righteousness shall return home to find that through the inertia or laxity of those responsible, the city, the state, the nation has in any way deteriorated. To the everlasting disgrace of humanity it must be admitted that a time of war furnishes the opportunity for selfish interests to accomplish their ends. With the minds of the people concentrated on the war and absorbed in relief work, corrupt politicians find it not difficult to control local and state politics and carry out their unrighteous programs. "To keep the home fires burning bright" until the war is over will require eternal vigilance in every community. The fuel of agitation and education along the lines of temperance and other great reforms must be tirelessly supplied, that the fires may be kept at white heat. Is your town or city still cursed with the legalized liquor traffic? Prepare for the home-coming of the young defenders by exterminating every liquor shop. If you are so fortunate as to live under a prohibitory law, constitute yourself a law-enforcement committee to see that the will of the people who have enacted that law shall not bo frustrated by the liquor interests. Remember that the deadly enemy of true democracy is lawlessness and that you may as valiantly fight for this principle in your own town as will your college comrade or your business associate or friend on European battlefields. Keep the home fires of benevolence and missions burning bright while so many generous friends and supporters are in army camp and on naval gunboat. Keep the home fires burning bright in the Bible school and city missions by filling the places left vacant by the departure of faithful teachers and leaders. Keep the home fires burning bright in the college and university where this fall the comrades who have enlisted will be so sadly missed. Fill with new recruits the ranks of those who have responded to the call to the colors, awaken the latent patriotism of every individual with whom you come in contact and make it tell for the true Christian democracy that shall make possible a lasting peace among the nations of the world. Let your slogan in home, church, office, factory, school, be "Keep the home fires burning bright."

THE NATION'S DRINK BILL

The announcement by the press that the nation's drink bill has increased tremendously during the past year will undoubtedly cause concern on the part of some. It is, of course, quite unnecessary to explain to UNION SIGNAL readers the cause of the apparent advance. But every advocate of prohibition must be prepared to meet the assertion that will be made by the liquorites that the report of the Internal Revenue department means an increase in the amount of liquor consumed and a reversal of public sentiment on the prohibition question.

As has been stated in these columns many times the figures given in the Internal Revenue report are based on the amount of distilled liquor released from bond, the payment of the Federal tax being required at that time. Anticipating the possibility of President Wilson's using the power vested in him by Congress to commandeer distilled liquors in bond for munition purposes, the distillers have withdrawn enormous quantities, estimated at over a million gallons a day, in many cases making loans in order to do it. This liquor, remember, has not been consumed, but will remain in the warehouses of the distillers for sale to retailers. It should also be taken into account, in explaining the Internal Revenue report, that very large quantities have been withdrawn for munition purposes. These two facts tell the story of the so-called increase. The figures made public in the report do not indicate that there has been a greater consumption of alcoholic beverages than heretofore, as they do not deal at all with consumption.

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. AMBULANCE PRESENTED BY NATIONAL PRESIDENT

The National W. C. T. U. ambulance for the French front is now a reality. It would have rejoiced the hearts of the generous donors to the Ambulance Fund to have been present on Saturday, August 25, when the machine was formally presented by Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, to Ambulance Company No. 9, in charge of Dr. S. V. Balderston. It was accepted by Lauris Eek, ranking sergeant. The full force of sergeants came from Fort Sheridan to inspect and receive the ambulance, which they enthusiastically declared was "a dream" and "a thing of beauty." The machine is one of the most substantial and best equipped ambulances made in this country. It can accommodate at one time four stretchers. The members of the corps which are to have the honor of using it in France are as patriotic and high-minded a company of youths as are to be found in the service. The National W. C. T. U. claims Head-Sergeant Eek as one of "its boys," for while taking his course at Northwestern University, he gave his leisure hours to service at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters. On one side of the machine, in a conspicuous place, appears a silver plate bearing the words: "Presented by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, U. S. A." During the heart-breaking days to come, as those who have contributed toward the purchase of the ambulance read the casualty lists from the French battle front, they will have the comfort of knowing that through this ambulance they are doing "their bit" to care for the wounded who are bravely defending their homes and their country in the war zone of Europe.

acquainted with it. But like many other things it was for a long time forgotten. Albucassis, a Moorish physician, rediscovered it in the eleventh century and it was improved somewhat later by a certain Raimundus Lullus, a theologian of distinction. He lived in the island of Majorca and learned to love a girl, who, alas, was suffering from an incurable disease. He threw himself into the study of physic and chemistry in order to save his sweetheart. This was impossible but he became a famous alchemist and specially busied himself with the art of distillation.

Though the alchemists learned by means of heat to separate this volatile substance, this alcohol, they had no idea of its origin. This was shrouded in mystery. Mankind had, of course, known since Noah's time that when grapes were crushed and exposed to the air, something was formed that would produce intoxication. But aeons were to roll by before men could read "in Nature's infinite book of secrecy" the story of how this came to pass.

At last Louis Pasteur, in the nineteenth century, announced to the world that fermentation is due to a minute plant, the yeast-cell, which lives and grows in solutions of sugar, and gives off alcohol as a waste product. Another scientist, Buchner, a few years later, submitted the yeast plant to great pressure and extracted from it a ferment which he called zymase. He showed that this is the agent that does the work of breaking up the molecule of sugar into two molecules of carbon dioxide and two molecules of alcohol. So now it is clear that alcohol is a waste product formed in connection with the splitting up of sugar. In other words, it is a result of decomposition. The work of the yeast plant is thus the exact opposite of that of the green plant cell. The green plant takes carbon dioxide and water and builds them up into a useful food, sugar, whereas the yeast plant uses sugar and breaks it down into carbon dioxide and alcohol.

This excretion, like others, is injurious to the cell that produces it and to all higher forms of life. It is well known that the bodies of all plants and animals, including man, are composed of the minute masses that we call cells. Cells have a few essential needs. One is water; another is oxygen. Alcohol has an affinity for both of the substances; it readily combines with them and thus deprives the cell of part of its supply.

Cells consist largely of protoplasm which resembles the white of an egg, but is a very complex material consisting chiefly of the class of compounds known as proteins. Alcohol is hurtful to protein and causes it to coagulate or clot. These three simple facts are sufficient to explain in large measure the injurious effects which follow its use.

As regards its character this toxin is narcotic, that is, if taken in sufficient doses it causes narcosis or stupor. In the days before chloroform was known it was often used in operations to deaden the sense of pain. It belongs indeed to the same group of substances as chloroform, ether and chloral, and is classed as an anesthetic. Therefore, by reason of its very nature, it cannot be suitable for beverage use.

Because, however, it gives a temporary feeling of elation, those who are ruled by impulse rather than by reason will naturally be in favor of it. Caliban stands as a representative of that great host who live for the satisfaction of the lower nature, the animal appetites. All these must be counted among the "Pros." If they say anything they will bear witness for the defense.

We shall soon hear from others of a very different type, some of them persons of intelligence and influence. All the supporters of alcohol are not Calibans by any means, but practically all the Calibans are supporters of alcohol, and this is to be expected.

Their cry is "Liberty" and here again our poor monster perfectly represents them. Having tasted the joys of alcohol he determines to break loose from his master, Prospero, the benefactor to whom he owed so much. Hear him sing:

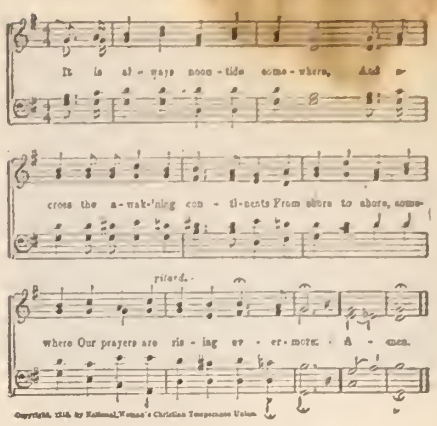
"No more dams I'll make for fish,
Nor fetch in firing
At requiring,
Nor scrape trencher, nor wash dish.
Ban, Ban, Caliban,
Has a new master; get a new man."

He will not serve Wisdom as it is personified in Prospero; he prefers to serve Appetite.

"Heyday, Freedom," he shouts, "Freedom, Freedom" and all the time he is a miserable slave, ready to resign every advantage of civilization for the newfound joys of the bottle. Nay, this "thing of darkness" will kill if possible the man to whom he is indebted for everything, even the very gift of language, and will cast himself down in abject submission before the one who can supply him with strong drink, crying, "I prithee, be my god," and protesting that he will be for aye his foot-licker.

What a picture of humanity reduced to its lowest terms. Such is our first witness for the defense of alcohol, Caliban, the deserter of Wisdom, the willing slave of Appetite.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

MY FATHER'S WORLD

This is my Father's world. O let me ne'er forget
That though the wrong seems oft so strong,
God is the ruler yet.

This is my Father's world. The battle is not done.
Jesus who died shall be satisfied.
And earth and heaven be one.

This is my Father's world. Should my heart be ever sad?
The Lord is King, let the heavens ring,
God reigns—let the earth be glad.

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What event of national importance relating to the liquor traffic occurred September 8?

2. Name the states that vote on statewide prohibition this fall.

3. What special issue is to be decided by the voters of the state of Iowa, and on what day do they cast their ballots?

4. What marked benefits has Des Moines experienced under prohibition?

5. Since China has freed itself from the opium curse, what new evil menaces its health and morals?

6. The women of what section of North America have been very recently granted suffrage privileges?

7. What well known humorous periodical has declared its intention hereafter to decline all liquor advertisements?

8. How could all colleges be induced to arrange for courses of lectures on the liquor problem?

TREASURER'S REPORT

MRS. MARGARET C. MUNNS, National Treasurer

Contributions to the Ambulance Fund

Contributions to the W. C. T. U. Ambulance Fund are given by states. It would be a pleasure to acknowledge these gifts just as they have been received from local unions and individuals as well as from state treasurers. As the larger part of this fund has come through the regular channels, reaching the National treasurer through the state treasurers, it would be impossible to give the names of all contributors, hence the acknowledgment by states.

Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund and Lillian Stevens Campaign Fund

The following contributions have been received for the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund and the Lillian Stevens Campaign Fund. After consultation with the state treasurers, it was decided to give this report hereafter by states rather than by local unions because state treasurers acknowledge these gifts through the state papers and the space in THE UNION SIGNAL is needed for other important matter. The Lillian Stevens Campaign Fund contributions have been acknowledged by states since the creation of the fund.

Opportunity of a Y. P. B. in a Normal College Town

Its Popularity Among the Students

ADA PARKER NEWTON

In the summer of 1912 the New York state Y. P. B. convention was held in Cortland. Not many young people in the city had ever heard of a Y. P. B., and so, when a public meeting was held on Sunday afternoon, very few were present. At the close, eight young people remained to learn more about the work and to organize a Branch. Of course there was an office of some kind for every member. The greatest difficulty presenting itself was that of gaining new members.

The young people looked upon the society as stiff and uninteresting and they had no time for it. Articles were published in regard to it, meetings were held in homes and one pastor opened his study but so few responded that it was very discouraging and many wanted to disband. A few, however, were determined not to give up, and one member conceived the idea of a young people's banquet.

Nothing was said as to the meaning of "Y. P. B." The affair was advertised as a banquet for all young people between the ages of sixteen and thirty. A toast list was arranged and Mrs. Maude B. Perkins was secured as the chief speaker.

The young people of the city were enthusiastic as this was the first banquet of its kind ever held among them. The work of the Y. P. B. was presented and an opportunity given to join. Several new members, representatives of all classes, were obtained.

A membership contest was launched immediately and many young people enrolled, among whom were several Normal students. These students were among our most enthusiastic members for several reasons. It gave them an opportunity to get acquainted with people not in the Normal, it opened the way for them to have a good time occasionally at socials, corn roasts, sleigh rides, Hallowe'en parties and so forth, and it gave them a chance for development by taking part in programs.

Many a Cortland Normal student has said the very happiest hours of the two years in Normal were those spent in the Y. P. B., where, also, the most lasting friendships were formed. As they have graduated and entered new fields they have gone forth as active enthusiastic members of the society, and if no Y. P. B. existed they were instrumental in having one organized. Many of these graduates leave Cortland each year and no one can estimate the number of new societies they have helped to establish or the new members they have secured, not to mention the lives they are influencing against alcohol through their daily teaching.

With so many graduating each year it is necessary for us to double our efforts to keep up our membership. That we have been able to do this is shown by the fact that our enrollment has increased from 8 in 1912 to 180 in 1917.

Our membership is so constantly changing that we are ever training new workers. Does it pay to have students and local young people co-operate in a Y. P. B.? We believe it does. The Normal students themselves are most heartily in favor of it. We give them the chance to enter our homes and make many lasting friendships which would not be possible in a strictly Normal society, while they give to us of their enthusiasm and ability.

Pennsylvania's Practical Prohibition Program

Special Correspondence

The Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. has sent a contribution of $295 to the Ambulance Fund. Philadelphia county, through its county and local unions, is giving teas and entertainments to the sailors and marines. Usually, for these occasions, groups of fifty or more are invited to a church. On Sunday the men attend church in a body. They show great appreciation of the attention given them and do not fail to express their enjoyment. Other unions have held receptions and banquets for the soldiers. The women throughout the state are making comfort bags and housewives and are sewing and knitting for soldiers and sailors.

Inter-county institutes are popular in Pennsylvania. A number of counties group themselves together, each county contributing its share to the intellectual feast. The free exchange of ideas thus afforded is a very practical aid. Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., is in great demand as a speaker at these institutes. At the Cascade institute she created much merriment by her response to the toast, "What Will the Women of 1920 Do When Prohibition is National?" She predicted that one superintendent, at least the one having charge of prison and jail work, will lose her job.

A union of the temperance forces, known as the Dry Federation of Pennsylvania, has been organized. All the temperance societies of the state are represented and a number of others, not primarily organized for temperance work but which believe in prohibition of the liquor traffic, are advisory members. The state W. C. T. U. president is a vice-president of this organization.

One union has had for its special work this summer the mothering of a daily vacation Bible school for foreigners. The Bradford Era has announced that it has discontinued publishing liquor advertisements.

The Pennsylvania state convention is to be held in Greensburg, Oct. 4-8, and every effort is being put forth to make this meeting helpful and entertaining Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, will be one of the speakers. Other speakers will be Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, National superintendent of Franchise, Hon. Daniel A. Poling and Dr. Jamney of Baltimore. A diamond medal contest will be a feature.

ATTENTION! Y. P. B. WORKERS! LAST CALL FOR DUES!

PERSONAL MENTION

It is with sincere regret we learn that our capable and beloved World's Y. secretary, Miss Amy Swankie-Cameron, has been laid aside for a brief rest after a successful operation. We want her to know our loving prayers attend her.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S BRANCH NOTES

Are all dues collected in your local Y. P. B.?

Far away Tasmania has asked the National general Y. P. B. secretary for information regarding our Y. P. B. work, and plans are under way to organize Branches. We wish our Tasmania comrades the greatest success.

More than one hundred of the young men and women of Chautauqua, N. Y., assembled at the invitation of Mrs. Maude B. Perkins to spend a pleasant time in games. Mrs. Fanny Danser, New York; Miss Helen Farquhar, local Y. W. C. A. secretary; and Miss Gwyneth Fulcher, Evanston, Ill., directed the fun. Mrs. E. H. Blichfeldt presided at the gathering. Two games of particular interest were played. One required a knowledge of the names of all the prohibition states, and the other was an observation test in which prohibition posters and charts were observed and the results recorded, the best report winning a prize. The affair was held at the instance of the National Young People's Branch of the W. C. T. U. and met with such favor that the request was made for a second like event.

Only those whose dues have been paid are members of our Y. P. B. Last call!

The state federation of the New York Y. P. B. has put into circulation five thousand cards bearing the following pledge: "Because of the present need for economy in food products and farm land and because I am an AMERICAN, I ..... pledge as a patriotic measure to abstain from tobacco and liquor until America is at peace with the world."

TEN REASONS WHY PROFANITY IS INCLUDED IN THE Y. P. B. PLEDGE

Some states include profanity in the Y. P. B. pledge. The following reasons are given by the New York Y. P. B.:

1. Because it is such an inelegant way of expressing our thoughts.
2. It is conclusive proof of vulgarity and ill breeding.
3. It is such a sure way of making one's self obnoxious and disagreeable to friends.
4. It is not used by writers of the best literature.
5. It furnishes a bad example for others.
6. It is language that grieves mother, wife and sweetheart.
7. It is disloyalty to OUR BEST FRIEND.
8. It is an evidence of a loss of self-respect.
9. It is a hindrance to mankind and virtue.
10. God's word says: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain."

THE CONVERSION OF CAROL

KATHARINE BAKER

The service was over and the congregation crowded up to greet the visiting minister. There was the competent housekeeper who used to reward him with lemon pie for cutting her grass, the elder whose Grimes' pippins he used to confiscate, the deaf, purblind, tactless old sister who concocted most of the trouble in the church, and last but not least, the other elder who always took the collection money home to count it. Rumor said when he was out of town the contributions doubled. They pushed forward, they uttered their complimentary speeches, they drifted down the cocoa-matting of the aisle, out into the open air.

Everybody came, thought the minister, except Carol. She sat still in a pew barred with sunshine that streamed through the slatted blinds. Occasionally she adjusted the transparent frills of her sleeves with thin, little fingers, otherwise she was motionless and unconcerned. Whenever he allowed his eyes to rest upon her, she seemed to her former colleague a miracle of loveliness and grace.

He had heard people say that it was incredible the way Caroline Middleton, a poor man's daughter, spent money on clothes. "Every hat she wears comes straight from Paris," the gossips said. "All her clothes are the best money can buy. Where does her father get the money?"

Over Jim's masculine head this talk had passed unheeded. Whatever Carol did was right, of course. But he could not help wishing she would tell him she liked the sermon.

Mr. Middleton put a fatherly hand on his shoulder. "You must come home to dinner with us, James," he urged affectionately. "Carol won't take no for an answer, I'm sure."

They were approaching the pew where the young woman sat. She rose and smiled prettily, though she fixed a baffling look on her father. "Of course you'll come, Jim." That was all she said.

He swallowed his pride, and accepted the indifferent invitation. Slowly they walked through the church yard to the manse, the maples sending winged seeds eddying among the white lilacs of Carol's wide-brimmed black hat. He removed one from the shoulder of her crepe gown. Once, years before, he had brushed away a caterpillar from her gingham pinafore. She had thanked him hysterically then. But this was not at all a friendly Carol.

The manse had grown very shabby. There were darns in the thin napkin he unfolded. The food slipped through the worn, uneven tines of his fork. Fate had ironically decreed thick ironstone ware for the use of the household. Carol's appearance and tastes would have harmonized better with Dresden china. There was a centerpiece of fragrant roses, but everything else except Carol's dainty clothes looked old and pinched.

And it had always been so. He hadn't thought much about such things in his boyhood, but now he remembered that Carol's family had never had much to do with. If he were rich, he would give her everything. But he remembered unpleasantly he never could be rich. He was poor, poorer than her father, and poor he must remain. Yet Carol was very ingenious and cheerful. She was used to very plain living. She wouldn't care. At least, not if she loved a man—if she loved him. Of course her clothes might not be as nice as she would like, but that would not matter to her.

After dinner Carol seated herself on the edge of the dingy, old-fashioned porch. In a little while he came and found her and seating himself beside her tried to talk. She answered as one preoccupied.

"Shall I leave you?" he finally inquired.

"Certainly not."

He drew a deep breath.

"Listen to me, Carol dear." She looked up nervously. "I have a house now—a dreary proposition, still, it's a house. I want to make a home of it. I want you, dearest." She did not speak. "Don't you care for me, Carol?"

"Oh, yes; I like you," she said in a stifled voice.

He caught her hand, but she snatched it away.

"You don't like me enough to marry me?"

"No," she burst out. "I don't. I couldn't like anybody without money enough for that. I just can't resign myself to being poor always."

"Why, Carol!" he remonstrated gently. "I couldn't give you everything your father can. I'm afraid I couldn't buy you Paris gowns and hats, but I'd try to keep you from feeling too great a difference."

Carol laughed scornfully, and drew back.

"A difference!" she mocked. "Because I couldn't have any more Paris things! You believe that idiotic gossip! As though I'd ever had anything! I never had so much as a shoe-button from Paris. For years, locked up in my room, I have made every gown and hat I have worn, and I've knitted sweaters and preserved fruit for a Woman's Exchange in the city, to buy the materials for my clothes. Do you want me to tell you why? When I was fourteen, Mrs. Miller sent me Rosanna's cast off winter suit and I had to wear it to school, tight as it was for me. Everybody knew it. I'll never get over that humiliation if I live to Methuselah's age."

"Why didn't you tell your father?"

"He couldn't understand. Poor father, he never notices that the linen is worn out, the china chipped, and the paint dingy. He thinks about the heathen and the next world, and I do the economizing. I tell you I don't care about love or anything else but luxury. I want beautiful clothes, a beautiful home, a motor car, and plenty of spending money. I'm tired of what you call the higher life."

She paused, breathing fast, and turned defiant eyes on him. His own were filled with pity.

"I'm a selfish brute," he said. "You poor, poor little thing!"

His sympathy and his dear, disconcerting nearness almost shook her resolve. But he turned and left her to seek her father in the study.

Chin in hand, she sat studying the church across the yard. Around its tall pillars as a child she had played hide-and-seek with Jim, and Frank Briggs and the others. Down in the gutter by the gravel drive, from bits of glass she had gathered as a child for dishes, she had served imaginary tea to Jim on the flat stone at the "carriage door."

A little frown of doubt contracted her forehead. With her free hand she tore at the petals of a Provence rose that nodded sweetly on the bush beside the steps.

Her father's one servant came hurriedly around the house to demand familiarly, "If Mr. Reynolds stays to supper, what you goin' to have?"

"Anything, Mary," said Carol.

"Well, there ain't anything except potatoes and bread and apple-sauce."

Carol turned indignantly.

"I don't care," she answered. "If it's good enough for us, it's good enough for Jim Reynolds. As he's a minister, too, I guess he doesn't usually live like a prince. Anyway, I don't think he'll stay."

She snapped the rose from its stem, and flung it angrily down the path. It struck a young man who had just entered the gate. He laughed, and stuck it in his buttonhole.

"Gee, you must be fond of me, throwing me flowers that way," he grinned at her.

The servant went back to her kitchen and the young man dropped down on the step below Carol. "Why do fat cooks always tie their aprons in front?" he inquired.

Carol did not bother to answer.

"Thought Jim was here," he changed the subject.

"He is. Do you want him?" She rose with alacrity.

"You know I don't. What a fool he is to sit indoors with your father, when he might be out here with you. I'm glad his taste is so bad. Otherwise I suppose I'd be still more unwelcome."

"I despise you, Frank, when you talk like that," cried Carol, impatiently.

He looked at her with an expression that gave charm to his commonplace face.

"Sorry, Carol, but you know I never was even among those present, in your opinion, when you had him around you."

"Nonsense! I never see either of you, anyway, since you left college." She glanced sidewise at him.

"You could see me all day, every day, if you wanted to."

"Don't," she deprecated.

"Are you going to marry Reynolds?"

"He hasn't asked me." He hadn't actually said the words.

"I can't help thinking you're mistaken," said Frank.

She laughed unwillingly.

"How are you getting along in the legislature?" she inquired.

He leaned forward. His stiff black hair seemed suddenly to bristle with confidence, his keen eyes narrowed.

"I told you I'd win, and I'm doing it. I'm no orator. That doesn't pay. Oratory never moved a vote. It's the men that know how to organize that can deliver the goods, and you just watch me! Carol, the time is coming when I could give you everything you want."

She shook her head, but faintly. He grew more ardent.

"It's no bluff, dear. I've plans, and they're working out. Let me tell you about it." He drew nearer. She listened, half fascinated. "You know the compulsory arbitration bill that's up now?" She nodded. "Well, Miss, when it's canned, I get a job at ten thousand a year."

"If it's canned," she suggested.

"When," he repeated, stubbornly, "for it's nix on the fraternal settlement all right. You mark me."

"How do you know?"

"Got the votes," he answered briefly. "Everything's settled and solid, except the Lyons county members. They're a little scary of organized labor. But they are pledged to the hotel people, and I'm to have them whenever the prohibition fight goes their way."

"Why, everybody expects Lyons county to go dry," objected Carol.

"The hotels don't."

"Frank, you wouldn't stand in with the liquor interests?" she asked, deeply shocked.

"Certainly not. I'm not tied to anybody. But they'll have their way. I don't drop a bone in my mouth for a shadow in the water. They'll win. If I help them, they'll help me. If I don't, they get what they want just the same, and I lose everything."

"I don't think it's exactly—respectable," said Carol, unconvinced.

"You don't?" echoed Frank, dark with passion. "You think I'm dishonorable?"

"Not that."

"Yes you do. Well, I can tell you, I may not be a gospel shark, but I'm as decent as other men. You've always admired Jim's supernatural sanctity. But

FOOD SAVING EXPERIMENTS

MAY YATES, World's W. C. T. U. Superintendent Food Department

Statistics published by the board of trade show that potatoes constitute more than one-fourth of the weight of food consumed by working-class families.

A government report suggests that, in view of a possible failure or enhanced price of potatoes, "the following vegetables are suitable substitutes, a preference being given to them in the order in which they are enumerated: 1, cabbage (including greens, sprouts, etc.); 2, turnips, with or without tops; 3, carrots; 4, parsnips; 5, beetroots; 6; beans." Artichokes and tomatoes are useful. But all these vegetables, except beans, which contain a large amount of starch, require the addition of small quantities of rice, maize, barley, semolina, sago, tapioca, peas or lentils.

It should, however, be borne in mind that green vegetables, potatoes and all root vegetables may have, as Dr. Robert Hutchinson states, "their composition and consequently their nutritive value profoundly modified by the mode in which they are cooked." A leaflet issued by the board of agriculture gives particulars of the immense loss of valuable substances when potatoes are peeled, placed in cold water, boiled, and the water in which they are cooked thrown away. Better results are obtained by placing the peeled potatoes in boiling water. But boiling, steaming, or baking them in their skins reduces all losses to a minimum. This leaflet also suggests that the water in which other vegetables are boiled should be made into soup.

This advice has been given for years by food and health societies, schools of cookery, etc. As many will not take the trouble to make soup, it may also be mentioned that this vegetable stock, provided it contains very little salt and no soda, makes a good beverage — children like it, and adults state that it tastes like broth.

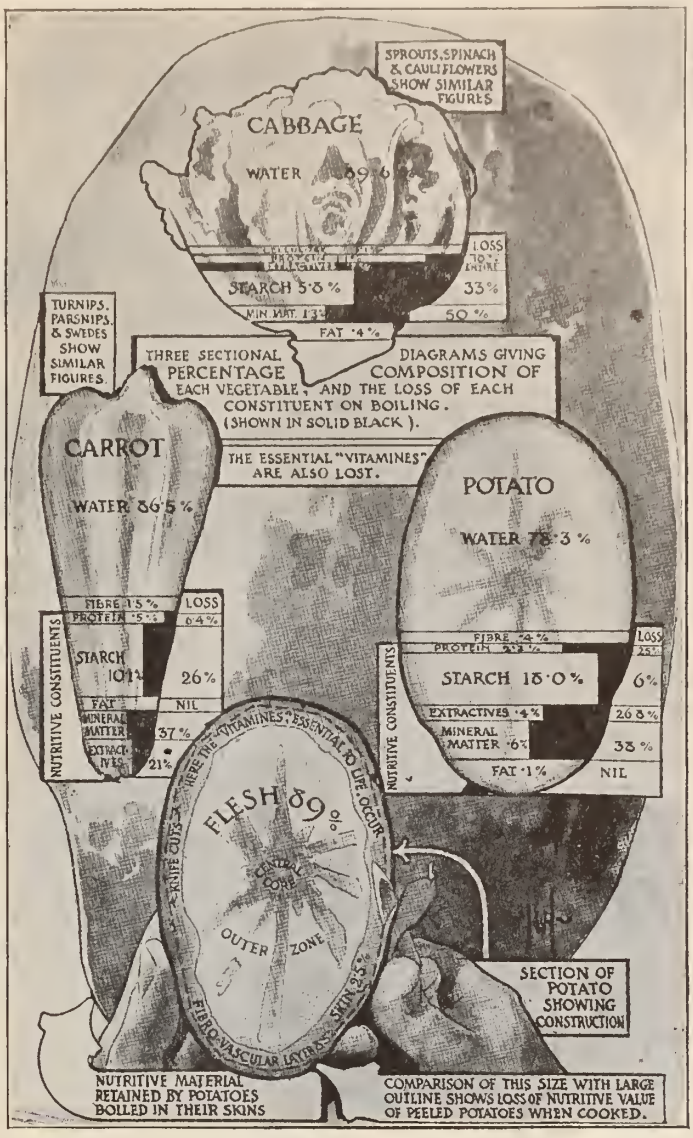

Diagram showing loss of nutriments in the potato and other vegetables by wrong methods of cooking.

It may also be incidentally mentioned that green vegetables used as salads, or cooked so as to retain all their valuable salts, will help to utilize our diminished cereals to the best advantage.

Cereals contain abundant supplies of the essential phosphoric acid, but are deficient in lime, which, in combination with it, forms the phosphate of lime so necessary, not only for bones and teeth, but for the formation of cell nuclei, tissues, brain and nerves. Sir Arthur Church, F.R.S., pointed out long ago that the needful lime to produce the true bone-former, or phosphate of lime, from the phosphates of magnesia and potash in whole meal, is freely furnished by green vegetables, and if these are taken an interaction may go on in the body by which the essential phosphate of lime is formed. As a practical illustration of this fact it may be mentioned that rabbits fed on oats alone developed thin, fragile skeletons, while similar animals fed upon oats and meadow grass, which contains a large amount of lime, produced normal bones.

THE CONVERSION OF CAROL

you touch him where he lives, and you'll find he's human, too. I'm not good enough for you, I know." He hesitated, and looked wistfully at Carol.

The instinct to temporize was strong in her. She laid her hand soothingly on his sleeve. At that instant Jim appeared in the long French window of the study. His face fell, then he called out in a tone of forced cheerfulness.

"Hello, Frank! I hear that you've got a little political machine of your own, and that once you get it in running order you'll make Boies Penrose look like a last year's legislative handbook."

They shook hands. Frank laughed comfortably.

"I'm doing something that way," he confessed. "When I'm boss, I'll make you chaplain of the senate."

The minister shrugged broad shoulders at the offer.

"No, thank you," he replied. "Not but that they need praying for. A bad lot!"

"You're too frank, Jim. Congregations don't like that. You'll never be rich," predicted Frank.

Jim began to laugh, glanced at Carol, caught himself and said slowly, "No, I never shall."

Carol frowned, and turned away her head.

"Yet with your fair average brain, there's no reason why you shouldn't," deliberated Frank. "The thing is to advertise, get in the limelight. You've been doing it, so far, all right. That epileptic colony for children you've been rooting for is a splendid idea. Applied ethics—that's what gives you a name nowadays. In fact, it's the only way to keep from being buried outright in an obsolete job like yours. What's more, you can get this legislature to vote you your colony, if you go about it right."

"How must he do it?" asked Carol, with immediate interest. Jim was silent.

"I've been talking to you about this prohibition question," Frank replied, addressing himself to Carol. "Saunders, the brewer, is involved, of course. He's the mainstay of your church in this state. Gives more than any other two people. Just about supports Reynolds' mission. Well, I heard him say it would be a good thing to get the moral support of a well-known clergyman. And I suggested you, Jim, as a good fellow, and he said go ahead and talk it over."

"Indeed?" said Reynolds, idly. He stood above them, one arm twisted about the slender, brown porch-post, and smiled down at Frank, but his face was somewhat flushed. "And the thirty pieces of silver?"

"The what?"

"The consideration, you know. He suggested my epileptic colony to stow away his products? If I help him make epileptics, he'll help me take care of them? Is that his idea? Oughtn't I to get more out of it than that?"

Frank looked puzzled. Carol laid a hand on his arm once more.

"He's jeering at you, Frank. He's insulted."

She turned her distracting face up to Reynolds. He repressed a fierce inclination to stoop suddenly and kiss it.

"I can't see any betrayal about it, Jim," she said, resentfully. "I don't suppose you think Mr. Saunders is a hardened criminal. I wonder you consent to associate with worldly sinners like Frank and me."

Reynolds turned very white and walked away.

"But Jim, your mission!" Frank called after him with real concern. "He's a stubborn old chap. It's good-bye to his money, if he gets sore on you."

"Let him keep his cursed money!" answered the other equably, as he opened the gate.

"Hang it all!" muttered Frank, regretfully. "I wish I hadn't mentioned Reynolds to Saunders. He's such a vindictive old beast. But I never dreamed Jim wouldn't be glad to do it."

Carol was playing with the old-fashioned watch-chain that had been her mother's. Her eyes were downcast.

"Never mind Jim," she said in a low voice. "He's a regular fanatic."

Frank stayed a long time. When he looked back from the gate, the soft twilight wrapped in a mysterious cloud the girl of his heart as she sat dreaming on the steps.

It was nearly a year later. Frank had come to Carol again today in a high-powered, noiseless car, and had taken her for a run into the country, meanwhile pouring into her eager ears his glittering prospects, his more than realized ambitions.

In the evening she went into the musty study, lined with blackened, calf-bound volumes on theology. Her father liked to have her there while he wrote. But she did not read or sew as usual, sitting quietly instead, apparently lost in thought.

These unattractive, lamp-lighted rooms, the Christian Endeavor, the Aid Society, all the duties of her life—with one word she could blow them all away. She might have magnificent gowns, beautiful jewels and a car all her own. And everybody liked Frank. He was such an obliging creature.

All just for a word? Surely it gave a girl an intoxicating sense of power.

There was a pretty flush in Carol's cheeks and her eyes shone brilliantly. Her father laid down his pen and looked lovingly at her. He looked very gray and old beside her rosy youth.

"I've been thinking about you all day, carissima," he said.

She smiled at him and pressed his hand against her cheek.

"Today is the anniversary of the day I asked your mother to marry me," he continued. Carol drew back out of the lamp-light.

"Carol, you'll soon be marrying. It's best you should, carissima. Every normal human being has a right to a home and children. And, dearie, I chose for you the very best mother I could find. When you come to the marrying point, my child, trust your life to an honorable man. Give your children a fair inheritance. That's the chief thing, carissima."

Carol flamed red in the friendly darkness. How could her father speak so to her?

But he did not notice her again. His hand, as she released it from her own, fell limply to his side. He sat gazing before him with a puzzled air, as if he were trying to hear something beyond the reach of human ears.

She left the room abruptly. All her sordid hopes appeared to her in their true colors, yet her heart protested against the grim unmasking.

But her father, disregarding the tumult his words had caused, sat with bent head in the gloomy study, the lamp-light shining on his white hair.

At midnight, Carol came to call him. He had sunk deeper in the easy-chair, and his hand was quite cold.

A year, to a day, Carol appeared alone again in the minister's pew. Everybody cast pitying glances at her, a tragic little figure in black.

The elders had been very kind. They had insisted that she stay at the manse until provision should be made for her. The new minister's family were not to trouble her. There was no hurry.

And now it seemed the new parson was to be just Jim. Jim was to have the manse, the dingy paint, the chipped china, the inadequate salary. All the meetings of the church societies would be his affair. He would marry some highly religious sister like himself, and she would take a turn at darning linen and making over hats.

There was Jim now, going up the pulpit stairs. At least, one must admit, he didn't look like a shabby, sanctimonious preacher.

When she married Frank, she could give large checks to the church—she could patronize Jim's wife—a most repellent person—and send the children beautiful presents!

"Carol, you're disgusting," she admonished herself. Suddenly she saw her father's white head in the circle of the lamp-light, heard his faint words, "That's the chief thing, carissima." But she hardened her heart.

Well, this was the last sermon she would ever have to listen to. Jim certainly had a clear, attractive voice. Only why would he talk about those tiresome epileptics and his colony that the legislature had turned down? Who cared for epileptics? Of course they were everywhere, but you needn't look at them. And it was nobody's business if people wanted to drink and have epileptic descendants. What made Jim so daft about them?

Vaguely her memory recalled a day there in the churchyard when she was a very little girl. Fat, funny, old Royal Cook had had a fit right before her, as she played tea-party on the "carriage step." He had frightened her almost to death and she had run to Jim for protection. Ever since, Jim had been perfectly dippy about epilepsy. That had started him, evidently. Very sweet in him, but if he'd really cared about her, he'd never have gone into the ministry.

The sermon ended, the congregation pressed forward. Jim's eyes had met hers a moment earlier. She felt a bit dizzy, and tried to go out, but the pew door was wedged shut by the crowd, so she sat down again.

Jim came to meet the people, instead of waiting for them inside the rail, and gradually, the greetings over, he pushed his vigorous way to Carol's pew. She summoned back her scattered senses.

"You look tired," Jim commented, solicitously. She was indeed as pallid as a wind-flower. The people had passed by and they were left almost alone in the sunny church.

"It's just a year," said Carol, her eyes filling with unexpected tears. "I—won't you come home to dinner? It's really your parsonage, you know. I'm only there on sufferance till you bring your things." She smiled wanly. He choked. "I'll be going very soon," she concluded.

"Not on my account, Carol, please," he remonstrated, looking hurt.

"No, but I must make up my mind to change my mode of life. Men are queer fish," she added maliciously as they walked down the aisle side by side. "I thought you were kind of piously ambitious to reform the world, and here you are, content to settle down in a country charge."

"Had to get out of the mission, or see it starve to death," answered Jim, outwardly imperturbable. "Saunders would not give a cent while I stayed."

She was silent as they crossed the yard. Then her spirit of contrariness shone forth again.

"I wish you joy of your new house, Jimmy. See the scaly paint on the porch-posts." They went in. "Linoleum on the hall floor," she added in the same hard voice. "It's so cheerful and homelike." They passed the study door. In this room Jim's yellow head would soon shine under the lamp-light as her father's white head used to. "I hope you'll like the lovely kerosene lamps, Jim. They smoke," she remarked.

He followed her into the parlor. No more mothers' meetings here for her. No more "rag-school," as she was wont

W. C. T. U. ACTIVITIES

The Central W. C. T. U. of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, has been conducting a "whirlwind" membership campaign of two weeks' duration, which has resulted in the gaining of over forty new members.

The twenty-ninth annual convention of the Crawford county (Kans.) W. C. T. U., Mrs. Eliza Millington, president, was held at Mulberry, August 22, and proved to be one of the most inspiring meetings in the history of the organization. The address of welcome by Rev. D. A. McCullough and the response by Mrs. T. J. Karr of Girard, president of the four-month-old union, the baby of the county, rang with patriotic enthusiasm. Mrs. Karr likened the wonderful manner in which the W. C. T. U. is organized for efficient work to the Ford automobile factory which Mr. Ford informed the government could be turned into a munition plant in a few hours whenever a need for it should arise, and which, at the present time, is turning out 1,000 cylinders per day for government aeroplanes. The round table discussion of the best things accomplished during the year and the symposium, "What is a Woman's Greatest Sacrifice in this War Crisis," called forth many points of interest. Reports of the local presidents showed encouraging progress. Pittsburgh union, with a membership of eighty, has purchased a $50 Liberty Bond, gained eight new members, held one lecture, and subscribed for eight copies of THE UNION SIGNAL. Girard, a new union, reported a membership of eighteen with three subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL. Arcadia, with twenty-eight members, subscribes for seven copies of THE UNION SIGNAL. The hostess union, with a membership of twenty-nine, takes eight copies of THE UNION SIGNAL. This union contributed $5 to the Ambulance Fund and held a gold medal contest and a temperance lecture. Much Red Cross work is being done by the unions of the county. The superintendent of the Flower Mission and Relief department reported that individually she had visited 5,763 homes and distributed 1,347 garments, 98,100 pieces of literature and 66 Bibles. It was specially urged that each union send a box of literature for distribution among the soldier boys and that efforts be made to interest the teachers in the observance of Frances Willard day in the public schools.

The Outagamie county (Wis.) W. C. T. U. convention met at Appleton, August 28-29, with an attendance of thirty voting delegates. Great encouragement was given the workers in the inspiring words of state leaders, the president, and Mrs. M. A. B. Smith, National organizer. Other interesting features were addresses by Mrs. Burrows of Bermuda who gave her experience as a white ribboner in the islands, Hon. John Strange, and Rev. T. Gales, and a gold medal contest, in which Roland Michelson was winner. Resolutions urging stricter censorship of moving picture films, cleaner fairs, the elimination of the use of tobacco on street and interurban cars, and greater efforts to impress upon children the dangers of alcohol and tobacco, were passed.

The Northumberland county (Pa.) W. C. T. U. recently held conferences at Riverside Park and Shamokin, both largely attended. Clinton Howard delivered an address, "The World on Fire," which made his hearers feel that the liquor traffic must be banished from Pennsylvania. The women of the county have been busy making comfort bags for the battleship "Pennsylvania." One of the sailor lads from Texas answered the letter found in his bag by thanking the W.C.T.U. for the gift and assuring the donors that every boy on the big ship appreciates the bags.

AFTER THE MEMBERSHIP DRIVE—

VIDA I. THOMPSON, Manager Circulation Department

After the Membership Drive is over, how shall we hold the new members won? How shall we keep them interested, enthusiastic? How shall we have the best meetings possible, and where shall we find new plans to help our boys now in training or in France? Isn't this the answer to these questions? By taking as many subscriptions as possible for THE UNION SIGNAL, which not only contains helps for making meetings a success and suggests methods of patriotic service, but furnishes news of what is already being accomplished along prohibition lines.

By persuading your friend to subscribe, remember you are doing her a great service, for you thus widen her outlook, deepen her spiritual life, and heighten her aspirations. How many subscriptions will your union send us?

While working on comfort bags, bandages, and other helpful articles, why not ask a good reader to read aloud from the latest SIGNAL, and at the close of the afternoon pass around slips containing the Quiz questions, which will serve to "nail fast" the information received.

The following suggestions received in a letter from a friend may not be too late for use in preparing for an outing:

"Dear UNION SIGNAL Friends:

"Today we attended a W. C. T. U. picnic. Such a time! It was all too good for utterance. So many of the dear women whom we have known and loved for years were there and we had the biggest dinner you ever saw served at a picnic! It was great. You'll be delighted to receive the enclosed subscriptions for THE UNION SIGNAL which I gathered up after making a few remarks in public to the assembled women. If I could go to another picnic tomorrow I'd get some more.

"One woman said, 'I've done a lot of good with my SIGNAL, just lending it around and getting women to read it. And I've gained several new members through getting them to read our official organ. I helped make Alaska dry, too, by sending my papers up there to my daughter who got friends to read them.' So you see THE UNION SIGNAL goes on its conquering way."

half-mockingly to call her sewing class for poor children. That hadn't been so bad, though. She liked the little tots, and she loved to sew. She would never have to do it any more now. That was all over.

They stood in the dining-room doorway.

"Don't you admire black marble mantels, nicely chiseled?" she asked.

All the bitter speeches stabbed deep, as she meant them to. He had followed her silently, but now, at the last gibe, he said under his breath, "You're cruel, Carol."

"I want to be cruel," she cried, turning on him tempestuously. "I'm glad I have a chance to be. I hate everything about this hideous place—hate it, hate it! Most of all I hate the ironstone ware. I'd like to smash every single bit of it to pieces."

In spite of youth and disappointed love, Jim had a saving sense of humor.

"Go to it, child," he agreed, standing back and putting his hands in his pockets. "That's one slight gratification I can afford you. I've saved a little money. I'll replace the stuff with real china. Fire away."

She looked at him in amazement. Then she lifted the monumental soup tureen that stood on the sideboard, poised it a moment while she glanced questioningly at Jim's impassive countenance, then sent the object she loathed crashing down upon the stone hearth.

He did not move. She hesitated, put out her hand toward a pile of breakfast plates, then drew it quickly back. The daring in her eyes changed to a look of horror. Sitting down, she hid her face against the chairback and shook with silent sobs.

"Carol," he said in a strained voice, "I can't bear that."

Her face remained buried in her arms. She stretched out a hand, blindly groping. Jim caught the searching hand in his and clung to it desperately. Next moment he had her close in his arms.

"O Jim, darling," she gasped hysterically on his shoulder, "how could I break father's dear old dishes, and spoil this lovely home?"

And again Jim asked the question the reply to which meant so much to him. This time he was not disappointed.

The Liquor Traffic must Be Exterminated Root and Branch because it is antagonistic to the highest interests of the nation. It lays its devastating touch on the Home, the Church, the School and Industrial Life. The one and only way to destroy it is by a National Constitutional Prohibition Amendment. The Senate has acted favorably upon the submission of this amendment to the state legislatures. The joint resolution will come before the House of Representatives next December. To hasten the movement the important thing at present is to communicate with your Congressman, urging him to vote for the amendment when the House acts upon it.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED LIQUOR FROM UNITED STATES TO AFRICA MAY CEASE—NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER CONSIDERED—SUFFRAGE RESOLUTION FAVORABLY REPORTED BY SENATE COMMITTEE—BILLS INTRODUCED PROVIDING PROHIBITION AND SUFFRAGE FOR HAWAII—COMPLAINT LODGED AGAINST LAX RESTRICTIONS AT AMERICAN ARMY CANTEENS IN FRANCE—MONSTER PARADE TO CELEBRATE CLOSING OF SALOONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

After five weeks' discussion in the Senate, the War Revenue bill was passed by a vote of 59 yeas to 9 nays. The measure is designed to raise $2,500,000,000 and goes back to the House for conference. Conferees have been appointed from Senate and House, and probably a week or longer will elapse before the bill reaches the President for his signature. Congress has given four months to the revenue problem. As all revenue measures must originate in the House, this bill had its first consideration there. The Senate with larger and later information has amended the House bill, both as regards the sum total and details. The amended bill carries half a billion dollars more than the House bill. The bill as it stands makes no change in existing postal laws beyond free mailing privileges to soldiers over the seas and a cent tax on parcel post packages. The important action of the last day was the striking out of all consumption taxes on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar.

On intoxicating beverages the Senate bill proposes to secure over $200,000,000 by raising the rate on distilled intoxicants from $1.10 to $3.20 a gallon and on beer from $1.50 to $3.00 per barrel.

One important amendment that was carried prohibits the exportation of liquors to any nation not at war with Germany, and then only to allies upon the application of an accredited representative declaring such liquor will only be used for the making of munitions. Africa is not at war with Germany. Consequently, the exportation of distilled liquor from the United States to Africa will cease when the bill is signed by the President if the House concurs. We can hardly believe the House would cut out so important an amendment.

Resolution on Nation-wide Suffrage Favorably Reported by Senate Committee

The Susan B. Anthony resolution for nation-wide suffrage, by constitutional amendment, was favorably reported on Wednesday by the Senate Suffrage Committee and will take its place on the calendar for a vote at the session beginning in December next.

Resolution for National Day of Prayer Before House

Senator Myers of Montana on Tuesday, September 11, reported back favorably from the Military Affairs committee, without amendment, the following resolution:

"Whereas, the people and Government of the United States are now engaged in the greatest war in history, which in its determination is fraught with great results for good or evil, not only to the people of this country, but to the people of the whole world, and which is the greatest undertaking upon which this country has ever embarked; and

"Whereas, this country is about to engage in preparing for war and will soon be sending abroad to the theater of war great numbers of our young men, there to take part in the sanguinary conflict and offer their lives in defense of their country's rights; and

"Whereas, it is in accordance with the customs and traditions of this country as a Christian nation and has heretofore been the practice of this country upon engaging in war to set aside a day, by official proclamation, for prayer for aid of the Almighty. Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring, That the President of the United States be, and he is requested by Congress to issue a proclamation, designating a day of prayer and calling upon the people of this country on such day to assemble in their various places of worship, and there offer prayer to Almighty God for the success of our armies and victory for our cause in this great conflict."

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to. It will now go to the House for concurrence.

Bills Introduced Providing Prohibition and Suffrage for Hawaii

Senator Shafroth of Colorado has introduced two bills this week of especial interest, one to prohibit the selling, manufacturing, or importing of intoxicating liquors into Hawaii; the other authorizing the Hawaiian legislature to give women, who hold property and other voting qualifications of men, the right to vote in territorial elections, also authorizing the legislature to submit to the territory the question of giving women unrestricted suffrage in the islands. These bills were passed in the Senate without debate or objection.

NOW IS THE TIME!

An expression of opinion on national prohibition should be secured from the many conferences, conventions, and synods which meet this autumn. They should be urged to pass resolutions favoring measures now pending in Congress, especially the submission by the House of the constitutional amendment already passed in the Senate by eight votes over a two-thirds majority. The six years amendment should be stricken out by the House. The Senate would doubtless concur.

Complaint Against Lax Restrictions at American Army Canteens in France

Acting upon representations of the executive secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, Representative Cooper of Ohio has complained to Secretary of War Baker that restrictions on the sale of intoxicating liquors at American army canteens in France are very lax. He said the statement had been made in the British House of Commons, that the American canteens are to be run on the British model which permits the sale of liquor, and that French officers are not making any strong effort to keep liquor away from the American forces.

With the closing of all licensed saloons and liquor establishments in the District of Columbia November 1, the temperance forces may institute court proceedings designed to bring the District within the operation of the Reed "bone dry" amendment to the post office appropriation act. While public opinion has taken for granted that "bone dry" legislation does not affect the District, there are others who hold a different opinion, and plans are being considered for testing their view of the matter in court.

Congress passed the Reed amendment after it had legislated the District into the dry column. This amendment prohibits the shipment of liquors into states and territories where the manufacture and sale of liquors are prohibited. The District prohibition law prohibits the advertising of liquors in any way. The postoffice appropriation act contains a provision prohibiting the use of the mails in advertising, or soliciting orders for liquors in states and territories where the advertising of liquors is prohibited. Whatever may be the outcome of the fight to have the District declared a "bone dry" territory the temperance forces intend to see that the prohibition law is strictly lived up to.

Monster Parade to Celebrate Closing of Saloons in District

There is a movement on foot to have a monster parade celebrate the closing of saloons in the District, as the liquor crowd has circulated the statement that prohibition was thrust upon the people of the District, and that a vast majority were not favorable to such action. To show the world that this is not true, it is hoped and expected to have so vast a number of men and women march down Pennsylvania avenue as to forever set at rest this libel. The committee is working to secure 50,000 Sunday school children to join in the march.

What a prayer of gratitude went up from thousands of hearts at eleven o'clock Saturday night, September 8, 1917. It was a date to be remembered, for it marked the closing of 600 distilleries at the command of the United States Government under the food conservation law. The distilling of strong drink in this country, we believe, has ceased, not only during the war, but FOREVER. God be praised for this victory. Of the 100,000,000 bushels of grain which have gone into distilled liquors each year, a large proportion will now be turned into food consumption. A number of distilleries expect to continue making alcohol to find its way into perfumes, toilet waters, bay rum, medicine and industries where denatured alcohol is used. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, revenue records show that nearly 11,000,000 gallons were shipped to allies for powder manufacture.

The British government has invited Congress to send a delegation to visit England and the British battle front as the guests of the people of Great Britain. The invitation came in the form of a cablegram that was laid before the Senate by the Vice-President. It was referred to the Foreign Relations committee. There is considerable favorable sentiment in both houses of Congress on this subject.

DISTILLERS ADMIT LIQUOR BUSINESS IS GOING INTO LIQUIDATION

SIX HUNDRED WHISKY FACTORIES CEASE MANUFACTURE

September 8, 1917, was a memorable day in the history of the temperance reform, when by order of the Federal government over six hundred distilleries ceased the manufacture of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes. Very significant are the comments and conclusions of some of the prominent men in the liquor trade on the event:

"The liquor business is going into liquidation," the Chicago Tribune says epigrammatically expresses the views of a large number of wholesale liquor dealers.

Frederick Diehl, general manager of Grommes & Ulrich, large dealers of Chicago, expressed himself as seeing no future for the liquor business. "I do not see how any of the wholesale firms can continue much longer," said Mr. Diehl. "We are winding up our business and will be out of it when we sell our last barrel of whisky. So will practically all of our competitors, no matter how hopeful they may be of the future.

"The business cannot continue with production discontinued, and, even if the war should be over in a few months, the passage of the new tax measure, imposing a tax of $3.20 a gallon on spirits in place of the $1.10 now charged, would be practically taxing us out of business.

Year and a Half to Live

"Today there are possibly 200,000,000 gallons of whisky in the country, and the normal consumption is 150,000,000 gallons annually. I do not look to see this consumption materially decreased, inasmuch as the lessening caused by high prices will be more than counterbalanced by the fact that many retail dealers and many private consumers are laying in large supplies of liquor anticipating greatly increased prices because of the new laws.

"On this basis, therefore, it is plain that the business has only about a year and a half to live."

A number of other wholesale dealers hold similar views. L. Ottenheimer & Sons said they have a fair stock on hand, but when that is exhausted they expect to close up their business. Rubel, Lillenfeld & Co. were of like opinion. Hasterlik Bros. said that inside of a year all the wholesale liquor houses will be compelled to retire and that they are not likely to resume again on account of the strides made by the prohibition movement.

The immediate effect of the distillery prohibition measure, said another liquor man, will be to deal a death blow to from 1,000 to 1,500 saloons in Chicago which have been on the brink of insolvency for some time.

"The small dealer will be hit the hardest," said Charles H. Hermann, president of Chapin & Gore, wholesale liquor dealers. "You can't stock up if you haven't the money to do it with, and whisky costs money nowadays. The wholesalers will

Distillery Employes Will Not Be Idle

Snapped Up by Other Manufacturers

"Peoria's manufacturers will snap up every available man released by the closing of the distilleries," said a prominent citizen of "The Still City" to a newspaper man. "Between 1,500 and 2,000 men will be put out of employment in the distilleries, but there is a place for every one of them in the tractor factories, the implement works, and in other Peoria industries. We can use every ounce of coal, and are glad to get it, that the distilleries have been requiring. Industrially, Peoria will never know that the distilleries have been closed."

A similar situation prevails in every distillery community. The larger number of whisky factories will use their plants in the making of commercial alcohol.

Omaha Clergyman Admits He Was Mistaken

Prohibition in Nebraska is working out very differently from the way some of its opponents expected. It hasn't made hard times; it hasn't increased bootlegging; it hasn't done a hundred and one other things that the liquor brethren solemnly assured the voters it would do. Among the people who are realizing from experience that prohibition is not what the brewers paint it is Rev. T. J. Mackay, rector of All Saints' Episcopal church of Omaha, one of the strongest opponents of prohibition in the recent campaign, and whose "Appeal to Christian Voters" was given wide publicity by the liquor men.

"I'm glad the saloons are gone. I wouldn't have them back," he said recently at an Omaha luncheon. "Everybody is glad the saloons are gone. I don't think saloons ever will come back."

The Rev. Mr. Mackay said he received no money for allowing his name to be used by the wets. He opposed prohibition because he thought it would be a blow at personal liberty, and that there would be so much bootlegging that it would be a bigger menace than saloons.

"I was mistaken," he declared. "Bootlegging, eventually, will be eliminated entirely. Omaha and Nebraska are better off without saloons."

Catholics of Iowa for Prohibition

Bishop P. J. Garrigan of the Sioux City (Ia.) diocese is authority for the statement that the Catholics of Iowa may be counted on to line up for the prohibition amendment on election day. In a letter to the Allied Temperance Committee of Iowa he says:

"The American saloon is a disgrace to our great and enlightened nation for it has no conscience, no respect for law, no care for the public welfare; even with the short experience of two years of prohibition in our own state, what town or city of the commonwealth would bring back the saloon?

"I hope that all our people will turn out at the coming October election, and by their votes nail down forever the lid of the coffin of the dead and buried saloon in Iowa."

Mayor Dahlman Converted to Prohibition

Mayor James C. Dahlman of Omaha, known far and wide as the "cowboy mayor" of Omaha, who will be remembered by white ribboners as the chief executive of that city at the time of the National convention in Omaha in 1909, has announced a change of heart on the prohibition question. The results of the dry law in actual operation in Omaha have caused his new attitude toward prohibition in general, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Mayor Dahlman finds the city's morals and business both improved. Department stores and groceries are delighted with the results. The sales of infants' shoes are much increased. Housewares show the same activity, savings banks officials are wearing smiles, and when it comes to men's wear and haberdashery, everybody is happy.

To the general satisfaction there were two exceptions. One was found in the hotels which had maintained bars, and the other in the cheap lodging houses. The latter suffer because dry patrons want better rooms and can pay for them.

Dallas, Texas, Votes Dry

Dallas, Texas, the second largest city in the state, with an estimated population of 118,000, becomes dry territory as the result of a vote in Dallas county, September 10. The county, outside of the city of Dallas, has been dry for twenty years.

have to go out of business when the whisky supply is exhausted."

That the closing of the distilleries will mean from 500 to 600 less saloons in St. Louis after the first of the year is the opinion of Edwin Schiele, president of the Edwin Schiele Distillery Company of that city. The saloonkeepers operating on the outskirts of St. Louis and many of those located in the poorer sections within the city will be unable to command sufficient trade to make money, he believes, because the hard liquor will be out of reach of the average wage-earner.

The opinion in general among distillers in Kentucky, says the Christian Science Monitor, is that although the federal law provides for prohibition only during the period of the war, the days of the distillery in Kentucky are over. This is based on the rapid growth of sentiment for state-wide prohibition, as indicated by the recent primary election, at which time the dry forces scored a great victory.

That the big distillers are "quitting for all time," is the opinion of the Chicago Herald's Washington correspondent, Arthur W. Crawford. "Even when the war is over," he remarked, "it is doubtful if these distillers will risk new investments in an enterprise that may come under the government ban at any moment. By the time the war is over it is expected that most of the distilleries will be converted into factories for the manufacture of other products."

Liquor Men Face Crisis

"The Massachusetts liquor men acknowledge that they are facing a crisis in their business," says the Boston Globe. "It may be, owing to the increased cost of hard liquors, that some of the retailers and barrooms will be forced to close. Licenses in this city are selling for a fraction of what they used to bring in the old days, and many saloonists are trying to dispose of their businesses."

Another one of the recognized heads of the liquor interests of the country, Robert D. Clarke of Clarke Bros. & Co., said to be the largest straight whisky distiller in the world, told a Chicago Tribune reporter that his distillery is through with the manufacturing of beverage alcohol, regardless of the extent of the war or the threatened approach of national constitutional prohibition. They have offered their plant for sale.

"We will close absolutely," Mr. Clarke said. "We will maintain our plants in apple pie order prepared to supply any demand from the United States government or the allied nations for such alcohol as is necessary for the manufacture of powder. We are through as beverage producers."

"Distillers have no illusions about resuming their business after the war. Most of them admit it is forever doomed and that the only opportunity of utilizing their plants as they now stand is in the manufacture of alcohol for commercial purposes. Some will remain open, making alcohol for medicinal use in the war, but most of them are closed entirely," says the Chicago Examiner.

While the new law leaves much to be desired in its provisions it is without doubt an advance step toward national prohibition.

PROSPEROUS CONDITIONS IN DRY CITY CAUSE STATE CONVENTION TO SEEK ANOTHER HOSTESS

The state W. C. T. U. officers of New Mexico are smilingly looking about for a hostess city other than Clovis to entertain the state convention. The reason is made plain in the following extract from a letter from Mrs. S. C. Nutter, a former state president living in Clovis, to the present president, Miss Harriet L. Henderson:

"The W. C. T. U. met today and reports were made about arrangements for convention. It has been impossible to find entertainment for delegates, not that people are not hospitable but there is literally no room for any more people in Clovis until more houses, and larger ones, are built. We tried the hotels and rooming houses, but everything is full. School opened yesterday with ten more teachers than last year and I am told that four hundred more pupils are enrolled. Everybody has rented to students or is boarding teachers. I met two teachers this evening who were worried about where they were to be housed. A large number of ranchers have bought property and are coming here to put their children in school. The principal of the school told me this evening that his house is sold and he can't find a vacant dwelling place to which to move. And so it goes. We had not dreamed of such an overflow as has come as the result of a dry county. Do you suppose the state will 'suffer' to such a degree, too, if it should go dry. New houses are going up constantly but are occupied at once, almost before they are finished."

IN PEACE OR WAR—WHY THE WATER WAGON?

MARGARET B. PLATT

The most conclusive argument that can be advanced in favor of the abolition of the beverage liquor traffic is that good effects follow the enforcement of a prohibitory law. Nothing else offers so impregnable a defense against all the sophistries put forth by the friends of John Barleycorn as to why sentence should not be pronounced against that arch murderer of human kind. The direful conditions always predicted by booze promoters as sure to follow prohibition never come to pass. On the contrary, results have been so beneficial that in many instances former friends and supporters of J. B. are now content in the assurance that his departure is permanent. Theories do not constitute evidence. Facts do. Experience is far and away ahead of hypothesis. Given a fair trial prohibition will always demonstrate its inestimable value to the individual, the community and the nation. It is the business of its opponents to prevent as far as possible its being given a trial. In the finals prohibition will win because its results justify its claims.

One of the Many Washington Saloons Prohibition has Put out of Business

By permission of the proprietor the poster was displayed in front of his place of business.

"Our Enemies Themselves Being Judges"

"Do you fellows want to paralyze business? Do you want to knock everything flat in this city? Do you want to see hundreds of vacant stores and thousands of people out of employment? Just keep up this fool campaign for prohibition and you will have us all ruined!" Thus raged a Tacoma (Wash.) saloonkeeper to a prohibition worker in the summer of 1914, and no doubt he really believed what he said. A few months after prohibition became effective in Washington the same individual, meeting the man whom he had formerly berated, exclaimed, "I want to apologize to you, sir, for what I said last summer. I never was so surprised in my life as I am on this prohibition question. None of the terrible things we expected have come true. On the contrary, business is better, vacant stores are rented, there's plenty of work and everybody is happier than before. I don't understand it, and I can hardly believe it, but I know it's true!"

Again, another ex-saloonkeeper who had, naturally, fought prohibition and railed at the "fool prohibitionists," after a few months' experience with the dry régime said to a physician who had contributed freely of time and money to hasten the exit of the liquor traffic, "Doctor, why didn't you folks bring about this change years ago? It's been the best thing in a business way that ever happened to the state, and in every way a great advantage to the people. I wish it had happened long ago." Questioned as to whether he thought the saloons would open again he replied, "No, no, the saloon will never come back, never. It's gone to stay gone. The people don't want it." Innumerable comments of similar kind might be given, all tending to show what a disappointment prohibition has been—to its foes!

Legions of Homes Made Happy

Instances of the happy effects of prohibition upon individual and home life are legion. One or two will suffice as illustration, for in effect the same conditions are repeated indefinitely. A shoemaker, who, when sober, was an excellent workman, through his fondness for liquor, which it seemed impossible for him to resist when it was within reach, had been reduced almost to poverty. His appearance and his business, or lack of business, evidenced his slavery. For four years his wife helped support the little family by doing washing for her neighbors. Destitution seemed imminent. Then came prohibition. Soon a change was apparent in the shoemaker. He walked erect, his step was firm, he had plenty of work and did it in a satisfactory manner. Instead of spending his time and money at the saloon he now goes home with a market basket on his arm, filled with supplies for the table. His wife no longer takes in washing. Her husband is a sober man, has joined the church and his friends say he looks ten years younger. The family is happy and contented and all unite in saying, "Thank God for prohibition." Such instances can be multiplied indefinitely.

Drink and Vice Boon Companions

That there is direct connection between drink and vice is evident from the fact that under prohibition the inmates in rescue homes in Seattle have decreased about one-third. In Tacoma where there were two rescue homes before the dry law went into effect, one has gone out of business for lack of patronage, while the other has about one-third the number that was usual under license. The cessation of the permit system and the strict enforcement of the red-light abatement law will do much to further minimize the vice problem.

Employers of Labor Approve Prohibition

A contractor employing large numbers of men said: "I formerly spent thousands of dollars a year on industrial casualty insurance. The dry law has reduced this charge to almost nothing."

Another, a large employer of unskilled labor who paid off his men Saturday nights, declared: "If we had a job on for Monday or one held over from Saturday we always knew there would be nothing doing Monday. There wouldn't be enough men on hand to make it worth while to attempt work. They would be recovering from their Sunday drunks or still hanging about the saloons. We would try to start Tuesday morning and have pretty nearly a complete crew by noon, and seventy per cent of all our accidents occurred on Tuesday. Four whole days and a half was our average week's work under wet conditions. It's six days a week now, and our accidents have decreased about eighty-five per cent."

Is Business Ruined?

One large shoe company which under wet conditions operated one retail store now has three stores in one city. Buildings which were formerly occupied by saloons now house grocery stores, clothing establishments, shoe stores, meat markets, etc. Bakeries are everywhere in evidence. Homes are in demand. The vacant store room or dwelling is a rarity. To one who knew Seattle as a city of saloons and now visits it, the most impressive things noted are the absence of saloons and evidences of drink and the presence of the great numbers of eating places, groceries, furniture houses and markets. The latter especially are everywhere. Some of the places formerly occupied by saloons are now used for first class market establishments with a vast display of fresh fruits, vegetables, meats, fish, etc. Since saloons went out, Seattle has become famous for its markets which are the astonishment and admiration of all visitors. Today Seattle spends its money for food instead of booze and increases its supply of pure water brought fresh from the mountain heights.

During the first year of prohibition a dressmaker who had formerly been employed almost exclusively by the brewers' families said that her business dropped to almost nothing. Her patrons had not expected prohibition! Now the former brewers have turned their attention to the manufacture of non-intoxicating products and are successful beyond expectation. In their prosperity the dressmaker shares.

That the cities of Seattle and Tacoma emerged from their recent street car strike difficulties with a minimum of disturbances and vandalism is due no doubt to the absence of saloons. The Tacoma Daily News, referring to this fact, remarks: "The community feels a sense of peculiar gratification over the almost total absence of vandalism and disorder." Who will believe that such a state of affairs would have existed had the liquor traffic been present or had there been any appreciable amount of bootlegging.

The conclusion is—must be—inevitable. As a matter of national defense, whether in peace or war, absolute national prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor is essential. A sober, industrious, contented people, happy homes, prosperous business, intelligence and thrift widely diffused, these elements will build a nation impregnable against any foe. It is not a matter of sentiment or emotion; it is a matter of fact and experience. America to be at her best must be sober and free. She can be neither while alcohol dominates any state or any class. It is folly to prate of revenue to be derived from alcohol. Every prohibition state demonstrates that such revenue is not necessary and that the state is ten thousand times richer and better off without it. America on the water wagon is America transcendent in peace, unconquerable in war. Let her rise to the fullness of her splendid power.

STUDY OF CONFLICTING STATEMENTS OF LIQUOR JOURNALS

PROF. JOHN A. NICHOLLS

In these strenuous days of war activity those who desire relaxation can turn with certainty to the editorial pages of the various liquor publications, and find there a quaint mingling of fact and falsehood, logic and sophistry, combined with such an earnest appeal to the nation to spare the liquor traffic as almost to awaken a feeling of pity for the poor scribe who is so hard put in his efforts to bolster up a business surely tottering to ruin. One of the most interesting and amusing of these articles appeared lately in Mida's Criterion, among the ablest and most influential of the liquor journals published in the United States. It is full of mis-statements, but it also contains some valuable admissions.

Doom of the Liquor Traffic Sealed

It says:—"The public mind seems to be keen on the idea of absolute prohibition." This is surely correct. Even a bartender will admit the truth of this statement. Not only the public mind, but the public conscience has been so thoroughly awakened by the dire effects of the liquor traffic, that it is now only a question of a short time when its doom will be written into the organic law of the land. But the editor goes on to say:—"We do not believe, and we have never believed, that actual prohibition can become an accomplished fact." Nevertheless, things happen in spite of disbelief. The possibility of the flying machine was generally discredited a few years ago, but today thousands of air men are taking part in actual warfare, with machines carrying not only men but guns and munitions of war. Actual prohibition is already an accomplished fact in a considerable part of the area of these United States, and ere long we expect to see it in operation upon a national scale. But in an attempt to bolster up his unbelief the writer presents a series of statements which are far from correct. For instance:—"As soon as the army and laboring classes in Russia shook off the autocratic yoke, the ban on liquor was removed." This is exactly the opposite of what occurred. One of the first acts of the provisional democratic government of Russia was to pass the following decree:—"The sale of alcoholic drinks containing a percentage of alcohol in excess of one and one-half degrees is prohibited throughout Russia." In the wine-growing districts only the sale of wines produced locally, and not containing a percentage of alcohol in excess of twelve degrees, is permitted. This is an even more drastic prohibition edict than that in operation before the revolution. It is the general opinion that a sober Russia made the revolution possible.

England and France Never Prohibition Nations

We are next solemnly informed:—"England is not on a prohibition basis, nor is France." Very true, but both countries are nearer that basis than ever before, and a large and constantly growing sentiment in Great Britain against the terrible drink evil is arousing a strong demand for national prohibition. But we are now told:—"In both England and France prohibition was tried with the same vigor that it was promoted in the United States." This is news with a vengeance. The temperance workers of England, now urging prohibition upon the government, will be much surprised to hear this important statement, and will wonder how it is that they have failed up to this time to discover that prohibition has been tried over there. Would that it might have been, for one of the saddest things in connection with the great war struggle is the fact that Great Britain has suffered much and her strength and resources have been seriously impaired by the evil results flowing from the law-protected liquor traffic. In France, where notwithstanding the Criterion's declaration, prohibition has not been tried, alcoholism has been recognized as a national danger, and quite recently a proclamation issued by the League against Alcoholism, the honorary president of which is M. Raymond Poincare, president of the republic, and which warned the young men and women of France against drink, was posted by order of the minister of commerce in every postoffice in the country. These countries are going forward and not backward in the fight against the world's greatest curse.

An important admission by the Criterion is contained in this statement:—"The effect of alcohol in the system is the same no matter what ingredient contains it. It is the same in wine and beer as it is in whisky." This effectually disposes of the claims of innocence made by the brewers for their special brand of intoxicants. And as the writer says:—"People drink more of them, and through drinking more of them they imbibe exactly as much alcohol in bulk, and the effect in their system is identically the same." Hear this, ye beer drinkers, and be wise ye advocates of the so-called lighter drinks. The contention of prohibitionists is now admitted to be correct, and the recognition of alcohol as a dangerous drug is fully conceded by the leading representative organ of the liquor interests.

In the days to come future generations will—as they read the story of the fight against the world curse—wonder that for so long we tolerated the most infamous wrong that ever befell a nation aspiring to freedom.

Beer and Wine not Temperance Drinks

To this is added the following nugget of wisdom which we most heartily commend to the careful attention of those well meaning people who believe that sobriety will everywhere prevail if only beer and wine are allowed to be manufactured and sold:—"So long as intoxicating beverages are permitted to be manufactured and sold, that long will there be just as much intoxication as there was before." Eminent scientific investigators the world over have made the same statement time and again. Professor Forel says:—"The so-called abstinence movement in the middle of the nineteenth century was only against distilled liquors and came to nothing or rather it drowned in beer." Prof. Gustave von Bunge, after a most thorough investigation wrote as follows:—"No other drink is so insidious. It has been in Germany worse than the whisky pest because more apt to lead to immoderate drinking." Scores of other distinguished men have fully corroborated these declarations. And now—to cap the climax—we have added to this weight of evidence the undoubted authority of Mida's.

But we are informed that the special virtue of whisky is that it has paid a much higher rate of revenue. On this account it ought to be spared. This is the old revenue argument over again. It is, in fact, the only stand-by of the liquor interests. Overwhelmed by the scientific evidence showing alcohol to be a dangerous habit-forming drug, with the economic facts showing its destructive and wasteful tendencies, with absolute proof that the world would be immensely benefited by its complete abolition as a beverage, the liquor traffickers utter their last despairing cry:—"You will deprive the government of more revenue." No matter how dangerous its continued use, allow it to remain, because it is willing to pay. But the nation is at last convinced that the traffic cannot pay. Government is not organized simply to collect revenue, but for the higher purpose of safeguarding the rights of all, and no bribe offered by the liquor traffic can in any way atone for its death-dealing effects.

Liquor Authorities Disagree on Revenue Figures

But it seems to be very difficult for the Criterion to give correctly the facts connected with the liquor revenue. It goes on to say:—"Seven hundred million dollars a year is quite a sum of money, and yet it is only a little more than the regular liquor revenue has been at the old rate in the past." How fast the liquor revenue grows—in the imagination of the liquor writers. According to the latest "Anti-Prohibition Manual," the total amount received from the traffic by the Federal government from all sources, including customs revenue, was $262,739,445. Surely there must be something peculiar in the atmosphere of the editorial sanctum, when to the writer this sum appears to be only a little less than seven hundred million dollars. It seems to prove conclusively that the surroundings are not conducive to clear thinking. But that seems to be a condition which is more or less associated everywhere with the liquor business.

Product of Distillery and Brewery Deadly Poisons

Again we are asked:—"Will the people permit this tremendous net loss?" In the first place it is not a net loss. The money now paid to the liquor interests will not be destroyed when the liquor traffic shall cease to be. The revenue obtained from some other source will be collected in a less wasteful manner, and the nation will be in every way the gainer by the change. But we are informed:—"The business of distilling is an honest business. It is not simply sanctioned by the public; it is demanded by the public." No business can be honest in the strict moral sense, which does not give value for what it receives. The shoemaker gives good shoes to his customer, the grocer supplies his patrons with the necessities of life. What does the saloon supply? The product of the distillery and brewery. The customer gets in return for his money a dangerous drug, which weakens his manhood, destroys his efficiency, and impairs his morals. The liquor traffic is simply a parasite making fraudulent claims, pandering to depraved appetite, flourishing upon false pretenses. It has been sanctioned by the public in the past, but that sanction is being rapidly withdrawn, and the time is fast coming when the traffic will be an outlaw upon American soil. "If we are to have prohibition, why not absolute prohibition?" This is a fair question, and we re-echo the cry. If whisky is bad it ought to go. If beer and wine produce the same results, and we are assured by the Criterion that they do, then they also must walk the plank. Alcohol will still be produced for proper purposes, but its manufacture for beverage use will cease. And in the days to come future generations will—as they read the story of the fight against the great world curse—wonder that for so long we tolerated the most infamous wrong that ever befell a nation aspiring to freedom.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PATRIOTIC SERVICE PROGRAM PROVES INCREASINGLY POPULAR

"The happiest thing in life is doing good according to a plan," said Frances Willard. If this plan chances to have to do with patriotic service and defines in a practical way the very service every woman is longing to render in this great world emergency, there is little wonder that the half million white ribboners of the nation enter into it with zest and ardor. Certain it is that reports from every state indicate that hands, heads and hearts are busy carrying out the suggestions embodied in the Patriotic Service Program of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Work Among Soldiers and Sailors: The slogan of the W. C. T. U. for the summer of 1917 has been, "On with the Comfort Bags!" Enthusiastically accepting the tremendous proposition that they supply with comfort bags the thousands of "jackies" who would pass through the four great naval training stations before being sent out to sea, the women of every state have worked literally day and night, tirelessly, painstakingly, lovingly, sewing into the comfort kits or housewives tender thoughts and fervent prayers. As heretofore stated, to expedite the preparation and distribution of these bags, a center was established in the neighborhood of each one of the four great naval training stations, namely, at Chicago, San Francisco, Providence, R. I., and Baltimore, Md. All summer long large quotas of bags from the contributing states have been pouring in. That these bags are needed and are appreciated goes without saying. The following letter to Miss Helen Hood, president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., from Mr. J. N. Dana, Y. M. C. A. secretary at Camp Ross, Great Lakes Naval Training Station, speaks for itself:

We have drafts of men going out every few days; in fact, my camp is the final detention camp for all the men before leaving for sea. Consequently I am having use for a great many comfort bags which the boys are asking for in large numbers. We are expecting between 25,000 and 30,000 new men within the next two months and we hope to have comfort kits for all of them, provided your many branch organizations can supply them. I thank you and the thousands of W. C. T. U. women throughout the United States for their great service.

Members of the National W. C. T. U. Headquarters family recently visited the naval station and as they passed from camp to camp asked the boys whether they found the bags of value. The replies were exuberantly appreciative. One Missouri lad told of his joy at finding that the gift he had received from the W. C. T. U. was made in a town only twenty-five miles from his home. It came to him like a message from his own dear ones.

It is deemed desirable to have these comfort bags presented to the boys in large numbers, after a fashion similar to the still popular Christmas tree performance. Men are but boys larger grown and their disappointment is marked if, because the supply is exhausted, they must, perforce, go without.

On another page is given a picture of the Southern California comfort bag shop, with a full description of the patriotic activities engaged in. Similar enterprises are being conducted in almost every state in the Union.

In sixteen states, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Michigan, Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Texas and Washington, miracle cities have sprung up in response to the government's needs. Here the young manhood of the nation is to be trained for the national defense. In a peculiar way, white ribboners will be interested in the training camp to which the citizen soldiers of their own state report for duty. The list of camps in this issue will show where they go and where help is most needed in co-operation with the plans for securing and maintaining clean and healthy conditions, physical and moral, in and about the cantonments.

If a co-operative W. C. T. U. comfort bag shop can be established in the vicinity of each cantonment, where all local unions in that military division can send their comfort bags, either direct or through a central point in their own states, it will be found of great advantage in many ways. The appreciation of the comfort bag or kit is steadily growing. A call for a million of these "surprise bags" comes from France. At the four great naval training stations the privilege of notifying a nearby W. C. T. U. comfort bag shop that a certain number will be needed on a certain day, with the assurance of meeting a prompt response, has made friends for the W. C. T. U. of commanding officers, chaplains and Y. M. C. A. secretaries. It is considered desirable to follow the same plan in supplying comfort bags to the new Army.

The demand comes from Army men for the flat, traveling case kind of kit for men in service. On page 10 is given a description of the Army comfort kit, directions for making, and list of contents necessary and optional.

The W. C. T. U. should not be selfish in its enjoyment of this work but should invite all women of the community to join in its labors. Southern California W. C. T. U. sent out a personal circular letter to every church woman's organization in the state, inviting it to make comfort bags on the W. C. T. U. plan, and many are accepting the invitation.

Soldiers' Recreation Rooms. Wherever recreation rooms for the soldiers have been opened, they have been distinctly successful and popular. That at the nation's capital has welcomed hundreds of homesick lads, who have not failed to express their gratitude for its cheery and heartening atmosphere. The following poem, written by young Robert E. Lee, a grandson of the great Southern general, was presented to the matron of the rooms, as an expression of his feelings:

We'll Ne'er Forget

You think it is a little thing
That you to our lone lives should bring these nights of song.
No matter what has been our past
These happy hours until the last
    Will linger long.

It is no little thing for you
To volunteer with courage true
    And do your part;
Your love for us, by some unseen,
Has brought to us this pleasure keen
    To cheer our heart.

When side by side we take our chance,
To live or die in bloody France
    For right and you;
Then never fear, you here at home
That we'll forget, where'er we roam
    The W. C. T. U.

The Massachusetts W. C. T. U. has purchased an acre of ground with a fourteen-room house upon it admirably adapted for a recreation home for the soldier boys at the Ayer camp. It will be equipped with two pianos, victrolas, games, pictures and other ideal recreation features. Concerning the new home Mrs. Katharine Lent Stevenson, president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., writes: "We shall first have a room where books, magazines, writing materials, and easy chairs will be at the disposal of the men. Then there will be evening meetings, concerts, socials, lectures, games, now and then a treat of home cooking, and always temperance literature and a possible temperance pledge to be brought forth when the occasion warrants. There will be a house mother, a white ribboner who will bring to the homesick, lonely boys a taste of mother love and sympathy. Rooms will be rented to the wives, mothers and sisters of the men who will crowd into Ayer, some for a last glimpse of their loved ones. The house is centrally located and magnificently adapted to a larger work than we can possibly attempt at present, though we trust it will develop along all lines. Lawn tennis, croquet, etc., may be played in the summer and fall, hammocks may be swung from the trees and there are possibilities for garden work. One of our most motherhearted women will have oversight of the social part of the work. Only pure home influences will of course be exerted. Already white ribboners are writing me from distant states, asking that we interest ourselves in their sons."

Do not forget to minister to the troops as they go from their homes to the various mobilization centers. The president of the New York W. C. T. U., Mrs. Ella A. Boole, suggests: "Many soldiers will be passing through our communities on their way to camp. Will not the W. C. T. U. be the first to see that these young

Let Us Make November 1 a Day of Memorable History

One of the most significant dates in this eventful year of 1917 will be November 1, the day on which a prohibition key will lock the door of every saloon and barroom in the District of Columbia. A day of rejoicing for every lover of "whatsoever things are pure and true and of good report." A day of thanksgiving for the host of temperance workers throughout the United States who helped bring this enormous victory. A day in which to remember gratefully the men in Congress who voted favorably for the Sheppard bill, providing for prohibition in the District of Columbia on and after November 1, 1917.

Our Capital City cleaned from its plague spot—the saloon! Let us rejoice! Let us appropriately celebrate the coming of prohibition to the capital of our great republic. Call the people together. Invite the band to play. Fly an extra flag for prohibition. Put your communities on record in favor of a referendum to the states on National Constitutional Prohibition and send their appeal for the passage of the Sheppard-Webb joint resolution to the Representative from your Congressional district.

Pray for victory in the states of Ohio and New Mexico, where on November 6 the voters will decide the momentous question of state constitutional prohibition. Petition the President of the United States for the enactment of war prohibition to insure the better safeguarding of our boys at home and abroad, the highest welfare of civilians and the conservation of life-giving grains and other food products.

Let our celebration help kindle a civic conscience in the hearts of the people, so that in this grave international crisis our great republic may exalt the Christian principles of love and justice and give light and life to all the nations of the world. Reverently, with united purpose and patriotic fervor, let us make Thursday, November 1, 1917, a day of memorable history.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END

September eighth has passed. The manufacture of alcohol for beverage purposes has ceased in distilleries, which numbered over six hundred. Thousands of men therein employed have been thrown out of work. The event has been heralded from coast to coast in the newspapers, with liberal comment, innumerable published interviews with distillers and retailers, and with profuse editorial utterances. Yet nowhere has a labor panic been reported. From no distillery community has there come word of serious business disturbances. In fact, not one of the threatened calamities which, according to the liquor prophets, were supposed to accompany such a readjustment of conditions, has occurred. On the contrary, business men of Peoria, one of the largest distillery cities in the world, announced that jobs were awaiting every one thrown out of employment by the closing of the whisky factories, and that their cessation would not cause a ripple in the business life of the city.

Press dissertations on the event vary all the way from the extravagant statement that the Federal edict ends for all time the existence of John Barleycorn to the pessimistic plaint that anyway there is sufficient whisky in store to last until the war is over.

What after all is the significance of the new law? Is it an advance step in our great reform? Does it mark another milestone on the way to national prohibition? Every close observer of the situation, we believe, will unhesitatingly answer in the affirmative.

First. As stated by various liquor dealers on another page, the effect of the law will be to decrease very largely the number of saloons, especially in the large cities, and thus lessen the centers of crime and vice and temptation.

Second. As a matter of course, the new law will tend to increase enormously the price of all alcoholic drinks, and in many instances will make it almost impossible and certainly difficult for a large proportion of the drinking men to continue the habit.

Third. The ease with which the labor feature of the change has been adjusted will once for all silence the threats of the liquor publicity bureaus that national prohibition will precipitate a nation-wide labor panic. It will also serve to convince all reasonable people that business will not be demoralized or indeed unfavorably affected by war time prohibition or the adoption of a Federal prohibition amendment.

Fourth. If the statements made by the liquor men are to be believed, the passage of the law has already convinced many of the distillers that it is useless longer to "kick against the pricks" of public sentiment, and that now is a most favorable time to gracefully retire from an unpopular business. As the years go on, the men who have been forced by the Federal pronouncement to engage in the manufacture of commercial alcohol or to put their plants to other and legitimate uses, will realize the advantages of a business that commands respect and is not in constant danger from state and Federal legislation. By the time the war is over they will feel little inclination to re-embark in their former line of activity.

Fifth. Even the one obnoxious feature of the law—the possibility that it will increase and perhaps popularize the use of beer—may in the end serve to bring the believers in alcoholic drinks of low content to a realization that beer is as productive as are distilled liquors of crime, poverty and other social and civic evils.

But the present victory will have little value unless we follow it up diligently with a campaign against beer. If it is lack of knowledge on the beer question that is lending favor to this so-called "temperance drink" let us meet it with education as to the nature and effect of the products of Gambrinus. If it is the power and wealth of the brewers that is saving it, let us expose the corrupt political tactics that have characterized the brewery interests always and ever.

Let us insistently demand that action similar to that taken against the distilleries be taken against the breweries, and thus mark the last milestone on our way to national prohibition.

DELVING INTO ANCIENT HISTORY

If the liquor publicity bureaus are to be believed the great battles of the past have been won because the intellects of the military leaders were stimulated by the use of alcohol. Interesting, isn't it, how eagerly the opponents of total abstinence and prohibition search the records of bygone years for some fragment of fact or fiction to show that the big men of those times occasionally indulged in alcoholic liquors. It is, with them, quite evidently a "safety first" measure, for men who a decade or a half century ago passed out of this world cannot rise up and challenge their statements. But what the world is wanting to know today is the attitude of the men who have had or are to have a part in the present war. If the drink publicity agents really desire to give the people a campaign of information why do they not call attention to the stand taken by General Kitchener, who said to his soldiers, "Your duty to your country can only be achieved by hard work and by strict sobriety." Why don't they proclaim from the housetops the plea of Kerensky of Russia to his troops, "Unless soldiers abstain from consumption of stores of liquor which they discover, new Russia will be submerged in a pool of alcohol to the accompaniment of incendiarism and other outrages. I demand that the use of alcohol by soldiers and officers be prevented." Why, indeed, do they suppress the declaration of that interesting figure on the French war front today, Major-General John J. Pershing: "There was a time when it was a natural part of a soldier's existence to drink and carouse. That day is past with the soldier sworn to defend his country's flag and representing the power and dignity of the nation."

No living war leader of prominence would risk his reputation by championing the use of alcohol; he realizes too well that such an announcement would forever shatter the confidence of the people in his ability to achieve victory.

NOTED FRENCH EDITOR PLEADS FOR PROTECTION OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS

For many years the editor of La Revue of Paris has printed in his columns repeated warnings as to the dangers of alcoholism. Since the beginning of the war his efforts have been redoubled. In the August number of his magazine he says:

"At the present moment France is attracting the eyes of the world more than ever before. It is not enough to show our enthusiasm regarding the English, Americans, Italians, Portuguese or Russians who are dwelling among us. We must likewise watch over their moral security. But alcoholism menaces all in the same degree. The 'Teddies' who arrive from the United States total or partial prohibitionists are exposed to multiple dangers and temptations. The great American republic accepts with heroism the sacrifices in men and in money which the war against the Germans may demand. But let us take care! We shall commit an evil action if her children find themselves exposed not only to the danger of being slain at the front, but to that of being poisoned by alcohol. Many writers in the United States have already manifested fears upon this point. A few concrete cases would suffice to cause an outburst of opinion on the other side. The Germans are watching and they will not be slow to exploit such sentiments, which are justified, indeed, to paralyze the grandiose impulse which is drawing the noble population of the United States towards the sacred cause of the Allies.

"The Minister of Foreign Affairs in France has a new role to fulfill. It is the elementary duty of the government and the Parliament to think of this and to assist him. The heroism of the soldiers at the front demands to be completed by the dignity of our life at the rear! Who would dare contend that this condition indispensable to our success is realized today!"

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. Mention a memorable event that is to occur November 1. How does the National W. C. T. U. president suggest observing the day?

2. What are some of the comments made by liquor dealers on the closing of the distilleries for the manufacture of alcoholic beverages on September 8?

3. Did the enforcement of the new Federal law in any way affect the labor market?

4. In what specific ways will this measure advance the national prohibition movement?

5. What convincing anti-beer argument is given in a recent issue of Mida's Criterion?

6. How have certain Washington saloon-keepers changed their attitude toward prohibition since the law went into effect in that state?

7. In what way has prohibition affected the vice problem in the state of Washington?

8. Name some of the ways in which white ribboners are co-operating with the National W. C. T. U. in its plans for patriotic service.

9. The influence of what prominent Iowa Catholic bishop is being exerted in favor of constitutional prohibition?

10. Tell some of the notable conversions to prohibition mentioned in this issue.

SCHOOL HOUSE SPEAKING CAMPAIGN TO WIN OHIO VOTERS TO DRY CAUSE

A vigorous school house speaking campaign, with four to six meetings in every school house in Ohio, is one of the plans of the Ohio Dry Federation, the meetings having been begun about the time of the opening of school. Temperance programs in which the children will take part are already being planned. The state campaign, which is to begin October 1, will consist of a series of meetings throughout Ohio, with addresses by men of national reputation. Negotiations are under way, it is reported, to secure several of the most prominent speakers in the United States.

EXPERIENCE OF SIOUX FALLS UNDER PROHIBITION A REBUKE TO CIRCULATORS OF CAMPAIGN FALSEHOODS

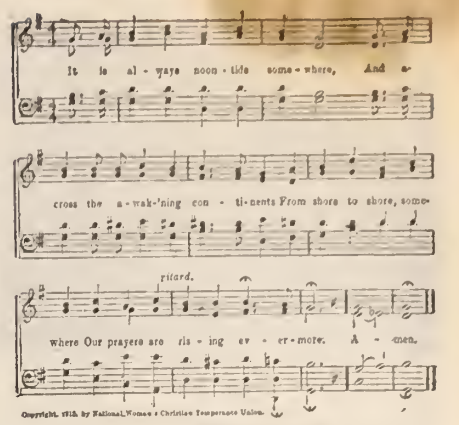
Prohibition in South Dakota during the short time it has been in effect has strengthened the faith of its friends in its desirability and won converts in the ranks of the enemy. The Sioux Falls Press tells the story of the first nine weeks of prohibition in Sioux Falls in these words:

"Comparison of the second month under state-wide bone-dry prohibition in South Dakota with the corresponding month in the last year of license again confirms the wisdom of the decision of this city when it voted for prohibition. In August, 1916, no less than 215 persons were either so helpless or so disorderly that the police had to gather them in. Last month only eight intoxicated persons attracted the notice of the police. And a year ago last month a total of 349 were arrested for various offenses. The month just gone saw only 44 arrested. Does prohibition lessen crime or disorderliness? It would seem so when we note that on charges other than drunkenness 134 were arrested in August, 1916, while only 36 were taken in last month. Fourteen of these were charged with bootlegging, or having liquor in their possession. The record is the more remarkable in view of the fact that only a few miles across the state line there is a saloon town patronized by the habitual users of intoxicants who visit the place frequently by automobile.

"Moreover, the city is in many material ways greatly improved. The opposition to prohibition not only contended throughout the campaign for the amendment last year that drunkenness would increase if the state went dry, but that the policy would be ruinous to a city like Sioux Falls. But the weekly bank clearings show a substantial advance over the clearings of the corresponding period of last year. Of the nine weeks that have passed since South Dakota went dry not one has recorded a decrease in Sioux Falls' bank clearings. Business men report collections very noticeably improved. Money that once went over bars is going now to clean up debts at the stores, and for the purchase of articles the dependents of former hard drinkers had heretofore been denied.

"There seems to be no room for argument on this question. The facts stand before us, justifying every promise that was made by the temperance workers during the campaign, and sternly rebuking the circulator of every falsehood disseminated by the pro-liquor element in the desperate fight booze made to save itself in this state."

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

TRUTH NEVER DIES

"Truth never dies. The ages come and go.
The mountains wear away, the stars retire.
Destruction lays earth's mighty cities low;
And empires, states and dynasties expire;
But caught and handed onward by the wise,
Truth never dies.

"Though unreceived and scoffed at through the years;
Though made the butt of ridicule and jest;
Though held aloft for mockery and jeers,
Denied by those of transient power possessed,
Insulted by the insolence of lies,
Truth never dies.

"It answers not. It does not take offense,
But with a mighty silence bides its time;
As some great cliff that braves the elements
And lifts through all the storms its head sublime,
It ever stands, uplifted by the wise;
And never dies.

"As rests the Sphinx amid Egyptian sands;
As looms on high the snowy peak and crest;
As firm and patient as Gibraltar stands,
So truth, unwearied, waits the era blest
When men shall turn to it with great surprise.
Truth never dies."

DELAYED SUFFRAGE VICTORY IN MAINE

The failure of the citizens of Maine to give a majority for the woman suffrage amendment at the election September 10 furnishes another argument for the national suffrage amendment. The measure appears to have been voted down two to one, doubtless, as in other states, because of the extreme conservatism of the men voters.

men are supplied with coffee and sandwiches, coffee and doughnuts, or coffee and rolls when they stop long enough at the station? Young, sturdy men can eat almost any time and nothing will touch their hearts more than to know that we are really interested in their welfare. Do not forget the boys who guard the bridges and waterworks."

A tourist from Seattle to the East writes to the Chicago Tribune that when she left Seattle she brought to the observation car twenty good sized packages, each containing several current magazines and the latest daily paper. She dropped one off at each bridge passed in the states of Washington and Montana where there was a soldier on guard. When her supply became exhausted her fellow passengers donated papers, magazines, boxes of candy or cookies for the same purpose.

Another suggestion worth jotting down in your notebook is to enclose an addressed, stamped envelope containing a sheet of thin paper when writing to American soldiers overseas. The stationery in the possession of the soldiers may become water soaked or otherwise injured. United States stamps can be used for the return letter, as this government intends, or has already opened postoffices in France. The following instructions concerning the sending of mail or cablegrams to soldiers abroad and at home are worth preserving:

Letters, newspapers, and parcels may be sent to those with the American expeditionary forces in Europe at domestic rates. Parcel post will be sent at 12 cents a pound with a maximum weight of twenty pounds. No C. O. D., insured, or registered parcels will be handled.

Money orders may be sent at domestic rates. Money or valuables cannot be sent by registered mail.

Magazines authorized by the postmaster general can be mailed to soldiers by placing a 1 cent stamp on the magazine. The magazine must be unwrapped and cannot be addressed to any individual.

Address all mail in the following manner:

Return to ..... [Stamp]
[Sender's name and address]

John Smith
Co.....
Regt. No. .....
.....
[Branch of service]
American Expeditionary Forces.

The cable rate from Chicago is 7 cents a word. Cables should be addressed as follows:

Chicago 13 words
Efm Amexforce London
John Smith seventeenth regiment third unit folks well MARY SMITH

The cablegram is sent to London and mailed from there to France.

Many Tailed Bandages. Since the W. C. T. U. undertook to make these bandages for the British War Relief Association it has been discovered that the original directions were not sufficiently definite. The following method is the correct one:

Directions for Making Bandage

Tear (do not cut) the selvedges from new, strong, unbleached muslin. Tear into strips four inches wide and thirty inches long. Take six strips and overlap two inches, each on the other, for a space of five inches at the center. Make two rows of stitching, each row two and one-half inches from the center, to hold the strips together. Where stitched, the bandage will be fourteen inches wide. The six ends on each side will be loose. Beginning at the top of the bandage, fold the "tails," first across the five-inch space, then toward the bottom of the bandage until half of them are so folded, then reverse from fourth strip, turning the "tails" the other way. Fold the bandage twice, making a flat package about five inches square.

In expressing gratitude for the help of the American women in making these bandages, Mrs. Walter Mulliner, secretary of the British War Relief Association, encloses a letter from the private secretary of the Queen of England, saying, "The Queen is much touched by the kindly thought which has prompted this gift, and she desires me to assure the members that the generous and useful comforts will be highly appreciated by our sailors and soldiers."

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING ARMY HOUSEWIFE

Materials for Housewife

Khaki, galatea or other firm cotton cloth of suitable weight and firm color, preferably light brown. Flannel for needles and safety pins.

Braid or tape about ½ inch wide, dark color, strong and smooth for binding, if used, and for ties.

Scraps of pretty silk for needle book and pin wheel.

To Make Housewife

Cut cloth into strips 19 inches long, 6 inches wide if housewife is to be bound, 6½ inches wide if to be hemmed.

Turn up one end of strip 4½ inches and hem for bottom pocket. Cut two pieces of cloth 4½ inches deep and 7 inches wide for middle and top pockets. Make box pleats in center of each after hemming. Leave spaces of ¾ of an inch between pockets for fold.

Attach 2 flannel leaves, either pinked or button-holed on edge at the top of the strip under hem or binding. Fill with safety pins.

Finish the edge of the housewife, sew on tape for ties.

Pinball is made of two round pieces of cardboard two inches in diameter. Cover one side of each with dark, pretty silk or velvet; ribbon is good to use. Whip the cards together and stick pins around edge.

Needle book. Two pieces of cardboard 2½ by 4 inches. Cover both sides with ribbon or other pretty material. Cut two pieces of flannel a little smaller than sides and whip all together at the back to form a book with flannel leaves. Fasten with band of narrow elastic ribbon or a small ribbon strap with "snap."

To Fill Housewife

The bottom pocket will hold Testament, pledge cards, leaflets, motherly letter and card with name and address of the maker.

In the middle pocket put the needle book, containing six needles of large size, four darning needles, white thread, number 24, wound on card to fit pocket; olive drab thread, same number and wound same way; also white and black darning cotton on cards; package automatic bachelor buttons, 2 sizes white bone, 2 sizes brown bone buttons, 6 of each, sewed on cards or in small bag; pin wheel; pair four-inch scissors.

The top pocket will hold trench mirror; comb and small toilet articles. Bandages and "first aid" materials are furnished by the War Department.

When filled, the housewife should fold into small, compact package.

Relief Work: Someone has said that "the frontiers of Belgium and France" are now the frontiers of the United States, and local and state unions and even Loyal Temperance Legions are adopting and becoming responsible for the little people of these countries who have become orphaned by the war. The need of work of this character will be greater in the months to come.

Moral Education: The Ladies' Home Journal, in connection with an article by Mrs. Robert E. Speer, on "The Boy in Camp and the Girl in Town," says:

"There is in every military camp a larger number of decent young men than those of evil desires. These young men are constantly 'on liberty' and just in proportion as the intelligent women of the cities nearest those camps make an effort to give those soldiers clean recreation, so will be the moral standard of the camps and the fighting strength of the men in them." The suggestion is made, "There is a distinct 'bit' that every girl (and every woman) in a city or town adjacent to a military cantonment can do, but it should be done only under the supervision of careful-thinking and wisely watchful women." With these needs in mind local unions near mobilization centers or camps have been quietly reaching out to throw around the boys a motherly, home-like influence. The Berkley W. C. T. U. of Norfolk, Va., gave an informal reception to about sixty of the enlisted men from St. Helena training station, providing a fine musical program, and serving light refreshments, ice cream and cake, each slice of which was decorated with a tiny American flag. Men from twenty different states were present and were profuse in their expressions of gratitude. The Demarest W. C. T. U. of Salem, N. J., arranged with the captain of the troops at Fort Mott to have Daniel A. Poling speak to the boys on Sunday morning under the trees, on "The Grip that Holds." The hearty response from the audience of khaki-clad men indicated their appreciation of the message.

The request went out from Nebraska W. C. T. U. headquarters that "September 1, the day of the mobilization of the state's united young manhood in training camps without our borders, be designated and set apart as a day of prayer for the safety and protection of our boys not only from the shot and shell of the enemy, but for strength and purpose to resist the temptation and besetments that environ military life."

The pertinent suggestion is made by the Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations that "Everything should be done to inculcate respect for the man in uniform, who has offered his life for our protection, and that supreme sacrifice makes him worthy of honor—

PATRIOTIC SERVICE PROGRAM OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA W. C. T. U.

Special Correspondence

It was decided at the state W. C. T. U. convention that the general officers shall be the state war-service committee to promote the work to be done through the department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors and to correlate the patriotic efforts of other departments.

In response to the appeal for comfort bags for sailors, plans were made to furnish five thousand, the first installment to be ready by August 1. Unions were asked to appoint war-service committees and to prepare to carry out the plans of the general officers. As a ready means of communication with the local unions, a monthly War Service Bulletin is published, copies of which are also sent to county officers. These bulletins will set forth from time to time all lines of service which, as patriotic women, we must render our country in this crisis.

State W. C. T. U. headquarters has been made the receiving and shipping station for all comfort bags and supplies for Southern California, and a comfort bag shop, utilizing convenient space in the balcony of the auditorium of our headquarters building, which is known as the Temperance Temple, has been opened and equipped. The shop is well stocked with all of the articles used in filling the comfort bags. Wholesale prices were generously given by a Los Angeles business firm and except for the personal influence, supervision and persistent efforts of the junior member of the firm many of the popular articles for our comfort bags could not have been procured, as they were not to be had on this coast.

The unions make the bags in accordance with the rules and specifications of the National department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, and provide ninety cents (wholesale cost) for the contents of each bag. The empty bags, with the money, are sent to our shop, where they are inspected, standardized and filled. The work in the shop is done systematically and at practically no expense to the state.

Squads of workers from county and city unions are detailed for service by the president of the Los Angeles county W. C. T. U., and the president of the city federation of unions. These workers give their services three days of each week and each day one of the general officers supervises the work in the shop, while the whole work of the shop is superintended by the state corresponding secretary, Mrs. Kara S. Root, who has been appointed director of the comfort bag shop.

The formal opening of the shop was made the occasion of a patriotic meeting held in the auditorium of the Temple. Printed invitations were sent to all women's organizations in the city. A most interested audience participated in the patriotic exercises and listened to two able addresses. Mrs. H. A. Cable, chairman of the California Woman's Committee of the Council of National and State Defense, spoke on "Woman's Call to Patriotic Service." Dr. Robert C. Barton, executive secretary of the Morals Efficiency association, presented "The Second Line of Defense." At the close of the program the audience accepted the invitation to inspect the comfort bag shop.

The comfort bag work and the shop have given the W. C. T. U. great publicity. Newspapers have published extended articles and printed pictures of the general officers. The Sunday edition of one of the largest Los Angeles papers gave a feature article descriptive of our work and also the picture of the shop taken by their photographer.

The International Film company took pictures of the officers and also of the comfort bag shop to be used in their syndicate work throughout the country. Last of all came the National Universal Film company, asking that the state executive committee, then in session, take a recess of a couple of hours and give them an opportunity to make a moving picture film showing the women filling the bags, folding bandages, and doing other war work. This was done and the moving picture will be seen first at the Superba Theater, Los Angeles. Thus far a thousand or more comfort bags have been made in Southern California, some of which have already gone on their mission, and we expect to reach our goal of five thousand.

If space would permit, we could relate most interesting stories of the "boys" coming to our shop and asking for the bags; of the scene when the executive committee sent away happy the son of one of our own white ribboners; of the many letters which we have received from the "boys" who have been given our bags, and, best of all, of the requests of officers for numbers of our bags and their recognition of the spiritual and moral uplift that must come to the "boys" as they read the choice leaflets and letters contained therein.

We have taken up the work of making the arm and leg many tailed bandages and fixed as our goal five thousand. The first shipment of these bandages will go forward September 20.

Our work is carefully co-ordinated with that of the Northern California W. C. T. U., and all comfort bags not needed in Southern California will be sent to the San Francisco W. C. T. U. headquarters for distribution.

Fifty thousand leaflets and five thousand copies of our state comfort bag letter have been printed for the comfort bags and for war-service work. Use has also been made of National W. C. T. U. leaflets.

As vice-chairman of the California Woman's Committee of the Council of National and State Defense, the state W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, has made possible a very close co-operation between the W. C. T. U. and the Woman's Committee. A very ready adjustment of the W. C. T. U. machinery has been made to carry out the plans of the committee and to co-ordinate our work.

Plans have been made for more extended work in the Flower Mission and

THE BREWERYMAN

JEAN K. BAIRD

The Story of the Little Daughter of a Liquor Man who was an Innocent Victim of Her Father's Business.

Julia Bateman came down Ontario avenue, or the "back" avenue as she with the rest of the people called it. The town lay packed close in a valley, with three avenues stretched its full length and the necessary cross-streets plainly defined. Originally these avenues had borne high sounding names, but the population was shifting and it was much easier for strangers to speak of "front" street, "middle" and "back" avenues. Why they should distinguish between the three was a question, unless it was that "front" street was a place of commercialism and traffic and was faced by the railroad tracks.

Julia Bateman came down the "back" avenue. Miss Julia was quite a character in town. She was so well known that her last name was rarely mentioned when one spoke of her. Numbered with those rare women whom the hand of time seems never to touch, her age was seldom thought of. One might be fully conscious of all manner of peculiarities and idiosyncrasies she possessed, but the matter of years was forgotten. She had been an advanced thinker when she was only a child. It was told of her that upon an occasion when the masculine members of the family were discussing the amount each one earned she had turned to the mother and, wholly unconscious that she was challenging a whole social system, had said, "And Mrs. R—, how much do you make? You work longer than any of your men."

As the years advanced, Julia's ideas advanced with them. She was a thinker. Perhaps that was the distinguishing trait about her. There was something in her personality which would not placidly let her accept conditions as they were. She must know why they were so and if they were of the best. She was fearless in saying what she thought. Therefore, she stood out from others in two ways—she thought and she was independent.

A new hundred thousand dollar school building was in the course of erection. The old one was not only inadequate to the needs, but was unsafe. The town had already been overbonded and before the new building could be undertaken an election for a vote on a new bond issue had to be held. There had been a contest, as parochial schools had just been put up and people who sent their children to them were not inclined to be taxed any more heavily for the upkeep of the public school system. There had been hot times in the little mountain town and the bond issue had carried by a small margin of fourteen.

Miss Julia had fought tooth and nail for the new schoolhouse, and now hearing that the walls were under way and that there was some semblance of outline to the structure, she walked down the "back" avenue to see it. The building covered almost a square. Miss Julia traversed that space and then stood at the corner and studied the school at an angle.

Presently John Hollimon came down the side street and crossed over. Hollimon was a big, handsome man about fifty years of age, well-dressed and presenting the sleek, satisfied appearance of one who is well fed. He bore all the hallmarks of the breweryman. His five brothers were engaged in the same business, wholesale or retail. They had become so prosperous as to utterly forget their childhood home of squalor and poverty and the days when their drunken father had kicked and abused their mother and had mistreated them. The Hollimons had risen by the very means which had brutalized their father and killed their mother. They had the finest of houses, the most expensive of cars. Silken clothes were their daily apparel.

Jim Hollimon had been acquainted with Julia Bateman indirectly all his life. That is, he had known her as two people born and raised in the same town in widely different social circles and holding opposite views on all public matters could know each other. Of one thing he was certain—she hated the liquor business and attacked it at every point. Julia Bateman would not consider letting Jim Hollimon's wife entertain her or ride in Hollimon's car because his income came from liquor, yet he admired and respected Miss Julia.

He crossed the street and stood near her.

"That's some building they're putting up," he said.

"Yes; it looks to me as though it was going to be precisely what we need. The town may be proud of it. I wonder which is to be the main entrance? There are three sides just alike."

"I don't know, I'm sure. They're tellin' me they're plannin' to teach the girls to cook and sew. Now, honest, Miss Julia, don't you think that's a waste of time. Can't a girl pick up them things at home?"

"You've used the right word, Mr. Hollimon. Pick up—that is just about what it is. What would you think of a doctor, or a plumber, or a dentist picking up his work from some fellow that had picked it up from some one else?"

"Maybe you're right. I get your point, but now my Marie—she's around about twelve years, and her mother's a fine cook."

Miss Julia shrugged her shoulders. "You may think so because the food tastes right, and you don't see any further than that, but you're all too big—too much fat on your frames—and your children are not as snappy as they should be. You have too much food and the wrong kind. Now that's my point! Train the future housekeepers to know food values, so that they can feed a child what is needed to nourish brain and muscle and all those things."

"Well, I'm sure I don't understand. I've read how it is the proper thing. You know, Miss Julia, that I am only an ignorant Irishman, without much schoolin'. But I believe in giving the children the best there is. If this cookin' and sewin' is good for them, let them have it. There's nothing too good for them."

"That's the American daddy speaking now," said Julia. "My, but I think the good American father is the finest thing in the world. He's without a peer."

Her companion did not smile. The wrinkles at the corner of his eyes deepened; that was all. "We just try to do our best for the kids and give them the show that we never had," was his reply.

They stood and discussed further the details of the building. Suddenly Miss Julia turned to him and said, "While we're on public questions, Mr. Hollimon, what do you think about the amendment that you men of the state are to vote on this fall?"

"Well, to tell you frankly, Miss Julia, I believe in women voting. I don't see why you shouldn't vote as well as me. Now, about this school building. You know more about public schools than I'd ever know. You're a taxpayer, too. I don't see that voting will hurt you any."

She laughed. "You think we'll still be women, whether we make a cross on printed paper or not. Before the election I went down and talked to the Italian voters. They could barely read English, had never been in a public school in all their lives, and they—or at least most of them—had never paid a cent of tax." She looked up at him with a smile in which there was more of a touch of humor than criticism of a political condition which balled up and generally muddled affairs in such a way.

"So I beseeched, explained and pleaded, and about a dozen of them graciously conceded to me the privilege of spending our taxes the way we wish."

"Too many Dagoes and Huns and that set of people have rights. It's the politicians run them in. They run in the people that they can control."

"Well, I'm glad you're for woman suffrage. I hope—" He raised his hand to stop her. "Don't go so fast, Miss Julia. I said I was in favor of women voting. They have as much right as I have. You and my wife and a lot know more about town affairs than we men do, but that ain't the point. I believe women have a right to vote, but I hain't going to vote for the amendment. I'm going to vote straight against it."

"You are? I can't understand that—a man working against what he thinks is right. I thought better of you than that."

"You know why we don't want you women voting."

"I haven't the faintest idea," replied Miss Julia.

"You women would knock our business straight into—you know where."

"We might hurry it along considerably."

"Let you women get in and we'd be out of a job. You know that."

"Mr. Hollimon, the Woman Suffrage Association has taken no stand on the liquor question. The only thing that they are asking for is equal political rights."

"Yes; I understand that, but you know what you'd all do. You know that well enough, and so do I."

"No, I do not know what we would all do—neither do you. You may surmise, but nothing further. You know what I would do. I do it anyhow, whether there is suffrage or whether there isn't. I'd fight the business tooth and nail, just as I have always done."

"You'd all do it. The women would outvote us the first election. Why, the Brewers' League know that, and they are sending men out to warn us what the carrying of this amendment would mean to us. There was a fellow by the name of Wells here from Pittsburgh just last week. He had a meeting of all the men in our business and we got our orders. They're sending out literature on the subject. There isn't a week that I don't get a lot of pamphlets or circular letters. A man's got to protect his own business."

"I'd like to see it," she said. "I realize that there's no use of discussing with you the ethics of the case. We wouldn't see things alike. We don't belong to the same generation; that is, as to a viewpoint."

"I won't pretend to argue with you. You get the best of me when it comes to words. But this is what I want to say: You people seem to think that we drive men in with a club and make them worthy of such encouragement and inspiration as good women can give." Note the following additional suggestions:

Invite the enlisted boys at the nearby camp to dinner—especially Sunday dinner—singly or in groups. In extending this hospitality make the family unit the smallest unit. Enlist influential mothers as leaders, but enlist all mothers free to give service. Learn from the chaplains and Y. M. C. A. what they are doing for the boys. Secure their advice and co-operation. Learn how many boys are off duty daily and what the city has to offer: In respectable lodging houses at moderate cost; in wholesome entertainment by clubs, churches and individuals; in disreputable temptation through liquor, gambling and disorderly houses. Remember that whatever is being done by men, there is special need of women's hospitality and personal influence. Every bridge is guarded by soldiers. Kindly interest and courtesies can be extended by good mothers in the vicinity and personal favors shown them.

Women in Industry: In addition to the various lines of work already undertaken in every community under this section, we suggest co-operation with the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense in its work for women and children in industry, of which Mrs. Raymond Robins has charge. It is work not alone "for the duration of the war," but will help form ideals of legislation long afterward. The committee suggests:

First, that all labor shall be performed by adults. Second, that the wages paid shall be at the highest prevailing rate in the industry which the contract affects, that there shall be equal pay for equal work, that for those trades where there is no wage standard an adjustment committee shall fix a fair wage, and that all wages shall be adjusted from time to time to meet the increased cost of living, the adjustment to be made by the committee, and that all other wage questions shall be submitted to the committee. Third, there shall be a standard eight hour day. Fourth, one day in seven shall be a day of rest. Fifth, women shall not do night work. Sixth, sanitation and fire protection shall be standardized. Seventh, there shall be protection against over-fatigue and industrial diseases. Eighth, there shall be no tenement house labor. Ninth, women who have small children needing their care shall be exempted from industry. Tenth, women shall be exempted from industry two months before and after childbirth.

We urge earnest co-operation in the enforcement of the Federal Anti-Child Labor law which went into effect September 1, 1917.

Americanization: Discussion of Americanization work is to be made a part of state W. C. T. U. convention programs. Work along that line is now being done, especially in states having a large foreign-speaking population. One branch of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense is concentrating its efforts upon teaching foreign women the English language and American standards of work. With the exigencies of war demanding hands, it is safe to say that at least half of these women will be "drafted" for industry, says one writer. "The non-English speaking ones will logically be called first. They are handicapped past all belief by not knowing the language. The only 'safety first' method for them is to learn English. The Ford Motor company reports that by the teaching of English to its foreign-born employes accidents have been reduced fifty-four per cent." This same committee is preparing to give a series of afternoon receptions, to continue as long as the war lasts—warm, informal, home affairs, without engraved cards or invitations and minus butlers. The hostess, the representative of the committee, will simply run out in the morning and find out who would like to go to a party in the afternoon, bringing their knitting and the babies. Then she will come back and get the party ready—coffee and cakes, or tea and cakes, conversation and nothing more. Polish women are to be the invitees for the most part. The party is to be held in a store in the most thickly populated Polish neighborhood in Chicago. These parties in a store will be but a beginning in patriotic education among these Chicago citizens. Similar "get together" affairs may well be planned in every foreign community.

Co-operation with the United Committee on Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy:

The United Committee on Temperance Activities, of which Miss Anna A. Gordon is vice-chairman, has asked the W. C. T. U. to provide sixteen stereomotorgraphs, one for each of the cantonments where the new Army is to be mobilized, as its part of the $100,000 the committee is endeavoring to raise. The slides to be used are to be specially prepared by the committee to teach temperance truths and it is understood that when the need for them at the cantonments is over, the machines and slides will belong to the states that purchased them. New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Iowa and Kansas have each signified their intention of purchasing one of these stereomotorgraphs. Other states in which cantonments are located, with less W. C. T. U. membership, will not be able to shoulder the burden alone, nor would the other states wish them to do so. Each wants to lend a helping hand in this extremely practical endeavor to reach the boys with the truth in a very attractive way. There is need of great haste in this matter as thousands of boys are already in the camps and the educational temperance work should be going on. This is our great opportunity to reach thousands of young men we could not hope to reach otherwise. This is agreed to be the full share of the W. C. T. U. in the work of the United Committee, and other calls will not be made unless something entirely unforeseen occurs. Send all funds through W. C. T. U. treasurers.

Finance: So generous was the response to the call from the National W. C. T. U. for funds to purchase a W. C. T. U. ambulance for the French front that enough money was received to buy two ambulances, with full equipment of litters, blankets and pillows. This large amount for patriotic work was raised largely by personal contributions—the ideal way. It is, however, often necessary to secure the money by other means, and local unions have done this through medal contests, food sales, community markets, war time dinners, melting pots, etc. Allendale W. C. T. U. of Michigan was obliged to use all the money in its treasury to buy supplies for comfort bags. When the useful receptacles were finished they were hung in picturesque fashion on a line stretched across a room, around them the women makers grouped and a snapshot of the ensemble taken, to be used on post cards, which are being sold to replenish the treasury. Many unions are interesting the merchants of their respective towns in the comfort bag proposition, and getting them to contribute all or part of the supplies. The Laramie (Wyo.) W. C. T. U. recently conducted a flower show at which it raised $300 for comfort bag work.

Community Interest: Some workers are inviting in friends and neighbors to help in their patriotic work, arranging for short talks on patriotic plans. A Michigan W. C. T. U. combines a discourse and demonstration on the cold pack system with work on comfort bags, etc. The food preserved on these occasions will go to a worthy home mothered by the W. C. T. U.

Membership. In response to the appeal of the National W. C. T. U. president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, the W. C. T. U. engaged in a concerted membership drive on September 12. If any local union found it impossible to arrange for special work on September 12, it is not too late to put it into effect. In the words of our honored and beloved National W. C. T. U. president: "With National Constitutional Prohibition in sight the W. C. T. U. division of the united temperance forces must continue to add largely to its numerical strength and its spiritual working force. We need thousands of additional members to help push regular constructive work and our comprehensive war service plans for soldiers and sailors."

drink. That's the attitude you folks take. We put up the liquor; a man can take it or leave it alone. If a fellow finds he goes too far, it's up to him to stop. If he can't do that he's poor stuff, and I say let him drink and kill himself off—the sooner the better. That's the way I reason. A man's free in this country. He's got the liberty of doing as he pleases. Nobody's driving him in with a club and pouring the drink down his throat."

Miss Julia laughed. There was no use discussing the question. "You might have a complete change of heart if your Jim took to it or your little girl—Marie did you call her—should marry a man who drinks to excess. We see things at a different angle as they draw nearer home."

"A gentleman should be able to take a glass of something and then stop. He shouldn't let himself drink too much. I've been around liquor all my life—me and my brothers—and I defy anybody to say he ever saw us with too much aboard."

"Ever hear about the old darkey fishing?" she asked. "Some darkey boys used to catch fish in a stream down near the James river in Virginia where I visited now and then. They soaked corn in moonshine whisky and dropped it in the pool and the fish would get tipsy and the boys would reach down and take them in with their hands. All except one. A big fellow used to come up, fill himself with the corn day after day and then swim away. One day the boys told old Isaac, who did odd jobs about the place, like toting wood and water, about the fish. He watched for a time and then came back to the kitchen disgusted. 'Them fool boys. Wastin' their time on a mullet fish. Ye can't get no mullet fish drunk. It hain't got no brains.'"

"That's one on me, Miss Julla," Jim Hollimon haw-hawed.

"That's why I told it," she said and walked away.

A week passed. The town was filled with excitement. It was "Old Home Week," when old residents came back to greet old friends. There were street carnivals and fakers. The saloons were open all hours regardless of law, and drunken men and boys staggered about the street.

At the extreme end of town was a wedding among foreigners. The ceremony had taken place in the church in the morning, but the feasting, dancing and drinking continued until evening.

There were some gay young bloods among the American youths who joined the wedding party for the pure sport of the thing and to share in the cheer of drink and meat.

The gay time went on. The moving picture shows were crowded. They ran all afternoon and until midnight. It was ten o'clock when suddenly a film in the "Nittany" was shut off and the manager came to the front of the stage.

"Is there in this house a little girl called Helene Hollimon? If there is, she is wanted at the entrance door." There was no response, no movement as if one were leaving. The man began again in a louder voice which echoed through the place: "Is there a little girl here called Helene Hollimon? If there is she is to go at once to the entrance door."

No one moved. There was quiet a moment, and then the pictures were continued. From place to place the call went. Every public place heard the demand that if the child were present she should come forth, for she was wanted at once.

Julia Bateman hurried from one of the picture shows. Jim Hollimon, the father, was standing outside. "Has there been some accident—some trouble at your home?" she asked.

"No; I'm concerned about my little girl. She's running about somewhere, and it's almost ten o'clock. It isn't safe with the streets full of drunken men and rowdies."

"She may be at the home of her girl friends," suggested Miss Julia. "Children have no idea of time when they're enjoying themselves."

"No; we've gone to the houses of all the little girls she plays with. They're all home. There was a wedding among the paddies down town. Helene sits near one of the girls in school and she went down right after dinner to see the bride and get a piece of cake. You know how kids are, Miss Julia."

She nodded. It was right and proper that any girl should want to see the bride and to eat bride's cake.

"But she left there about five. The folks went off on that four-thirty train. I went down there—I forget their names—but she went off about five. Several people saw her run out the back way, through a sort of shed and up the alley, and she called back that she'd have to get home for supper."

"She stopped in somewhere and the people have invited her to eat."

"That may be, but her mother never lets her go around like that. Of course, I know nothing could hurt her right here in town but I don't like the looks of a little girl on the street alone."

He moved away. Miss Julia and her woman companion turned toward home. They went through the gay streets, so crowded that one had to push his way, and then down into the residence avenue where by contrast all was still.

As they came near the street by the river they saw a man stumbling about.

"Wait until we see who it is," said Miss Julia. "With all these strangers in town—"

"It's only Micky," was the response. Thus reassured, Julia moved on. Micky was a character about town. It was said that his mother, a fine woman of great spiritual and intellectual gifts, had, before Micky had been born, been so mistreated by her husband that the child, conceived in drunkenness and cursed through all his pre-natal life, had come into the world just a little queer. But he had been a good boy, harmless, speaking to everyone, and bothering none. He provided for himself the necessities of life, in summer mowing lawns or tending gardens and in winter looking after furnaces and cleaning walks, now and then taking a glass of liquor, but no more.

He touched his hat and bade them good-evening. To their surprise he paused in the center of the walk so that they could not pass. He reached forward and seized Miss Julia by the lace which trimmed her waist. She caught a whiff of his breath. She saw the shifting and rolling of his eyes. Micky was drunk—dead drunk. He stumbled and stammered as he tried to talk. "Say, Miss Julia, I was down to that wedding. They treated me like a boss. My, such things to eat and drink; all you wanted."

"Yes, yes, Micky, I suppose it was very nice, but I must go on. Good night, Micky."

"But I was wantin' to tell you. That little girl was there. I saw her there. They made her drink some wine. She was there, all right, Miss Julia. I saw her sitting right by the kitchen door and then they made her drink more, and she laughed and we all laughed, and then we laughed until we cried, Miss Julia."

"Yes, yes. Good night, Micky." She tried to loosen his fingers from her waist, but he seized her not ungently by the wrist. "Then she went out of the door and down the walk. Our laughing frightened her, Miss Julia. She wanted to run home. She was a runnin', too, for to be honest, Miss Julia, there was some high times in doors; all the men drunk as gang bosses. But she didn't go up the avenue. She didn't go home."

He was maudlin. He had a drunken leer that was sickening.

"Where did she go?" asked Miss Julia.

"Only the devil and the river knows." He loosened his hold on her hand as he added, "And they hain't going to tell." He hiccoughed, tried to laugh and then reeled away.

"Poor Micky! Drunk," said her companion.

"I'd been afraid if I had been alone. He acted queer. Lack of brains and a supply of whisky don't seem to be a very good combination."

From afar off, in the distant square, could be heard the sound of the calliope and the voice of the barker who made known the attraction within his tent. Near by lay the river whose swollen waters, yellow and brown in the sunlight, now moved like a mass of shadows, somber and spectral. The quiet of the bank and beach and the flow of the river hovered like a bird of ill omen about them.

"I shall hurry home and go straight to bed. Poor Micky has made me nervous," said Miss Julia.

"You are not afraid?"

"No; only nervous. What is there to be afraid of. Poor Micky has made me heartsick. Poor fellow. The news about the little Hollimon girl, too, has disturbed me."

"I don't doubt that she's home and in bed by this time."

"I suppose so. Children of that age become so interested in performances that they forget everything, even going home to eat."

BIG DRY VICTORY FOR MINNESOTA

BESSIE LATHE SCOVELL

St. Louis county voted September 10, by a 3,000 majority, to banish saloons from its territory, the law to go into effect March 25, 1918. Duluth, a lake port of about 80,000 population, situated in St. Louis county, went dry in July, while Hibbing, one of its large mining towns, is already dry through Indian treaty provisions.

The Minneapolis district W. C. T. U. is making preparations to entertain the state convention, September 26-28. Miss Anna A. Gordon, National president, and Mr. Daniel A. Poling will be the convention speakers. Owing to war conditions the program will be shorter than usual. A patriotic hour, state constitutional prohibition and campaign plans are to be three big features.

Miss Rozette Hendrix, president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., is a member of the advisory board of the Minnesota division of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense and vice-chairman of the Fifth Congressional district. Mrs. Della R. Mandigo, state treasurer, is also a member of the advisory board.

Four hundred housewives have been distributed at Fort Snelling by the state W. C. T. U., while hundreds more have been given out by local unions in the state directly to the boys going from their home towns.

PATRIOTIC SERVICE PROGRAM OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA W. C. T. U.

Relief department. San Diego county W. C. T. U. has adopted three French orphans.

At the recent state convention of our Young People's Branch it was voted to provide one hospital electric fan and before the convention closed the money was all subscribed.

The call for contributions to the National Ambulance fund met with generous response and the state was able to more than double its apportionment. The white ribboners of Kern county propose to raise the money for a "Kern County W. C. T. U. Ambulance."

Many telegrams to Congress, asking for national prohibition as a war measure, were sent by the unions. Response has been made to every appeal of our National president.

Future bulletins will give plans which are now under consideration for more extended patriotic service. The next step is to secure the co-operation of the women of the churches and to open the way for a request for financial aid.

The state W. C. T. U. vice-president, Mrs. Eva C. Wheeler, has responded to calls for public demonstrations of our war-service work. Her comfort bag poem, which she recites while she exhibits the bag and its contents, gives special charm to the work. As director of the comfort bag shop and as state corresponding secretary, Mrs. Kara S. Root is rendering invaluable service to the state.

At the recent state executive committee meeting it was decided to inaugurate a patriotic membership campaign to continue throughout the year and to put into operation the plans of the National W. C. T. U.

ALCOHOL

ITS RELATION TO HUMAN EFFICIENCY and LONGEVITY

By Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk

Medical Director of the Life Extension Institute, and author, with Professor Irving Fisher, of "How to Live." Revised and criticized by the Members of the Hygiene Reference Board

An absorbingly interesting study of alcohol and its effects upon humanity which should be read with profound attention at this time, when the evidence that society is paying a heavy bill for its indulgence in stimulants can no longer be disregarded by thinking men and women. The author examines the question from the point of view of life insurance statistics, of laboratory tests, of the clinic, and of the sick room, and in other ways, and gives it as his cumulative judgment that alcohol is a destructive force, wholly evil in its total effects.

Old Mr. Barleycorn departed from our midst September 8. Overfeeding is what ailed the old codger. He would insist upon devouring too much corn. I Can Brighten Your Life!

What would it be worth to have health—untiring energy, buoyant spirits, perfect figure, clear complexion and the right weight for one of your stature?

Think how it would brighten your life; enable you to work without fatigue; how your capacity for enjoyment would be multiplied; and what charm it would add to your personality!

This is my life work. I have done these very things for 80,000 other women, many of whom were weak, frail, depressed and discouraged. I have made them oh, so well! Leading physicians endorse my methods. Their wives and daughters are my pupils. Treatment in your own home—private and confidential.

Does it sound "too good to be true?" Tell me your difficulties and I will tell you, without cost, how you can overcome them — without drugs; without great expense or delay. I have had a wonderful experience and I want to tell you about it.

DO YOU WANT to "do your bit" intelligently as an individual?

DO YOU WANT to know how your union can help the nation?

DO YOU WANT to have interesting and helpful meetings?

DO YOU WANT your union to have a place on the Honor Roll as fulfilling all requirements?

THE ANSWER to each of these questions is the same—TAKE THE UNION SIGNAL. It will help you in all these and many other ways.

WHY NOT "CAN" KNOWLEDGE?

Dear friends, women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Alabama, will you take THE UNION SIGNAL? If each union would send one subscriber we would more than double the number asked, which is at least one-fourth our membership. Sisters, let us try for it. In this day of warm patriotism are we going to stand by our official organ? The women of the W. C. T. U. are patriotic, have always been, are now, showing it by their splendid work for the soldiers and sailors. Patriotism is the life of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. From every part of the state we hear of the women "canning" everything. While we are doing so much canning in other directions, let us "can" some knowledge for our prohibition work by reading THE UNION SIGNAL. We should know what our own organization is doing and what others are doing for national prohibition. We are sure to win. Let us rally around our colors and take THE UNION SIGNAL.

PROF. JOHN A. NICHOLLS TO GIVE SIX MONTHS' SERVICE IN EDUCATIONAL CAMPAIGN IN GREAT BRITAIN

The United Temperance Forces of Great Britain have made arrangements for a national educational prohibition campaign. A joint committee has been appointed representing the United Kingdom Alliance, the National British Women's Temperance Association, and the National Temperance Federation, which includes the Grand Lodges of the Independent Order Good Templars of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales. A large number of provincial conferences and demonstrations will be held throughout the United Kingdom, and beginning March 20, great meetings in London, followed by a national conference. Speakers will be present from Russia, Canada, and the United States. In all, twenty-six conferences and over 300 meetings will be held, in addition to special meetings in Scotland and Ireland. At the earnest request of the joint committee, Prof. John A. Nicholls will spend six months in the work there, opening the campaign in Scotland on October 1, and also taking part in the annual meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance at Manchester, October 11-18. A great inaugural reception will be held in Newcastle-on-Tyne on October 19. In addition to the services of Prof. John A. Nicholls, it is expected that Mr. Daniel A. Poling, Dr. Charles Sheldon, and other well known speakers from the United States will take part later in the campaign. It will be purely educational and the whole plan is the most comprehensive ever undertaken by the temperance forces of Great Britain.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

CONGRESS MAKING PREPARATIONS TO ADJOURN—REPRESENTATIVE HERSEY OF MAINE DEFENDS SUFFRAGE—STATUS OF PROHIBITION FOR HAWAII

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

The War Credits bill for the enormous sum of $11,500,000,000 passed the Senate on Tuesday without a dissenting vote. This is the largest War Credits bill in the world's history. The Senate has been steadily at work for weeks on these most important measures, while the House, having been more expeditious, has by "spells" been in recess. Now that these bills are in conference to adjust the differences between Senate and House, the Senate has taken a breathing spell. Leaders of both houses are making tentative plans for an adjournment early in October. The Soldiers' and Sailors' insurance bill must be passed at this session, to be in accord with the desire of President Wilson. A sub-committee in the Senate is holding hearings on the measure, and it is expected it will pass without any unnecessary delay.

So far as is known, the President has no further new legislation to present, and is understood to be quite ready for Congress to "go home." This is the tenth month of this extra session, and in many ways has been nerve-racking, for in a large sense the destiny of the world has been in the hands of these men. As week after week, during the heated term, I have watched them take their places with eagerness and earnest, true-hearted purpose, realizing fully the great responsibility resting upon them, my prayers have gone to heaven in their behalf. More and more must this Christian nation remember these men before Almighty God, and not only at public service, but in the "closet," and at the "family altar," should our President, also, and his advisers be kept before the Lord God of our Fathers, that wisdom from above may be given them.

Representative Hersey of Maine Defends Suffrage.

Saturday, September 15, Representative I. G. Hersey of Maine addressed the House in explanation of the defeat of suffrage in his state. He said he was in the Pine Tree state just before election day, and found that men who had previously favored suffrage declared they intended voting against it as a "rebuke to those women who have placed upon their banners the words, 'Kaiser Wilson,' and flaunted them at the gates of the White House." He then went on to say, "While I believe they are brave and courageous, they are repelling the votes of the very men who can help them win their cause. I can but compare them and their sentiments with those of that matchless woman that Illinois so honored by placing her statue in this Capitol, Miss Frances E. Willard. On the pedestal are the words of this woman, when a thousand men hung on her lips. Let me read them:

> "'Ah, it is women who have given the costliest hostages to fortune. Into the battle of life they have sent their best beloved with fearful odds against them. Oh, by the dangers they have dared, by the hours of patient watching over beds where helpless children lay, by the incense of ten thousand prayers wafted from their gentle lips to heaven, I charge you give them power to protect along life's treacherous highway those whom they have so loved.'

"This is not the death of woman suffrage; it will triumph in days to come. Today a few misguided women, 'with hands unwise, close all the gates to Paradise.' Tomorrow, woman, free, unfettered, and enfranchised, will pass in triumph through those gates and enter into her rightful kingdom, there to go out no more forever." This address was received with great applause. It would be a pleasant surprise, I am sure, to Mr. Hersey to receive the thanks of those who appreciate these prophetic words.

Post Office Department Drives Another Nail In John Barleycorn's Coffin

The Post Office department has driven another nail in John Barleycorn's coffin, by barring from the mails in dry territory any advertisement of a saloon, barroom or buffet, or any other place where intoxicating liquors may be procured. However, liquor propaganda setting forth the advantages of liquor generally, or which argue pro and con on prohibition, but do not advertise intoxicating brands, may enter dry territory.

President Wilson this week issued a proclamation calling upon the school children of the nation to do their part in the war by joining the Junior Red Cross to assist in the mercy work of the senior organization. The President says, "This organization will teach how to save in order that suffering children elsewhere may have the chance to live and will make possible the best work in the great cause of freedom we have pledged ourselves." Plans are now under way, in co-operation with the boards of education of various states, for launching membership campaigns. Schools are to be recruited as units with membership fees of twenty-five cents for each pupil. The juniors will aid in the making of the simpler articles and supplies needed in the hospitals abroad.

NOW IS THE TIME!

An expression of opinion on national prohibition should be secured from the many conferences, conventions, and synods which meet this autumn. They should be urged to pass resolutions favoring measures now pending in Congress, especially the submission by the House of the constitutional amendment already passed in the Senate by eight votes over a two-thirds majority. The six years amendment should be stricken out by the House. The Senate would doubtless concur.

A gold medal for being the greatest humanitarian in the world in 1916 was presented to President Wilson at the White House, September 20, by the Humanitarian Cult of New York City.

The superintendent of schools of the District of Columbia states that some part of President Wilson's state papers may form a part of the curriculum of the high schools, and possibly of the graded schools, also. It is generally recognized that Mr. Wilson's writings are models of English composition, but just what parts will be used has not yet been decided. Some of his war papers are certain to be a part of the course.

Rumor That Government Will Take Canned Goods From Families Baseless

Despite denials already sent out, a baseless rumor that the government intends to take canned and dried foods from farms and families is traveling so fast that officials here are beginning to suspect a deliberate propaganda to hamper food conservation. As a result, the United States Department of Agriculture has put a denial in the hands of every agent with the request that he give it the widest publicity possible and widespread local publication. A telegram received by the department from a Florida editor indicates that the rumor has traveled to the extreme south. The government has never contemplated the seizure of canned goods.

Dr. J. H. Wadman of Honolulu, Hawaii, who is in Washington, in the interest of prohibition for the islands, tells me that the campaign for Congressional enactment to banish the liquor evil from the fair shores of Hawaii is still in progress. Unfortunately, owing to the rigid rules obtaining in the House which prohibit the consideration and report of any legislation by committees of that body other than distinctively war and revenue measures, it has been impossible to secure action on the bill during the present session, although much effective work along lines of publicity and personal appeal, preparing the way for the regular session in December, has been done by those who stand as sponsors for the measure.

In the Senate, where such rules are not so binding, while the committee in charge of the bill has not taken formal action yet considerable headway has been made in informal conferences. Senator Shafroth, the chairman, is deeply interested in the measure and last week introduced another bill, apart from the one now pending as a straight prohibition enactment, similar to that which has so wonderfully and effectively put the evil out of Porto Rico. This bill provides for a referendum in Hawaii, which our good people of the islands do not favor, owing principally to the attitude of their delegate in Congress, whose sympathies are not wholly with the movement and whose influence with the native electors seems to be paramount. Moreover, our friends in Hawaii take the position that since Congress permitted the evil to enter the islands at the time of annexation, the problem of its removal is a Congressional one and not territorial. The responsibility rests upon the Federal government.

Mr. Shafroth states that his introduction of the new bill in no way binds the hands of the committee. He only meant to "speed up" the measure and prepare the way for quick, definite action in the early days of the December session.

While a motley gathering of boatmen and passersby looked on, the police of the harbor precinct of Washington, Wednesday afternoon poured into the Potomac river ten gallons of whisky and thirty cases of beer, confiscated in "speakeasies" in raids during the past year. Firemen from the fire-boat assisted in the annual ceremony, which, in view of the approach of prohibition, took on to many the aspect of a real burial. Into the river after the liquor went a box of pistols and razors, relics of many a bar-room quarrel. The confiscated weapons were followed into the sea by a bushel sack of playing cards and poker chips, taken in gambling raids. The dean of the harbor precinct, who has witnessed demon rum meet a similar fate many times, expressed the belief that there was not as much alcohol as usual destroyed this year.

MINNESOTA EX-LIQUOR DEALERS ORGANIZE FOR PROHIBITION

BESSIE LATHE SCOVELL

In the county option contest in St. Louis county, which terminated successfully September 10, with a majority vote of 3,619, there was created one of the most unique organizations yet known—the Ex-Liquor Dealers and Employes Dry League. Its president is G. C. Gardner, for many years a member of the firm, Gardner Bros., wine house at 113 W. First St., Duluth; its secretary, P. A. Lund, for twenty years a bartender, his service ending when Duluth went dry last July. Those who until recently have been employed in the various branches of the liquor business are eligible to membership in the society.

This league of former liquor men took a most active part in the public speaking and paid advertising campaign conducted in connection with the county battle. September 8, two days before the election, it ran in the Duluth News Tribune the following display advertisement:

PAID ADVERTISEMENT

Inserted by Ex-Liquor Dealers and Employes Dry League. Amount to be paid, $20.16.

WE

We have had a chance to see the liquor business from the inside and from the outside and we know that it is no good either from the standpoint of the liquor drinker or the liquor seller.

We are glad that saloons have been banished from Duluth and we hope to see conditions further improved by cleaning the saloons out of the entire county. Even the Range saloonkeepers will be glad when the county goes dry.

ASK US

Ex-liquor Dealers and Employes Dry League

By GEORGE C. GARDNER, President.
P. A. LUND, Secretary.

VOTE "YES" ON MONDAY

The dry campaign closed with big meetings in all parts of the county. West End (Duluth) had two great gatherings. Father S. A. Iclek, pastor of St. Mary's Polish Catholic church, and George C. Gardner, president of the Ex-liquor Dealers and Employes Dry League, both spoke in the interests of prohibition, undoubtedly helping greatly to bring about the triumph recorded.

When asked as to the purpose of the Ex-Liquor Dealers and Employes Dry League, President Gardner said: "The move is not a new one. It has been contemplated for some time. Not a few of the men formerly engaged in the liquor business have been working for county option. There was sufficient reason for organizing so that more could be accomplished. We have seen the liquor business from the inside and our move in rallying with the dry forces comes as a result of our knowledge of the conditions as we have seen them under both the dry and wet régime. It is probable that the new organization will be permanent. Our membership is growing rapidly and we do not intend to let our activities stop with the county election. We expect to play a part in the state campaign. Liquor is detrimental to the man who drinks it and the man who sells it."

Drunkenness Principal Cause of Delay in Coal Delivery

Drunkenness causes more delay in the shipment and handling of coal along the New England water front than any other single factor. This fact was brought to light at a recent conference in the State House, Boston, between officials of the United States Shipping Board, the Massachusetts Public Safety Committee and owners of coal barges and tugs, says the Christian Science Monitor. Practically every address emphasized this point, some of the speakers explaining that labor trouble was itself due to intoxication. These statements occasioned the query, "Why not try national prohibition," by Raymond B. Stevens, vice-president of the United States Shipping Board, who presided at the meeting.

Russian Villages Born Anew

The Russian Ministry of Finance recently published a volume in Petrograd under the title, "Influence of the War on Some Aspects in the Economic Life of Russia." From one division of the volume, "The Effect of the Stoppage of the Sale of Vodka on the Life of the Masses and on the Productivity of Their Labor," the following brief extract is taken:

"Religiosity and church-going have increased, as a result of soberness; Sunday schools, libraries, people's houses are more assiduously frequented; the circulation of newspapers, reviews and books has grown, and an interest is evident in lecture courses and public addresses, as well as a tendency to organize co-operative institutions; the modes of recreation and relaxation have become more rational. Saloons are replaced by teahouses and eating-houses, sometimes by moving picture theaters which are very popular now even in the remotest villages. There has been an improvement in domestic relations. The family and its welfare are strengthened. The tears of wives, children, and mothers have died out—the members of the family quietly wait at home for their provider, without hiding in the corners for fear of quarrels and blows, as in former days. (Report of the Permanent Court of Exchequer.) The position of the woman in the peasant family has improved. In short, in the words of the peasants themselves the village is born anew and people have begun to live in a godly fashion. (Report of a tax inspector, government of Saratov.)"

"Come With Me to the Hospitals," Says Dr. Haven Emerson, New York City's Commissioner of Health

Busy as is the commissioner of health of New York City, he takes time to answer some of the anti-prohibition fallacies that appear in the New York papers. Recently he replied as follows to an editorial in the New York Times:

"In your editorial opposition to the pending proposals for prohibition, have you not failed to consider how much more the country loses economically from the use of alcohol than the government gains from the excise taxes?

"For every dollar the federal government collects in liquor taxes, the local taxpayers of the country spend $10 to repair the damage done by liquor. Is it the federal government that maintains the alcoholic wards at Bellevue hospital, with its 8,000 admissions a year, or supports the inebriate farm at Warwick, pays the costs of the police, the courts, the prisons and asylums or poor farms, where are users of alcoholic beverages, wine and whisky, and the incompetents and derelicts due to them are cared for at public expense?

"Come with me to the hospitals and the clinics, visit the homes of the poor, and see where the public must spend its money to rescue the remnants that liquor has left. Can you not see that it is worth a greater sacrifice than $500,000,000 a year to liberate a country from the bondage of the alcohol habit? There is no need to drag ethics into the matter. It is a matter of lives, brains, health, bread and dollars and our promises due to our allies. Nothing so practical, nothing so patriotic, nothing so logical can be done by this country now as to face the issue in a manly way. As Lloyd George said, 'England is fighting Germany, Austria and drink.' Let us finish the drink first, and free ourselves forever from the most habit-forming of drugs, and then go ahead and show our allies our effectiveness, our self-control as only a non-alcoholized country can. The world has never seen a non-alcoholized nation in war. Alcoholic beverages neither create strength nor maintain health. We can do without them and the tax they bring us, that health may prevail."

LICENSE MAYOR OF ASBURY PARK STOPS W. C. T. U. FLOAT

Over forty years ago Asbury Park, N. J., was founded by the Hon. James A. Bradley as a temperance town, and to this fact is due, in large measure, its remarkable growth and prosperity as a seashore resort. Mayor C. E. F. Hetrick and certain commissioners now desire to make it a license city and are leaving no stone unturned to accomplish their purpose. For more than twenty years a baby parade has been held annually in the city, attracting great crowds from all parts of the state. At first the parade was merely what the name suggests, but of late the infants participating in it have been far outnumbered by adults.

In view of the fact that the mayor and commissioners were about to authorize a special election to decide the license question the Woman's Christian Temperance Union secured permission to enter in the parade a float, a large boat on wheels, in which rode sixty-four children. Covered with white cheesecloth and decorated liberally with flags and pennants, the effect produced by the float was striking. Twelve-foot signs, one on each side, bore the words, "Uncle Sam has Dry-Cleaned Twenty-Six States, We want New Jersey Dry-Cleaned," and "W. C. T. U. Recruits, Please Vote to Protect Us from the Liquor Traffic." Banners proclaimed the following slogans: "Make Asbury Park Safe for Us," "Beer and Whisky, They're a Curse, We Drink Water, Safety First," "Prohibition Slows up Crime, Speeds up Business," "We'll Help Make the Map all White." The float was drawn by a pair of beautiful horses with harness draped in white and decorated with small flags in generous profusion. As the W. C. T. U. sentiment-maker stood awaiting its turn to fall into line, a hireling of Mayor Hetrick shouted in a brusque, discourteous manner, "Take those signs off or get out of the parade." Knowing that he was overstepping his authority, the committee paid no heed, and the float was lustily cheered as it made its way along. When it came within view of the mayor, who was seated on the grand stand, he ordered a rope stretched across the street in front of the horses and stationed three policemen to guard the float to insure its remaining stationary.

Crowds gathered and of course asked the cause of the special police protection. When it was found that the mayor of a prohibition city objected to a few prohibition facts being presented to the public gaze, "the laugh was on him." The comments on the float would fill a book. "Your facts are all right," said one, "but you need a new mayor." "You deserve first prize for your decorations and second for your spunk," said another. "A prohibition town plus a rum mayor is a bad combination," said a third. The papers the next morning gave the prohibition float big headlines. Two days afterward with its "objectionable" signs intact, it was placed on a prominent street corner which an automobile parade was to pass, and later it was displayed on private property of Hon. James A. Bradley in the business section.

Because of the action of the mayor the float attracted much more attention than it would have done had it been allowed to proceed in the parade, and the signs were read by perhaps three times as many people. Moreover, the mayor was shown up in a true light, for many people think it naturally follows that a prohibition city has a prohibition mayor.

The fight has just begun. The Rev. John Goorley of the Ballard Memorial M. E. church, is actively engaged in the campaign, which bids fair to be victorious if the temperance forces as a unit are wholehearted in their efforts.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE A COMMONPLACE IN THE PROGRESSIVE WEST

MARGARET B. PLATT

Concerning the suffrage defeat in Maine the following editorial comment in the Seattle Daily Times is both interesting and encouraging:

"The conservative East and the ultra-conservative South will be the last to grant the ballot to women. The suffragists will be agitating in these sections years after feminine participation in elections has become a commonplace throughout the Middle West and the Far West.

"The reverse sustained by the women in New England yesterday merely was an incident in their general campaign. Every political fight in which this question figures as the leading issue is regarded by the suffragists as so much advertising for the 'cause' and, because it leads to a general discussion of the subject, is believed by them to bring the ultimate triumph of this principle so much nearer."

In the minds of those who, although resident in suffrage states and having ample opportunity for observation, fail to realize any of the direful results prophesied as sure to follow "women's votin'," there rises the query, why the men of Maine, or any other state in this day and age, should so fear to invest their mothers, wives and daughters with the same political privileges they themselves enjoy? Can it be possible that their long participation in political affairs has made them in their own estimation less honorable, true and just—a fate from which they fervently desire to guard their women, or is the voting privilege a thing of such dignity and power, so broadening and uplifting to those who possess it, that they selfishly desire to bar their universal "better half" from a share in its beneficent influence? Either assumption reflects no credit upon the male voter—but—the query remains unanswered.

One would really like to fathom the mind process by which any man of average intelligence and decency can convince himself that his women folk are not as well qualified as he to share in the privileges, duties and responsibilities of government. True, women have the privilege of paying taxes with no expression of opinion as to how the money shall be used, they may be governed by men whom they have had no opportunity to elect or defeat, and punished by laws which they have had no voice in making. But the forefathers of these women rebelled against taxation without representation, and fought and died for the liberty now denied their daughters.

Yet in these crucial days, the like of which the world has never seen, these same women are loyally supporting their government by every means which woman's ingenuity can devise and every ounce of labor that mind or body can give, and as to the gift of their sons for their country's defense, who can measure the value of such sacrifices or fathom the grief of the mother's soul?

There are certain classes of whom we may inevitably expect bitter and unreasoning opposition to equal suffrage. But we would not like to think such representative of the average "down easterner," possessed of home and family ties. Evidently the spirit of true democracy no longer thrives spontaneous in eastern soil. In the sturdy and progressive West its roots take deep hold and find nurture and its seeds will some time find rootage and bear right fruit, even among the bleak New England hills, and that which is now a commonplace in a few states will become in all states one of their crowning glories.

WHO'D GO BACK NOW TO SINGLE SUFFRAGE?

SPOKANE CHRONICLE SCOUTS IDEA THAT THE WEST WOULD ABANDON WOMAN SUFFRAGE

The darkest East seeks light. Out from imperial New York, center of self-satisfaction for the universe, comes a plea for facts, for opinions, for advice from the rude, crude West.

"What has been the worth of the woman's vote on political, social and community life in the state of Washington? Has it increased the cost of elections? Do they vote in proportion to the men? For what specific reforms have the direct vote and influence of the women been responsible? Would you go back to male suffrage again if you had the chance?"

Would we go back? Why?

Aren't trading out automobiles for ox-carts out here in Washington, are we? Or tearing up the railways to put in jinrikishas? Or smashing the telephones to make way for the good old smoke signals and waving blankets of Siwash days?

Going back? After we have seen the weird bugaboos that used to scare us change to sheets and pumpkins? After we have waited in vain for six years to see one divorce caused by suffrage; one starving husband blaming it for a neglected household; one poor baby wailing at home while mother carries a torch for Charles and Charley or Woodrow and Tom? Going back, after seeing minds broadened, patriotism strengthened, reforms brought through by woman's kindling interest in the government that shelters herself, her sisters and her children? Back—after these new voters have scared bevies of low politicians into honest work and helped to dump dozens of foolish schemes on the scrap heap? After their ballots—the ballots of these blessed Washington women—have driven out the saloons, routed the bootleggers and made divekeepers, dive landlords and dive grafters curse the day when the wives and mothers walked up to the ballot box?

Do elections cost more? Yes; but only because more votes must be counted. Do women vote in proportion to the men? Not yet; perhaps three women in five now, but those three votes are well worth while. Are they crazy for office? In six years possibly one woman in a hundred has come before the voters as a candidate. Their effect on political life? For cleaner men in office; for keener interest in the public schools; for a living wall of support behind every clearcut moral issue; for better parks and playgrounds; for speedier, more effective public aid to the poor, the sick, the aged.

Going back? Watch us, New York. Washington is going — going straight ahead.

HOW ABOUT KANSAS?

IS PROHIBITION A FARCE IN THE SUNFLOWER STATE?

Useless as the effort would appear to be, the liquor publicity bureaus are still endeavoring to make the public believe that the prohibitory law is not enforced in Kansas. No less a personage than Congressman Meeker made a declaration to that effect recently in the House of Representatives. When the question of the submission of the federal prohibition amendment was being discussed in the United States Senate some weeks ago, Senator Thompson took occasion to produce a little documentary evidence on the subject of the enforcement of Kansas' prohibition law that ought to forever put a quietus on the false statement of Congressman Meeker and other liquorites. Senator Thompson said he had written to mayors, police judges and county officers in every county in the state, inquiring as to their experience with prohibition, addressing them in the following words:

"My Dear Sir: As you have perhaps observed, the old question as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure or actually prohibits—thereby lessening drunkenness and crime and resulting morally and economically advantageous to our people—has again been raised in our prohibition fight in the Nation.

"As one of the law-enforcing officers of the state, I would be glad to have your experience, observation, and views on these propositions by early mail, with authority to use the same in the Senate should it become important to answer the misrepresentations usually made by the opposition.

"Thanking you in advance for your trouble, I remain, with best wishes,

"Sincerely and cordially,

"Wm. H. Thompson."

Kansas Wants Nation-wide Prohibition

Senator Thompson received more than one hundred replies, coming from nearly every county in the state. These letters, which were reproduced in full in the Congressional Record, all agree that prohibition has been of inestimable value to the state, and that nation-wide prohibition is the next logical step.

We quote briefly from a few of the replies:

"When the prohibitory law was first brought before the voters of Kansas I voted against its adoption," says the police judge of Iola, Mr. W. L. Bartels. "But in the years since its adoption I have carefully observed its workings and effects and have become convinced that it has been so beneficial to the state, its citizenship, and business that I have become and now am a staunch supporter of prohibition, state and national.

"I believe the prohibitory law has decreased crime and pauperism in Kansas fully 95 per cent. During the last year an average of four cases of drunkenness per month has been brought in my court."

50 Per Cent of the Jails and Poorhouses Without an Inmate

Mr. J. J. Varner, mayor of Iola, says:

"Prohibition in Kansas has eliminated at least 90 per cent of drunkenness, crime, and poverty since its adoption. When you learn that 50 per cent of our jails and poorhouses have no inmates and compare this record with the states that permit the sale of intoxicants, you can very easily conclude that the reason is the presence of John Barleycorn in one state and freedom from it in the other."

From Barber county, located in the southwest section, the county attorney, Mr. Samuel Griffin, writes:

"The person who contends that prohibition in Kansas does not prohibit does not know either the conditions in Kansas now or what they were in the past. There are fewer paupers and more families who own their homes. Men and women are better dressed. They give better service to their employer; hence every line of business meets with better success under prohibition.

"P. S.—There should be national prohibition without doubt."

From Bourbon county, in the southeast section, the county attorney, Mr. James G. Sheppard, writes: "Prohibition in Kansas is a success in every possible way, and any person who says that it is not a great benefit to the state is either misinformed or willfully falsifying, and the same is true of any person who says that prohibition has injured the state in any possible way."

"You Never See a Young Man Drunk"

The sheriff of the county, Mr. J. W. Hartman, states: "You never see a young man drunk in Bourbon county; it is some old fellow who got the habit during saloon days that is drunk. As soon as these old fellows die there is going to be a marked change in the amount of drunkenness."

Hon. George C. McKnight, mayor of Hiawatha, states: "The law prohibits absolutely here in Hiawatha, Kans. During the past year there have been 27 arrests for drunkenness: 26 of these were persons returning from across the line in Missouri or Nebraska. The only liquor they brought home with them was in their stomachs. These parties were promptly arrested and placed in jail. One arrest was for drunkenness or sickness from taking too much Hostetter's bitters. 'Bootlegging' is unknown here in Hiawatha and has been for several years. In September a circus visited our city, and on that day over 20,000 people were in town. Not a single case of drunkenness was reported to the police, and we have not heard that a single drunken person was seen. The prosperity of our city is beyond anything ever known here. Thirty thousands dollars' worth of city 4 per cent bonds sold last month for a premium, and that to local purchasers."

Enforcement a Problem in Border Counties

The county attorney of Brown county, Mr. W. E. Archer, has this to say:

"The prohibition laws of Kansas are not a failure; they do prohibit. Brown county is a border county, 40 miles from Missouri, and 19 miles from Nebraska, both wet states and the chief source of whatever trouble we have in enforcing the law. Nebraska is already dry and Missouri will come next, and when the liquor dealers and bootleggers are driven out of these states, there will be little or no trouble in enforcing the liquor law in Brown county.

"Kansas would no more think of giving up its prohibitory liquor law than it would its public school system or the right of the people to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience."

Railroad Shop Town Averages Only Three Arrests a Month

Hon. J. F. Bailey, mayor of the city of Horton, a railroad town of 4,500 people, says:

"I have been a resident of the city for about thirty years and I want to say prohibition is not a failure in Kansas but a grand success. As you know, Horton has a population of about 4,500 and is a railroad shop town, and I can truthfully say it is seldom one sees a drunken man on the streets, and that is usually some one that comes in on the train from some point in Missouri. There is very little crime committed in our city, and I don't think we average three arrests per month, and our city jail is empty most of the time."

Hon. G. W. Stinson, mayor of Eldorado, Butler county, in the heart of the new oil field, which is destined to be the most productive oil field in the world, says:

"I feel that I am able to say with authority that were it not for the fact that we have in effect a thoroughly dependable liquor law, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in this state, it would be difficult, indeed, to maintain order. As it is, however, even under these apparently adverse conditions, the authorities are enabled to maintain the usual good order with comparative ease."

The mayor of Sedan, in Chautauqua county, Hon. Norman L. Hay, writes:

"We have little drunkenness. If you will give us a law making it necessary for those that hold a government license to sell intoxicating liquors to come out in the open, or better still, have the government refuse to license them to sell it, we will make a state law making the point of delivery the point or place of sale, and then we will be able to enforce the law with little or no effort. This administration and the people of Sedan stand for the enforcement of the prohibitory law."

Pittsburg, one of the largest cities on the eastern border, has had considerable trouble with law enforcement. The chief of police, Hon. Roll Rakestraw, after dealing with the difficulties experienced on account of being able to buy liquor just across the line, says:

Not a Vacant Business Building in Town

"But notwithstanding all this, our city is in a much better condition than it was twelve years ago. Then we had in the neighborhood of 28 saloons running open in our town, which then had a population of about 12,000. When the order was given to close the saloons in Pittsburg it was rumored that Pittsburg would go dead and that business houses that were vacated by the saloons would remain empty; but, on the contrary, as fast as the buildings were vacated by the saloons they were immediately occupied by some legal business. And today our city has a population of 20,000, with no saloons and not an empty business building in town, and we have never had a lull or panic in business."

From Ellis county, located in the northwest section of the state, a letter from the mayor of Hays, Hon. H. W. Chittenden, states:

"I know of no law on our statutes which has a greater sanction by the people of this state than this law, and I do not suppose that anyone will contend that Kansas is a lawless place.

3,000 Population and Not a Drunkard

"The population of the city of Hays is about 3,000. Out of this number of people there is not one drunkard; in fact, we have no drunkards, paupers, or idlers, but our people are contented, happy, and prosperous. Nearly seven-eighths of them own their own homes and have money in the bank."

The sheriff of Ford county, Mr. C. W. Woolwine, says: "The people here are so well satisfied with it we will vote almost to a man and woman for national prohibition."

From Franklin county, the sheriff, Hon. Nick Johnson, at Ottawa, the county seat, states:

"To my mind, open saloons in Kansas would be a crime equal to taking the lives of our younger generation."

The district judge of this district, Hon. C. A. Smart, states:

"You can put it down as a settled fact, prohibition is here to stay. It is as firmly fixed in the minds of our people as the abolition of human slavery, and is no

IOWA GOES FORTH TO BATTLE

LORA S. LA MANCE, National W. C. T. U. Organizer

There has been considerable uneasiness at state prohibition headquarters about the election in Iowa. The leaders now are becoming more optimistic, for while Iowa has been a sleeping giant, it is rousing itself at last. Iowa is going dry!

The liquor forces are putting up a sly, foxy fight. They are trying to "hushaby" the daily press. They are doing no open talking or electioneering, but every string is being pulled and every possible wire laid. From various places in the state there was reported a revival of the old-time social evening. By and by it was discovered that the young people were not present and few women. The "party" people were staid, middle-aged, wet men, using the plea of a social gathering to slyly plan to reach every possible voter and quietly "fix" as many of them as possible. The liquor men plainly see that their only hope is to keep the temperance voter asleep.

In the Mississippi river towns rooms have been rented for two or three months. No renter appears. The rent receipt is made out in the name of Illinois men who live across the river. If their vote is challenged they intend to claim Iowa as their home because they hold rent receipts.

At first the dry people were over-sanguine. They thought the state could not be lost, but when some of the leaders were stirred up to investigate conditions they found plenty of voters who did not even know there was to be a special election on October 15. Now the dry leaders have inaugurated a veritable whirlwind campaign. Speakers are going night and day and auto caravans are to rush on telling hikes all over the rural district. The Iowa slogan is, "Get out every voter." Indifference, carelessness and over-confidence are the worst foes.

There is a splendid central campaign committee, with J. B. Weede of Des Moines as campaign manager. He is putting his soul into the work. Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, state W. C. T. U. president, is a "generalissimo." If the state goes dry it will be largely through her efforts. More than any other one person in the state she has broken up the fallow ground. County after county she has organized for the campaign. Whenever she slips away from the Des Moines headquarters for a day or two it means another county brought into line.

Miss Louise Hollister, National organizer, has been quite active in the state, and her work is highly spoken of. Mrs. Matilda Patterson, Iowa's National organizer, is planning auto trips to carry the war to the farmer.

The writer has been organizing counties as though that was all there was to work for. The Mississippi river counties are largely German. Some of these counties have had their dry men boycotted to the limit. Temperance women have been sneered at and children of dry parents jeered at. At Davenport the Rev. W. C. Blancke, a courageous Lutheran minister, has led the prohibition battle for years. A systematic campaign of blackmail and intimidation was set up. His plucky wife was insulted on her own door steps. A Davenport millionaire said he would not have suffered the abuse Dr. Blancke had for $100,000 in money. Dr. Blancke's courage bore fruit, however. Today he is the most esteemed man in the city and has been put in charge of the Davenport and Scott county campaigns. Fifty business men, many of them formerly on the other side, told the writer that they are now for prohibition. The doctor's splendid courage has inspired them and the workings of prohibition have convinced them that a live town is better off without saloons than with them.

Clinton, an important river town, put a manufacturer, Mr. M. L. Christian, at the head of the campaign, with a dozen judges, merchant princes and factory men behind him as an advisory board. A prominent land man is at the head of the campaign in Cedar Rapids and every man allied with him is a strong business man.

Jones county has exceptionally able men as leaders. Cedar county appointed a county seat merchant to head its campaign, with an advisory board to assist him. In Waverly, Dubuque, Des Moines, and Fort Dodge it is the same story—the men of big business are leading the campaign.

All the ministers are preaching prohibition sermons. Billy Sunday is expected. William Jennings Bryan and Richmond Pearson Hobson are to be brought in for the home stretch. Mr. W. G. Calderwood and Mr. Hinshaw have just reached the state, and with their enthusiasm and resourcefulness will awaken the last sleepers.

Grand old Iowa! October 15 will find the battle for constitutional prohibition won and the question forever banished from the politics of the state.

HOW ABOUT KANSAS?

longer a disputed question. It is a fixture in this state because our people have become thoroughly convinced that it is a paying investment; that is, that sober men are to be trusted in all stations in life rather than drunken men, and the situation resolves itself down to that proposition."

From Junction City, Geary county, where the present officers' training camp is located, Judge J. I. Kerr, police judge; Mr. M. D. Peeso, city marshal; and Mr. I. M. Platt, city attorney, state over their signatures:

"It has been the earnest endeavor of the officers at all times during the past ten years to enforce all laws, and especially the prohibitory liquor law. Naturally drunkenness has materially decreased, as have all other crimes. We have made an examination of the records and find that our police and district court records show a decrease in crime and prosecution for offenses of at least 500 per cent. This may seem large, but an examination of the records will bear us out."

From Mitchell county, city attorney of Beloit, a city of about 4,000, Hon. A. E. Jordan states:

Only One Murder Case in Twenty-five Years

"During the past twenty-five years we have had but one murder case in this county.

"For several terms of our district court we have had no criminal cases whatever. The present bar docket shows not a single criminal case.

"We scarcely average two cases a month in our police court, and some years have not averaged more than one a month.

"We have held public meetings, such as barbecues and the like, here in this town at which there were over 10,000 in attendance without having a single police court or a county criminal court case arising therefrom or in connection therewith.

"Our pauper list is almost nothing."

The sheriff of Wyandotte county, Mr. R. L. Hinch, of Kansas City, Kans., says:

"There was a time in Kansas when prohibition did not prohibit, but the day is gone, never to return. Whisky has been the downfall of millions of good people. The saloons were closed in Kansas City, Kans., about ten years ago. Kansas City, Kans., has prospered ever since; business rents commenced to increase when the saloons were closed here. There are no vacant business houses in Kansas City, Kans., and have not been since the saloons were closed, excepting some buildings that were erected in the resident district by brewery companies for the purpose of selling liquor in. At this time most of them are occupied."

Less Misery in Kansas than in One City of Missouri

From Wilson county, the mayor of the city of Fredonia, Hon. W. J. Moss, states:

"I am a native of Missouri, but have lived in Kansas for over thirty-six years, and anyone who says that prohibition in Kansas is a failure misrepresents the facts. There is not as much misery and crime caused by drunkenness in the entire state of Kansas as there is in one of the larger cities of Missouri. We have a few cases of chronic drunkenness and a small amount of bootlegging, but taken altogether it is not a drop in the bucket as compared with states where the open saloon is allowed."

From Sherman county, Hon. George Kelly, mayor of the city of Goodland, states:

"I think we are at least 90 per cent better off than we were before, as we practically have no poor people any more; the people in general all pay their debts better, hold their jobs better, and it is a very rare thing to see a person under the influence of liquor. While I am not a strict prohibitionist myself, I am sure against the saloons, for I know we are much better off without them."

From Sedgwick county, in which is located Wichita, the second largest city in the state, Hon. Thornton W. Sargent, district judge, states:

"Take the state as a whole, my observation is that there is not one-tenth of the drunkenness in Kansas that there is in the wide-open states. Over 90 per cent of the children of Kansas have never seen a saloon; a large majority of the children do not know what a saloon means, except from hearsay."

Hon. Thomas C. Wilson, district judge at Wichita, in the same county, states:

"Prohibition in Kansas is a great success. In the thickly populated centers the law is violated more or less, and until we have national prohibition it will be impossible to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor. . . . It is a rare exception to see a drunken man on the streets, and the benefits of prohibition to the rising generation are inestimable."

Bookkeeper had Never Seen a Drunken Man

From the city of Eureka, Greenwood county, in the southeast section, in the oil and gas district, Hon. M. A. Miller, mayor, states:

"I think I can answer your question quite intelligently by repeating to you a conversation I had with a young lady, who is bookkeeper and cashier in our store. I asked her the question if she often saw a drunken man in Eureka. She said she never had seen one, and she has been raised right there."

From the city of Newton, Harvey county, in the central section of the state, Hon. A. J. Duff, mayor, writes:

"There is absolutely no question in the minds of our city commissioners or our citizens as to the success of prohibition in Kansas and in our city. Our officers are greatly handicapped by private shipments of liquor into the state, this being the most serious obstacle to full enforcement of the law."

"WHAT BOOZE DID TO ME IN THE TWENTIES"

A TALE OF A MODERATE DRINKER

Paragraphs from the Life Story of a Noted Author as Related in the American Magazine

Whisky played an important part in my life for twenty-five years. I might say John Barleycorn was almost one of our family. My father, accounted a brilliant man, drank himself into divorce at thirty-five, oblivion at forty, and death at forty-two. This in itself is pitifully conventional. The most remarkable thing about it is that never until his death was he without full control of his senses through the amount of alcohol he had imbibed. He was not a "drunk" in the accepted sense of the word. He never lost his mental or physical balance—In fact, there are people who knew him who would be shocked at the statement that drink had anything to do with his fall.

Yet it killed him.

The type of drinker who passes unnoticed is the man who takes a drink "now and then," never allows himself to become intoxicated, and secretly loathes those of his friends who do. Whisky never interferes with his business—apparently—nor his health, he says. He can take a "drink or leave it alone," or he "never takes a drink before evening," or, again, he "don't feel well, so he's on the wagon for a while," thereby unconsciously admitting that instinct tells him alcohol, like any other dangerous beast, must be leashed occasionally lest it fall upon its master.

Only a Cocktail at Dinner

I belonged to this type of drinker; and I long remembered the look on my mother's face and her silent weeping when, at seventeen, I loudly declaimed that there was no harm in an occasional drink. It was her first intimation that I had been drinking moderately for a year.

Perhaps a year after that, my grandfather, another moderate drinker, lost a responsible position because the alcohol had hardened his liver and made daily attendance at his work impossible. He was burnt out at fifty, and his boast was that he never got intoxicated. Nor did he, to my knowledge. Three years later, two of my uncles died. I had never seen either of them drunk, yet it was proved beyond cavil that booze had accounted for them both. I heard my grandmother say in a paroxysm of grief and indignation that neither of her sons had ever done more than take a cocktail at dinner. Our family physician nodded his head grimly, and said, "Precisely, madame!"

I early determined that no such fate should befall me. I reasoned that my deceased relatives must have consumed a staggering amount of liquor, but had cunningly hoodwinked the family. No such result, I told myself, with the logic of youth, could come from the indulgence in a social highball now and then. Moderation, that was the thing! The doctor was a fool or a quack!

I have since found that if I was right in my deductions, then all doctors are quacks and fools, since they all hold to our family physician's theory regarding drink. They have facts and figures to prove that the steady, daily consumption of alcohol, in however small a quantity, is mental, moral and physical suicide. If you are skeptical of their assertions, or their interesting highly colored plates of one's liver, kidneys and what-not, mutely protesting at being ossified, then visit any of our large jails, hospitals or insane asylums. There you will find living proofs that carbolic acid undiluted is a much better potion than booze, because it's quicker.

At twenty-one I had been drinking moderately for about four years. During that time I followed the trail of booze across the country and talked with scores of "moderate drinkers"—men who seldom, if ever, got drunk, yet seldom passed a day without drinking. Besides the tramp, there was the actor who had starred on Broadway and who boozed off; the business man who began to drink at banquets in his honor and wound up driving a furniture van in Seattle; the expert machinist working as a laborer because his superiors were afraid to trust him on a big job, knowing he took a drink now and then; the newspaper man, ex-city editor of a big town sheet, who was afraid to trust himself, by the same token, and so on in endless, tragic variety. Not old men, dying of hardened arteries and the result of a profligate youth, but young, vigorous specimens whose average age I'd put at thirty-five. And the country is fairly littered with them! Through at thirty-five in a nation where opportunity is a byword!

The full story of this man's life and acquaintance with John Barleycorn, told in his own words, appears in the October American Magazine. He is one of the best known writers in the country. Because of excessive drinking he came within two hours of death—before he was thirty years of age. Starting in as a so-called moderate drinker at sixteen years of age he continued to drink more and more heavily. While seldom drinking to the point of intoxication he lost several responsible positions on city papers and his wife left him because of his disagreeable temper. After a particularly unhappy experience with liquor, his wife, thinking he had reformed, returned, only to find that the alcohol habit was binding him more and more firmly. Then one day he stood just two hours removed from death. His wife it was who aroused the dying spark of manhood, and he set aside untasted his last glass of liquor.

Moderate drinkers all, proud of their ability to handle the stuff.

Crime and Booze Modern Siamese Twins

The average drinker admits that crime and booze are the modern Siamese twins. He acknowledges that booze brings suicides, many of the more frightful diseases, full jails, ravaged homes, broken and shamed mothers, fathers and children. Yet he says something like this: "It's all in knowing how to drink." Yet, would you care to walk a tight-rope over the Grand Canyon, knowing in that way you'd get a better view of its beauty (the drinker's argument on booze and life), with no other security than the knowledge that as long as you handled yourself correctly, kept your balance, you wouldn't fall in?

Booze is a crime against nature. Which of you cannot pick an example of this in your own town, your own neighborhood?

The chief reason that led to my drinking was, as is the case with thousands, a love of conviviality. I am a gregarious creature and I like to fraternize and mix with my fellows. I swiftly found a congenial bunch during my first week on the New York paper and soon became one of the leading spirits, being admittedly a good newspaper man, accounted something of a wit, and a drinker of no mean ability. It wasn't long before my daily half-dozen drinks were looked upon with lofty scorn by my fellows. I was virtually an abstainer in the eyes of men who never went home after a day's trick at the office without being "half stewed." Perhaps a dozen of us would meet without particular intent in a congenial café in the midst of the Row. There we would sit from five in the afternoon often until eight at night, talking shop, mouthing cynicisms on our more successful brethren, and drinking, drinking, drinking.

I increased my consumption of booze until I was drinking in the neighborhood of a dozen highballs daily. I acquired the pasty complexion, perpetual cough, and hunted expression of eye peculiar to the "moderate drinker." I learned that Scotch whisky could be drunk with the "least harm," and brandy with the most; that cocktails changed the general topography of one's stomach, and that enough rye meant the d. t.'s if it were but given time. The booze that was the most beneficial was never mentioned, nor have I yet heard the name of it, from 'Frisco to Florida.

The first pronounced effect of about five years' moderate drinking on a youth of twenty-three was when I found it impossible to eat before the middle of the day or sleep before the middle of the night.

Within Two Hours of Death

One of the biggest specialists in the country coldly and dispassionately computed my chances of life at two hours. He was willing to operate but held out no false hopes. I spent a couple of hours on the operating table and my wife spent a couple of hours in hell, while they carved out the tissue the booze had destroyed, and made some human semblance out of my maltreated stomach.

Well, I beat it again.

A day after the operation when my chances of life seemed assured, I was suddenly seized with racking pains—which I came to look for and fight for a long time afterwards. At the doctor's order, a nurse came to my bedside with a bromide mixed in a whisky glass full of brandy. I could scarcely wait until she covered the intervening inches—I was afire with the desire for that drink. I snatched it from her hand and in my eagerness spilled a drop and swore under my breath. My wife rose in white horror and laid a trembling hand on my arm. She simply uttered my name—and as I turned impatiently I was conscious of a distinct shock. In her young face was mirrored all the agony she had endured through this thing I was about to gulp with lips that shook at the momentary delay, and in her voice was something that crashed through my booze- and pain-racked being to hit the last spark of manhood that had somehow survived. The nurse and doctor watched us with indulgent interest. They saw only the tableau—not the thing behind it.

I put that glass down untasted—not a bit melodramatically—just placed it on a chair that stood near the bed. I summoned what strength I had left to ask them all to leave the room, and began my drive against John Barleycorn.

I've never had a drink since.

I haven't come out of the battle unmarked. I have some nervousness, and my eyes are not the bright optics of a

National W. C. T. U. Convention, Washington, D. C., December 2–7, 1917

MISS GORDON GOES TO NEW MEXICO

Miss Anna A. Gordon left Evanston this week for New Mexico to confer with W. C. T. U. leaders of the state-wide campaign and to participate in various mass meetings and rallies. Mrs. W. E. Lindsay, wife of the governor, and vice-president of the New Mexico W. C. T. U., has invited the National president to accompany her to the meeting of the state federation of women's clubs at Gallup, and speak in the interests of prohibition for New Mexico. Miss Gordon's headquarters will be at Santa Fe. The state votes on the liquor question November 6.

NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION AND OUR STATE CONVENTIONS

The slogan of every state convention will be "On to Washington," interpreted to mean not only for our great National W. C. T. U. convention, to be held in the nation's capital in December, but "On To Washington" for an effort to secure through Congress the submission of a Federal prohibition amendment to the state legislatures. At these state meetings resolutions urging favorable action by the House of Representatives will doubtless be passed, but every white ribboner should realize the urgent necessity of influencing her fellow citizens to send communications to their respective Congressmen urging them to work and vote for the amendment with the six year clause omitted therefrom.

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

"BEATING THE 'BONE-DRY' LAW"

Lawlessness of any kind within a nation is a greater peril than the threatened attack of foes from without. In a republican form of government the only sovereign recognized is LAW. To belittle or ignore the law of the land, enacted by the will of the people, is the opposite of patriotism—treason. In this country at the present time certain interests are sending through the mails, anonymously, publicity sheets, the nature of which is anything but patriotic. Made up of a series of newspaper clippings, all of them derogatory in tone, their very evident purpose is to discredit a law enacted by the Congress of the United States—the Federal "bone-dry" measure. One statement reads: "Before the Federal 'bone-dry' law went into effect last July, prohibitionists said that it would be respected because the strong arm of Uncle Sam could enforce it. But newspaper stories prove conclusively that just as much disrespect is being shown the national laws as the much-shattered state laws."

In these days when so much is being said about making the world safe for democracy, are we not as a nation doing an inexcusable thing in continuing to harbor in our midst interests that not only disregard the law but are in a continuous campaign to spread abroad a spirit of lawlessness and disrespect for law through the circulation of false statements or gross exaggerations concerning the few violations that are bound to occur?

Not until this "accursed thing in the camp" is exterminated from our national life, can we stand before the other nations now growing toward democracy, as an ideal republic in any sense of the word.

"UNLESS WE FIGURE INACCURATELY——"

Whenever the liquor interests indulge nowadays in optimistic prophecies—which is not often—they modify them with a conditional clause. "Unless we figure inaccurately, prohibition has reached its highest mark," remarks Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular. Certainly the method of computation on which such a conclusion is based would not bear close inspection.

The writer must have failed utterly to take into account the fact that at the present time there are living in prohibition territory about 56,000,000 people, most of whom have signified at the polls or in other ways their entire satisfaction with the dry policy, their sole and only complaint being that state laws cannot be perfectly enforced until prohibition is national in scope, and to that end they propose to work indefatigably.

The writer for the liquor paper must also have left out of his calculations the action taken by numerous national women's organizations, representing about fifteen million women, which have indicated their positive antagonism to the liquor traffic, and have determined to oppose it until it is exterminated. The influence of this mighty body of citizens, a large proportion of them voters, cannot fail to increase prohibition sentiment.

Certainly the drink prophet overlooked the growing sentiment entertained against beverage alcohol by American physicians, as indicated by the action taken at the recent national convention of the American Medical Association. He was also unmindful of the weighty sentiment against liquor prevailing and rapidly increasing in commercial circles.

Strange as the omission may seem, he must have failed to consider the attitude toward prohibition of the great ecclesiastical bodies. The Protestant churches of America, with hardly an exception, have enlisted to the finish in the campaign against King Alcohol, and have pledged themselves, severally and collectively, to advance the cause of prohibition to the point of full and complete victory. In the Episcopal and Catholic churches anti-liquor sentiment is steadily growing.

There is another factor that the writer for the liquor paper must have overlooked—the young people growing to manhood and womanhood in the twenty-six prohibition states and in the vast local option territory, trained and educated through the public schools to know the evil results arising from indulgence in strong drink, and having continually before their eyes a demonstration of the benefits of a saloonless environment.

But the liquor prognosticator need only look within the ranks of his own trade to discover refutation of his conjecture that prohibition has reached its highest mark. If we have arrived at the crest of the prohibition wave and it is about to recede, why do we so frequently hear that men engaged in the liquor business are voluntarily abandoning it? Why is the second generation of old distilling and brewery families declining to continue in the business? Why are the great breweries equipping their plants for the manufacture of soft drinks? Why, indeed, have whole companies of liquor men organized to oppose the business they formerly were engaged in? Why are the big distillers, forced out of the alcohol beverage business by the war, declaring that they do not intend to resume it?

All because these men know that the prohibition movement will grow in favor until not only this nation but all the nations of the world shall have become free from the legalized liquor traffic.

TOM GILMORE'S EXPECTATIONS

Is prohibition's solid rock of Gibraltar, the state of Kansas, in peril? Tom Gilmore evidently so believes, for he announces that within the next few years he expects to "see the state issuing licenses for the sale of alcoholic beverages." Upon what sources of information the distinguished advocate of personal liberty bases his "great expectations" we are not informed. Certainly he has before him a task of monumental proportions if he proposes to undertake to change the sentiment of the citizens of the "sunflower state" regarding the alcoholic liquor question. He will find it necessary to convince not only the governor and supreme court but the humblest day laborer that in order to reach the maximum of success as a commonwealth, crime, pauperism and even drunkenness must be encouraged; that Kansas is not living up to its privilege as the "greatest and most glorious state in the Union" until it has filled its jails and police stations, its poor-houses and insane asylums by licensing the sale of liquor and setting in motion the dehumanizing process warranted to furnish inmates for these institutions.

But—this talk of Kansas's reversion to the old license system is stuff fit only for publications devoted to wit and humor; we'll venture to say not even Mr. Gilmore himself takes it seriously. Read the letters published in this issue of The Union Signal from sheriffs, police court judges and other law enforcement officers of the state and note their enthusiastic comments on the value of the dry law. It has come to be such a commonplace that nobody even thinks it necessary to voice it, that Kansas would no more think of giving up its prohibitory law than it would of abandoning its public school system or its habit of church worship.

An exchange makes the statement that Mr. Hoover's mail these days is intensely interesting. Many letters declare the willingness of women to observe meatless days and wheatless days, but say, "We will begin when men observe 'drinkless days' and 'smokeless days!'" The circumstances suggest the old saying, "Save at the spigot and waste at the bung!" More money is wasted in drink and tobacco every day than all the women in the country could save by having a wheatless day and a meatless day. While Congress dilly-dallied over the question of prohibition and food control the distillers destroyed millions upon millions of bushels of grain, stocking up with enough whisky to last for some years. Now Congress has forbidden the manufacture of whisky during the war, but not its sale.

Despite the avalanche of millions of letters, petitions and appeals praying for prohibition of the manufacture of beer the brewer goes on with his work of destroying the grain needed to feed the nations. The Committee of Sixty stated in May, according to the Congressional Record, that the food wasted in drink would equal 15,000,000 pounds per day. It is also stated that it requires much more grain to make beer than whisky. Why should women be urged to observe wheatless days and save every crust and crumb while the brewer is permitted to waste every day millions of pounds of the precious grain? Does it seem fair or just or right?

The women of our country are humiliated beyond measure by the fact that their appeal, which means, if granted, not only the conservation of food, now so necessary, but the more necessary conservation of manhood and womanhood, an immeasurable moral uplift, and vast economic benefit to the whole country, goes unheeded. At the same time the brewers' business, which means destruction and degradation of men and women, a lowering of moral tone and stupendous economic waste, goes on unchecked by the government. Women everywhere are questioning, "What does it mean? We are saving, economizing, conserving in compliance with our government's request and giving our sons at our country's call that the world may be made safe for democracy. What are the brewers doing? Tearing down and wasting where we are trying to build up and save! We ask that our land shall be made safe for our boys and girls, that our homes shall not be ravaged by strong drink and vice. The brewer asks only that he shall be allowed to continue to pile up wealth and retain power by the destruction of all that we hold sacred and holy." Which appeal will be heeded by the powers that be? In these days so full of peril, which is of more value to our government, the united, unquestioning, loyal and grateful support of its womanhood or the financial gain of a few self-seeking brewers and their ilk? Who shall answer?

Stars and Stripes out of Place

A saloonkeeper of Philadelphia recently displayed as part of a window exhibit five small flags, each in an empty whisky bottle. Such use of the flags aroused instant indignation by passersby. "There is absolutely no connection between the American flag and the whisky bottle," remarked one citizen. "If the saloonkeeper had put models of the poorhouse and the penitentiary in the window beside his booze he would have been nearer the point."

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. How does Dr. Haven Emerson, New York's health commissioner, answer the revenue argument of the anti-prohibitionists?

2. In what way have former liquor dealers of Duluth recently proved their thorough conversion to prohibition?

3. How does opposition to woman suffrage in the Eastern states impress the Western commonwealths who have entrusted the ballot to their women citizens?

4. What evidence has recently been introduced in Congress demonstrating that prohibition prohibits in Kansas?

5. Tell some of the perils of so-called "moderate drinking" as graphically set forth in an autobiographical sketch of a noted writer in the American Magazine.

6. Why did a company of Washington lumberjacks refuse to go to Montana to work?

7. For what purpose are the sixteen stereomotorgraphs which will be purchased by the National W. C. T. U. to be used?

8. Where and when is the next National W. C. T. U. Convention to be held? How can reduced rates be secured?

9. Name the five groups of necessary foods as given by the Department of Agriculture.

10. What is the important thing to do at present to hasten the movement toward national prohibition?

They Sign the Temperance Pledges in their Comfort Bags

"Do the soldiers appreciate the comfort bags with the motherly letters, pledge cards, Testaments, etc., they contain?" white ribboners are often asked. The following letter is a fair sample of others received at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters from time to time and not only evidences gratitude for their gifts on the part of the boys, but a desire, engendered by the friendly thought expressed through them, to enter upon a new life.

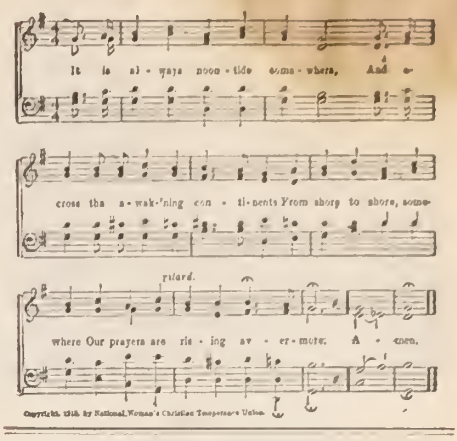
"I received your sewing kit," writes one boy, "and I appreciate it very much. I have been reading the Testament and feel that I ought to get right with my Maker for I have been away from church for about eight years. At one time, before the liquor habit got control of me, I was a Christian. Now that I cannot get the stuff any more, I feel much better and have no trouble in doing without it. I feel, too, that I ought to sign the pledge before I sail to a foreign country and I enclose it. Please answer so that I may know you received it." A postscript to the letter shows that the young man is trying to convert his comrades to total abstinence. "My tent mate," he writes, "is about half convinced, and if you could only send him a cheering word, I think he would sign the pledge."

Yes, the comfort bags pay.

First Year of Prohibition in Toronto Shows Big Crime Decrease

The first year of prohibition in Toronto, Canada, has been a success, according to a statement by Lieut.-Col. H. J. Grasset, chief of police. Assaults and violences, it is reported, have decreased.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

Our Holy War

God bless ye, comrades!—in the fight
Ye're waging now, ye cannot fail,
For better is your sense of right
Than king-craft's triple mail.

The truths ye urge are borne abroad
By every wind and tide;
The voice of Nature and of God
Speaks out upon your side.

The weapons which your hands have found
Are those which Heaven itself has wrought,
Light, Truth, and Love;—your battle-ground
The free, broad field of Thought.

No partial, selfish purpose breaks
The simple beauty of your plan,
Nor lie from throne or altar shakes
Your steady faith in man.

Press on!—and we who may not share
The toil or glory of your fight,
May ask, at least, in earnest prayer,
God's blessing on the right!

National W. C. T. U. Evangelist Promoted

Cassie L. Smith, a pioneer white ribbon worker, on September 14, passed to the other world. At the time of her Homegoing she was a National W. C. T. U. evangelist and identified with the Ocean Grove (N. J.) local union. Not only in her own state but in the nation was Miss Smith known and loved. Her personality has left its impress upon the lives of thousands who sat under her teaching and came in contact with her in various other ways.

One who has enjoyed the friendship of Miss Smith for more than a decade says of her: "She put her whole soul into the spiritual side of the great prohibition reform, emphasizing ever and always her belief that the Lord God Almighty leads in the holy warfare. A living exemplification of the ideals she cherished and held constantly before her comrades, she leaves with us the inspiration of her beautiful life and true-hearted devotion to principle."

RED LETTER DAY

TRANSPORTATION NOTES

ELLA A. BOOLE, Chairman Transportation Committee

The question of routes and rates to the National W. C. T. U. Convention at Washington will without doubt be considered when delegates are elected at the state conventions. Many, because of the reduced rates granted for our convention, will take advantage of the opportunity afforded to pay a visit to our Nation's Capital.

Three associations, the Central Traffic, the Trunk Lines and the New England, have granted convention rates of two cents a mile through the purchase of a round trip ticket from points within their territory, the same to be stamped at Washington. Tickets may be purchased on November 29, November 30 and December 1 and are good for return, reaching starting point before midnight of December 12. It is advised that delegates and visitors in the territory of other associations purchase tickets to Chicago or St. Louis, then re-purchase to Washington, taking advantage of the convention rates in the territory through which they are granted.

Delegates in southern territory may find it to their advantage to use mileage tickets, and announcements will be made later of special points where groups will assemble and travel together. A special train will be operated from Chicago and one from New York. It is possible special cars will be arranged for from St. Louis and from Chattanooga or Knoxville. Consult your state president as to the best route by which delegates may travel together.

Members of the Official Board and Executive Committee should plan to reach Washington Friday morning, November 30. Delegates and visitors should reach Washington not later than Saturday and plan to remain through the convention, which will close Friday night, December 7.

Let us make every effort to secure a large attendance at our convention, which promises to be the most notable convention ever held.

WHY THE STEREOMOTORGRAPH?

If you would like to help in an educational temperance campaign to be conducted in the camps where the new army is being mobilized, send in your contribution to the Stereomotorgraph Fund. The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been asked by the United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy to provide as its share of the $100,000 the committee is endeavoring to raise, a sufficient amount to purchase sixteen stereomotorgraphs, one for each cantonment.

Stereopticon slides covering every phase of the alcohol question in its relation to the individual will be used with the stereomotorgraphs. These slides, which are to be specially prepared by the committee, will visualize the menace of liquor drinking, showing how it unfits a man for soldierly duties by breaking down his power to resist cold, disease and wounds, and by slowing up his mental faculties. The most recent utterances of great generals and statesmen and the very latest findings of the war will be reproduced with gripping force. Each of the new series contains reproductions of a number of patriotic posters and cartoons.

Stereomotorgraphs will be set up in places where the men gather in large numbers. Several stereomotorgraphs will be supplied to Y. M. C. A. secretaries who visit the smaller outlying camps where permanent "huts" are not established. When the need for the stereomotorgraphs and slides at the cantonments is over they will belong to the states that purchased them. Kentucky, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Iowa and Kansas have each signified their intention of purchasing one of these stereomotorgraphs. Other states in which cantonments are located, with less W. C. T. U. membership, will not be able to shoulder the burden alone, nor would the other states wish them to do so. Each wants to lend a helping hand in this extremely practical endeavor to reach the boys with the truth in a very attractive way. There is need of great haste in this matter as thousands of boys are already in the camps and the educational temperance work should be going on. This is our great opportunity to reach thousands of young men we could not hope to reach otherwise. This is agreed to be the full share of the W. C. T. U. in the work of the United Committee, and other calls will not be made unless something entirely unforeseen occurs. Send all funds through W. C. T. U. treasurers.

The stereomotorgraph displays automatically fifty-two lantern slides either continuously or controlled by a push button. The apparatus may be attached to the regular incandescent 110 volts electric current. The lamps used are nitrogen filled Mazda of 400 watts or more if necessary. The stereomotorgraph is in use now by leading educational institutions, hospitals, churches, societies, business organizations and railroad companies.

We record here the names of comrades and friends who have recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. E. L. G. HOHENTHAL, South Manchester, Conn., the beloved president of the local union and a faithful worker in the cause of temperance and righteousness.

GEORGE H. MIX, Danville, Iowa, a life member of the state W. C. T. U. and a staunch prohibitionist. His home had welcomed scores of temperance workers, and his heart was ever open to calls for help in the cause of Christ.

Section of W. C. T. U. Parade at Kansas State Fair—Governor Capper in the Center of the Group

One thousand members of the W. C. T. U., headed by Governor Capper, took part in a national prohibition parade at the Kansas State Fair at Topeka, September 13. Thousands of spectators cheered the procession as it made its way from the entrance of the fair grounds to the W. C. T. U. tent. Boys from the state industrial school in uniform, led by Henry W. McAfee, marshal of the day, composed the first section of the parade. Following them were the white ribboners, with Governor Capper in the lead. One hundred school girls from Oakland, dressed in white, brought up the rear.

"Prohibition sentiment is growing in the East," Governor Capper told an audience of several thousand that had gathered for an open-air meeting held in front of the W. C. T. U. tent, "and it has been predicted that the end to liquor will come within a few years. Throughout the east I found that Kansas was being given credit for leadership in the prohibition movement to wipe out the saloon. Kansas has been the most successful of all the prohibition states."

TO GOD BE THE GLORY

ANNA F. QUINN

(Related to the Writer by the Minister in the Story)

Many years ago when the town of R. was started in the northern part of California it was a supply center for the small mining towns and camps of the surrounding country. As R. was the terminus of the railroad the town became the headquarters for miners and mining men. Everything ran wide open—the saloons, gambling dens, dance halls, etc. I, being a young man and poor and wishing to make money faster than hard work would bring it, took my old mother, whom I supported, to R. very much against her will, although she had no other means of support.

When we arrived in the town I rented a small house, put mother in it, and then began to look around to see how I could best invest what little money I had. A saloon seemed the thing for me, so I rented a small shanty and started in. Customers began to come immediately and money flowed in. My conscience hurt me somewhat as I knew I was engaging in the liquor business against mother's wishes and that she was praying for me continually. However, I kept open shop day and night. I had one customer who never failed to come for his morning drink, a Mr. H., a carpenter, the father of two little girls. He always paid cash for his liquor and spent a good part of his time and money at my place on pay day. This went on for some time. One morning in October I awakened early in the morning after having been up almost all night. Looking from my window I discovered about four inches of snow on the ground. The sun was shining and the world looked very beautiful. As I gazed with delight upon the scene two little girls, one about seven, the other five, came in sight. They were gathering sticks for firewood. Their clothes were pitiably thin, their little feet were bare. I watched them for some time. All at once I recognized them. I said, "Mercy! They are the carpenter's children. Mr. H. has been spending his money in my place for drinks while his family is starving and freezing—and I live in comfort." Tears ran down my cheeks. There and then God touched my heart. I arose, dressed, went to my mother and said, "Mother, your prayers are answered." "Thank God," she replied. "Are you going to sell out?"

"No, I'll quit this business forever now."

After breakfast I went to my saloon. There stood Mr. H. waiting for his morning drink.

"No," I said; "no more drinks do you get in this place. I saw your children this morning almost naked out in the snow, gathering fuel, and I taking your money for drink! God has shown me my wrong doing and yours. Promise me you will stop drinking and care for your family. I will help you all I can. I will take the pledge with you. Will you give up the cursed stuff?"

"I will try," said Mr. H.

He went on to his work. I closed my saloon doors. Then I broke every bottle of liquor in my place, smashed in the head of every beer keg and locked the place for good. I then went to Mr. H's house and asked the wife what they had to eat. She began to cry and showed me the cupboard. In it was only a crust of bread. They had no fire, no wood. I said nothing but went out to a grocery store and ordered a supply of everything necessary. Then I went to the butcher shop and ordered meat. Next I visited the wood yard. Then I purchased clothing for those children. Mr. H. took the pledge with me. I said to him, "I helped to pull you down. May God help me to help pull you up."

From that day on Mr. H. has not touched drink. His family is well provided for in a good home and he is an honorable citizen and Christian. As for myself, God called me to the ministry. Mother is dead but lived to see me serving the Master. My wife and I travel from place to place doing missionary work among the poorer classes. God is blessing our labors and work of love to suffering humanity. To Him be the glory. Amen.

THE BREWERYMAN

JEAN K. BAIRD

The Story of the Little Daughter of a Liquor Man who was an Innocent Victim of Her Father's Business.

Miss Julia was true to her word. She went home and to bed immediately, but going to sleep was a different matter. She fell into slumber at last after she had tried all manner of control of her sub-conscious self,—such as picking roses in a garden, and making them into an imaginary bouquet.

Night and quiet. The awful blackness of the river bank unlighted and heavy with trees; the steady movement of the water which suggested rather than gave a sound, and the mountains opposite,—too far distant to be seen—only the edge of their great heights made a dark line against a gray sky.

Miss Julia awoke. The fire bells were ringing like mad. The church bells broke in upon them. There was a pounding upon her own front door for the one there had missed the door bell. Then his groping hand fell upon it, and its clang was added to the other noises. Miss Julia put her head out of the window. On her front door step stood two men torch in hand. From the flickering light she recognized them as two men of the town.

"What is wanted?" she asked.

"Get up and search your premises. Little child is missing."

"Jim Hollimon's girl," she said and reached for a heavy robe and slippers.

She groped down stairs and flung open the door.

"She is not in the house. I looked about before I went to bed."

"We thought she might have wandered off and fallen asleep somewhere."

They looked in the corner of the porches and in the hammock under the trees. No girl was there.

"A girl of twelve—"

"She isn't the oldest. It is Helene—the eight year old."

Into every nook and corner they peered. "Perhaps some other searching party has found her. I think the child never came up this street."

"She isn't found yet. They'll signal with the steam whistle the moment she's located."

They moved down the street, their flaming brand looking like the devil's own signal, as the men swung it about their heads, knocked at doors and called out, "Get up and search your premises. Little girl is lost."

Miss Julia had gone to the gate. In bath-robe and with hair falling over her shoulders, she leaned over the fence and watched them go down the street. "Get up and search your premises. Little girl is lost."

She shuddered. The words "little girl" were much more fearful than "child." Terror was in her heart,—not fear for the things about her which might do her physical hurt; but terror at the thought of what might happen to the child.

Regardless of her gay flowered robe and loosened hair, she went down the dark street following in the wake of the torch now so far away that it looked like a red ball. When she came to the end of the vacant square, her view broadened. Houses were lighted, and women appeared in their doorways. There were few men to be seen; but the long line of lights on the opposite side of town, beginning at the foot of the mountain, and a mile or more in length, moving slowly upward, showed where the men of the town had gone.

The bells and whistles had ceased their clanging. There was light everywhere, but there was quiet. When one spoke, it was in whispers.

Miss Julia moved on down the square. She glanced up at the town clock. The hands were at the point of two. She moved on and on, not knowing where she was going, but led by some irresistible impulse.

She entered the main street. There, huddled up in one of the arm chairs which set out on the street before the hotel, was poor Mickey, sound asleep.

Miss Julia paused before him. In the night and the quiet, with her flowing hair about her shoulders and her dark eyes brilliant with excitement and fear, she seemed like the spirit of vengeance about to swoop down on its prey.

She was about to lay her hand on Mickey's shoulder to awaken him. Then she paused. She never knew until afterwards what stayed her hand. But as she was about to touch him a vision flitted before her mind. It was not that of the lighted street and the big wide deserted windows of the hotel. It was thoughts of the river—the stretch of beach where at one end all the garbage and filth of town were heaped. She thought of it in the darkness. How lonely a child would find itself there—a child like Helene Hollimon. "The devil and the river know, and they won't tell."

She raised her eyes. Across the glass of the window she saw the white letters, Hollimon House Bar. She drew back from the poor crumpled-up imbecile in the chair. She pushed open the door into the barroom. A bartender stood leaning on the bar.

Jim Hollimon sat crouched in his chair as though helpless. He was staring into space. He started when he saw her. Then, recognizing her, he sank back. They had promised to bring him news. He was waiting. Only the glass of the window separated him from poor Mickey on the outside, dead in liquor and sleep.

"Bring a torch. They have forgotten," she said.

The bartender took up a torch and lighted it. Jim Hollimon staggered to his feet and followed her.

"You haven't—they haven't—" he began.

"No," she said, understanding what he would say. "There is one place they have not looked. We'll go there."

"Go to the dump," she said to the man. He went ahead with his torch and she and the father followed. From the open door wild-eyed women and frightened children gazed upon them in silence, and then without a word followed. Before they reached the river bank there was a mob about them, pushing and surging, yet without noise.

"Only the river and the devil know—and they never tell."

"Clear down," said Julia to the torch-bearing man.

They clambered down the bank and across the washed out fields to the dump. The light flickered, rose and fell as they climbed up and down the little heaps of rubbish. Then some one saw the gleam of white—a little girl's embroidered dress. A woman—a mother with children of her own, pushed the crowd back. "Take him away," she said.

But Jim Hollimon pushed forward—what had once been big, smiling, well-fed Jim Hollimon, now bent and shivering and shrunken. He pushed his way ahead, and took up the dead body—the body of his little girl, whose life and body had been taken to satisfy the passion of a drunken beast.

He turned back with the burden in his arms. He turned to face the drunken, leering face of the half-wit, Mickey—Mickey who had hung about his place for years and whose last dime he had taken many and many a time. Mickey laid his hand upon his arm, and slobbered over him as he began: "I didn't intend—I had drunk too much—they treated us like bosses, with your own stuff, Jim. I was drunk—drunk as a gang boss on pay-day."

Not a sound. Like figures in marble, they stood and waited. Then with a yell, Jim Hollimon handed the little dead body to some one near, and had seized Mickey by the throat. Just then the shop engine let forth its fearful shriek as though it would tear the very heart from the breast of the night. It was the signal to the men on the mountain that the child had been found.

Every Man Where He Is Worth Most--- says Uncle Sam, in developing the Nation's efficiency. Every citizen should heed this injunction. YOU must get where you are worth most if you want to work with the greatest pleasure and efficiency and attain the greatest success. You can find the place you fit in with the help of this great new book—

HOW TO CHOOSE THE RIGHT VOCATION

A BOOK TO HELP MEN FIND THEIR WORK—THEN WORK THEIR FIND

This new book, by the expert Vocational Counselor, Holmes W. Merton, covers this vital subject amply, completely, practically. From it you can learn in detail—

What ability is needed for each of 1400 distinct vocations; how to discover whether or not your present work is your RIGHT work; how to examine yourself to ascertain just what work you are best fitted for; how to bring into play your greatest powers; how to make your work yield the most satisfaction and profit; etc., etc.

This book is vitally necessary to every man or woman who wants the right job—to every employer who wants the right men—to every parent who wants his son or daughter to find the right place in his life work.

THE MAN WHO DRIVES A MOTOR CAR

The man who drives a motor car where crowds of human beings are should have his wits as bright and keen as is the sparkling gasoline. A motor is a deadly thing that's sure to slay and wound and wing unless the driver's safe and sane, possessed of clear and active brain. How sinful, then, the sodden skate who says, "Before I pull my freight, along the crowded streets to fly, I'll drink four fingers of old rye." With tanglefoot beneath his belt, he goes as fast as he can pelt; his eyes distorted by old booze, the path of safety he won't choose. In haste to get to other bars, he knocks the wheels from passing cars, and makes the dodging walker swear, and kills a lawyer here and there. He is a messenger of death; and any man whose dark blue breath suggests long sessions at the bar should never run a motor car. If "Safety First" is what you mean, you can't mix gin and gasoline.—Walt Mason.

Lumberjacks Would Not Leave Prohibition State

One of the finest arguments for prohibition is furnished by the action of about fifty Washington lumberjacks. These men, who work in the lumber camps far from contact with the public and out of the reach of such temptations as are afforded by the open saloon, are often the easy victims of that institution when their term of service expires and they change from their isolation to the crowds of the city and are exposed to its temptations. We have seen this demonstrated in our own city (Minneapolis) for many years. The sums of money which have been carried out of the lumber camps and lost in saloons and brothels of this city no one can estimate, but that they aggregate in the total millions of dollars would hardly be an over-statement.

These Washington lumberjacks, who had been fighting fires in dry Idaho and Washington, refused to go into Montana to perform the same service because they feared that if they exposed themselves to the temptations of a wet state, they would lose all their earnings in the saloons. And so they turned down an appeal for their help at good wages and refused to enter Montana because the prohibition law has not yet gone into effect.

The incident is so unusual and the decision of men, ordinarily among the best patrons of the saloon, against venturing within the reach of its influence is so much of a moral victory for them as to constitute a new and certainly very telling argument for prohibition. There is included in it the indictment that the state, in licensing the saloon, is betraying the weakness of its citizens to their most dangerous adversary—not a new charge, but presented in a new and effective way. When a state comes to be shunned by the lumberjacks on account of its moral standards it has something to think about.

Oh, no, we haven't forgotten that in a large part of Minnesota the conditions are no better, but that does not invalidate the argument.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Make Tarrant County Safe for the Soldier Boys, the Texas Slogan

Special Correspondence

In the voting dry of Dallas county, including the city of Dallas, September 10, Texas scored one of the biggest prohibition victories in its history. The city of Dallas has been considered one of the strongest wet cities in the state. There has always been a rivalry between Fort Worth and Dallas in that direction. In the last election in Tarrant county, in which Fort Worth is situated, great fear was expressed that if Tarrant went dry the business men would all move to Dallas. Dallas is now dry, and a petition is being circulated among the voters of Tarrant county for a vote on the question October 1. Even the anti's think prohibition will win.

In the Dallas campaign Mrs. Nannie Curtis, president of the Texas W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Wendell Spence had charge of the work among women. They engineered a great procession with banners and flags, decorated autos and other features calculated to influence voters. A free lunch was served and all-day prayer meetings were held. The churches and Sunday schools took an earnest part in the campaign. Rev. George Truett, a Baptist minister, and Bishop Mouzon were very active. The election was conducted with wisdom and good-will on both sides. Pro's and anti's each offered $500 for proof of any fraud or evil doing. The votes were not published until the entire count was made. Gonzales county went dry a few days ago by a majority vote of one. Williamson county has just voted wet. The next thing is the campaign in Tarrant county.

As a city, Fort Worth is much interested in the soldiers. It is undergoing a cleaning up process, getting rid of questionable places and trying to redeem its promise to the government that if the defenders of the nation were sent here they would be safe from many temptations. Churches, halls, and homes are opening to the boys and they are being invited to spend their hours of recreation in safe, pleasant ways. On a recent Sunday night before a packed house at the First Baptist church in the city the lads sang delightfully some of the old hymns. There were some conversions among them.

W. C. T. U. work is going steadily forward. Many of our women are delivering addresses and organizing unions. Mrs. Maude Gerhardt, Press superintendent, is speaking in the interests of prohibition. Fort Worth union had a great banquet and a rummage sale. The Fort Worth Record and the Star Telegram have promised space for W. C. T. U. items. The Campaign Plans sent out by the National W. C. T. U. were published verbatim in both these papers. A letter from Miss Gordon has also been published therein. An effort is being made to have the Bible read in our public schools, and a recent report along that line is encouraging. Woman suffrage is still growing in interest and influence in the state.

Dallas has gone dry. "Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Tarrant county is next on the list.

W. C. T. U. Activities

A Flower Mission school of methods was held recently at Clinton, N. Y., under the supervision of Mrs. Cora A. Toomer, county superintendent. At the evening meeting, "Uncle Sam's Flower Garden" was given with fine effect.

"Prohibition time has come.
Down with rum! Down with rum!
He's our foe! He's our foe!
Go, King Alcohol, Go, go, go!"

This was the telling message on the white banner carried by "Temperance" in the charming little play.

The Wyoming county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. institute held September 13 at Attica was well attended. It was poster day for Wyoming county and a poster was presented by each superintendent and president as she gave her report. Mrs. Rose R. Seeley, county president, led the hosts in her usual enthusiastic manner, making the most of each moment. Mrs. Matie Sanders was elected president for the coming year, Mrs. Seeley, who has been at the head of the county organization for nearly ten years, having declined renomination. In the evening a gold and grand gold medal contest was held with Miss Florence Howes as winner of the gold medal and Mrs. May Carl Hall of the grand gold medal.

Wonderful success has attended the work of Mrs. I. D. VanValkenburgh of Albany, N. Y., who has been campaigning for two or three weeks in Ontario county. At the county convention in the late summer, Mrs. VanValkenburgh was named "mile a minute," an appellation she is said to live up to. She has spoken in churches, on street corners, from autos, in school houses, anywhere she could reach the people. Her street meetings are pronounced especially interesting, as she has the remarkable knack of attracting the passing throng, and even the loafers treat her with respect. Mrs. VanValkenburgh came to Ontario county direct from a three months' campaign in New England.

Ocala (Fla.) white ribboners, who have been untiring in their efforts for the soldier boys stationed in their city, recently had opportunity to secure on short notice the services of Will D. Upshaw, candidate for United States Senator from Georgia, for an address which attracted almost the entire company of soldiers and so many others that the church was barely large enough to accommodate the assemblage. As a preface to his address, he congratulated Ocala on its prohibition law. "I hope all honest men on the other side now see how much better it is to have temptation legally removed from young men, and the earnings of labor going for happiness instead of sorrow and poverty," said Mr. Upshaw. "If any one has an idea of trying to bring liquor back, let me prophesy that the youngest child that prattles tonight on its mother's knee will never live to see saloons legalized in Marion county." In the absence of Mrs. B. H. Seymour, president of the W. C. T. U., Mrs. Van Hood, vice-president, gave a message of cheer to the soldier lads.

Chenango county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. held its annual convention at Norwich, September 7, with fifty delegates present from the nineteen unions of the county. The present county membership of 677 includes forty new members. Mrs. Mary B. Hyde, county president, was ably assisted by Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, National Y. P. B. field secretary, who gave the address of the evening. Other numbers on the program were short afternoon and evening addresses on suffrage by Mrs. Frances Johnson, music by Prof. Frederick Reisberg and wife, and devotional exercises by Dr. Robert L. Clark, pastor of the convention church.

ALCOHOL

ITS RELATION TO HUMAN EFFICIENCY and LONGEVITY

By Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk

Medical Director of the Life Extension Institute, and author, with Professor Irving Fisher, of "How to Live." Revised and criticized by the Members of the Hygiene Reference Board

An absorbingly interesting study of alcohol and its effects upon humanity which should be read with profound attention at this time, when the evidence that society is paying a heavy bill for its indulgence in stimulants can no longer be disregarded by thinking men and women. The author examines the question from the point of view of life insurance statistics, of laboratory tests, of the clinic, and of the sick room, and in other ways, and gives it as his cumulative judgment that alcohol is a destructive force, wholly evil in its total effects.

War Department Closes Saloons in New Mexico Town

In accordance with an order issued by Major General A. P. Blockom, Deming, N. M., became dry on August 27. This action was made possible because of the fact that the seven saloons of the city were found to be within the prescribed half mile of Camp Cody, divisional training camp of the National Guard.

Governor of Hawaii Bars Intoxicants from Official Banquets

The governor of the territory of Hawaii, Hon. Lucius Eugene Pinkham, it is reported, has decreed that liquors shall be banished from the official banquets given by him. He showed his sincerity in the matter at the dinner recently given in honor of the commission from Japan en route to Washington.

India

Mrs. Margaret B. Denning, president of the W. C. T. U. of India, rejoices over the year's achievements in the various lines of departmental work, especially that of Literature.

South America

Miss Isabel Vazquez of Montevideo, South America, writes interestingly of her successful educational and organizing work. The activities of the year include an L. T. L. open-air festival at which 1,500 children were present and a social festival held in the zoological gardens; scientific temperance teaching and the formation of temperance clubs in the public schools; the organization of L. T. L.'s in the Sunday schools; entertaining and instructive meetings for mothers; lectures by eminent doctors before large audiences; addresses by W. C. T. U. members before a medical congress; and always press work and the distribution of temperance literature. Three thousand children, nine hundred mothers and two hundred factory girls have been reached.

New Zealand

Miss Clara M. Neal, L. T. L. superintendent for the New Zealand W. C. T. U., writes that the prospects for advance along the best established methods of work for the boys and girls are bright and promising. The "Manuals," marching songs and recitation books are selling better than ever. There is an increasing number of subscribers for The Young Crusader.

St. Louis' Mayor Declares Dry Nation Would Not Bring Great Economic Shock to His City

In the course of a recent address before the commissioners of Dallas, Texas, in which he discussed the superior merits of a commission form of government over the aldermanic system controlling his own city, Mayor Kiel of St. Louis touched on the question of national prohibition. He declared St. Louis would not suffer a great economic shock if the nation went dry, as St. Louis brewers are now putting out substitutes for beer and making non-intoxicating drinks.

Kansas Governor Predicts Dry Country in Five Years

National prohibition will be a reality in less than five years, in the opinion of Governor Arthur Capper of Kansas. In an address recently delivered in New York City he predicted:

"National prohibition is coming in less than five years because the business world is rapidly lining up for it as an economic proposition. In the west the strongest supporters of prohibition are the large employers of labor, including the railways, the packing houses, and other industrial concerns."

man twenty-seven. But I feel better, eat better, sleep better, and look better than I have in nine years. I'm getting stimulus from my three-year-old son and averaging ten thousand a year, no part of which is going for booze. I have made new friends and have won back many whom I alienated under the urge of booze. I entered the lists with a strong body, a healthy mind and some illusions. I did not bring them all out with me. I've suffered, but feel I got nothing but justice, under the law of compensation.

I cannot close this narrative without remarking that when both senator and stevedore agree that booze is due to disappear from this country within the next ten years it is more than idle talk. A wave of common sense, not fanaticism, is sweeping the nation, sweeping booze before it to oblivion. One hears this everywhere and from all classes of people. Returns from the polls in many states hitherto gloriously wet are constantly battering old John Barleycorn against the ropes. He hasn't got the crowd with him, they're yelling, "Knock him out!" from the gallery. This is not the sanctimonious chant of the reformed drunkard, but the observation of one whose living depends upon the accuracy of those observations. This is a big movement that's gathering strength among us, as big as the one that wiped out slavery fifty years ago. When it starts to roll there will be millions behind it, and that means "Exit hurriedly" for booze.

IN THE PARISIAN TRAMCARS

In the Parisian tramcars now appears a poster calling attention to the evils of drink. It attributes to alcohol two hundred thousand mad people, twice that number of consumptives, and the majority of criminals. This emphatic piece of propaganda is signed by the president and honorary president of the temperance society, L'Alarme. The former is Jean Finot, the well-known writer; the latter President Poincaré, chief executive of the French republic.

ALCOHOL IN "INSECTVILLE"

There are some insects that are wiser on the alcohol question than many a human being. An editor for the San Francisco Examiner, while in a restaurant, made the acquaintance of one such, a little black bug about a quarter of an inch long, with a tiny beak, a round body and four legs. "There was a man sitting opposite me drinking brandy," says the editor, in telling the incident. "When he saw the bug he dipped a toothpick in the brandy and placed the toothpick in front of the bug's nose. The bug fled. Three times the toothpick was placed in front of it, and the last time the bug ceased to run away. Instead, he investigated the end of the toothpick and then, firmly holding the end with his forelegs, proceeded to assimilate the brandy on the end.

"The man dipped the toothpick again in the brandy and gave the bug another drink.

"At this point the bug suddenly reared up on its hind legs. It regarded the tablecloth and its surroundings as though it were a Napoleon among bugs. You could see that it was exhilarated mightily.

"After about two minutes of this superbugism it dropped down on its feet again and tried to walk. First it fell over on one side and then upon the other. At which the man laughed heartily. Then, finding itself unable to walk in this way, it started to walk backward and did it with great success. After walking backward for a time it stopped again and began to shake itself and pant heavily. After this had passed away it gingerly started to walk frontward again—none too steadily, but still with considerable control.

"The man with the brandy dipped the toothpick again into his glass and offered it to the bug. The bug, with all its power, fled from it. Five times the toothpick was placed in front of it and five times the bug tried to get away, at last falling off the table onto the floor rather than take another drink. Upon which the man said to me: 'Well, I guess I have cured that bug of the drinking habit'—drank his brandy and ordered another."

Some of our readers may have read Lubbock's studies of insect life and may remember his experiments with intoxicated ants. The ants drank and became drunk like human beings. When a sober ant found an ant of his own tribe staggering about he helped the drunken brother home and out of danger, but alas for the drunkard if he happened to belong to another tribe! In this case he was dragged to the nearest water and thrown in.

RE THE OREGON BREWERIES

In view of the statement of Oregon liquor men that breweries in the state are either lying idle or making soft drinks with greatly reduced outputs and consequently a smaller force of men, our readers will be interested in a communication from O. P. Hoff, labor commissioner of Oregon, in which he mentions two former breweries which to his positive knowledge are at present employing more workmen than before the prohibition law went into effect. "Portland Brewing Company, as a brewery prior to the advent of prohibition gave employment to eight people," says Mr. Hoff. "It is now engaged in the manufacture of soft drinks and gives employment to twelve people. The North Pacific Brewing Company and the Gambrinus Brewing Company of Portland gave employment to twelve and thirty-two men, respectively, in 1914, while engaged in the manufacture of beer. Both these plants are now operated by the Damascus and Townsend creamery companies in the manufacture of butter and other dairy products and provide employment for an aggregate of fifty people."

A BIG "DRIVE" DUE!

Won't you make a big "drive" at your county convention for UNION SIGNAL subscriptions? If twenty subscriptions could be sent in from every county convention, what a revelation we should have of efficiency on the part of our women. It would lessen by no small degree the multitude of questions that come to the state officers and would discover to us an army of workers that need only the inspiration of the vision of the wide field to make them multiply in usefulness by a hundred fold. Don't say, "Oh, I have more than I can read now." If you do not have THE UNION SIGNAL, you lack one of the essential elements of a number one worker.—From the Nebraska Union Worker.

Vacations are over, school time is here. Let us catch the vim and energy freshly generated and conserve it into live-wire Loyal Temperance Legions! There never was a time when the training of our children was as important as at present. Our very best young men are being called to the front. The children must be the future efficient leaders. Ours is the opportunity; let us measure up to it.

We agree with "Mother National" that "each family represented in each L. T. L. should have this educative paper with its many helps. Where the parents do not subscribe for the children, the Legion or the W. C. T. U. should do so. In some places an appropriation is made by the union for this purpose, and in other instances the necessary amount is supplied from the L. T. L. treasury. As a result of either method the boy or girl receives most valuable aids in character-making—The Young Crusader."

French Orphan Adopted by North Carolina White Ribboners

Help the Little People of France

The appeal of the hungry children of Europe touches the hearts of "organized mother love." Ten cents a day, or $36.50 a year, will provide necessary nourishing food for an orphan child in France in addition to the ten cents per day allowed by the French government.

Local and state unions and even Loyal Temperance Legions are adopting and becoming responsible for the little people of other countries who have become orphaned by the war. The need of work of this character will be greater in the months to come.

Money is sent through regular W. C. T. U. channels.

There is a certain member of Congress who stutters except when he makes a speech or talks over the telephone. Recently he had occasion to call up a friend in Seattle on a matter of personal importance. When the transcontinental connection had been made the man in Seattle shouted through the phone:

"Who is talking?"

"This is 'Tom Smith,'" answered the Congressman at the capital end of the wire.

"No, it is not 'Tom Smith,'" snapped the man in Seattle.

"Yes, it is 'Tom Smith,' I tell you," the Congressman fairly bellowed. "Why do you doubt it?"

"Why, 'Tom Smith' stutters."

"Do you think I am going to stutter at a dollar a word?" the Congressman retorted as he banged down the phone in disgust.—Nebraska Legal News.

THE ARMY OF TOMORROW

Morning after morning the tread of many feet,
Like an army marching wakes the quiet street,
With their sunny faces lighting up the way,
The merry-hearted little folk begin their busy day.
Though little do they dream it, they live their blithest time,
And who shall sing their gladness in the measure of a rhyme—
With naught of care to cloud them, with easy tasks to do,
And teachers full of gentleness to guide the learners through
The mazes of the labyrinth, till all the grades are past,
And the coveted diploma is in the hand at last?

Perhaps an honest lad who walks so sturdily along,
May one day win the suffrages of many a mighty throng.
The boy whose foot is planted now on learning's lowest round
May scale the heights of science or its deepest ocean sound.
The soldiers of the future, its splendid rank and file,
Are hurrying forward here today where little children smile;
Here, too, beneath the daintiness of dimpled flowerlike face,
We catch the flitting sweetness of the mother's look of grace,
Where yet Love's steady light shall burn above a cradle bed,
And the tenderest love is watching o'er a little golden head.

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

Congress has seldom been so stirred as it has been over the disclosures made public by Secretary of State Lansing concerning a message sent by the former Ambassador from Germany, Count von Bernstorff, in January of this year, to the Berlin foreign office requesting authority to pay out $50,000 to influence Congress through an unnamed organization, apparently known to the Berlin authorities. Count von Bernstorff indicated in his communication that money had been used by this organization on former occasions for the same purpose. Indignation and disgust characterized the feeling among Senators and Representatives at the first reading of this astounding addition to the series of disclosures covering German intrigues in America and elsewhere. Upon second reading it was seen that no charge was made that the money went to Congressmen themselves, but that fact did not minimize the sense of outrage generally entertained over the admitted effort of a foreign ambassador to corruptly influence sentiment bearing upon Congress. There was widespread demand for an immediate investigation in which Congress would co-operate with the executive, using the information in the hands of the Secretary of State and the Department of Justice to facilitate the fullest inquiry.

Representive Heflin Makes Grave Charges

Representative Heflin of Alabama, on Friday delivered an impassioned speech in the House, in which he made the most startling accusations, saying, "If I were permitted to express my opinion, I could name thirteen or fourteen men in the two bodies who, in my judgment, have acted in a suspicious manner by the introducing of resolutions or bills or made speeches in the Congress or out of it that lead to the conviction that they are not loyal to this government in the hour of its peril. They ought to be investigated, and if found guilty they ought to be expelled from the House and from the Senate."

The matter was taken up on Monday, as soon as the House met, as a question of highest privilege, by Representative Norton of South Dakota, who read from the speech of Mr. Heflin in the midst of the wildest applause and great confusion. Mr. Norton asserted that Mr. Heflin had made false charges, and when Mr. Heflin attempted to reply, jeers and cries of derision from all over the House drowned his voice. At one time, when Speaker Clark managed to bring the House out of tumult into order, Mr. Heflin repeated that he had his suspicions about some of the Representatives. Cries arose from all over the House, "Name them," and for an hour or longer the excitement was intense. No such scene has been witnessed in Congress for many years, and evidently the matter is not yet settled.

Creation of Committee on Woman Suffrage Ordered by House

Creation of a Committee on Woman Suffrage was ordered by the House on Monday, September 24, by a vote of 181 to 107. The Ways and Means Committee will name the personnel of the new committee, which will have charge of all suffrage bills now handled by the strongly Anti-Suffrage Judiciary Committee. Creation of the committee, for which the suffragists long have contended, assures an early fight on the Susan B. Anthony amendment at the next session of Congress. Miss Rankin and Representative Pou, chairman of the Rules Committee, who reported the resolution, made the principal speeches for it. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, and Dr. Anna Howard Shaw are enthusiastic over this latest move on the part of Congress.

Secretary of State Lansing has been exceedingly tactful in speaking of the Japanese Mission to the United States, the members of which are still here. But upon being pressed for some indication of the progress being made in the numerous conferences he has had with Viscount Ishii, head of the mission, he made the following comprehensive statement: "The conversations with Viscount Ishii have been of a most satisfactory character and I think his visit to this country has been most helpful in benefiting relations between the two countries and in strengthening the bonds of friendship." It is no secret that the coming of the Japanese Mission was regarded as an occasion of the highest moment, not only because of its bearing on the participation of Japan in the war as an ally of the United States but because of its significance touching future relations of this country with the foremost power of the Orient. Certainly what the viscount has said publicly has led many Americans, who hitherto have thought little about oriental problems, to realize that much of the matter printed over here about Japan's alleged intentions in regard to Japan and China, Japan and California, has been purposely twisted to meet the ends of Germany. Despite the silence that has invested the Japanese Mission's stay it is certain that when it leaves there will be in many quarters of this country a higher regard for Japan than there has been before.

WRITE TO YOUR CONGRESSMAN!

An expression of opinion on national prohibition should be secured from the many conferences, conventions, and synods which meet this autumn. They should be urged to pass resolutions favoring measures now pending in Congress, especially the submission by the House of the constitutional amendment already passed in the Senate by eight votes over a two-thirds majority. The six years amendment should be stricken out by the House. The Senate would doubtless concur.

Letters should also go to your Congressman, urging him to vote for the amendment when the House acts upon it.

Protest Against Use of Red Cross Funds for Tobacco

Constant queries have come to our office as to the propriety of using Red Cross funds for the purchase of tobacco for soldiers and sailors. Numerous protests have been forwarded to Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman of the Commission on Training Camp Activities under the War Department, who is in sympathy with our side of the question. As the government has decided to provide United States soldiers and sailors with everything possible for their comfort, and as tobacco seems such a necessity to a majority, it is furnished to the boys. The Presbyterian Ministers Association of Washington and vicinity has now taken the matter under consideration, and at a recent meeting a protest was issued, which the secretary was instructed to send to both houses of Congress. The protest is "against the proposal to thrust tobacco on every soldier as a part of his ration." The resolution further states: "We respectfully protest against the purchase of tobacco for soldiers with Red Cross funds, much of it contributed by churches with no intimation it is to be so used. We have no thought of forbidding soldiers to use tobacco, but believe no sanction should be given to the use of this harmful narcotic by having it furnished by the government as part of the ration, or presented as a charity, which would naturally lead some to use it who never would have done so without special inducements. We also respectfully suggest to the Red Cross management that an organization so closely related to the churches in its work, should not allow its name to be used to sanction Sunday entertainments that violate the spirit if not the letter of American Sabbath laws under the guise of charity."

Better School Privileges for Children of Lighthousekeepers.

For many years, a goodly number of American born children have been cut off from school privileges, not from any neglect on the part of their parents, for a more industrious, temperate, and honorable set of men and women never lived, but because of the avocation of their fathers as lighthousekeepers of our eastern and western coasts. A woman of Maine, which has a larger number of lighthouses than any other state, has approached the government in behalf of the children, her own growing family being the incentive. She is a loyal W. C. T. U. woman, who faithfully wears her white ribbon, although rarely seeing anyone outside her own house. Once a year she attends the state convention, longingly anticipated as her one great outing. One day there came to Washington headquarters a letter from this brave hearted mother, seeking counsel. It was a new field of effort, and I went at once to the bureau where these matters are considered, only to ascertain that the question of school privileges and regulations comes under state laws, and that the government of the United States could do nothing. This woman has since turned her attention to the state, and I note that Maine has put in operation the plan of having a traveling school teacher visit the outlying lighthouse stations in the state, where school facilities for older children are lacking. The state pays the salary of the teacher, who is transported to and from the stations by lighthouse tenders when necessary, and also furnishes books. The keepers, however, are obliged to provide subsistence for the teacher at their own expense. One teacher now covers fourteen lighthouse stations, following a regular schedule. An objection is the short period—only two weeks—spent at each station by the instructor. It is most earnestly hoped this condition may be improved.

Congress May Adjourn Early in October

Congress is working hard to bring about an adjournment early in October. Every day Senators and Representatives slip away, and it is hard now to secure a quorum. Several have left this week, and others are kept at home through illness. But the faithful few are in attendance, rain or shine, summer and winter, doing their best for the men and women whose representatives they are. It is more and more a mystery why so many desire to return to Congress and work to bring it about, for it is no child's play to attend to the many calls upon

IOWA'S FLYING WATER WAGON

FIRST OF ITS KIND IN PROHIBITION HISTORY

Iowa temperance workers, in an effort to spread abroad the gospel of state constitutional prohibition and thereby secure an affirmative vote at the October 15 election, are adopting any and every legitimate means of advertising. A flying water wagon is their latest "hit." An aeroplane flight in the interests of prohibition has probably never before been attempted and is likely to open the eyes of the entire countryside. Crossing the state from east to west nine times, the machine will circle repeatedly over all towns of any size whatever, hurling "bombs" filled with anti-liquor arguments, consisting of copies of telegrams from men of well known national prominence. To give the messages the proper "air" they will bear the date of their scheduled "falling," and will be embellished with an official campaign button. Whole packages of these prohibition publicity agents, strapped together with paper bands which will easily release them at the proper time, will be "let off." The flying water wagon will make about forty landings and the dry committee is being besought by people day and night for "stops" or "circles." Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, president of the state W. C. T. U., writes that the idea is taking like wildfire.

Speakers will journey in autos simultaneously with the aeroplane, that the waiting crowds may hear from them on the liquor question. Altogether it is thought that the plan will be a "boomer" for the dry cause. The cost of the project will be great, but already it is certain that many of the merchants will assist with the financial end of the enterprise, which gives every evidence of helping to wheel Iowa into the ranks of states having constitutional prohibition.

Prohibition Sentiment in Texas at White Heat, says Ex-Governor Colquitt

As is well known liquor politics played an important part in the events which led to the removal from office of Governor Ferguson of Texas. Mrs. Nannie Webb Curtis writes that the impeachment is a signal victory over the liquor domination. Former Governor O. B. Colquitt, who during the days he was the chief executive of the state, was pronouncedly antagonistic to the dry cause, apparently sees the liquor question in a different light at the present time.

"The entire state would vote prohibition were the question submitted at this time," he is quoted in the Houston Chronicle as saying. "I believe the state would roll up a 200,000 majority for prohibition now. The state is thoroughly aroused over the condition of affairs at this time, when our nation and all our state governments should be bending their efforts to the defense of democracy throughout the world instead of trying to clean their own house. The people will sweep clean from the state every interest or man who has had a hand in plunging our state into its present sad state of affairs. The trend of sentiment in this state is all too clearly indicated in the recent elections in Dallas, Gonzales, Liberty and Williamson counties, and I might even add Harris county, where the anti majority of 5,000 was practically cut in two."

Dry Iowa State Fair a Record Breaker

The recent Iowa state fair which has attracted national attention and which has been declared a model by experts, was a fair in which liquor was entirely absent. "We never had a state fair like the recent one, said Dean C. F. Curtis of the Iowa State College, "and the absence of booze has been marked on its effect upon the crowds. We never have had as prosperous a looking lot of attendants before."

Grange Leaders to Help in Ohio Campaign

The Ohio state grange is going into the prohibition fray "with its fists clenched," according to an announcement of Grand Master Taber, as reported in a Columbus paper. Mr. Taber will himself take the stump for prohibition, and will bring into the state Grand Master Ketcham of Michigan and Grand Master McSparren of Pennsylvania.

City of Quebec to Vote on Prohibition

The province of Quebec, the last stronghold of the liquor traffic in Canada, is fast becoming prohibition territory. According to a recent announcement in the Montreal Witness, out of a total of approximately 1,200 municipalities in the province only 99 are wet. A sweeping victory has recently been won in Missisquoi county. During the summer months an energetic campaign has been in progress in the county, conducted so quietly, however, that no Montreal daily and few of the eastern township papers made mention of it. Protestant and Catholic, French and English, worked hand in hand, and prohibition was secured by a 1,732 majority vote. Every poll except one gave a majority for prohibition. In Farnham, Sweetsburg and other municipalities the liquor vote was literally snowed under. In some polls not a single liquor vote was cast, in others only one, two or possibly three. Quebec City is to vote October 4, and if prohibition is victorious in the ancient capital, a dry dominion is practically assured.

Are Iowa Liquor Dealers Becoming Reconciled to Prohibition?

"Have the liquor men of Iowa given up the fight? If so, the spectacle of ex-saloon keepers, liquor dealers, and wholesalers marching to the polls to register their vote for the 'dry' forces of the state may be a reality October 15, when the constitutional prohibition amendment is voted upon," remarks the Sioux City Tribune.

"I have been in the liquor business for twenty years," says one man who is now dispensing soft drinks, "and during that time I have sold trainloads of booze across the bar. While business connections may compel me to refrain from taking an active part in the dry campaign my sympathies are all with the prohibitionists, for I have money invested in this new enterprise. It is yielding me a fair profit and it has scarcely any grief connected with it." Some of the liquor men who have gone into the soft drink business, it is reported, are taking active part in the present prohibition campaign, because of the fact that should the saloon come back it would bring the added expense of another change. One big factor in converting the liquor men to the dry cause, says an ex-saloonkeeper, is that under the present regime the refreshment parlors are no longer forced to be constantly fighting the anti-liquor interests.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE THE WORLD AROUND

Woman suffrage is making triumphal progress in its world-wide campaign. Already eleven states of the United States and the territory of Alaska have bestowed upon their women full suffrage. In eight additional states women have been given the privilege of voting for the President. Six states have given women municipal suffrage. Five of them are included in the presidential suffrage list, Illinois, North Dakota, Indiana, Nebraska and Arkansas (at primaries). Vermont is the sixth. In thirteen other states women have school suffrage, and in four they have the right to vote on taxation or bonding propositions. During 1917 the more conservative eastern states have recorded two victories for suffrage. Vermont has given women municipal suffrage and Rhode Island presidential suffrage.

In Canada five great provinces, Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Ontario have adopted "votes for women." Even Mexico has caught the equal suffrage spirit and the women of Yucatan have been given the ballot.

On the other side of the world New Zealand, Australia, Finland, Norway, Iceland, Denmark and the great republic of Russia have given the women equal suffrage. The women of British South Africa have had municipal suffrage since 1914. By a vote of seven to one the British House of Commons has gone on record for equal suffrage and the Prime Minister of Hungary is reported as announcing that a bill enfranchising a large number of women will be introduced as a government measure.

TWO NEW WORTH WHILE BOOKS ON ALCOHOL

"This is the new epoch—please God, the last epoch—in the fight against the liquor traffic in America," says Louis Albert Banks, D D., in presenting to the public his new book, "Ammunition for Final Drive on Booze." "The speaker of today who is going to be felt effectively in the strife must use the arguments and speak the language of today. He will find here what he needs to equip him for the last drive on the enemy."

True to his word the author has secured the choice addresses of temperance orators, effective illustrations, fresh facts, strong arguments by the ablest men and telling testimonies. An exhaustive topical index makes it possible, without unnecessary expenditure of time and research, to find desired material.

Now that whisky is under sentence by the government there is need to emphasize the harmfulness of beer. Read the quotation from Dr. Edwin F. Bowers on "Beer and Stupidity."

"The most sinister thing about beer is its apparent harmlessness," says Dr. Bowers. "Whisky, wine, gin, brandy and other so-called 'hard drinks' long hid behind the Bibical bulwark, 'for the stomach's sake.' At last science and common sense combined to prove that they have no peculiar medicinal value. Then beer picked up the fallen banner. The 'food values' of beer and ale have been proclaimed so widely and entertainingly that the average person fatuously believes in them. Besides, beer is supposedly the beverage of that truly neutral country lying between sobriety and inebriety. It is the cup of compromise. 'I can drink beer all night without feeling it,' is a common enough remark.

"But can you?

"Modern scientific research has shown that, contrary to general belief, beer is proportionately much more noxious than are wines or liquors. The Bremen Anti-Alcohol Congress, a conclave of many of the most famous physicians in Europe, concluded that, while liquor makes a man brutal and dulls his judgment, an adequate amount of beer makes him slow-witted, and abolishes judgment. While wine or brandy, in sufficient quantity, makes a man crazy, beer tends to make him stupid."

The liquor interests have tried again and again to convince the public that Abraham Lincoln was a friend of the liquor traffic. A story which is doubly apropos at a time when we are using every means in our power to protect the lads of the Army and Navy from the drink evil is quoted from Dr. John Talmadge Bergen. It shows not only the great heart of Lincoln and his sense of guardianship over the men who followed the flag, but his abhorrence of the American saloon and the drink habit. At a Lincoln meeting among old soldiers of a Michigan city one of the veterans related the incident. "We have heard what Lincoln has done for all of us; I want to tell what he did for me," said the veteran. "I was a private in one of the western regiments that arrived first in Washington after the call for 75,000. We were marching through the city amid great crowds of cheering people, and then, after going into camp, were given leave to see the town. Like many others of our boys the saloon or tavern was the first thing we hit. With my comrade I was just about to go into the door of one of these places when a hand was laid upon my arm, and looking up, there was President Lincoln from his great height above me, regarding me, a mere lad, with those kindly eyes and pleasant smile. I almost dropped with surprise and bashfulness, but he held out his hand, and as I took it he shook hands in strong western fashion, and said, 'I don't like to see our uniform going into these places.' That was all he said. He turned immediately and walked away and we passed on. We would not have gone into that tavern for all the wealth of Washington City. And this is what Abraham Lincoln did then and there for me. He fixed me so that whenever I go near a saloon and in any way think of entering, his words and face come back to me. That experience has been a means of salvation to my life. Today I hate the saloon and have hated it ever since I heard those words from that great man."

"Alcohol, Its Relation to Human Efficiency and Longevity"

"Alcohol, Its Relation to Human Efficiency and Longevity," by Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk, medical director of the Life Extension Institute, is an absorbingly interesting study of alcohol and its effects upon humanity.

"If alcohol is the key that unlocks the door to the chamber of disease, degeneration and life-failure, we must hold it solely responsible for the results that follow its use," says Dr. Fisk, in the chapter, "Alcohol a Depressant." "The only safe course is not to use the key. Some individuals may enter the chamber for a little while and escape without noticeable injury; but given two million supposedly sound, healthy men, and let them one after another enter that door, and there can be no reasonable doubt of the result. Many will come out smitten as from the war zone; many will not come out at all. Given two million men of the same type, who pass by the door and do not use the key, and, considering the exactly measured evidence of common observation, who can question that at the end of twenty-five years, the first group will be decimated as compared to the second? If the life insurance statistics showed any other result, they would be inconsistent. Whether the total effect is directly due to indulgence strictly maintained within the limit of so-called moderation is a purely academic question. As practical men, what we wish to know is: What does it cost us in the long run to drink alcohol? The evidence that society is paying a heavy bill for the indulgence cannot be longer disregarded by conservative men, entirely outside of the propaganda for drastic methods of reform.

"The contention that there is an inborn social craving for alcohol is pure dogma. Man craves enjoyment, relaxation, change. He seeks to anticipate good fortune and to quiet the activity of those conservative faculties which cause him to worry over trouble and life-struggle. He finds that alcohol apparently assists him in attaining these ends, and he drinks it for these effects, not because he is 'thirsty' or 'craves' alcohol qua alcohol, without any knowledge of its effects. Many individuals who are wrecked by alcohol would lead normal lives undisturbed by any 'craving' for it if they were protected from the repeated experience of its effect."

The author examines the question from the point of view of life insurance statistics, of laboratory tests, of the clinic, of the sick room, and in other ways. He gives it as his cumulative judgment that alcohol is a destructive force, wholly evil in its total effects.

ONTARIO ENJOYS PROHIBITION YEAR

The province of Ontario, Canada, has had one year of prohibition and reports indicate that our neighbors to the North are well pleased with the experiment. One writer gives the following summary of results:

"The great outstanding gain has been a moral revolution in the homes of Ontario and the decrease in jail population. Those who were formerly a burden on the family are now the support of it. The commitments to Ontario prisons for drunkenness have decreased between 70 and 80 per cent. The total number in Ontario jails shows a falling off of over 40 per cent. In Toronto during the first nine months of prohibition the number of people in jail showed a decrease of 25 per cent. Druggists report a big increase in sales of tooth brushes, powders and pastes since the dry era was inaugurated, a significant argument for what prohibition does to restore self-respect. About eighteen hotels in Toronto to have closed within the year, but these were hotels where the bar was the predominant feature, and their dropping out has done little to lessen guest accommodations."

The Pioneer of Toronto gives an interesting review of the past year:

Commercial Travelers Pleased

"Prohibition is the best thing that has ever happened to the traveling public," says Mr. Alec Cook, president of the Commercial Traveler's Association of Canada. "The hotels are quieter at night, and more like home. There is none of the rowdyism there was when the bars were in operation. The accommodation is as good, and in some places better. The prices are higher, but everything is up, and the prices would have gone up in any case. I have heard no serious complaints. We had a lot of complaints under the license system. I think the hotelkeepers deserve credit for the way in which they have taken to the change, and the way they are observing the new law."

"Prohibition has been of great help to the retail grocers," said Mr. Hugh Blain, president of the Eby, Blain Company. "The grocers say that their customers are now paying their accounts better than formerly. Where they previously gave the money to the saloons, they now take it to their wives."

Electrician Speaks

"Prohibition is one of the best things that ever happened, not only to Ontario, but to the country as a whole," is the opinion of Mr. C. F. Meyrick, who is in the electrical business. "Business men are glad that it has come to pass; people are more refined in their appearance, and tradesmen are reaping the benefit in all directions, although on account of abnormal trade conditions it is impossible to say what percentage of increased trade can be placed to the credit of the temperance measure."

DEATH SENTENCE FOR THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC PLEA FROM PRISON CELL

One. just one, of the countless tragedies caused by the liquor traffic in every community where liquor is licensed came to light during the campaign in Dallas county, Texas. It was published in the Dallas Dispatch, and helped in the outlawing of the traffic in Dallas City. The story is common enough—only that of a murderer awaiting the death penalty for crimes committed under the influence of liquor—but his plea for the extermination of the traffic which was his undoing should cause every voter in the land to rise to the defense of those who are not strong enough to withstand the temptation of the ever-accessible saloon.

"When crime is attributed to the saloon it is fastened on the right source," writes Leonard Dodd, awaiting execution in his prison cell. "They speak of my crime as 'only the act of a vicious criminal.' What made me 'vicious'? What made me a 'criminal'?

"Whisky!

"I did not inherit a mania to attack a defenseless girl.

"Surely I wouldn't, knowingly, gamble with the gallows!

"No greater love burns in any man's breast than I have for my mother and my people.

"No one is quicker to go to the aid of any girl in danger than I. I WAS human until I forfeited my rights to be called such. Whisky destroyed all the good there was in me, transformed the man to a beast. I've seen dogs that slay rabbits play with babies. I wonder why the same dog kills, cripples—instinct? Whisky crazes the brain and, like the dog, instinct directs the human brute to maim, torture and kill. The man isn't the vicious criminal—the real demon, savage and vicious as a jungle beast, is liquor—the saloon! This terrible fiend, alert and cunning, is forever on the lookout, ready to lead astray your own unsuspecting daughters. Your sons, that all your pride lies in, are easy victims.

"Have you a son? Don't be surprised, then, if some day you are called to police headquarters to look after your model boy. You may get off by paying a fine; you may have to employ the state's best legal talent. You just can't believe that the boy you have done so much for, tried so hard to raise decently, is a murderer. Oh, God, why did he do it? Whisky!

"My daddy thought the same as you. Just a short time until a miserable life is ended, and another pawn of whisky is sent to meet his Maker.

"The liquor folks are going to tell you that booze does not cause misery and crime. Murder is crime; criminal assault is crime; robbery and burglary are crimes—and the cause in my case? I know, my people know, the man who sold it to me knows, that it was whisky.

"And I have asked each inmate of the wing I am confined in, 'Why are you in jail?'

"They almost to a man answered, 'Booze!'

"I never planned to commit the dastardly crime for which I am awaiting death. Somehow it just happened. I was lit up. Others will get drunk as long as the stuff can be bought. A drunken man is liable to do anything. He doesn't think of the law or consequences. His brain is in a fog. Have you a sister? Then it's your duty to protect her. Don't wait until it's too late. Vote your home town dry.

"I can see office buildings, hotels, and property controlled by the liquor people through a window in the jail. They have millions of dollars back of them; they have a slush fund, and silver-tongued orators. They are going to fight it out to the bitter end. Oh, people of Dallas, open your eyes! It's whisky that's sending your sons to the penitentiary and to the gallows. It's whisky that's dragging your girls to the gutter and filling the insane asylums. DRINK is the vicious criminal that ought to be hung!"

SOME NOSTRUMS: "WHAT'S IN THEM?"

MRS. MARTHA M. ALLEN, Superintendent of the Department of Medical Temperance for the World's and National W. C T. U., Forest Hills, Long Island, N. Y.

Tanlac, 16.4 per cent alcohol: Essentially a wine to which some bitter herbs have been added, a small quantity of laxative and some glycerine. The Journal of the American Medical Association says of it June 30, 1917, "There is not an intelligent druggist but knows that Tanlac is a piece of unmitigated quackery, and there is not a newspaper publisher who, if his family were sick, would attempt to rely on Tanlac."

Dr. Pierce's Anuric Tablets: Essentially sugar, an acetate, iodide and salicylate of either sodium or potassium, quinine, aloin and hexamethylenamin. Kidney troubles should never be self-treated as they are too serious for self-drugging. Before Pierce sent out a kidney "cure" he taught in his "Medical Adviser" that advertised kidney "cures" are harmful, indeed hazardous. Since he sends out a kidney cure this part of his book of advice has been omitted.

Warner's Safe Remedy, alcohol, 14.40 per cent: Essentially alcohol, glycerine and potassium nitrate with extractive matter. Alcohol should never be used in inflammatory diseases of the kidney, and potassium nitrate would tend to add to any kidney inflammation that might exist.

Asthma cures: Practically all asthma cures contain potassium iodide, a drug that impoverishes the blood when used frequently. Other ingredients used are stramonium leaves and mullein leaves. Force's Asth-Manna is mainly an emulsion of linseed oil to which sugar and potassium are added. Ascatco has been found to be an opium-arsenic preparation with benzoic acid and potassium and 13 per cent alcohol. Tucker's Asthma Cure has been found to contain cocaine. It is not always made the same. It is understood that persons are recompensed for recommending it.

Tonics: The advertised tonics and bitters are nearly all strongly alcoholic. They contain little besides alcohol and caramel sugar for coloring. Tona-Vita has a flavor of meat extract added to the alcohol mixture. Most of the "bitters" are now classed by the United States government as intoxicating beverages. An alcoholic mixture cannot be a tonic. Outdoor air, sunshine, cold baths, proper food, and exercise are the real tonics.

Kodol Nerve Tonic, 13.5 per cent alcohol: Solids almost entirely sugar.

Bell-Ans: A mixture of baking soda, charcoal, ginger and oil of wintergreen. These ingredients are not harmful but they will not work the marvels claimed in Bell-Ans advertising.

Nuxated Iron: A mixture of iron, calcium, magnesium, glycerophosphate, potassium, cascara, etc. The quantity of iron to a tablet was found to be 1-25 of a grain, and the quantity of nux vomica 1-500 of a grain. In a dollar bottle of Nuxated Iron there is less than 2½ grains of iron; in Blaud's Pills, the common iron pills sold in drug stores at 50 to 75 cents per 100, there are 48 grains of iron. It is not wise to take iron unless under the care of a skilled physician as iron may do much injury. Nuxated Iron is a patent medicine in the common use of that term.

Wine of Cardui, 20 per cent alcohol, with some viburnum and blessed thistle: Careful experiments with these two drugs are said to show that they have no medicinal value in the troubles for which Wine of Cardui is used. The alcohol deadens feelings of distress, hence seems to give value to the medicine.

Catarrh Cures: Dr. Blesser's was found to contain chamomile, anise, cubeb, pepper. The Anglo-American Medicine Company's Catarrh Cure was found to contain cocaine. Wei de Meyer's was found to be a mixture of carbonate and bicarbonate of soda. Piso's showed vaseline, carbolic acid and fluid extract of golden seal. Sage's showed common salt, a little carbolic acid, oil of peppermint, a trace of sulphur and powdered golden seal. Munyon's Special Catarrh Cure showed sugar pellets slightly medicated with alcohol. Nothing else could be found.

Consumption Cures: Pinex, a syrup of tar containing 16 per cent of alcohol, 17 per cent sugar and some chloroform. Shiloh's showed chloroform and some derivative of morphine with a trace of alcohol. Solberg's Consumption Cure showed nothing but barley flour. The cost of treatment is $20 a month! Hydrocine was found to be almost all sugar with a small quantity of oils and some inert substance like talc. Lung Germine showed a mixture of 44 per cent alcohol, 4 per cent sulphuric acid and 52 per cent water.

Cough and Cold Remedies: Most of the cough remedies contain some form of opium. Chloroform and alcohol are also used with wild cherry and licorice. Kennedy's Honey and Tar showed chloroform, salicylic acid, codein and considerable croton oil. Codein is a drug to be avoided. Mentho-Laxene showed the dangerous habit-forming drug, heroin. Piso's contained chloroform and peppermint, and the extremely dangerous drug, cannabis indica. Ajax Cold Cure, like many other cold cures, contains acetanilid, a heart depressant, also opium, yet claims to be "harmless." Morphine was found in Brown's Bronchial Troches. Jayne's Expectorant contained opium. Pape's contained acetanilid and a laxative drug.

Obesity Cures: Kellogg's (not the Battle Creek Sanitarium Kellogg) Safe Fat Reducer was thyroid gland, poke root and toasted bread. Rengo was thyroid gland, poke root, cascara and cassia. Marmola did contain thyroid, but a later analysis showed only a combination of two laxative drugs. Thyroid will reduce weight but it is such a dangerous drug that careful physicians will not prescribe it. Deaths have resulted from its continued use. The safe way to reduce is to cut out the starchy foods and the fats and eat gluten bread and bulky food like raw cabbage.

Headache Powders: Most of these contain acetanilid, a heart depressing drug, and caffeine, a drug injurious to the nerves and to the kidneys. Phenacetin is of much the same nature as acetanilid and is used by some manufacturers. Potassium bromid is also used. Deaths from "heart failure" are sometimes a result from the weakening effect of headache powders. To cure headache find the cause. If it is eye-strain, get proper glasses. If it is stomach trouble, be careful not to overeat, particularly of "rich" foods. If it is overwork, or fatigue, or lack of sleep, rest more.

Some headache powders are falsely labeled as "containing no dangerous drug" or "harmless" when acetanilid is present.

Kidney Cures: Buchu is in some of these: licorice, glycerine, potassium acetate, sugar and alcohol in others. Resol-Vent capsules showed nothing but quinine sulphate. Pettinger's Kidney Remedy contained couch grass, a little senna and the rest was crushed roasted beans! Swamp-Root analysis revealed a flavored alcohol and water mixture with sugar and a laxative with salicylates. Vernal Palmettona was essentially an alcohol solution of emodin drugs (rhubarb root, etc.), salicylic acid and glycerine. Any other ingredients could not be determined. McLean's Liver and Kidney Balm, 11.88 per cent alcohol, although its manufacturers warn against alcohol. Doane's Kidney Pills, oil of juniper, fenugreek and potassium nitrate. Dodd's Kidney Pills, a resinous cathartic with soap and a small amount of fat or wax, bicarbonate of soda, calcium carbonate, sodium and Rochelle salts. Foley's, alcohol, glycerine, caramel and a cathartic. Its claims are false.

Nerve Disorder medicines, Epilepsy, etc.: Miles' Nervine, bromides with sugar. Sanatogen, 5 per cent of glycerol, phosphate of sodium with casein, the solid part of milk. A pint of milk equals a dollar's worth of Sanatogen in food value, according to the analysts.

Cures for Drunkenness and Drug Habits: Alcola, Box one, caffeine, strychnine, talc, starch, milk sugar and coloring matter. Box two, similar, only boric acid takes the place of strychnine. Box three, tartar emetic, gypsum, talc and starch. Mrs. Margaret Anderson, to whom persons are told to write about Alcola, is a "stool-pigeon" for the Alcola manufacturers. Tartar emetic and strychnine are both dangerous poisons. Golden Treatment for the Drink Habit (Dr. J. W. Haines Co.), 75 per cent sugar, 15 to 20 per cent starch, a small quantity of ipecac and capsicum and apparently cascara. Edward J. Woods sends out a "complete treatment" of 60 powders and 68 tablets. The powders were found to contain tartar emetic and sugar of milk, nothing else. The tablets showed tartar emetic, sugar of milk and boric acid. "The estimated cost of the complete treatment is about two cents." The book "Nostrums and Quackery" says Woods' Tobacco Cure is just as worthless as his drink cure. Sante, sold as a substitute for whisky, contains from 21 to 26 per cent of alcohol. The solids were found to be almost entirely sugar with some bitter.

Bodi-Tone, cinchona, gentian, rhubarb, cascara, berberis, capsicum, lithia and iron phosphate. An insoluble substance, probably talcum, was found.

Coca-Bola, a mass of coca leaves, held together by gum benzoin. The sample contained 0.71 grains cocaine to the ounce. A fine preparation to make cocaine fiends.

Williams' Pink Pills, green vitriol, potassium carbonate, powdered magnesia, powdered licorice and sugar.

Green's Sarsaparilla contains formaldehyde with considerable sugar. Nearly all the advertised sarsaparillas contain iodide of potassium, a drug that impoverishes the blood.

Peruna is being advertised again. Some years ago Peruna was found to be alcohol and water colored and flavored. To avoid being taxed as an intoxicating beverage a laxative was added which the North Dakota Board of Health reported to be apparently senna.

Paine's Celery Compound, 19.25 alcohol with considerable sugar. Alcohol is the most active ingredient.

Dr. Jayne's Alterative claims to be almost a "cure-all." Analysis showed molasses, glycerine, a little calcium chloride, Epsom salts, sarsaparilla extract and 25 per cent alcohol.

Vinol is advertised as Wine of Cod

DEMOCRACY'S FOE

SURVEY OF DRINK SITUATION N EUROPE AT THE BEGINNING OF THE WAR

MARGARET WINTRINGER

Two great battles are on, two wars are being waged in the world today. Gradually the clash of arms will fade into a background against which will stand forth a war involving the physical, moral and spiritual welfare of every present inhabitant of the globe, and of generations yet unborn. And it depends upon the issues of this greater war whether the world shall be made safe for democracy.

The participation of the United States and the part it shall play in the greater and the lesser war, will determine victory or defeat in this grave crisis in which a whole humanity is involved.

Foreseeing that whether or not we kept out of the holocaust of arms, the United States would bear an important part in the war against drink, on a cold December day in 1915, I preferred my request in person to the State Department in Washington for a passport to visit warring Europe.

Promptly came the query from the chief of the Bureau of Citizenship, "Why do you wish to go abroad at a time like this?"

I answered that I wished to go to study the temperance situation created by war. All Europe had suddenly become a great temperance laboratory in which regulation, restriction and prohibition were being tried out on an unprecedented scale. After some persuasion, the passport was granted which enabled me to go abroad as a student investigator in this world temperance laboratory.

Drink in Its Relation to the World War

It is the purpose of these articles to give the results of such investigations as may pertain to the war and betray the part which drink has played in delaying victory and adding to the awful sacrifice of the world's young manhood.

In every nation now at war, temperance societies had increased in membership during the past fifty years of peace. In Great Britain, for many years before the war, dramshops were disappearing at the rate of a thousand a year. In London itself, with a million more inhabitants than in 1900, there were one thousand fewer licensed houses. Great Britain's drink bill was less than in the latter part of the previous century. In London alone a quarter of a million were reached in one year by open-air meetings held by the United Kingdom Alliance. Even the report of the Prussian Government Trades Inspection for 1911 stated that "Beer drinking is growing less and less."

Russia and France were the only countries where the ratio of consumption had not been diminished in pre-war times. It is well for Great Britain and the United States—now allies for prohibition—to remember that the failure in these two countries was not due to lack of temperance propaganda, but to misdirected temperance effort. In Russia, millions were reached in open-air campaigns; in France white placards of the government and the colored posters of the various temperance societies made their appeal against alcohol. But the effort aimed at regulation and compromise rather than prohibition, and the consumption of vodka and absinthe grew apace.

When war tore away the mask from the drink trade, sixty years of peace-time agitation and patient, systematic and scientific education enabled the public to recognize alcohol as democracy's foe; and started the revolt against drink which grew by leaps and bounds and early in the war threatened the overthrow of liquor autocracy.

In sheer fright, Norway jumped on to the water wagon and stayed there sixty-nine days. The historic lesson value of Napoleon's one-hundred-one days of empire sinks into insignificance beside Norway's marvelous sixty-nine days at the outbreak of the war. Never before in history was there such a demonstration of the triumph of prohibition over restriction in mitigating the drink evil. For sixty nine days the sale of liquor was prohibited by the government, and during that time the number of offenses caused by drink was forty-two per cent less than under the "Samlog." Prohibition would have made an even better showing had it not been for the private importation of Scotch whisky, which owing to the peculiar conditions of war, the government was unable to control. Then for forty-two days the sale of liquor was allowed three forenoons on four week days, and though the restrictions were most drastic, the offenses caused by drink trebled and came within one-seventh of the total number committed under unrestricted sale.

Norway's Sixty-Nine Days on the Water Wagon

Those sixty-nine days on the water wagon have caused Norway to desire permanent passage; and the beneficent effect of that trip upon a country so little afflicted with drink as to consume the smallest percentage of alcohol of all the nations of the world will not be forgotten by alcoholized Europe.

The war once ended—they too will ride for their health.

In fact, early in the war the neutral nations of Europe sought safety in more or less drastic prohibitory legislation. Holland prohibited the sale of spirits for beverage purposes. Denmark conserved her food supply by prohibiting the use of rye, wheat, potatoes, barley and foreign corn, except for the manufacture of yeast, and has since strengthened her laws until she has virtually prohibition. Except in Stockholm, Sweden had prohibition during the mobilization of her army, and seventy-five per cent of her subjects are now under absolute prohibition. In fact, it is largely due to the beneficent effect of such early measures of prohibition as they have adopted, that the neutral nations of Europe may hope to withstand the tightening of the food embargo.

Great Britain Within Five Minutes of Prohibition

The story of Great Britain within five minutes of prohibition, as I heard it from the lips of one of Britain's foremost statesmen, and the subsequent price which the nation has paid in the prolongation of the war and loss of valorous youth only await a Milton to become a tragic national epic. I am only free to tell the story that led up to that five minutes; the revelation of loss of time by war-workers, delay of transports and lessened munitions output, which resulted in an investigation by Parliament and the appointment of a committee to consider action by the government; an estimated cost of $300,000,000 dollars, an amount which would have been saved by fifteen days shortening of the war that drink has prolonged into years of indecision. Then everything cleared for the final vote of the committee, which was never taken, though it is an open secret that the King desired it, the public expected it and was ready for prohibition. In vain, prohibition leaders and friends of temperence crowded the House of Commons and waited outside for the hour for which they prayed to be ushered in.

Germany actually clambered over the wheels of the water-wagon, reviving the law of the State of Siege of June 4, 1851, which enabled the German army to be mobilized practically under prohibition. For an unheard of six weeks even beer was under taboo in all German villages. And to those six weeks Germany owes her initial success in the war. But ere firmly seated, she fell off the water-wagon. In October the law of the State of Siege was lifted and there followed the wretched village orgies, and the atrocities in Belgium which have forever blackened Germany's escutcheon.

France met the foe, courageously sacrificing absinthe, the green fiend known to the Egyptians in the days of Moses, but "invited and earnestly entreated" by her people, to prohibit the sale to soldiers, women and children, of spirits containing more than eighteen per cent of alcohol, Marianne hesitated, finally issued the order, and afterward so qualified it as to make even this palliative ineffectual.

Liquor a Greater Foe to France Than is Germany

But the women of France are courageously optimistic. In France, a mother mourning the loss of a beloved son said to me, "If the war brings no other benefit than freedom from drunkenness and the rescue of our people from the hereditary traits, degeneracy and enfeeblement of mind and body, which follow in the train of alcohol, then the war is a blessing and I rejoice to have given my son for such a cause, but if we do not overthrow the interior enemy, then a greater foe than Germany has slain our democracy."

The impartial historian will record that prohibition in Russia proved an insurmountable barrier to Prussianism during those early days of war, while Great Britain deliberated, hesitated and failed to make the supreme sacrifice which would have enabled her to have been the same insurmountable barrier to Prussian encroachment in the West.

As in the beginning of the war drink made itself a pro-German force, decreeing victory or defeat, by lessening the output of munitions, delaying transports and commandeering tonnage needed for war, so today it may prove itself democracy's foe, overturning majorities, and throttling the patriotic effort to increase our national efficiency, so that speedy victory may follow America's entrance into the war.

WHISKY CAUSE OF UNFITNESS FOR ARMY SERVICE

"Whisky caused the rejection of hundreds upon hundreds of our young men from the draft army who were found physically unfit," Lieutenant-Governor Dickinson of Michigan is reported to have said. "Examination papers absolutely and undeniably prove it." This statement is equally true of other states, and is one of the big reasons for the elimination of drink from the nation. If the United States is to have a future the young men of the nation must be safeguarded from that peril of perils, the liquor evil.

National W. C. T. U. Convention,
Washington, D. C.,
December 2-7, 1917

The article "Some Nostrums: What's in Them?" by Martha M. Allen, published in this issue, is to be leafleted, and can be secured from Mrs. Allen, Forest Hills, Long Island, N. Y., or from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Ill., at 40 cents per 100.

Many of the boys from northern homes are in training in cantonments in southern states. The acting president of the Alabama W. C. T. U. writes that white ribboners of the North, wishing to remember soldiers at these camps may send comfort bags or supplies to Mrs. J. B. Chatfield, 219 Holcombe St., Montgomery, Ala., or to Mrs. D. P. Haynes, Anniston, Ala., presidents of unions in these cities, who will take pleasure in seeing that the gifts are delivered.

Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, state W. C. T. U. president, writes that Mrs. J. S. Umberger, a white ribbon comrade of Las Animas, Colorado, will be glad to correspond with relatives of enlisted men who may be in the Fort Lyon sanitarium, established by the Federal government for the care of invalid sailors and marines, and that she will consider it a privilege to do anything for their comfort and happiness.

In this issue is published the first of a series of articles by Margaret C. Wintringer on war-time anti-liquor legislation in Europe. Miss Wintringer, it will be remembered, spent some months in Europe in 1915, studying conditions relating to the liquor question, and can speak from first-hand observation.

AND NOW THE UTAH ARGUMENT!

Every state which adopts the prohibition policy furnishes an incontrovertible argument against the continued toleration of the legalized liquor traffic. The liquor interests may with their ill-gotten profits employ space writers to argue speciously against the dry policy but their fallacious reasoning avails little; it is negatived overwhelmingly by evidence in the press of the prohibition states, proving that the anti-liquor law is the champion reducer of crime and drunkenness and the augmenter of wealth and prosperity.

Utah's prohibition law has had only two months to demonstrate its value, but already all over the state that "infallible standard by which to gauge the commercial health and energy of a community"—the banks—is proclaiming that it is an unqualified financial success. The Salt Lake City banks report a three per cent increase in deposits during the interim since the liquor shops went out of business, and banking institutions throughout the state make a similar showing. The press of the city gives the credit to the fact that Utah has entered upon a new phase of her economic career by becoming "bone dry" in the matter of liquor.

"The dourest opponents of prohibition must feel themselves confounded by the incident that the increased bank deposits and the abolition of the liquor trade so exactly coincide with each other," says the Salt Lake City News. "Their gloomy forebodings as to business prostration thus vanish into thin air. They were either woefully poor prophets, or they made predictions which they did not believe. In either case they are discredited, though that fact does not make much difference either way. The essential thing is that, apart from every other consideration, prohibition pays; for the million dollar increase over normal deposits since August 1 may not unfairly be cited as the sum which under the old condition would have been passed to the white-aproned gent across the bar in exchange for iniquitous stuff that the purchaser took into his mouth to steal away his brains."

Workers for state and nation-wide prohibition will joyfully add the Utah argument to those furnished by other dry commonwealths and will find in it further valuable ammunition to help score a victory against John Barleycorn.

A NOTABLE EXCEPTION

Much well deserved commendation has been given by the press to Provost Marshal-General Crowder's suggestion to the governors of the states that certain well-established places of business be closed as a "safety first" measure and as a mark of respect while the drafted forces were being mobilized in the various cantonments. A point to be noted in connection with the official's proposal is the omission by him of all lines of trade except one. Not a word about the shutting up of the grocery stores. Not a hint of the desirability of restaurants being placed under the ban to prevent overeating at this crisis in national affairs. Not a syllable that would lead the governors to deem it necessary to demand the suspension of business by the fruit stores, the confectioners or the soft drink emporiums, which might be supposed to tempt the populace to over-indulgence. One and only one branch of the commercial business of the states—the saloon—was considered so inimical to the young defenders of the nation that the Federal official communicated to the state executives the recommendation, which was virtually an order, that it be closed during the period of mobilization, as, says the general, "It is especially inappropriate that it be marred by the untoward events which drunkenness brings in its train."

Significant, is it not? Brings to mind the fact that when a riot breaks out the first thing done is to close these places for the sale of alcoholic beverages. Whenever a strike is imminent, these identical centers of trade have to be put out of commission. Absolutely in a class by themselves, tolerated by sufferance when affairs are apparently moving smoothly, given to understand that when any great emergency arises they are a recognized menace to the community and must be suppressed.

If such a precautionary measure for the protection of the enlisted youth of our land, as that suggested by General Crowder, is necessary for a day, why not for a week? For a month? For a year? For the period of the war? Why not, indeed, in the name of common sense and consistency, for all time?

"WAKING UP" IOWA

Iowa is showing itself very up-to-date in its campaign methods, all of which are proving to be efficacious in arousing the people to the necessity of continuous, strenuous work up to the day of the election, October 15. We venture to say, however, that none of its efforts will accomplish more in the way of "waking up" the voters than the tactics now being used by the representatives of the liquor interests. We are informed that every business man in the state has received a plain manila envelope, bearing a one cent stamp, and post-marked, Clinton Iowa, with his address printed in lead pencil in a childish hand. This envelope contains one slip of paper conveying the warning that the prohibition wave is due to arrive October 15, and that if the people vote "Yes," they will pay more rent, taxes, etc., and "turn the state over to a bunch of outsiders who are reforming them at a goodly salary." Then comes the appeal: "WAKE UP. Pass this along. Mail it to a voter today." Another slip bears the following threat: "This is a reminder that we will withdraw our trade from all dealers whose churches have entered politics, bribed legislators, or support any paid body of reformers. Prohibition is up to the voters and will not be bought by the children's pennies that escape the reformer's pockets."

This communication is first of all an admission that those who oppose the amendment have no valid arguments to urge against it but are obliged to resort to a threat of boycott so childish and foolish as to excite nothing but ridicule. It is a virtual recognition that the opponents of prohibition are lined up against all the moral forces of society, represented in the churches, practically all of which are in favor of the dry movement, and it is of course deserving of no intelligent man's attention, for the fact that it is sent out anonymously stamps it as the work of cowards. No man, no business, or interest that is afraid to fight in the open is entitled to a hearing.

Certainly the most ardent advocate of prohibition could not have devised a more effectual method of "waking up" Iowa to the true character of the opposition to constitutional prohibition.

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

A Study in Values

Dr. W. C. DAWES

A man offering his body in a sacrificial service of love and patriotism lies wounded, torn and bleeding. He has offered his all, his life, and now that is ebbing away, though the suffering has not passed. A fellow being approaches and into every wound pours a corroding acid. We shudder at the thought.

Substitute for the wounded man, a nation, for the corroding acid, alcohol, and the picture is true to life.

A second picture is before us:

A mother and her children are starving. Just across the street stands a vast brewery whose owner, when appealed to for aid, cries loudly, "What care I if you suffer for bread? I need grain to make my beer."

Our nation and our allies face hunger, thousands upon thousands starvation, yet the brewery interests threaten the government if grain is denied them.

The country that dares to oppose the greatest military machine ever constructed, stands afraid and trembling in the presence of those who would take the bread from the mouths of women and children, and give in its place a poison.

Uncle Sam, in the name of humanity, stand up and be a man!

These starving women and innocent children will take no thought of vengeance, but at the great judgment throne of God who shall say that they will not point the finger of scorn and say, "You starved me that the brewery man might destroy his fellows."

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What is the prohibition situation in the Dominion of Canada at present?
2. In what respects has Ontario felt the effect of the dry law during the year it has been in force?
3. Is there anything to indicate that the liquor dealers of Iowa are becoming reconciled to prohibition?
4. Name the states having full and partial suffrage.
5. What countries are demonstrating the success of woman suffrage?
6. Why should the temperance workers in every community carefully scrutinize the books on temperance in their public libraries?
7. Relate the story of Lincoln and a young soldier who was about to enter a saloon.
8. What part did liquor play in the battle of the Marne, according to a German writer?
9. Tell how one of the newest prohibition states is furnishing excellent arguments for prohibition campaigns.
10. In what definite way are all advocates of national constitutional prohibition called upon at this time to work for the cause?

Christmas Candy for the Soldiers

Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, urges that candy intended for the American soldiers overseas for Christmas be sent without delay. She suggests that all sweetmeats, especially home-made caramels and chocolates be well wrapped in tinfoil and carefully boxed. Mrs. Thacher expresses the hope that hundreds of pounds of confectionery may be sent by white ribboners to the boys in the war zone.

The October Number of the Temperance Educational Quarterly

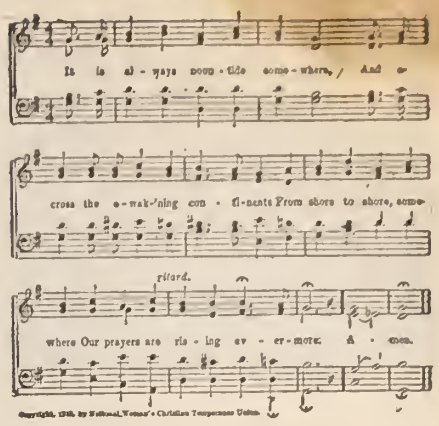
Special attention is called to the current issue of The Temperance Educational Quarterly, as it contains the new program for Temperance Day or Frances E. Willard Day. It is hoped that this program may be used not only in the states where the law requires the observance of such a day but in every state. The program may be shortened, if necessary, but it is intended for an afternoon when all local chapters of the W. C. T. U. will be present in the schoolroom and hear the children explain temperance.

In addition to the program the October Quarterly contains an article on "Temperance in Europe as Affected by the War," by Dr. Ried of Glasgow. This article is clear, concise and up-to-date and may be quoted with perfect assurance of its accuracy.

Special attention is called to an unsigned article, "A Doctor's Off-Hand Talk on Cigarets." By a mistake of the publisher the author's name was omitted; but this telling article that never could have been more timely was written by Dr. Arthur Holmes, Dean of the State Teachers' College of Pennsylvania. It should be read by all workers in the schools as well as by superintendents of the department of Anti-Narcotics.

The program may be obtained in leaflet form from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House at five cents per copy. Extra numbers of the Quarterly may be ordered from Mrs. Edith Smith Davis, 561 33d St., Milwaukee, Wis.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

"Lord Make It Right!"

Being perplexed, I say,
Lord, make it right!
Night is as day to Thee,
Darkness as light.
I am afraid to touch
Things that involve so much;
My trembling hand may shake,
My skilless hand may break;
Thine can make no mistake.

Being in doubt, I say,
Lord, make it plain!
Which is the true, safe way?
Which would be vain?
I am not wise to know,
Nor sure of foot to go;
My blind eyes cannot see
What is so clear to Thee.
Lord, make it clear to me.

—Unidentified

We record here the names of comrades and friends who have recently passed to the higher life:

JOHN M. SHRIGLEY of Lansdowne, Pa. Another great heart has been stilled. Mr. Shrigley was a life member of the National and World's W. C. T. U.: the strong and generous supporter of Mrs. Shrigley and Miss Ethel Shrigley in their National and state work.

MRS. CARRIE SHUMAN, Arcata, California, president of the local union and for three years president of the Humboldt county W. C. T. U. Although an invalid for a number of months, just a week before her home-going she attended a W. C. T. U. convention held in her home town, the program for which she had taken an active interest in arranging.

MRS. CAROLINE EDGERTON, Dunreith, Ind., an active worker for prohibition and equal suffrage and a liberal supporter of these reforms. She expressed the hope that she would live to see the fires put out in the last distillery, and her death took place September 8, when the distilleries were closed for at least the period of the war.

FAIRS AND OPEN AIR MEETINGS

CAROLYN P. LINDSAY, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent

As September and October are the months for fairs, the department of Fairs and Open Air Meetings is particularly busy at this time. The late date of the National W. C. T. U. Convention this year is a distinct advantage in that reports of all fairs held can now be included in the National superintendent's report. This is not possible when the annual gathering occurs in November.

While the department is now conceded to be an "all-the-year-round" one, especially because of its exhibits and window displays, many superintendents like to concentrate the effort of the year at this time on fairs, feeling that an unusual opportunity for making prohibition sentiment is presented upon such occasions, and so it is, particularly at the state fairs. The war has not changed conditions greatly in this direction. People are still looking forward to "fair time" when they may exhibit the results of their experiments and their labors in agricultural endeavor. The fair is the great recreation center of rural communities and the articles displayed represent to a great extent the efforts of the year.

Wherever people congregate temperance principles can well be promoted. White ribboners have a splendid way of advertising their year's work. The tent with its literature and free water, the parade, the moving picture (with temperance films), the "sandwich" man telling his little story by means of posters, the talk from the automobile—everything attracts and helps teach people the thing they must ultimately learn, viz., that national prohibition is coming faster than they can possibly realize.

A year ago we had nineteen prohibition states. Today we have twenty-six states, also Alaska, Porto Rico, the Canal Zone and the District of Columbia, all dry.

Last year, fairs were held in 666 places; in 354 of these, the W. C. T. U. had an active part. Nearly 2,000 other open-air meetings were held. Nearly 1,000 members were gained. Over 1,000,000,000 pages of literature were distributed and nearly $20,000 raised. Thirty-three fountains were erected, and nearly 8,000 posters used. There were fifty-two parades with 106 floats. Drinking cups and blotters, SIGNALS and fans were used by the hundreds. Nearly 300 pledges were signed.

We are hoping that this wonderful report of last year will be trebled this year. Twenty-eight states participated in the year's work. Let us not feel that all our energy must be given to war relief work. There are other ways of being patriotic. Our department work must not be allowed to suffer, and the department of Fairs and Open-Air Meetings is one of the most effective ways of creating public sentiment. "Let us not be weary in well doing," but keep right on to make this the best year yet.

It is not too late for exhibits and this is also the season for floats and parades. Surely there is something in the department Plan of Work which meets your needs.

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

EMMA L. STARRETT, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent

How our hearts respond to the call for service! And one of the calls is to keep the home fires burning. As Christian citizens we are responsible for the spiritual and moral influence in the community. The basic foundation of government is a Christian civilization founded upon the Golden Rule of Christ. In our anxiety concerning the war let us not forget that the old problems of city, state and national life, perhaps intensified, are still waiting to be solved.

We must help to make America safe for democracy, by urging law enforcement; the safeguarding of community interests and welfare; the teaching of patriotism, citizenship and morality in the public schools; the necessity of public playgrounds; the importance of the ballot—see department leaflet, "Only One Vote"—and the responsibility of every citizen to use his influence and right of franchise for the election of men in city, state and nation, who will stand for righteous decrees, and not violate their pledge of law enforcement and thus allow the vicious and immoral element to lower the standard of civic life.

In every way urge the importance of woman's influence—see the new leaflet, "Woman's Influence in Civic Betterment." Study community civics, city ordinances, state laws and the great need of desirable legislation along social, educational and industrial lines.

A number of the leaflets in this department have been used in comfort bags for the soldiers, especially, "What's the Harm in Gambling," "Cost of a Boy," and "Sobriety a Builder of Nations."

The offer of $45 in prizes for the best temperance cartoons by pupils in seventh and eighth grades and high schools should be given more publicity in local and city press. Send for copies of the free "Prize Offer" leaflet, urging the value of this visualized temperance education, for the superintendents and principals of your public schools.

A new declaration of policy in the administration of Indian affairs has been issued by Hon. Cato Sells, commissioner of Indian Affairs. "The time has come for discontinuing guardianship of all competent Indians and giving even closer attention to the incompetent that they may more speedily achieve competency.

"Broadly speaking, every Indian, as soon as he has been determined to be as competent to transact his own business as the average white man, shall be given full control of his property and have all his lands and money turned over to him, after which he will no longer be a ward of the government.

"This is a new and far-reaching declaration of policy. It means the dawn of a new era in Indian administration. It means that the competent Indian will no longer be treated as half ward and half citizen. It means reduced appropriations for the government and more self-respect and independence for the Indian. It means the ultimate absorption of the Indian race into the body politic of the nation. It means, in short, the beginning of the end of the Indian problem.

"In carrying out this policy, I cherish the hope that all real friends of the Indian race will lend their aid and hearty co-operation."

The question of the rights of the red man is, then, one of the home problems we are asked to help solve. Indians are volunteering in large numbers to fight for liberty and world-wide democracy. Immediately following the declaration of a state of war, a message from Salt Lake City stated that "Ten thousand native Navajo Indians will take to the war path for the government." Another from the principal chief of the Cherokees, Tulsa, Oklahoma, asked the privilege of organizing a regiment "to defend the flag when needed in the great crisis now before us." According to an official report 1,200 Indians from the Canadian reserves have enlisted for active service in the war. "They have proved themselves excellent riflemen and possessed of great endurance," says a report. Seventy-five Indians from Nebraska have just gone into camp. A dispatch from Glasgow tells of the training camp in Scotland for the Six Nations of the Canadian Iroquois, who are fighting with the Allies.

It is an inspiring thing to find the Indians joining in a struggle for international freedom, brotherhood and democracy. More and more are we beginning to give due heed to the rights of the race which once had this entire continent for a playground and which fed the starving Pilgrims in 1620. Let us work and pray that American democracy shall include them as well as the alien races.

The Seminole Indians in Florida, after a long, heroic struggle, have recently had 100,000 acres of land set aside for them by the legislature.

The courts of California have now decreed that Indians are both electors and citizens, and that, therefore, they cannot be denied the right of sending their children to the schools nor their sick and infirm to county institutions.

By slow degrees Indians are coming into their own. Literature urging law enforcement and explaining the meaning of good citizenship of a character which appeals to other peoples, will help solve the problem of the red man.

New Flowers Named for Frances E. Willard and Anna A. Gordon

If you desire a perfectly new and not-to-be-duplicated blossom to grace your home, send to the Gloede conservatories, Evanston, Illinois, for a Frances E. Willard or an Anna A. Gordon delphinium. Exquisite varieties of this beautiful flower have been named in honor of these well known women by Mr. R. F. Gloede, who has the Luther Burbank talent for producing new floral creations. The choice of Miss Willard's namesake was made within a few days of her birthday, September 28.

The delphinium belongs to the Ranunculaceae family, genus larkspur, so-called because the gland containing the nectar is dolphin shaped. The newly evolved "Frances E. Willard" species is cream white, with a heart of gold, and the blossoms upon the long, graceful spike are full and abundant. The "Anna A. Gordon" delphinium is an exquisite blue with a lavender tint toward the center.

The floral beauties which now bear the names of these two beloved leaders of the W. C. T. U. are aristocrats in the plant world. Upon the occasion of the christening of the plants recently the florist informed the representative of THE UNION SIGNAL that he had that very week sold one of these delphinium hybrids to a Lake Forest, Ill., resident for $1,000. This is not the first flower to be named for Frances Willard, a beautiful rose having for some years borne her name.

One Variety of Delphinium

Some Nostrums: What's In Them?

Liver Oil but contains no oil and showed 18.88 per cent alcohol.

Varnesis: 15 per cent alcohol, one per cent laxative drugs and a dash of red pepper. A person taking this according to the directions will get as much alcohol in a week as if he took twelve bottles of beer.

Parmint: "Appears to be an alcoholic solution containing sugar, glycerine, chloroform and a mixture of volatile oils, anise predominating."

Wincarnis: A meat wine made in England. It will make drunkards, as any other wine will. Meat wines are a fraud, as extract of meat is only a flavor. It is not a food.

Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills: Acetanilid and caffeine. The directions advise dangerous doses.

Mother's Friend: Nothing but cottonseed oil could be found in this.

Balm of Figs Compound: Fatty matter, icthyol, alum and boric acid.

Nutrolactis: A little strychnine and alcohol with a little laxative matter.

Thacher's Worm Syrup: Contains a poisonous drug, santonin, which is more dangerous when given as recommended, with castor oil.

Mayr's Stomach Remedy: Powder No. 1, Glauber's salts, acid sulphate. No. 2, sodium acid phosphate. Liquid, olive oil colored to disguise. The "gallstones" which pass after taking these are produced by the action of the intestinal fluids on the oil and acids.

Balm Palmetto: Capsules are cocoa butter, alum and a trace of hydrastis (golden seal). The cerate was found to be plain vaseline. The Female Tonic, sugar of milk 100 per cent.

Celerina: 42 per cent alcohol. "Nothing else that has any recognizable activity."

Preparations listed by the North Dakota board of health as consisting principally of alcohol are Peruna, Hostetter's Bitters, Swamp Root, Lydia Pinkham's Compound, Kennedy's Medical Discovery, Berg's Health Tonic, Hoff's Vitalizer, Kodol Nerve Tonic.

The board of health of Cleveland, Ohio, co-operating with the druggists of that city, have put the following nostrums out of sale in Cleveland: Hull's Superlative Compound, Swamp Root, Tanlac, Kopp's Baby Friend, Nature's Creation, Lung Germine, Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, Our Standard Remedy, Tuttle's Family Elixir, Dr. Kauffman's Sulphur Bitters, Plant Life. etc.

Beautifiers, etc.: Mayatone, Epsom salts and borax. Parnotis, baking soda and Glauber's salt. Saxolite, alum and Epsom salts. Crystos, common salt and boric acid. Spurmax, dried and perfumed Epsom salts. Newbro's Herpicide, alcohol, glycerine and salicylates.

The danger of self-prescribing is illustrated by this incident: A man who was suffering from an eruption in the palms of his hands used an ointment for some time but without relief of the itching or the eruption. Finally a visit to a physician disclosed that he was suffering from diabetes mellitus.

In the analyses here given all the active drug constituents are named. It is possible that there may be small amounts of other ingredients not definitely recognized by the analysts.

Contest Workers, Attention!

MRS. A. E. CARMAN, National Superintendent

Owing to the advance in the price of silver, material and labor, we are compelled to charge an extra twenty-five cents on all silver medals. The gold medals and all souvenir pins and badges will remain the same as at present. The price of the contest books will be fifteen cents each. The literature will remain the same. We do not believe this small increase in price will hinder in any way the work of the department.

The many calls for funds to carry on an active campaign for National Constitutional Prohibition and Work among Soldiers and Sailors will induce many, who heretofore have not been active, to take up contest work, as a well managed contest brings in money that helps materially in the extensive work of the organzation.

THE PREACHER'S ADVISORY BOARD

DAWLEY PALMER

At the first informal meeting of the officers of the church to which the Rev. Doctor Bolton had just been appointed, the pastor was received with hearty cordiality, and, in view of the alleged mistakes committed by previous leaders of the flock, everyone was very earnest in the desire for a mutual understanding of conditions.

"This seems to be an appropriate time, Doctor Bolton," ventured Mr. Smith, "to consider what is the highest good of our church."

"Yes, Mr. Smith."

"Now, regarding the trend of your sermons, I feel that it would be unwise for you to attack the Sunday ball games in our town, for it might offend many young people who attend our Sunday school and others whom we wish to attract. Some of our boys even play, and a large number attend the games. We never have openly opposed the sport, for fear the young folks might seek amusements further away from home."

"I understand," said the pastor, rubbing his chin.

"May I put in a word just at this time?" asked Mr. Jones. "Mrs. Jones, who is president of the Ladies' Society, wanted me to request, on behalf of the ladies, that you do not attack from the pulpit sects whose faith differs from ours—who read from other books than the Bible. You see, our ladies have many friends among such people, who always come to our church dinners and who spend considerable money at our bazaars."

"I see," said the reverend doctor, vaguely.

"And I should like to add," interrupted Mr. Brown, "that the men of the congregation might appreciate it if you were not to say anything about tobacco habits. Most of them smoke, more or less, and, of course, we wouldn't like to lose any of them."

"I infer, then, Mr. Brown—" began Doctor Bolton, but Mr. Brown had not finished.

"Pardon me; I have one more point to make. You will find that some of our people play cards—just in a nice social way, you know, but for some consideration—prizes—cups—little things of that sort—so if you should ever wish to preach against gambling, it would be well, perhaps, not to mention the things I have spoken of."

The reverend gentleman shifted his position uneasily, coughed twice, and essayed to speak, but was interrupted by Mr. Gray.

"Since these subjects have been brought up so frankly," he remarked, "would it not be well to advise Doctor Bolton of another matter? In times past, when the church needed help in paving the street and laying sidewalks, two liquor dealers donated generously. Though we are happy to say we have no saloons in this community, some of our best friends—those who have bought memorial windows and have assisted in other ways—are distantly interested in saloons in other localities; so that, doubtless, it might be well to avoid the liquor question except, of course, when it must come up."

"I came here to preach the gospel!" thundered the pastor, as, with white lips, he sprang to his feet.

"Certainly, certainly!" was the reassuring chorus.

"Well, what would you have me preach about?"

"Why—the Bible, of course," "To be sure," "Certainly," came from one and another of the surprised company.

"And what shall I preach against?"

There was an awkward pause, during which the puzzled spiritual mentors ahemmed and cleared their throats, but no one spoke. Finally Doctor Bolton arose, solemnly lifted his hands, and said, "Brethren, let us pray."

AN UNWRITTEN STORY

CECILE L. HOUGHTON

Mary Evans had an ambition. She taught the little school in her home district, by her sweetness and patience made her pupils love her, satisfied the neighborhood—which is really saying a great deal—and won the hearty approval of her occasional visitor, the county superintendent. But besides doing all this Mary had an ambition. She wanted to write stories, stories that should be eagerly read by people far and near, stories with a helpful, hopeful message that might cheer and bless the reader and inspire to nobler living. Dozens of airy, half-formed "creations" had flitted through her brain during the lovely, busy autumn months. Sometimes she had even caught a few words on the tip of her pen and promised herself that later she would find the time to elaborate her ideas. When, for a few days, there were no lessons to prepare, no work to plan and no test papers to mark, then surely she would have the coveted leisure moments to make her beloved dream come true.

At last, because of hard work done the evening before, Mary Evans was able to claim one particular Saturday morning as her own. To be sure, she gave some attention to certain duties in the home. For example, she helped mother with the work, advised sister Jane just how long to make her new skirt and what sleeve pattern to use and attended to many little details of various kinds. All these things did not take much time, however, and Mary congratulated herself that at half past nine she was ready for the task she had long had in mind—the actual writing of a story!

It was a bitterly cold day and the house seemed hard to heat. Finding that her own room was too cold for comfort, even if she wore a wrap, she brought tablet and well-sharpened pencil to the living room. Scarcely had she seated herself in the corner by the big stove when little brother spied her, left his toys and, nestling close, inquired, "Is 'oo goin' to wite a tory? Let bruvver see Mary wite a nice tory."

With one arm about the child, she proceeded to concentrate her mind, when a noise upstairs attracted her attention and she ran to the door. "What are you doing, mother? Moving the furniture out of the east room? It's too heavy for you. I'll be right up to help." After thirty minutes or so she was back again at her interrupted task. All would have gone well for several minutes had it not been for the telephone. Susie Jarvis wanted to make some candy and only "teacher" knew the best recipe. There was to be a vacancy in Sunday school next Sunday and the pastor called to ask Mary to take the class. An old classmate was home on vacation and wished to meet her friends at an informal party, and Mrs. Tupper, a near neighbor, was shut in the house with a cold and wanted Mary to come over and cheer her a little. The popular young teacher answered all these requests in her usual pleasant manner and again sat down to write. She had actually formulated a title and several words of introduction when the door opened and father poked in his head.

"Oh, there you are," he breathed in a relieved tone. "Got a pencil handy? I've been figuring some accounts and they don't come out just right. If it isn't too much bother I wish you'd go over them with me." Of course it was no bother. She was glad to assist her father. But evening found the delightful story still unwritten.

After the children had gone to bed and father sat dozing by the fire, once more Mary rather stealthily produced her paper and pencil. Uncle Ben, apparently deep in his paper, slipped his glasses down on his nose, looked fondly at his niece, and then said:

"Got something to tell you, Mary. Just heard it today. It's about one of your boys at school, too. You know last threshing time how hot it was. Mighty trying time for any of us. Never saw such wet shirts and roasted looking faces in my life. Well, that biggest boy of yours took a man's place with his fork all through the season. I used to give him a lift myself once in a while when I happened to work near him. He didn't ask me to; no sir; he's a gritty one! Well, one day Hunt and Lee and Lewis and some of those big fellows who ought to know better were wetting their parched throats with something not out of the water boy's jug, something they thought would brace them up a little. They thought it would be fun, I suppose, to see that biggest boy of yours 'be a man,' as they called it, and they set out to accomplish their purpose. I reckon you girls don't know, maybe, how subtle and persuasive and mean a lot of fellows can be. But try as they might, do you suppose they could make that big boy of yours give in? Not a hair's breadth, no sir! And I have good reason to believe that the training his teacher gave him in school and those physiology lessons had a heap to do with his standing up as he did and resisting the temptation to drink those big fellows put in his way. Well, I guess you were going to study or write and I'm hindering you, so I'll go to bed. I thought, though, I'd like to tell you what I have tonight."

The fire had burned low. Mary laid aside her paper and pencil and stole softly away to her cold room. "Perhaps it is not for me to write stories," she thought as she snuggled down in the warm blankets. "Perhaps it is for me to live out my stories and to help others to live them. Anyway I am happy, so happy, over my big boy! It is worth everything if I helped the least bit in the winning of his victory."

THE FLAG ON THE FARM

We've raised a flagpole on the farm
And flung Old Glory to the sky,
And it's another touch of charm
That seems to cheer the passerby.

But more than that, no matter where
We're laboring in wood and field,
We turn and see it in the air,
Our promise of a greater yield.

It whispers to us all day long
From dawn to dusk: "Be true, be strong;
Who falters now with plow or hoe
Gives comfort to his country's foe."

It seems to me I've never tried
To do so much about the place,
Nor been so slow to come inside.
But since I've got the Flag to face,

Each night when I come home to rest
I feel that I must look up there
And say: "Old Flag, I've done my best;
Today I've tried to do my share."

And sometimes, just to catch the breeze,
I stop my work, and o'er the trees
Old Glory fairly shouts my way:
"You're shirking far too much today."

The help have caught the spirit, too,
The hired man takes off his cap
Before the old Red, White and Blue,
Then to the horses says: "Giddap!"

And starting bravely to the field,
He tells the milkmaid by the door:
"We're going to make these acres yield
More than they've ever done before."

She smiles to hear his gallant brag,
Then drops a curtsey to the Flag,
And in his eyes there seems to shine
A patriotism that is fine.

We've raised a flagpole on our farm
And flung Old Glory to the sky;
We're far removed from war's alarm
But courage here is running high.

We're doing things we never dreamed
We'd ever find the time to do;
Deeds that impossible once seemed,
Each morning now we hurry through:

The Flag now waves above our toil
And sheds its glory on the soil,
And boy and man look up to it
As if to say: "I'll do my bit."

THE LOST TRILL

JENNIE N. STANDIFER

The frost fairies had painted the forests in crimson, russet and gold, which was a hint to the southern warblers that the song season was drawing to a close. The orioles, thrushes, cat birds and many other famous singers were trimming their feathers for their journey farther south, while the songsters who were going to remain through the winter were busy practicing their best lays before their beaks must be closed to protect their vocal chords.

Down in an apple orchard one crisp frosty morning, Mrs. Mocker and her two daughters were cleaning their summer home tree of borers before flitting to Cedar Thicket to spend the winter.

Mrs. Mocker was saying to Jimmie Mocker, her only son:

"You must learn some new notes before the songsters leave us, son. I want you to be as famous a singer as your father. You spend too much time practicing that whistle to worry Mr. Dog, and mewing like a kitten to puzzle Mrs. Cat. And do quit giving that hawk call and scaring poor Mrs. Hen and her biddies half to death. Never pretend you are something bad when you are not. Your poor dear father used to say, before that cruel hawk caught him, that we mockers must be proud of our good name and keep it spotless. Fly away now, and learn some pretty quavers and trills."

"All right, mother," chirped Jimmie cheerfully.

Away he flew over meadows and fields, to a briar thicket near a spring. A trim, brown thrush was balancing himself on the swaying limb of a willow, and caroling a gay rondo. Jimmie listened with both of his ears until he caught the key and then he joined Mr. Thrush in a lively duet.

When the thrush flew away, Topknot Redbird began a cheery solo on the other side of the branch. Jimmie began to pipe the notes, and before you could say Jack Robinson half a dozen times, he could warble them as well as Mr. Redbird himself.

Then he practiced the coo of a dove and Bob White's call. An oriole began a sweet sonata over in a tall elm, and Jimmie could soon sing it as easily as Mrs. Oriole.

He was wondering what he would learn next when a flock of noisy blackbirds came whirring over his head and lighted in a field nearby. They began chattering a chorus as they scrambled and fought over some stacks of corn.

"There's my chance to learn a quaver," thought Jimmie.

He flew to a fence near the blackbirds and his quick ear soon caught the throaty notes he wished to learn. He was singing merrily when —zip! a clod of dirt came whizzing in the midst of the greedy blackbirds. They were away like a flash. Two boys leaped the fence and began putting the corn in baskets.

"Blackbirds are rascals," said one boy. "If we hadn't come early, they would have eaten half of our popcorn."

"They are thieves," said the other boy. "I hate to hear their ragtime singing."

Jimmie spread his wings and flew to a barn yard. His mother would not want him to learn that kind of song.

Billie Blue Jay was scolding and cha-a-ing up in the window of a hay loft, and Jimmie called out:

"What's the matter, Billie?"

"I want an egg to suck, and Mrs. Hen won't get off her nest. Come help me drive her off and have an egg yourself."

"No thank you, I'm no eggsucker," replied Jimmie. "I've got to be careful of my name."

He flew to the top of a big magnolia and began to breakfast on the bright red seeds. He had finished his meal when from the back yard of a big house there came a clear, sweet bird trill that almost took his breath away.

"That's the song I must learn," he cried as he fluttered over to the back yard. "That is Robin Redbreast—the prince of trillers!"

Hidden in the foliage of a giant cedar, Robin was singing his best, while a dozen or more of his aunts and uncles and cousins and other relatives were feasting on the pale yellow, frost-bitten berries of a china-tree.

Jimmie flew to the cedar and listened eagerly to the wonderful song. How delighted his mother would be if he could learn that lovely trill! Softly he piped the notes over and over. He was beginning to get the right key and time when—down fell a young robin from the china-tree!

Jimmie expected the song to stop, but Robin Redbreast trilled and quavered merrily on without seeming to notice the downfall of his relative.

Another robin fell from the tree and several others were staggering giddily. Suddenly the gay song hushed, for from the barnyard a cautious old hen was squawking: "A hawk; A hawk! Hide! Quick! Quick!"

The robins in the china-tree flew to the cover of the big cedar. The hawk circled lower and lower. Jimmie was so frightened he hardly dared to breathe. One of the robins fluttering on the ground was almost in the hawk's talons when there was a loud shout, and the two boys with baskets of popcorn came running through a gate. The hawk flew away and Jimmie felt safe again.

"Look at those drunk robins!" cried one of the boys. "Those half-rotted china berries make birds as drunk as wine makes men."

"There's a mocking bird with that tipsy drove of robins," said the other boy. "I didn't think mockers kept such company."

"Oh, he just happened along."

Jimmie flew straight to the apple orchard and found his mother and sisters still hunting for borers in the apple tree.

"What new songs did you learn, Jimmie?" asked Mrs. Mocker with interest.

"I learned the thrush rondo, and redbird quickstep, and the oriole sonata."

"Did you learn any quavers and trills?"

"I got the blackbird quaver all right, but they call blackbirds rascals and thieves because they steal corn."

"Then don't imitate them, Jimmie. Leave that quaver out of your song."

"I will, mother. Then I heard Robin Redbreast trilling. It was the most beautiful trill in the world, and I learned it right away, but a hawk came very near catching a robin who was drunk on china berries, and I was so frightened I lost the trill. I could follow a flock of robins and learn it again, if—"

"No, you will not follow any of the rowdy Robin family, Jimmie Mocker," declared Mrs. Mocker positively. "If you learned that trill somebody might mistake you for a robin. No matter how beautiful it is, you'd better lose it than to lose your good name."

And to this time Jimmie Mocker has never learned Robin Redbreast's lovely trill. But his singing is so fine that the trill has never been missed from his store of beautiful songs.

The Part Drink Played in the Battle of the Marne

In the book, "The Battle of the Marne," written anonymously by a German writer and censored by the German authorities because of certain incriminating admissions as to the actual motive in attacking France through Belgium, is found the following startling revelation as to the part drink played in the conflict. The Northwestern Christian Advocate calls attention to the statement contained in the publication named, which is now translated into both French and English:

In telling the story of the forced march of the German army toward Paris, the author, supposedly upon the staff of von Moltke or von Kluck, says:

"Our soldiers are worn out. For four days they have been marching forty kilometers a day. The ground is difficult, the roads are torn up, trees felled, the fields pitted by shells like strainers. The soldiers stagger at every step, their faces are plastered with dust, their uniforms are in rags; one might call them living rag-bags. They march with closed eyes, and sing in chorus to keep from falling asleep as they march. The certainty of victory close at hand and of their triumphal entry into Paris sustains them and whips up their enthusiasm. Without this certainty of victory they would fall exhausted. They would lie down where they are, to sleep at last, no matter where, no matter how. Only the delirium of victory keeps our men going. And, to give their bodies a drunkenness like that of their souls, they drink enormously. But this drunkenness also helps to keep them up. Today, after an inspection, the general was furiously angry. He wanted to put a stop to this collective debauch. We have just persuaded him not to give severe orders. It is better not to be too strict, otherwise the army could not go on at all. For this abnormal weariness abnormal stimulants are needed. In Paris we shall remedy all this. We shall forbid the drinking of alcohol there. When our troops are at last able to rest on their laurels, order will be restored."

"Mark you, it is a German officer who states that German soldiers 'drank enormously' before the battle, and the carousal did not stop with the march," comments the Advocate. "In the French villages of Ile-de-France and Champagne the soldiers broke into the well filled cellars of the fled French and consumed their contents, leaving the main street of each town so strewn with wine bottles and broken glasses that the troops marching through later were forced to go by the neighboring fields.

"It would not be fair, perhaps, to say that the Battle of the Marne was lost through drink. It was lost to the Germans because people of heroic and splendid blood, aroused by the cruel thrust of a rapacious militarism, fought for their 'altars and their fires.' But when a German officer, writing a book on the battle, calls attention to the fact that German troops 'drank enormously' on the eve of battle, sensible people are permitted to draw their own conclusions."

ALCOHOL

ITS RELATION TO HUMAN EFFICIENCY and LONGEVITY

By Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk

Medical Director of the Life Extension Institute, and author, with Professor Irving Fisher, of "How to Live." Revised and criticized by the Members of the Hygiene Reference Board

An absorbingly interesting study of alcohol and its effects upon humanity which should be read with profound attention at this time, when the evidence that society is paying a heavy bill for its indulgence in stimulants can no longer be disregarded by thinking men and women. The author examines the question from the point of view of life insurance statistics, of laboratory tests, of the clinic, and of the sick room, and in other ways, and gives it as his cumulative judgment that alcohol is a destructive force, wholly evil in its total effects.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 60, Washington, D.C.

Our Washington Letter

them from their constituents. A member told me he had spent the entire day seeing what he could do for a woman living in his district, whose first husband, a Union veteran, had died and she had married again. Now the second one is dead, and she is seeking to have her pension renewed because of the service of the first husband. He was tired and I think somewhat disgusted, but said, "She is an old woman, and I want to help her if I can."

Grand Jury Scores Prevailing Style of Woman's Dress

Word comes to Washington of a stinging rebuke on the part of the grand jury of Frederick, Md., in regard to the prevailing style of woman's dress. The report says: "It would be far better for society and our young men if some of the ladies of this city would attire themselves in a more becoming dress. The law forbids partly nude characters upon billboards, and the government prohibits the use of mails for obscene pictures. We do not question the motives of our young women attired in present costumes, but we do believe it would be far better for society and that young men would live in a realm of purer thought if some of the women of this city would attire themselves in a more becoming dress. Thus, sometimes the eyes of the young men are inveigled into friendlier relations with the perpetrators and exponents of evil, brought about by an exhibition of their semi-nude appearance."

So far as we can discover, this is the first time a grand jury has submitted such a rebuke, in criticising the prevailing style of woman's dress. Shame upon womanhood that it should be necessary for men to call attention to the lack of womanly modesty.

Recently "Damaged Goods" was shown in films at the National Theater in this city, as a part of a nation-wide campaign by the war service commission, in the interests of purity. It was hoped that by means of this particular picture from an educational standpoint, and as a moral sermon, great good might be accomplished. Admission was free, and fully 1,500 soldiers and sailors crowded the theater. There were marines and jackies and soldiers from a dozen different divisions of the Army, student officers from training camps and Army officers, from subaltern to general. Speeches were made by Secretary of the Navy Daniels, Surgeon General Braisted of the Navy and others. Surgeon General Gorgas said, "This film is both a lesson, and an appeal to the intelligence. the patriotism and the manhood of the individual soldier and sailor to safeguard his body for the nation now and for the coming generations."

Why He Wouldn't Do

One of Chicago's old-time stock yards magnates, who was a philanthropist as well as a pork packer, had an intense dislike to cigarets, and would not allow anyone to smoke them in his office. One day, many years ago, a half-grown youth found him alone at his desk and asked for a job as an office boy. The packer looked him over kindly enough, but shook his head. "I'm afraid you won't do, son," he said. The lad, rather effeminate in appearance, had received several similar answers during the day and was somewhat discouraged. So now he said with some bitterness, "I suppose it's my yellow hair." "What is your name, my boy?" "John Harris." "Well, Johnnie," said the millionaire packer, "it isn't your yellow hair; it's your yellow fingers."—The Youth's Companion.

A Blow in the Face of the Liquor Traffic

Doubtless the military order forbidding the sale of liquor to soldiers and sailors in uniform, is the squarest blow in the face that the American liquor dealer ever felt. They can hardly look at the flag without "seeing stars" and "feeling stripes" that smart. They want that order revoked, and are going about in a thousand subtle ways to accomplish that end. They are not likely to succeed. The sobriety and orderliness which has marked the mustering of the troops has been an object lesson in prohibition which will not be lost upon the nation. The "drunken soldier" or "drunken sailor," who has figured in every former war, is practically an unknown figure in our streets and ports today. Of the thousands of uniformed men on leave, whom we have seen in the last seven months, not one has been visibly under the influence of liquor. Thank God, and thank Secretaries Baker and Daniels, and all others in authority who braved the odium of the liquor-capitalist press in the discharge of their duty.

Admiral Caperton was in the Plate River in July with the South Atlantic squadron, and some thousands of blue jackets had shore leave in the hospitable ports of Montenegro and Buenos Aires. They acquitted themselves like gentlemen. The chief of police wrote to the admiral that never had such a visit been accompanied with so little disorder, and an impartial observer, writing to a New York newspaper concerning the good behavior of our boys, confessed that the credit was due in large part to the anti-alcoholic policy of the present Secretary of the Navy. America thanks you, Mr. Josephus Daniels!—Christian Advocate.

I Can Brighten Your Life!

What would it be worth to have health—untiring energy, buoyant spirits, perfect figure, clear complexion and the right weight for one of your stature?

Think how it would brighten your life; enable you to work without fatigue; how your capacity for enjoyment would be multiplied; and what charm it would add to your personality!

This is my life work. I have done these very things for 80,000 other women, many of whom were weak, frail, depressed and discouraged. I have made them oh, so well! Leading physicians endorse my methods. Their wives and daughters are my pupils. Treatment in your own home—private and confidential.

Does it sound "too good to be true?" Tell me your difficulties and I will tell you, without cost, how you can overcome them — without drugs; without great expense or delay. I have had a wonderful experience and I want to tell you about it.

Hail, Thou Blessed, Light Giving Union Signal!

For three weeks I have not seen the "letter from home," as Frances Willard called our blessed SIGNAL. A bunch has just arrived, but I thought I would give the white ribboners just a faint conception of my feelings before opening them.

It is impossible to tell the loss that I have felt—that is an intangible thing too deep for expression. In the first place I feel behind—far behind in things temperance. I can not discuss the latest issues of the reform. I can not answer the latest questions. There is a feeling of wanting to step aside and hide when people begin to talk prohibition. I know nothing as to the latest steps taken in Congress which I learn from Mrs. Ellis' weekly letter.

I don't know what our dear National president, Anna Gordon, is doing and thinking these days. I am blind as to relief work done by our women for the soldiers. I miss the letters from the superintendents. I am left in surmise as to what the states are doing. Worse still, I know nothing of the work around the world. Yes, my mind is a blank as to what the young people are doing in the Y. P. B. I feel "hungry" for the sight of THE SIGNAL as a dear friend—yea, more, as a loved one who has for almost thirty years filled the three-fold office of companion, servant, guide.

Yes, I want to use THE UNION SIGNAL—direct its use to others, and I want to follow its orders as I would the guiding hand of wisdom.

Now, who else feels as I have described? If you have these blind, groping, ignorant, lost and lonely feelings, I advise you, most solemnly, to subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL and read it through each week. If you will, such a brightness, such a zest, such an insight and far-sight will be yours as will cause so great a transformation as to make you feel you hardly are the same person.

Now, I'll open the SIGNALS. Already my heart begins to beat with a faster pit-a-pat, and my eyes are beginning to see through the veil that has darkened them.

So much for THE UNION SIGNAL! Hail, thou blessed paper—the bearer of good news, high hopes and a promise of victory!—J. C. P. of Arkansas.

A New Book of Daily Devotions for Prison Inmates

White ribboners who are interested in prison reform work may be glad to know of the little volume of daily devotions for prison inmates; "Looking Forward Day by Day," by Judson Swift, D. D. The book contains a choice Scripture verse with inspiring illustration or explanation, a short prayer, and more extended Scripture reference for each morning and evening devotional hour for a month. Under "Prayers for Special Occasions" are prayers to be said on going to trial, before sentence, after sentence and on the day of release. The book is published by the American Tract Society, Park Avenue and 40th St., New York City.

"He Would Not Advertise"

There was a man in our town
And he was wondrous wise,
He swore by all the dogs that be
He would not advertise.

At last one day he advertised,
And thereby hangs a tale;

Sailors Assembled in Front of Barracks at the Newport (R. I.) Naval Training Station, for Meeting Addressed by Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Work Among Soldiers, Sailors and Marines, and Mrs. Jennie L. W. Rooke, President Rhode Island W. C. T. U.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

There has been a demand by almost the entire House for an investigation of the accusations by Mr. Heflin which were mentioned in last week's UNION SIGNAL, viz., "That he could name thirteen or fourteen members of Congress who had been acting suspiciously," thereby implying they had been corrupted by German gold. A committee has been appointed to look into the matter, and make a report at the coming session in December.

The Senate, too, has had its dramatic moments this week, and the excitement, while not as intense as in the House, has been kept at almost fever heat by the insistent demand coming to the Vice-President and to individual Senators from all over the country, for the expulsion of certain Senators because of their treasonable utterances. Just what may be the outcome it is difficult to determine, but that Congress has been stirred to its depths is most apparent. It is a time to test men's souls.

Tax Legislation Completed

Monday, October 1, without a dissenting vote, the House accepted the conference report on the War Revenue bill, thus ending the tax legislation for this session of Congress in the House of Representatives. Representative Kitchin, leader of the Democratic side of the House, and chairman of the Ways and Means committee, held the floor for two hours discussing this bill, and much of the time was consumed in showing the changes made in conference. Mr. Kitchin said, "We had before us virtually all past bills of this country, and many of those drawn in foreign countries since the war began, and this is a better measure than any of them. . . . The burden is shifted around equitably between rich and poor, and while every one has to pay, none has to pay unfairly." He continued, "It is the first conference report on a big tax bill in half a century which all the conferees have signed in peace and harmony."

Later the Senate without a roll call and with only perfunctory consideration adopted the conference report. The bill was immediately signed by Speaker Champ Clark and Vice-President Marshall, and was at once dispatched to the White House to receive the signature of President Wilson. The Senate sponsors of the bill were apologetic for many of its provisions, admitting that it contained numerous features to which they were opposed, but that some kind of a bill had to be passed and this was the best they could do under the circumstances.

Postal cards will sell for two cents, letters will be three cents, and the tax of one cent on a parcel post package costing twenty-five cents or more, is retained. A tax will be charged each person attending a moving picture show if the admission is more than five cents. A host of stamp taxes designed to raise $30,000,000 will have very general application. Increased taxes on coffee, tea, and sugar were stricken from the bill. The new rate on whisky is $2.10 per gallon, on beer $2.50 per barrel. Wine taxes will be doubled, and grape juice will be taxed one cent a gallon. It is said that the high price of liquors and the decreased demand are responsible for the closing of several saloons during the present license year. "Many of the dealers in liquor will drop out of business before Washington goes dry," remarked a saloonkeeper recently. "People will not pay the prices dealers will have to charge."

Liquor Provisions of War Revenue Measure

Under the provisions of the War Revenue measure, it will be necessary for all dealers having fifty or more gallons of liquor in stock to make returns to the internal revenue collector, and the past week they have been engaged in that work. The authorities are keeping tab on some of those making large purchases of liquor, and will enforce the Sheppard law if attempts are made to serve liquor to patrons for a consideration. The temperance forces of the District of Columbia are watching the movements that are being made by the liquor men and others who favor the retention of intoxicants. It is possible that at the next session of Congress we will make an effort to have a law enacted which will prohibit the possession of liquor in the city. It is to be deplored that in conference the section prohibiting the exportation of distilled spirits to Africa was stricken out. The question, therefore, must go over until the next session, when every foreign missionary society should send a protest to the respective Congressmen against this elimination, and urge a measure prohibiting such exportation.

The increased taxation on liquor, also, fastens the incubus more securely upon us, and stands directly in the way of National Constitutional Prohibition.

Three Hundred Saloons in Hoboken, N. J., Must Observe Government Order

In harmony with the government order for the closing of all saloons within a half mile of government docks where our soldier boys embark, in the neighborhood of three hundred saloons will be summarily closed October 8 in the city of Hoboken, N. J. In consequence, there is dire consternation among the saloon fraternity of that beer flowing community. A hasty call of liquor leaders was made, with the result that a committee, headed by the mayor of the city, Patrick R. Griffen, was appointed to go immediately to Washington and appeal to the President to revoke the order, so far as Hoboken was concerned. Before starting on their quest, the mayor received a telegram saying the President had referred the entire question of saloon closing around points of army activity to Secretary of War Baker. The order states that "The sale, directly or indirectly, of any alcoholic liquors within one-half mile of the port of embarkation at Hoboken is contrary to law." That the Department of Justice is determined to close the saloons within the barred zone has been made plainly evident, it being announced unofficially that the order promulgated by United States District Attorney Lynch would be enforced by armed men if necessary. Mr. Lynch made it known that saloonkeepers and liquor dealers who come within the provisions of the decree, and violate them, will be severely dealt with by the Federal authorities. As yet, there seems to be no appeal from the decision to close the saloons, though the liquor interests of Hoboken are pinning their hopes to the efforts of the mayor, expecting that he may obtain at least some modification of the order.

The unusual honor of having his nomination confirmed in the open Senate was paid this week to Charles F. Johnson, of Waterville, Me., a former United States Senator named by President Wilson as a Federal circuit judge for the First judicial circuit. The motion was made by Senator Fernald of Maine, and the Senate agreed to the nomination by a unanimous vote.

The new wireless station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, the most powerful in the world, was opened this week with a new world's record for long distance transmission. Messages exchanged between Secretary of the Navy Daniels and the naval commandant at Pearl Harbor were transmitted between Hawaii and Sayville, L. I., approximately five thousand miles, within thirty-three minutes.

Congress Glad to Adjourn

Today, Friday, October 5, Congress is working hard to finish its schedule and close this special session of the Sixty-fifth Congress tomorrow, Saturday, October 6. Each day many Senators and Representatives have gone away, making the number so small that it has been a difficult matter to secure a quorum. April 2 the session convened, and each day of the full six months has been filled with matters of the greatest importance. Immediately upon final adjournment train loads of Congressmen will leave for their homes. Eight weeks later the regular session will convene, and will probably continue for months.

TAX EMBEZZLER BLAMES BOOZE

"Booze brought me where I am." Familiar words in a court room, and yet always used to explain the tragedy of another life gone wrong. This time they were uttered in a Pennsylvania court and by an officer of the law, Squire Robertson of Bridgeport, who was on trial in the Montgomery county criminal court for embezzlement of taxes. The Philadelphia North American describes the scene in the court room as follows:

"'Before he got into the political game and took the office of justice of the peace and then that of tax collector,' said his mother, Mrs. Jane Robertson, eighty-seven years old, 'he was as fine a man as ever lived in this country. He got down at the corner with that gang of drinking bums, and here he is today.'

"Robertson nodded his head in approval of what his aged mother said.

"'But I did not profit one cent myself,' said the ex-justice. 'I spent the money unwittingly, largely to make myself a good fellow by buying booze.'"

CITY OF QUEBEC VOTES FOR PROHIBITION BY 2,000 MAJORITY

On October 4, the city of Quebec voted for prohibition by a large majority. After a most remarkable campaign the historic, conservative city of the Dominion, where the liquor traffic has apparently been strongly entrenched, declared in unmistakable terms its desire to abolish the sale of liquors. As we go to press, the following communication is received from Mrs. Mary E. Sanderson, treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., a resident of the province of Quebec: "Quebec City has gone dry by over 2,000 majority. It seems too good to be true. Montreal and Sherbrooke will now have to vote dry, and with these three liquor strongholds captured for prohibition, we shall have a free Canada."

As stated last week, a sweeping victory has just been won in Missisquoi county, making the province of Quebec nearly ninety per cent dry. Some time ago the Montreal Witness prophesied that if prohibition were victorious in the ancient capital of Canada, Quebec, it would virtually insure a dry dominion in the near future.

Portsmouth, N. H., Brewery In Operation Sixty Years —Closed!

The Eldredge Brewing Company, established in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in 1856, has recently closed its doors as a result of the Lewis prohibition law passed by the state legislature last April. For the last ten years or more the plant has employed three shifts and run twenty-four hours a day. To what use the plant will be put is a matter of conjecture. It is rumored that the Rockingham County Farmers' Alliance has a plan for taking over the ice vaults and the machinery and establishing a cold storage plant.

New "National Party" Formed

During the past week there has been held in Chicago a "get-together" conference of representatives of the Prohibition, Progressive, Social Democratic and Independent parties, resulting in the formation of a party to be known as the National party. Dr. Ira Landrith was elected permanent chairman of the new organization. Headquarters are to be maintained in Chicago. The plans outlined at the meeting are said to be merely temporary in their nature as they must await formal approval by the governing national bodies represented by the participants in the conference. The platform reported by the press to have been adopted unanimously after discussion included the following clause relating to prohibition:

"Alcoholism is a deadly disease, destructive alike to health, happiness, the social order, industrial prosperity, and patriotism. It is an insurmountable barrier to the attainment of true democracy. . . . In order that the destruction of the traffic in alcoholic beverages may become complete and permanent we favor the immediate submission by Congress of a constitutional amendment to that end, urging upon the several state legislatures that they promptly approve this amendment as soon as it is submitted."

Des Moines Chamber of Commerce Favors Constitutional Prohibition

At a special meeting of the Des Moines (Ia.) Chamber of Commerce, called for the purpose of considering the advisability of state constitutional prohibition, resolutions were adopted urging an affirmative vote at the special election to be held October 15.

Connecticut Towns Vote for Prohibition

Connecticut has added materially to its white territory as a result of the "small town election" at which ten of the larger industrial centers, Griswold, Milford, Plainville, New Milford, Haddam, Manchester, Ellington, Windsor, Stratfield and Suffield, turned to no-license.

Russia Orders Alcohol Supplies Used for Vinegar

With a view to promoting temperance permanently, the Russian provisional government is reported to have ordered that all supplies of alcohol at distilleries and on licensed premises shall be used for the manufacture of vinegar and mineral waters. These products, it is specified, shall not contain more than one per cent alcohol.

Utah Bank Deposits Soar Under Prohibition

Salt Lake City bank deposits have increased three per cent, or more than $1,000,000, since Utah went dry, it is estimated. One bank alone reports an increase of $200,000 since August 1. The president of the Nord Clothing company of Salt Lake City told its employes at the semi-annual banquet, that prohibition had had a favorable effect on trade and had given a general impetus to business, as reflected in the volume of business transacted by the company. Financial conditions in every part of the state are reported greatly improved, banks almost without exception claiming largely increased deposits.

Dry Law Reduces Cost of Government

"It costs less to maintain county jails since the dry law took effect in this state," says the Tacoma (Wash.) Ledger. "Inmates are fewer. A study of the statistics of the principal counties convinces one that the dry law has effected a reduction in cost of government, to say nothing of moral improvement and bettered economic status of families.

"The dry law took effect the first of the year, 1916. In that year maintenance of jails, according to figures compiled by E. D. Cowan of Spokane, cost $97,344, whereas in 1915 the cost was $123,990. The reduction was 21.49 per cent. The overhead charges for the jails remained about the same, which means practically the same number of officials were retained. Presumably one of the largest savings was in the item of food for inmates.

"Mr. Cowan finds that in seven of the more populous counties of eastern Washington the average daily number of inmates in the jails was 228 in 1915 and 121 in 1916, a reduction of nearly 50 per cent, and that in seven of the more populous counties of western Washington the average daily number of inmates was 347 in 1915 and 252 in 1916.

"The population of the state was greater in 1916 than 1915, and it is a fair inference that the dry law brought about the reduction in number of jail prisoners.

"The per capita cost of keeping the inmates was larger in 1916 than 1915 because the jail population was smaller and the overhead charges were not reduced in proportion to reduction in number of jail inmates.

"Some time ago figures were made public showing a decrease in the number of inmates of the state prison and reform school. This is to be attributed also to the dry law.

"Loss of revenue from liquor licenses was used as one of the arguments against the dry bill in the 1914 campaign. Of course, there was such a loss, but the moral and economic benefits unquestionably more than offset it, while the statistics show a considerable saving in maintenance of prisoners. Within the next few years it will be possible to make a more complete statistical study of the effects of prohibition."

FOOD DESTROYERS AND MINE SWEEPERS

MARGARET WINTRINGER

While in England I heard much of the heroic efforts of the mine sweepers. Seldom did I read a morning paper which did not record the death of some of these unnamed heroes, who, to feed Great Britain, battle with the elements as well as with the enemy—with dangers overhead and under the sea. "In the whole world, where will you get other such brave men?" asks Sir Edward Carson.

What wonder that there is great indignation among patriotic Britons because the brewers would send these brave fellows out to death in the sea, and demand, and have thus far compelled the government to hand over for their use the sugar and grain brought safely through the enemies' mines—precious foodstuffs bought with the lives of these courageous men, and paid for by the mine sweepers' orphaned children; or that the brewers have been christened food destroyers, while in the British mind today, the much derided teetotallers and prohibitionists have become the mine sweepers, conserving the nation's food supply.

When I was in England the first morning—"Bread or Beer" was issued by Sir Alfred Booth, chairman of the Cunard steamship line, whom the war found neither a prohibitionist nor a teetotaller. Yet, early in 1916, at a Liverpool war savings meeting, the doughty shipbuilder and world's greatest authority on transportation startled the British world by declaring, "The transport problem demands prohibition till the war is over."

He bluntly said, "I am not thinking of the temperance side of the question,—we have got beyond that now. I am thinking of the demand which the trade makes upon the services of our ships, our railways and carts, and our labor." He denounced the use by the breweries and distilleries of thousands of tons of coal mined and sent to them every week, the barley and other produce carted and hauled by rail to the brewery, brought back again and distributed to the consumer. "If we are to maintain our armies in the field, we shall before very long have to choose between bread or beer," warned Sir Alfred Booth.

Beer Lessens Munitions Output and Delays Transports

But before this, the government had issued a most remarkable document, containing incontrovertible evidence that drink was rendering British war workers inefficient, and charging beer with equal complicity with spirits for a lessened munitions output and delay of transports until in the trenches it was written in letters of blood that the brewers of England were helping the Germans to win the war. Refusing to countenance an enemy-trade and anxious to hasten the time when British lads should no longer die by thousands at the front, George the Fifth signed the pledge and banished wine, spirits and beer—there was no exemption—from the royal household.

War prohibition confronted the trade. Six years before, Mr. Frederick W. Thompson, an English brewer, visited America and published in a book on high license his discovery that prohibition does prohibit. The volume was widely read by the trade, and it caused British brewers to have such a fear of prohibition that they besought the government to buy them out and submitted a proposition for the nationalization of the liquor traffic. Though the proposition never came before Parliament, it served its purpose and defeated war prohibition.

1,000,000 Acres Reserved for the Raising of Grains for Intoxicants

Yet it was so!—1,000,000 acres of the best land in the United Kingdom were still devoted to the production of drink, and beer claimed nine-tenths of the entire million acres for barley and hops! During those first days in England, I was not yet accustomed to the rapid calculation of billions demanded by war, and it was startling to learn that the grain destroyed in the manufacture of drink during a year of war and war saving would have made 1,000,000,000 loaves of bread, and that 440,000,000 pounds of sugar were demanded for the manufacture of beer, while children cried for sweets and sick soldiers asked in vain for sugar for their tea.

The biggest thing ever set up on earth is the Great Pyramid. It is 80,000,000 cubic feet. The food destroyed by drink during the war would make two Great Pyramids, both bigger than the Pyramid of Egypt.

The longest British railway is the Great Western; it is over 3,000 miles, but it would not hold the food destroyed by drink since war began. If every inch of it were crammed with wagons, the Great Western Railway would need hundreds of miles more line to hold the trainloads of food destroyed.

There are but 750,000 railway wagons in the United Kingdom, but if the Drink Trade had them all they would not hold the food it has destroyed; it would need hundreds of thousands more.

There are about 30,000 engines on our British railways, and if the food destroyed were made up in trains of 125 tons apiece, all our engines would not pull them; we should still want 10,000 more.

—"The Fiddlers," by Arthur Mee.

Sugar a Necessity to the Soldier

The knowledge that more than half the whole energy of the body is derived from the combustion of sugar; and of the provision which raises the proportion of sugar in the blood as much as thirty per cent immediately upon the sounding of an infantry charge; the supreme value of sugar in averting and mastering alike the fatigue of soldiers and munition workers undoubtedly influenced Germany to cut down her beer output seventy-five per cent and raise the proportion of sugar in the dietaries of her soldiers. The English brewer's demand for the conservation of sugar for brewing at the deprivation of the soldier may prove a national calamity.

No More Ship Space for Prunes, But Plenty of Room for the Brewers' Hops

With the Army and Navy near collapse, beer was having the time of its life, masquerading as "The Economical War Drink." The brewers' manifesto, which appeared in February, 1916, urged reduction of food expenditure and advised additional drinking of beer! It demanded that malt liquors "be reckoned among the necessities rather than the luxuries of war time." Upon such false pretenses, beer laid its toll of a million tonnage on the depleted resources of the mercantile marine and demanded the importation of hops as usual, when dried fruit was prohibited; though the same weight of the festive hops required five times the shipping space necessary for the somber prune.

While, without complaint, the grocers saw their stock depleted by war-time legislation, the people patriotically accepted drastic food control and the public unmurmuringly submitted to shortage of coal, the brewers demanded and won the right to continue the waste of food and fuel. In the first year of war this enemy-trade evaded the fair share of the nation's vast war expense, and not only made the consumer pay the extra war tax, but by raising the price of beer exacted a profit of five and a half million pounds on the twenty-two million war revenue they paid the government. And for the first time in history the British government entered the foreign money-market as borrower!

While I was in London, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, the noted surgeon, complained one day, "The real rulers of our so-called democracy are the brewers, who, with their dupes and hirelings, pursue unchecked their national function, surprising in peace, staggering in war, of turning foodstuffs into poison."

Can one wonder that with the beginning of the war so eminent a patriot as Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey, the genial editor of the Spectator, changed that paper's policy from opposition to teetotalism and prohibition to support of them? The United States is also a beer country and we may ponder well the warning parable in which Mr. Strachey recently spoke to a London audience:

Editor of Spectator Warns London Audience

"A city, though its armies were victorious, was in dire straits for food. Strict search was made to see that nothing that could be used for food should be wasted, and lo, a great store of barley and sugar was found. And the general thanked God that they were saved. There was enough barley and sugar to enable them to hold out till the re-victualling that was sure to come in a few months. The barley, mixed with corn, would make excellent bread and the sugar would save the children."

"'Alas,' said the civil authorities, 'all this barley and sugar must be turned into beer; we dare not touch it.'

"The general, who was a simple soldier and did not understand politics, was angry. 'This is a town of sane people, not a lunatic asylum, nobody can be allowed to turn into beer what might be made into bread and so save the people.'

"But it was even so. The city fell and the conquerors drank the beer!"

The tense silence that followed was broken by this declaration:

"The proper thing to do, the straight thing to do, the only honorable thing to do, is to stop the brewers and give the people bread. With famine facing the world, the government must stay the food destroyers on land as well as on sea, if we are to have victory."

THE CAPITAL CITY IN WAR TIME

WASHINGTON THE MEETING PLACE OF THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION, DECEMBER 2-7

EARL GODWIN

The National Capitol Where During the Opening Days of the December Session of Congress the House of Representatives Will Consider the Amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition

There is an electricity in the air at Washington in war time. There is the feeling of a great force suddenly thrown into life, the consciousness that the motive power of an enormous organization is humming along, gathering itself into a position to make a greater leap and testing itself thoroughly before it gathers up its entire flood of energy for the final stroke.

Lucky indeed is the American who will be able to carry through life the memory of having seen the Capital City in war time. And more fortunate still will be the man or woman who can see Washington at this great and important time and comprehend the significance of the great throbbing now felt at the heart of the nation. Each throb sends the vitality of the nation coursing through its channels, carrying the new virility of a vigorous and pure people, destined, perhaps, to clear the earth of those forces which caused the great war. All this can be felt at Washington.

It is apparent upon the streets, where the fifty thousand new government employes have made the avenues and parkways the thoroughfares of a most cosmopolitan throng. Washington, chosen by the Fathers to be an isolated capital, favorable to neither northern nor southern manners and customs, gradually felt the warm glow of the hospitality of the Maryland manor houses and the charming customs of the Virginia planters until for all practical purposes the Capital became a southern city. But now, with the great influx of men and women who have rushed here to take part in the management of the war, there is probably no more complex population in any city on earth.

On Sixteenth street, which stretches northward from the White House, and is the conduit for the meridian of longitude on which navigators base their calculations, one can see these days the actual contact of the allied nations. Sixteenth street, the great afternoon driving and walking thoroughfare, taking precedence now over Connecticut avenue which was the great promenade of the diplomatic corps for years, is now almost a show window for the nations at war with Germany. On this great street one can see, almost any afternoon, the French Ambassador, M. Jusserand, whose most palpable eccentricity is that he persists in wearing a light summer straw hat nearly all winter. It gives him a most individual appearance, especially when he is bundled in furs on a very cold day. The Russian Embassy, a great mansion not a half mile from the White House, directly north, will give the visitor a hint of the majestic sweep of the Romanoff ideas. Walking or riding, at almost any hour of the day, one can see officers of the French, Belgian, English, Canadian, Italian and Japanese armies. Their uniforms are in every instance fancier than the plain business-like khaki of the United States Army, but the men are no finer. Of course the city of Washington is thronged with American soldiers, sailors and marines, and especially filled up with officers of the Navy, who are stationed at the great naval gun factory in the eastern end of the city, or at the Navy Department, where the big establishment of naval forces is administered.

Further up Sixteenth street are other embassies. M. Jusserand, the straw-hatted ambassador from France, lives in a beautiful mansion at the top of what is termed Meridian Hill, and not to be outdone, the Republic of Cuba is building as fine a home for its diplomatic representatives here as there is anywhere in the world. It will be a neighbor of the French Embassy. Across the street is the McVeigh home, a palace inside and plain as an old shoe without, except for its size. It was in this house that the first of the allied missions, the one from England, was entertained. In a little pocket directly off Sixteenth street is the home of Henry White, diplomat of long experience, having represented the United States in many courts and countries, his most famous assignment being that of Ambassador to France. It was in his house that General Joffre and the members of the French Mission were entertained while in Washington. Forty thousand children gathered in deep lanes along the upper part of Sixteenth street to give Joffre a welcome which made the iron soldier's heart jump for joy, and brought the tears to his clear, kind eyes.

On Sixteenth street, too, there are the embassies of Chile and Spain; and also a great brown stone castle, which no one can miss. This is the home of Mrs. John Henderson, widow of Senator Henderson of Missouri, friend of Lincoln, and the man who drafted the constitutional amendment for the freeing of the slaves. Herbert Hoover, the wizard who has gathered in his hands the control of the nation's food supply, has a house on this street; so also has Charles Evans Hughes.

In a white brick house, at the corner of Sixteenth and Q streets, lives Admiral Cary T. Grayson, U. S. N., not a naval fighter, but a doctor, who was recently promoted from a very low rank to his present very high one. His assignment during the present administration has been that of personal physician to the President, which accounts for his sudden rise. He now outranks many naval men of experience. Senator John Sharp Williams of Mississippi lives on this street. He will shortly retire from public life, and when he steps out there will be left scarcely one man of the old school Democrats who formed the minority party in the days when the Republicans were in overwhelming strength in the Senate and House.

On the corner of Sixteenth and M streets is the home of the National Geographic Society. This organization is the center of the geographical intelligence of the western world, and in addition, one of the largest publishers in the world. Under the auspices of the society expeditions are equipped and administered for the exploration of the farthest and most inaccessible corners. Roosevelt, Peary, McMillan—these and a hundred others have co-operated with the Geographic Society to add to the sum of human knowledge of the world in which we live. The publishing feature of the society is its magazine.

LOYALTY!

MARY FRANCES WILLARD ANDERSON

One of the biggest and best words in the English language is LOYALTY. Loyalty expresses the essential virtue of every successful nation, community, business, organization, home or individual.

That nation is greatest, that organization is most successful, and that home is happiest when all its members are loyal to each other and to the whole body of which they form a part.

Loyalty is that quality which prompts a person to be true to the thing he undertakes. It means definite direction and fixity of purpose.

It has been my experience that wherever I have found an active, progressive, enthusiastic Young People's Branch I have found a group of members who were loyal to each other, to their officers, and to the great cause for which we stand.

These days of turmoil, anxiety and suspense tend to upset our usual trend of action and interfere with the prescribed methods of carrying forward the work of our Young People's Branch. Calls by the score for funds and for personal service —most of them legitimate and helpful— are being sent our members and our young men and women are undoubtedly responding heartily. The danger at present lies in the scattering of forces and in losing sight of our own organization and the great principles for which it stands. To aid in a material way our soldier and sailor boys is commendable and is an effort which has the hearty endorsement of every loyal American, but of greater importance is the moral and spiritual welfare of our nation's defenders. Along just this line our Y. P. B. members are especially trained for service.

A valuable lesson for us to learn is to put first things first, and so, dear coworkers, through thick and thin show your colors in this time of stress and as Young People's Branch members be LOYAL!

"O watch, and fight, and pray;
The battle ne'er give o'er;
Renew it boldly every day,
And help divine implore."

OUR WORLD'S Y. P. B. COMRADES

Over one hundred British Branches are maintaining refreshment rooms for the soldiers and many others are helping in the temperance buffets and distributing literature upon all possible occasions.

Pembroke (Canada) "Y's" sent beautifully filled scrap-books to a hospital in France, and one returned soldier told how the wounded were so glad to receive them, especially because of the familiar hymns and tunes found in each copy.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S BRANCH NOTES

Our 1917 Pennsylvania Y. P. B. president, Mr. Claude Edgett, who attended our National W. C. T. U. convention at Indianapolis, is now at Allentown U. S. training camp. From every state our Y. P. B. officers and members are being called to the colors.

At the close of the New York state Y. P. B. convention in Ithaca, a Y. P. B. was organized. That gave the final touch to a wonderful gathering.

The Frances Willard Y. P. B. of Omaha, Neb., has furnished three hot water bottles for the hospital at Fort Crook, and the young men of the Branch are providing the yarn and needles for the young women to use in knitting various articles for the soldiers and sailors.

SECOND MEETING

Medal Contest.

(Do not fail to have at least one medal contest this year.)

CHOOSING THE LEADERS

There is too much reference to "the leader" of this and that society. Nearly every society has several leaders, and, if you study deeply, you will find that its whole membership list is composed of leaders, each of whom is well nigh invaluable to the organization. Think of a few of them:

There is the leader of debates, the leader of parliamentary usage, the leader of music, the leader of social meetings, the leader of entertainment schemes, the leader of decorating, the leader who creates enthusiasm, the leader whose chief ability is to get new members, the leader who wins co-operation from other organizations—and many more. Is not each a leader? Which one has all the ability of all, or even of three or four?

The important thing is for each Young People's Branch to discover the many leaders which it contains, and set each at work along the line which offers the most opportunities for success. To discover these leaders it is necessary to get together often, and work hard. Frequent meetings and plenty of work will bring forward all the "flowers of individual ability."

SHE HAD A WORD FOR HIM!

A young man decided to make to a young lady a formal offer of his hand and heart—all he was worth—hoping for a cordial reception. He cautiously prefaced his declarations with a few questions, for he had no intention of "throwing himself away." Did she love him well enough to live in a cottage with him? Was she a good cook? Did she think it a wife's duty to make a home happy? Would she consult his tastes and wishes concerning her associates and pursuits in life? Was she economical? Could she make her own clothes? etc.

The young lady said that before she answered his questions she would assure him of some negative virtues she possessed. She never drank, smoked or chewed; never stayed out all night playing billiards; never lounged on the street corners; never "stood in" with the boys for cigars or wine suppers.

"Now," said she, rising indignantly, "I am assured, by those who know, that you do all these things, and it is rather absurd for you to expect all the virtues in me, while you do not possess any yourself. I can never be your wife." And she bowed him out and left him on the cold doorstep, a madder if not a wiser man.—Health Journal.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA Y. P. B. CONVENTION

The Southern California Y. P. B. convention, held at Long Beach, was one of great interest and enthusiasm.

The reports, music, and addresses were of an exceptional nature, and a delegate to the National convention was appointed.

A large number of southern California's Y. P. B. young men are in training and their absence was keenly felt. One of the happy features of the convention was a sail on the Pacific ocean.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S BRANCH

SIDELIGHTS FROM SHAKESPEARE ON THE ALCOHOL PROBLEM

CHRISTINE I. TINLING

[This article is the second of a series by Miss Tinling. The first one, published in the September Y. P. B. number, considered the animal nature of man in its relation to alcohol as typified by Shakespeare's Caliban, a character in "The Tempest."—EDITOR.]

Let us now look a little more carefully at Stephano and inquire why he is so ready to share his precious liquor with the strange creature he has found upon the shore.

The ship's butler prides himself on not being easily frightened; no man can make him give ground. But he is considerably startled when he sees prone on the earth this four-legged animal in a man's clothing. "What's the matter?" he exclaims, "have we devils here?" Caliban has been quite scared at the sight of Trinculo, taking him, as we have seen, for one of his master's spirits come to punish him. Now, as the jester has crept under his gaberdine, his fears increase and he cries out in dread, "Do not torment me, O." Poor creature, he is trembling in every limb, and no wonder. He knows from experience how effectually Prospero can punish and how his invisible ministers can fill his skin with pinches.

Stephano concludes he is no devil but a monster of the isle with four legs. He can talk, too, and he speaks Italian. Wonder of wonders, that wrecked on a desert island Stephano should find someone who uses his own mother tongue. "I will give him relief," he says, "if it be but for that." But not for this reason alone does he apply the precious bottle to the monster's mouth. He begins to think, as Trinculo had done a few moments before, what a curiosity this creature would be in his own land. But the poor thing is evidently very sick; he is still shaking violently. He has a fit of some kind, probably the ague. "If I can recover him and keep him tame," soliloquizes the butler, "and get to Naples with him, he's a present for any emperor that ever trod on neat's leather."

Caliban's terror does not diminish. He knows not what this being is going to do next who has wormed himself into his gaberdine. "Do not torment me," he begs, "I'll bring my wood home faster."

"He's in his fit now," thinks Stephano, "and does not talk after the wisest. He shall taste of my bottle; if he have never drunk wine afore it will go near to remove his fit. Open your mouth," he says, with rough good-nature, "here is that which will give language to you. Open your mouth; this will shake your shaking, I can tell you, and that soundly. You cannot tell who's your friend," and as Caliban responds to the invitation, he continues to encourage him. "Open your chaps again."

But now Trinculo recognizes the voice of his old chum and cries out in fear and wonder. "Four legs and two voices," exclaims Stephano, "a most delicate monster. If all the wine in my bottle will recover him I will help his ague. Come, I will pour some in thy other mouth."

In short, Stephano is a firm believer in the efficacy of alcohol as a medicine. It will cure a fit, be it ague or what not, and by this panacea for the ills that flesh is heir to he will restore the monster and make his fortune.

It was inevitable that through the centuries mankind should look on alcohol as a help in sickness. It removes pain, lessens fatigue, and gives a sense of well-being. These effects, as we now understand, are delusive; they are simply due to the fact that it is an anesthetic. It is because it narcotizes the nerves that the sense of pain is diminished; the trouble remains the same, if indeed it is not increased.

STEPHANO PRACTICES MEDICINE

"He shall taste of my bottle; it will go near to remove his fit."

Until shortly before Shakespeare's time the science of medicine was in its age-long infancy. We obtain a faint idea of how great was the lack of scientific knowledge if we examine one of the statutes passed a few years before the poet's birth.

"In the parliament holden at Westminster in the thirde year of the King's most gracious reigne for the advoyding of sorceryes witchecraft and other inconveniences it was enacted that no persone within the Citie of London should take upon him to exercyse and occupie as Phisician and Surgeon except he be first examyned, approved and admytted by the Bishopp of London." That a cleric was the chief authority in matters of medicine and that sorcery and witchcraft were means used by many who called themselves doctors, are two facts sufficient in themselves to give us a picture of the ignorance of the time.

In the Dark Ages the monks had been the dispensers of physic. They had a few recipes which they prescribed for the most common diseases and if people did not recover on account of taking them, they often did so in spite of taking them and gave the monks the credit. Doubtless, too, they sometimes deserved it.

With the sixteenth century came the revival of learning in all European countries and among the many studies which received new impetus medicine was one of the most prominent. Men began to read the works of the ancient physicians in the original instead of trusting, as heretofore, to translations from the Latin and the Arabic. Better still, they began to explore nature's secrets for themselves. The brave Vesalius, in spite of derision and obloquy, dissected the human body and laid the foundation of the science of anatomy. Harvey, whose name marks an epoch in the history of medicine, was a contemporary of Shakespeare. He may be said to have instituted a scientific method in physiology, but his great discovery was not given to the world until after the poet's death.

This, then, was essentially a transition period. The light of science was indeed breaking, but the mists and vapors of ignorance had not been entirely dissipated. Great discoveries were being made and at the same moment men in high esteem in the medical world were writing the most utter rubbish.

The doctors were still to a large extent alchemists and would sell charms and philters that were supposed to possess mysterious power. They long believed in the medicinal value of gold; when it was acted upon by lemon juice, honey, salt and alcohol and repeatedly distilled, it was said to "heal every disease that is thought incurable in the space of seven daies at the furthest." We find "mummy" mentioned in Shakespeare. That was a magical mixture, whose name is suggestive of its source, and both long before and long after the poet's time it was used as a medicine. The charming and chatty writer, Sir Thomas Browne, says that Francis the First always carried "mummy" about with him and relied upon it as a standby in all disorders.

Shakespeare's medical knowledge was remarkable. His marvelous mind would appear to have assimilated practically all the learning of his age on this subject. We are even tempted now and then to wonder if he saw beyond his time, so scientifically true are some of his statements regarding matters which were then only partially understood.

Compared with the follies above mentioned, the use of alcohol as a medicine seems almost sensible and certainly it was entirely natural. Theoricus, a German writer of the sixteenth century, says: "It sloweth age, it strengtheneth youth, it helpeth digestion, it cureth the hydropsia, it keepeth the head from whirling, the teeth from chattering, the throat from rattling, the heart from swelling, the hands from shivering, the sinews from shrinking, the veins from crumbling and the bones from aching."

Long has alcohol held its place, but our own day has witnessed a remarkable change in medical opinion. Modern conviction is expressed in a nut-shell in the words of Dr. Norman Kerr: "Alcohol is the pathological fraud of frauds." Sir Victor Horsley says: "It is of no more use in disease than it is in health." No one pretends in these days that it will go near to remove a fit.

One of the things of prime importance in sickness is the elimination of poisons and the presence of alcohol retards this process because it reduces the amount of oxygen in the system. Add to this the fact that it is a depressant, interfering with all the vital functions and it will hardly seem necessary to mention in further detail the ways in which it acts as an ally of disease.

A canvass was recently made among American physicians in order to determine their present attitude toward alcohol and to compare the medical opinion of today with that of a few years ago. A number of hospital authorities replied that practically no alcohol is now used as a medicine in their institutions. Several said there had been a decrease of seventy-five per cent in the last five years and others put it as high as ninety per cent.

One somewhat amusing reply was to this effect: "Alcohol is sometimes valuable in fractional doses to allay the anxiety of patients and friends." That is, though the doctor knows it is worse than useless, he may feel obliged to prescribe it because the patient in his ignorance so desires.

The weighty words of Dr. Howard A. Kelly are a warning to all who in the medical faculty or out of it are inclined to tamper with this insidious poison: "It is clear, in the light of experience and of recent research work, that alcohol should be classed in the list of dangerous drugs, along with morphine, cocaine and chloral. On the basis of experience I appeal to my colleagues everywhere to abjure its use."

Alcohol will ere long be relegated to the same limbo as "mummy" and mentioned only as illustrating the follies of a bygone age.

NATIONAL PRESIDENT IN NEW MEXICO

The campaign for state-wide prohibition in New Mexico is in full swing. On October 4 a state council of representative prohibition workers met at Santa Fe, in the words of the local press, to "form an invincible line-up for the last month's drive of the campaign to carry the amendment November 6." Among the speakers of national reputation from outside the state was the National W. C. T. U. president, Miss Anna A. Gordon. Miss Gordon is the guest at the executive mansion in Santa Fe of Mrs. W. E. Lindsey, wife of the governor. Since her arrival in New Mexico, she has been kept very busy. By vote of the state Methodist Episcopal Conference she addressed that body in session at Las Vegas; as the guest of the governor's wife, she has attended and spoken before the State Federation of Women's Clubs at Gallup; and has participated in the meeting of the state council. She goes to Albuquerque for Patriotic Week, October 9-11, for the patriotic celebration which is to take the place of the state fair usually held at this time of the year. She will later speak at the state convention and at various rallies and mass meetings planned as a part of the campaign.

FRANCES E. WILLARD DAY IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

There was no companionship that Frances Willard found more congenial than that of the child. It would have delighted her to know that when she had passed on to the other world her memory was to be kept fragrant in the minds of the little people through the observance one school day in the year of what should be known as Frances Willard Day; when through exercises and instruction the boys and girls should be told of her great life work and urged "to enact against the drink habit a prohibitory law for one—that one himself—and to declare that law constitutional in the supreme court of his own judgment and enforce it by the executive of his own will."

Already eight states have Temperance Days, all except two, North Dakota and Alabama, named after Frances E. Willard. In Tennessee, Kansas, Oregon, North Dakota, Missouri and South Dakota, this annual observance has been established by act of the legislature. Missouri is the only license state that has taken such action. In Alabama and New Mexico the state boards of education arranged for the observance of the day. The popular time of the year for this celebration is the fall, somewhere near Miss Willard's birthday in September. Kansas celebrated it last month. Oregon is planning for an enthusiastic observance on October 26. The current number of the Oregon Teachers' Monthly calls special attention to it by a life sketch of Miss Willard. Tennessee is to observe the fourth Friday in October and is securing the co-operation of all public school teachers to make it a notable occasion.

The October number of the Temperance Educational Quarterly contains an extended program for Temperance Day in the public schools, prepared by Mrs. Edith Smith Davis, World's and National superintendent of Scientific Temperance Instruction. It can be secured in leaflet form from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Ill., at five cents a copy.

ACCIDENTAL TRUTH-TELLING

Not infrequently one comes across a bit of accidental truth-telling in the pages of the liquor journals. For instance, Mida's Criterion, in its latest issue, remarks, "The saloons of Chicago are keeping the fire and police departments in operation." This admission was of course intended to convey to the reader the idea that without the license money from the saloons the city could not maintain a police department, but, taken by itself, the sentence is a significant statement, the truth of which can be substantiated by the city records. The saloons of Chicago and of every other license city are largely responsible for keeping in operation the police departments of the respective cities in which they are located. The question long ago passed the argumentative stage, for the testimony from every large city that has gone dry shows a rapid decrease in drunkenness, disorder and crime as a result of the elimination of the saloons and consequent lessened work for the police department and diminution of expense to the taxpayers for the operation of the department.

A year after Colorado's prohibition law went into effect, the chief of police of Denver, Mr. Hamilton Armstrong, said of its results: "Prohibition has emptied our jails to a large extent. It has rid Denver of a considerable number of vags and petty crooks, who formerly made the saloons their hangouts; it has cut down the number of murders and suicides; it has done away, almost entirely, with the street fights that used to be daily occurrences and, likewise, it has operated to minimize the number of family quarrels that yearly come to the attention of the police department. Denver used to be considered the best city of its size in the country for police news. Now it is running a race for the distinction of being the worst."

Or take the record of the city of Portland, Oregon. Twelve months after the saloons were banished by state law, Mayor Albee made the statement through the Oregonian that "Police records show great reductions in crime, the number of arrests for drunks and vagrants from January 1, 1916, to December 1 of the following year, being 2,507, as compared with 9,008 for the same period of the previous year." Coming down to current history, the first month after Ogden, Utah, was bereft of its saloons by the state prohibitory law, there occurred a reduction of over 75 per cent in the amount paid for boarding prisoners in the city jail, according to figures taken from the office of the city auditor. The experience of Canadian cities is similar. The mayor of Winnipeg, Manitoba, recently stated that the first three months under the dry law showed that drunkenness had been reduced eighty per cent, while all crime throughout the province had been reduced fifty-eight per cent, as compared with the three previous months.

Even in the city in question—Chicago—according to Mayor Thompson, "The Monday morning police dockets show that since the saloons were closed on Sunday there has been one-third less crime."

The truth which the liquor journal accidentally told—that the saloon is the one institution that above all others keeps the police department in operation—deprives of all its force its later assertion that the finances of this same department are dependent upon the license money of the saloons.

A WORTH-WHILE INVESTMENT

"Oh, it does pay to get young people started right," remarked a W. C. T. U. worker of many years' service. The force of her fervid declaration lay in the discovery she had just made that the man to whom the credit was largely due for leading the Duluth (Minn.) dry campaign to victory had thirty years before been a member of the young people's society of the W. C. T. U. of which she had charge. Through it he had received the instruction and training that equipped him for successful leadership in the prohibition reform. A knowledge of the early life of the men and women who are making prohibition history today would disclose hundreds of similar cases, showing that through the Loyal Temperance Legion or the Young People's Branch, enthusiasm for the temperance cause awakened in the mind of many a young man or woman an ambition to champion it through life. Is there any work more important or that has in it the promise of greater and more permanent results than the organizing, instructing and training of the young people through the Young People's Branch? If you would insure the continued success of your work, make the young people's society in your community one of your chief and special interests, and do not be content until it is the most popular organization for the youth in your city.

OHIO CONFIDENT OF VICTORY

As the date for the vote on state-wide prohibition in Ohio draws near the campaign grows in intensity. October 7 was designated as Dry Ohio day in the Sunday schools. An appropriate program was prepared by the general secretary of the Ohio Sunday School association and the offerings received on that day were to be forwarded to the Ohio Sunday School association and will be used to help in the campaign to free Ohio from the liquor traffic. Many interesting occurrences, from time to time, show how the voters of the state are lining up on the prohibition question. In the Columbus Labor day parade the typographical union was not represented. Their reason for this was explained through the columns of the September Typographical Journal:

"It was decided at the August meeting of No. 5 not to participate in the Labor Day parade this year. It was learned that the brewery workers contemplated their usual stunt of 'packing' the parade and using it for their own propaganda. The dry amendment comes before the Ohio voters again this fall and the printers did not wish to go on record as favoring the various banners, floats, etc., that were in the parade."

The Ohio state board of administration has declared itself as opposed to the use of alcohol as a medicine, and it will be barred from all public institutions under state control. Dr. A. G. Hyde, superintendent of the state hospital of Cleveland, has been making some interesting experiments which led to this decision. In former years the state's bill for whisky for medicinal purposes has been approximately $1,000 a year.

The attitude of the general press of the state is one of the most encouraging features of the campaign. The false statements and foolish predictions of the liquor men are being ably answered by Ohio editors. Threats of increased taxes should the prohibition law go into effect are being brought to the people through liquor circulars in the vain hope that, through the "pocketbook nerve," votes may be won. One of the many replies being made to these circulars appeared in the Ashtabula Beacon, from which we quote:

"The circulars do not, of course, make any mention of the fact of the ruined manhood which is represented by the amount which comes to the state treasury as the result of saloons. There is no allusion to the mothers' tears, or wives' tears which every dollar of this revenue represents. There is no monetary equivalent to the sorrow which is brought to the homes of the men and boys whose money is spent in the saloons and a small part, a very small part, of which remains in the state as taxes.

"Even though it were necessary for the taxpayers of Ohio to go down into their pockets and pay every cent which is now paid by the saloons in the way of taxes, would they not be willing to do so, rather than have the destruction which saloons bring in the way of blasted manhood? But it will not be necessary to do anything of this sort, because what the state would lose in the way of revenue would be nearly, perhaps entirely, made up by the reduction in the cost of law enforcement and the expenses incident to court cases for which the saloons are responsible. The farmers of Ohio are too intelligent to be misled by reading matter such as is contained in the circulars being sent about the state, and this fact will be emphatically impressed when a vote is taken on November 6."

Leading men of the state who are in a position to understand the situation in all its details are prophesying victory for the dry cause. United States Congressman John G. Cooper, who last December attended the big W. C. T. U. rally in Washington and at that meeting became a life member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, speaking at the Ashtabula county W. C. T. U. convention held recently at Rock Creek, predicted victory for the Ohio dry cause, saying:

"If Ohio goes dry this fall, then we may look for the nation to follow, for Ohio is now the key to the national situation."

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. In how many states is Frances Willard or Temperance day observed in the public schools?
2. Explain how the beer interests of Great Britain have retarded the progress of the war.
3. The study of what Shakespearean character furnishes an interesting sidelight on medical temperance?
4. How are the police departments of big dry cities affected by prohibition?
5. Give the date of World's Temperance Sunday.
6. Name the subject to be considered and some of the methods suggested for the observance of the day.
7. What are some of the reasons that might be given for the deferred suffrage victory in Maine?
8. How has the cost of the maintenance of county jails of the state of Washington been reduced by the prohibitory law?
9. What indications point to victory for prohibition in the Ohio state-wide campaign?
10. Name some of the attractions of the city in which the National convention is to be held.

Many Oregon hop growers have been pulling up their hop vines and planting in their stead loganberry bushes, which prove a much better paying crop owing to the universal popularity of loganberries.

THE CAPITAL CITY IN WAR TIME

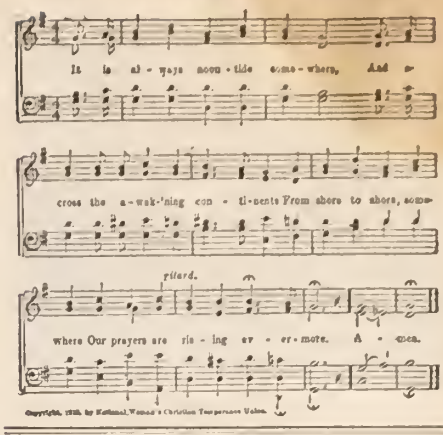
On the other side of Sixteenth street, a few blocks north, is the splendid building of the Carnegie Endowment, an institution of the great iron king for the benefit of human knowledge. From this endowment flows a stream of gold to be used by men of undoubted scientific knowledge and skill who are spending their lives in the advancement of science.

Sixteenth street, to which everyone is drawn, has become the main artery of the town, not for traffic and business, but for the things which go to make up color and character. One would think that a street of this kind would be called by some name more indicative of its merit. The Congress of the United States once tried to change this street name. Three or four stiff-necked ladies, seeking for a name to equal some of the picturesque street names of Paris and Berlin, actually succeeded in getting the Senate of the United States to pass a bill changing the name to "The Avenue of the Presidents."

Immediately all of Sixteenth street rushed to the engravers to have their cards and stationery changed. When the House of Representatives received the bill Democratic gentlemen of that body swallowed the thing with a wry face—but in a later bill changed the name back to Sixteenth street, which the Senate accepted just as ungracefully. The engravers and stationers reaped another harvest, and the name now remains Sixteenth street. It is the cosmopolite thoroughfare of the Capital City, and no visitor will regret spending hours strolling or riding up and down its fine length.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



THE GOOD TEACHER

The Lord is my teacher,
I shall not lose the way.

He leadeth me in the lowly path of learning,
He prepareth a lesson for me every day;
He bringeth me to the clear fountains of instruction,
Little by little he showeth me the beauty of truth.

The world is a great book he hath written,
He turneth the leaves for me slowly;
They are all inscribed with images and letters,
He poureth light on the pictures and the words.

He taketh me by the hand to the hill-top of vision,
And my soul is glad when I perceive his meaning;
In the valley also he walketh beside me,
In the dark places he whispereth to my heart.

Even though my lesson be hard, it is not hopeless,
For the Lord is patient with his slow scholar;
He will wait awhile for my weakness,
And help me to read the truth through tears.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4

Dear Sunday School Workers:

World's Temperance Sunday draws near. The date is November 4. The International Lesson Committee could not have selected a better Temperance Lesson than the one scheduled for our coming World's Temperance Sunday. It is found in I Kings 20:1-21 and is entitled, "Defeat Through Drunkenness." The Golden Text is found in I Kings 20:11. The Syrian king with his invading, half-savage army, made an overpowering raid upon Israel, destroying villages, farms and orchards, ravaging homes and murdering women and children. The prime purpose of this enemy was to secure the gold and silver of Samaria, the wealthy capital city, to seize the bountiful harvests of grain and fruit, regardless of the fate of the people, and to make women and children their prey.

A careful study of the lesson will show that no better type of King Alcohol could be conceived than the wicked king of Syria. The power of the organized liquor traffic has been so great as to practically make it possible for King Alcohol to say, "Your gold and your silver is mine." Surely he has seized not only the gold and silver but also the harvests of grain and fruit. He has ravaged homes, made victims of women and innocent children and the desolation caused by the liquor traffic in our country may well be compared to the devastation of an invading army.

But the voice of the people is being heard today against King Alcohol and his invading army and God is giving victory to the forces of righteousness. The doom of the liquor traffic is sealed. It must die.

Sunday school workers have had a large part in the onward march of prohibition, and so on World's Temperance Sunday let the keynote of every temperance program be "Victory."

November 4 should be the one great temperance rally day of the year. To make it such there is need of special effort. The first important work is publicity. Announce the day through the press. Let the public know the origin of the movement to establish a World's Temperance Sunday. Let due credit be given to the Sunday School department of the National W. C. T. U. for advancing the movement in the United States and to the World's Sunday School department for securing the co-operation of Sunday school workers of foreign lands. All needed information for publicity work is found in the department leaflet entitled, "World's Temperance Sunday," a copy of which should be given to pastors, superintendents and teachers. (Price, 25 cents per 100).

Decorate for World's Temperance Sunday. Let the decorations be both beautiful and significant. Use flowers and birds for cheer. Use the Stars and Stripes to suggest the fact that true patriots will protect our country from the devastating army of the liquor traffic and write prohibition in the laws of our land. Use the conquest flag to suggest another fact that Christ is the Captain of the Temperance Army and because the battle is the Lord's, victory is certain. Let suitable posters be used in every department, to become silent teachers of truth concerning alcohol and the liquor traffic. Display pledge chains and pledge flags and let them emphasize the principle of total abstinence as the safeguard to our youth.

Plan an inspirational temperance program for each department of the school, or, if desired, the Junior or Intermediate department may give the temperance program before the entire school assembled. A Sunday school medal contest, given in one-half hour, with the awarding of the Sunday school medal, is always an interesting program. Our suggestive outline program for the Sunday school hour, if carried out, will also prove effective.

Have an impressive pledge signing exercise. Print upon the blackboard or print in motto form the following:

EVERY MEMBER A TOTAL ABSTAINER
TEMPERANCE WORKER.

TODAY IS THE TIME TO DECIDE AGAINST STRONG DRINK
DECLARE YOUR PRINCIPLES
DO SOMETHING FOR TEMPERANCE

The use of our patriotic temperance pledge is opportune. The pastor or superintendent can make much of the preamble of that pledge, which reads: "For Love of Christ and Country, In the Cause of Freedom from King Alcohol." The pledge is either single or triple. Begin to construct a pledge flag, either of the regular red, white and blue triple pledge cards or of the International single pledge cards in colors. A beautiful flag can be constructed of our pledge links, in colors, by pasting them together lengthwise and permitting each stripe thus made to hang loose. Let emphasis be given to Christian and patriotic citizenship by the circulation of the Christian citizenship pledge (and here again the pastor or superintendent could use the preamble as the basis of an exhortation. It reads: "I believe that the liquor traffic ought to be destroyed; that government ought to protect virtue, banish vice, and safely guard the homes and liberties of the people,") and the pledge is a promise to use the ballot in the interest of good citizenship and good government. (Price of Patriotic and Citizenship cards, 50 cents; the flag cards, triple pledge, 30 cents; the International pledge for flag, 40 cents; the pledge links, 35 cents per 100, postpaid).

Remember the Soldier Boys. Our department has issued a leaflet giving suggestions for Sunday school patriotic service, some of which might well be embodied in the plans for the observance of World's Temperance Sunday. Especially do we ask that every young man who has enlisted in the army and who was a member of the Sunday school shall, by vote of the school to which he belongs, receive a letter containing a pledge card, with the request that he will sign the same. A duplicate card might be enclosed to be signed and returned to his pastor or superintendent.

Hold a competitive Sunday school temperance rally on the afternoon or evening of World's Temperance Sunday. Invite all schools to participate. Let the schools compete for a flag to be presented by the local union or some generous friend of our work. The competition could be conducted as follows: Each school will have its own temperance program and then contribute one feature of it to the rally program. Judges will award the prize to the school furnishing the best exercise for the rally program. Points of merit may be decided upon, which will govern the judges in their decision.

A Temperance Day exercise may be given on Sunday evening by the Sunday school. The department publishes an attractive program for such a meeting or for a Temperance Day rally. It is entitled "Victory." (Price of program, including music, 5 cents. A supplement giving recitations, 5 cents.)

Finally, on World's Temperance Sunday, make one more plea for National Constitutional Prohibition. Let every Sunday school adopt the following, or a similar resolution, and forward a copy to each of the respective members of the House of Representatives, giving name of school, city and date, and signed by pastor, superintendent and secretary of the school:

"Resolved, That this Sunday school of ———— members, most earnestly pleads for National Constitutional Prohibition and begs our Representatives in Congress to vote in favor of the submisison of the prohibition amendment to the states for ratification."

Our great Sunday school petition will voice the plea of youth to the House of Representatives and will be on exhibition at our National W. C. T. U. convention in Washington.

The quarterly Budget for World's Temperance Sunday contains new illustrated leaflets and appropriate selected material for use in the Sunday school, samples of leaflets for general distribution, pledge cards. The special helps for teachers, aside from the lesson leaflet, are a geography exercise with the prohibition map brought down to date.

The Budget contains a sample of program and supplement entitled "Victory."

Price of Budget is 15 cents (in advance) or 50 cents per year. Send at once for the Budget, make selections, order supplies early and Get ready for the observance of World's Temperance Sunday.

HELEN H. GREEN

The thirty-fifth annual convention of the Virginia W. C. T. U., the most enthusiastic in the history of the organization, assembled at Charlottesville,—quaint, conservative, scholarly, old Charlottesville, nestling against the foothills of the Blue Ridge,—noted for its university, its fried chicken, and its hospitality.

Despite the fact, which all states recognize, that losses often occur and aggressive work sometimes lapses as the temporary, reactionary effect of a great prohibition campaign, Virginia W. C. T. U. membership has crept steadily up since the day the liquor traffic was voted out. Even this year, when the beloved president was ill and incapacitated for so many long months, the W. C. T. U. has grown and gained and flourished like a green bay tree. In praying for strength for our leader we have ourselves been strengthened for the work she loves, until today we start on the thirty-sixth year of our quest knowing that we shall live to see the fulfilment of all our hopes and prayers.

Every member of the state union feels an especial debt of gratitude and an increased love for the state corresponding secretary, Lilian A. Shepherd, for the satisfactory manner in which she has carried her double burden through the year, ably assisted by the outgoing treasurer, Mrs. E. B. Clement. In Mrs. Hoge's tender speech of acceptance of office she paid the highest possible tribute to these women and to their noble supporters, back in the counties, "behind the guns." "Every passing year," said Mrs. Hoge, "adds to my conviction that there are no women in this world more loyal and dependable than my own Virginia women."

Mrs. Hoge was elected for the twentieth time, the state proving thereby that its members appreciate, as well as render, splendid service. Mrs. Shepherd was also re-elected, and the fact that after seventeen years of service there was not a dissenting vote, speaks for the esteem in which she is held. Mrs. J. W. Strickler and Miss Lona Kern were elected treasurer and recording secretary, respectively, the former officers declining to be considered. Mrs. Clement was made editor of the official organ, The Virginia Call, and Mrs. Faith T. Parrott was made state superintendent of Scientific Temperance Instruction.

Rev. Sidney J. Peters, state commissioner of prohibition, in a fine address the closing night, gave some startling figures. Among many important facts he declared that the jails of the state today have 1,700 less prisoners than at any other time since statistics have been recorded, and that in a few months, when some of the long term prison sentences shall have run out, the state prisons of Virginia will hold less than one-half the number of inmates of any one of the years before the state went dry. He also said that, so far as revenue is concerned, not one dollar has been lost to the treasury of the state, and that if savings in court proceedings were considered, the commonwealth must own itself thousands of dollars to the good.

An immense amount of work has been done by the department of Work among Soldiers and Sailors under the direction of Miss Amelia Colgan, state superintendent. Much of the effort has been centralized at the port of Norfolk, where Mrs. Shepherd has purchased supplies and distributed comfort bags to the men on outgoing transports. Since the declaration of war the department has expended

THE MAINE SUFFRAGE CAMPAIGN

DEBORAH KNOX LIVINGSTON, National W. C. T. U. Franchise Superintendent

The first great battle for the political enfranchisement of women has been waged in the state of Maine and, in spite of our deferred victory, it has been a battle worth while, from the most southerly line bordering on New Hampshire to the line on the far north that separates the state from Canada. Every city and town, every village and rural community was reached with the suffrage message.

Maine presented as difficult a field for the conducting of a suffrage campaign as has ever been faced by any group of women in any part of the country. Very little propaganda work had ever been done, and the State Suffrage Association, which had but a small membership, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union were the only organizations that had gone up regularly to the legislature, asking various forms of suffrage.

Last February, after a strenuous effort on the part of the Legislative committee, the legislature submitted to the people the referendum. About six months remained for the campaign, but during two of them, April and May, not much could be done on account of the almost impassable condition of the roads, and the heavy rains of June made effort worthless, so that but a little more than three months were left for active campaigning.

World War Held Attention of People

Early in the campaign our country entered the world war. The whole thought and attention of the people was given to securing support for the Liberty Bonds, Red Cross and Navy League work and other patriotic endeavors. This greatly hindered the raising of finances, and the creating of organizations, the two foundations upon which the structure of a successful campaign must be built, and which more than anything else the state of Maine needed.

After the referendum had been submitted the first effort was the formation of a campaign committee, consisting of representatives of the various organizations which had gone on record for woman suffrage—the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Suffrage Association, the Grange Referendum League, the Men's Suffrage League, the Civic League, and the Federation of Woman's Clubs. This committee carried on the work of the campaign from its headquarters in the Exchange Building, Bangor, your National superintendent acting as chairman and campaign manager.

During the campaign 285 committees were organized in the sixteen counties of the state. Each committee was given a plan of work, the most important feature of which was the securing of names on petition blanks especially prepared with the heading, "We, the women of Maine, of voting age, respectfully petition you to grant us the vote on September 10." Over 38,000 names were secured, classified by counties and sent in printed form just before election to over 100,000 voters in the state. The value of these petitions was four-fold:

Petition Work Systematically Pushed

First. It gave the committee something definite to do in securing the names and distributing literature.

Second. It answered the statement of the antis, that the women did not want to vote.

Third. It was the last printed appeal to the voters before election.

Fourth. It lined up the women for the next big drive, namely, the ratification of the Federal amendment.

There is no medium through which we can reach so many people in a campaign as the press. On the whole, the papers of the state were with us. There were a few notable exceptions.

During the last weeks of the campaign special supplements prepared by the campaign committee were issued by two of the largest papers of the state and used and distributed by twenty-two papers in the state.

Posters displayed in windows, tacked on trees and fences, and put up in every available space carried the message. The "movies" were used as an advertising medium. About a million and a half leaflets were distributed by the various organizations composing the campaign committee, and at least five hundred public meetings were held during the last three months. We were fortunate in having many distinguished men and women within and without the state to address great crowds both at outdoor and indoor meetings.

What were the causes of our defeat?

First, the natural conservatism of the people, due largely to a lack of knowledge of the issue.

Second, the light vote. There are at least 130,000 voters in the state of Maine, and only 57,000 cared enough about amending the state constitution to lay aside their own personal interests to go out and vote. A little more than 20,000 votes were cast in favor of suffrage and something more than 37,000 against it.

Third, the fact that in many sections of the state the machines of both parties united to defeat us. While the referendum was submitted by the Republican party, it was not supported at the polls by it.

Fourth, the picketing at the White House, an ever ready excuse given by many men as a reason why they were not favorable to the cause.

Fifth, the feeling among many women that all their time should be given to the service of the Red Cross, failing to see that women will be better patriots when they become citizens.

These and other conditions made possible the defeat.

Campaign of Great Educational Value

Every campaign has its educational value, and this campaign so stirred the state of Maine that its women will never again be the same. In suffrage campaigns we have nothing to lose but everything to gain. Every vote cast at the election was an added asset to our cause, every speech had its reward in converts, every community organized meant the kindling of the fire that is to burn with holy and consecrated enthusiasm until every prejudice and antagonism is consumed, and woman emerges free and unhampered to walk side by side with man in the affairs of government, making her contribution to the legislation that governs us all irrespective of sex.

The fate of Maine emphasizes anew the need of our determined effort to secure the passage of the Federal amendment. So far as the eastern states are concerned they will find it an easier task to influence legislatures to ratify the Federal amendment than to get the cause before the people.

WILLIAM THOMAS' NERVE TONIC

MARGARET BAIRD

"The heavens are telling the glory of God,
The wonder of His work displays the firmament.
The wonder of His work displays the firmament."

The song was wafted into the kitchen of the farmhouse from the barnyard. "Do you hear that, mother?" asked Farmer Mader, as he came in from the fields. "Do you think the angels in heaven will ever make sweeter music than that? Listen, now:"

"The day that is coming
Speaks it the day."

The boyish voice stopped and the couple, listening enraptured from the back porch, heard the accompanying interlude whistled through without one breach; then the voice again softly caught the strain:

"The night that is gone to following night.
The night that is gone to following night."

"Isn't that whistling more like the robin's morning song in the early springtime than anything else you know, mother?"

"Yes, yes, father; but you know William loses nerve when he sings in public. You know he lost his nerve, too, when he took the examination last fall to enter college; now he must spend the winter going over the same branches, and in associating with the cattle in the stable when Providence intended him for something better. I intend to lighten up that boy's work this winter and give him a chance to study; once he gets into college, and they discover that voice, it will earn him his way through. Why, that great singer from Boston, last year, can't touch him. Listen, father":

"In all the lands resounds the word,
Never unperceived,
Never understood."

The old man put his hand to his ear and listened till the singer entered the barn and the tones were lost to the enraptured audience of two, on the back porch.

"That one song, father, is worth the boy's board for a month; we must give the lad a chance."

An hour later the sturdy, red-cheeked, bright-eyed boy came in for supper. There was no mistaking his nationality; the bright brown eyes, the dark hair, the occasional brogue, told that he enjoyed the common inheritance of his people, the Welsh, in a great gift of song.

"What were you singing while you were feeding tonight, William?" asked the old man.

"It's called Hayden's 'Creation,'" replied William. "I heard it sung over in Wales two years ago. I sent for the music and picked out the air on the fiddle. You ought to hear the whole thing through."

"Do you know it all?"

"Yes, sir, the whole thing."

"Let's hear it, then."

"Why, Mr. Mader, it would take the whole evening to sing it through. Besides, it's intended to be sung by choruses and quartets and solos, and then there're instrumental accompaniments that give the voice a rest and sort of link the parts together and make the whole thing seem just like one long hymn."

"William, my boy, God has given you that voice for a purpose and you must not waste it singing to the cattle in the barn."

"But, you see, Mrs. Mader, I can sing here and in the barn and never make a mistake, but when I see the sea of faces before me I lose my nerve and flat."

"But you must not lose your nerve and flat, my boy. Maybe you need a nerve tonic. When Dr. Smith comes again, I'll ask him to fix up a tonic for you," continued Mrs. Mader.

William arose from the table with his irrepressible smile and sauntered back to finish up the chores.

"Guess Mrs. Mader is right about the singing. I know I will be able to sing sometime if only I can get up the nerve to face an audience. But there's no use fretting over it. I'll get ready for that examination."

William had a curious little study on the second floor of the granary. The broad-minded farmer had suggested that he fix up this place away from the house and the clatter of work. The light came in through a tiny window on the south side of the corner selected by William. A quaint old coverlet partitioned it from the rest of the second floor of the granary. An old cherry writing desk with great glass knobs, a wooden bottomed, stiff-backed chair, a worn deer-skin mat, and an old fashioned lamp made up the furnishings of the room.

A violin hung over the little window. A great low, square stove with its pipe thrust through the wall, occupied a large part of the study. "That stove's too big for the size of the study, my boy, but it's the best we can do. Just regulate the heat by the amount of wood you put in and you will pull through. Once the college professors hear that 'Never unperceived' song, they'll not ask what was the size of the stove that kept the toes of the boy warm while he was getting ready to come to their school."

When William went back to the barn that evening it was with the inspiration which comes of the determination for self mastery.

"If these good friends believe in me," he said to himself, "I must not disappoint them. And some day—some day—if I only had the nerve."

He patted the sides of the brown cow in the end stall, threw in another armful of hay to the horses, closed the doors and climbed the narrow, dusty stairway of the granary to the study. He set flaming a handful of the pitchpine shavings and thrust them into the great rusty stove, lighted the marble-based lamp and then very gently and tenderly took the violin from above the window.

"Seems this fiddle holds me back from my studies; but once I have a little visit with it the lessons seem clearer. Then it makes a fellow hustle through the geometry and arithmetic to get back to the music. And sometimes, as I play, I can see the low hills of dear old Welshland across the sea and hear father and mother again sing the evening hymn in the thatched home;—but, there I go again—that everlasting dreaming will never demonstrate a theorem." The last strain of "Thora" plaintively came from the violin, and it was again placed above the little south window.

He thrust a stick of wood on the embers of the pitch-pine shavings, took up a worn geometry from the desk. "If two parallel lines be cut by a third straight line the alternate interior angles are equal. Let AB and CD be two parallel lines—goodness, I'm feeling sleepy again. That fiddle must not come out first tomorrow night." He opened the door of the old desk and set out a jug. "I guess a drink of cider will waken me up." He tipped the jug from the edge of the desk and drank freely and put it back again in the "cubby." "We have to prove that the angle CDE equals the angle ABE," he continued. His mind rapidly followed the demonstration of the theorem to the end and also of the converse of it and of the next one and its converse.

Then he took up the little copy of "Macbeth" and read carefully for a half hour. His mind as expeditiously took up the chapter on sound and after another hour of mental concentration the fiddle was again taken from its ledge and the bow tenderly, caressingly swept the strings until a streak of light came across the lawn.

"Time to go to bed. I see by the streak of light from the window that Mrs. Mader has come to the kitchen to mix the cakes for breakfast. So-long, so-long, dear old fiddle."

"Must have studied too long, my head reels; think I'd better stop earlier tomorrow evening," he said to himself as he crossed the lawn.

The violin, the geometry, Shakespeare, the science of sound, the dark "cubby" and the stone jug, even the friend on the ledge of the south window, and the peculiar dizziness were soon all forgotten in that sound slumber which must follow all the days spent in the air, and which belongs to youth and health and a clear conscience the world over.

The next night's study was followed in the same way as that of the previous night. The fire and lamp were lighted, the geometry demonstrated, the jug taken from the "cubby" of the old desk, and the violin from the ledge of the south window.

And so winter settled upon the family at the farm. As the evenings grew longer and colder, the furnishings of the little study, including the desk with the "cubby," and the stone jug, were moved to the kitchen bed-room. The violin was hung over the mantel of the great fireplace of the sitting-room, where it could be picked up at odd moments and would not interfere with the study in the evenings.

"Well, for instance!" exclaimed Farmer Mader one evening, late in the winter, as he took up the country paper, "that famous band of Welsh singers is coming to the county seat this winter. I can't for the life of me see how a lot of singers who have sung before the king and who are wanted all over the world will sing in a little city like Clearfield. Oh, yes, I see, they are returning to Wales and come that way to take passage for home." William dropped the bow of his violin and hurried to the side of Mr. Mader to see, for himself, if it was really in the country paper. His eyes became suddenly brighter as he glanced over the great shoulders of his farmer friend.

"Yes, sir, and they're going to sing the 'Creation,' as sure as you live, Mr. Mader. That song that you say is the best of all I play or sing. The one you call the 'Never unperceived!' hymn, you know."

"Mother, look here," he called to the kitchen, "that band of Welshmen who are going all over the world singing are actually coming to Clearfield next month."

"What's the date, William?"

"December twenty-second."

"Well, my boy, we will celebrate Christmas this year by going to town and listening to those Welshmen glorifying God with their voices."

"But, Mr. Mader, it will cost, oh, I can't tell how much, but I know a lot more than I can afford with college ahead."

"Never mind, my boy, what it will cost. This will be my Christmas gift. We will get up early, hitch the bays to the sleigh, put in a basket of butter and eggs for my daughter in town, and take her and the boys with us to the song service in the evening. Mother will be ready to go with us and then, my lad, we will have a chance to hear that 'Creation' song through from start to finish, with the solos and all the little fiddle and horn flourishes thrown in."

"But, Mr. Mader—"

"Run up to your studies, my boy. When I sold that extra two hundred bushels of corn this fall, I said to myself, 'Now that'll go for the little extras this winter,' and so it will, every cent of it. I count the singing of the 'Creation' hymn by a band of Welshmen a little extra, and we'll be there, if Providence gives us strength to go, my boy, so climb to the kitchen bed-room and figure out that geometry. We want to see you entered in college this time next winter."

William climbed the kitchen stairway to the study, but the strains of the "Creation" floated through his mind, he saw the notes of the music mixed in with the lines and angles of the geometry, and the words of the song seemed to float between the lines of "Macbeth."

When at last the lessons were studied in their regular order and the little jug was taken from the dark "cubby" of the writing desk and tipped on its edge, the lad slept and dreamed he sang the "Creation" through before a great audience of expectant faces and never once lost nerve or flatted.

"Maybe some day I can," he thought, as he awoke. "That tonic of Dr. Smith's is building up my nerves, I know. I must succeed for the sake of my good friends, the Maders, as well as for myself."

The proposed trip to the county seat became the regular topic for fireside conversation from that evening.

"William, before you study tonight, play over that part of the 'Creation' hymn that goes down low and you sing—

"The night that is gone to following night,
The night that is gone to following night."

William never needed a second request to lift the violin from above the fireplace, resin his bow and hunt through the music until he came to the place where it went down low or up high as the request might be. But often it required several requests from his old friends before the violin was once more placed above the fireplace and he climbed the kitchen stairway to the lines, angles and circles of the geometry and figures of Shakespeare and the laws of philosophy.

Long before the day that the celebrated Welshmen were to sing at the county seat, the old friends of the red-cheeked, homeless, gifted little Welsh boy, on the farm, were well acquainted with every strain of the oratorio to which they were to listen.

And William, singing the same airs every evening, gained a new confidence and delicacy of expression that made him feel that the nerve would come in time.

The old couple, never doubting, sometimes joined the boyish treble and sometimes beat time with nodding heads or clicking needles to the violin as it wailed the plaintive strains of the masterpiece.

The bays were rubbed until their sides shone like satin on the evening of the twenty-first of December, the sleigh was brought to the middle of the stable floor early in the morning, and it, too, was rubbed and dusted until not a spot defaced the beauty of its polished surface. The silver of the buggy harness was also polished until it outrivaled the table ware of the farm house. The fur robes were taken from the granary loft to the kitchen to warm up a little, ready for the morning, and all to the tune of

"The day that is coming
Speaks it the day.
The day that is coming
Speaks it the day."

The same quiet preparation pervaded the household. The turkey, which was to join the butter and eggs for the daughter in town, was hung out to freeze early in the morning. The crock of cookies was placed beside the fresh bread in the pantry to be ready for the return of the travelers from the county seat. The Sunday suits of father and William were dusted and placed with their clean linen in their respective rooms, early in the morning. The old gray and lavender silk gown was carefully pressed and placed with the bonnet of violets and lace in their perfumed box and securely wedged beneath the back seat of the sleigh.

Very early in the morning of the twenty-second of December, the happiest trio in Clearfield county could have been seen seated in the family sleigh with the bays, dancing gaily toward the county seat.

Mr. Mader and William occupied the front seat, so as to take turns at driving, as Mr. Mader said. Mrs. Mader and the well filled basket and the great robes occupied the back seat.

At noon the bays were munching their oats contentedly at the end of their journey and the happy trio were as contentedly dining at the cozy home of the town daughter.

William, impatient to learn more of the famous Welshmen, was standing an hour later, gazing absorbedly at the bills advertising the great musical event of the year.

"If we could just find someone who could read and speak both English and Welsh we would be all right."

The words were spoken in a beautifully modulated Welsh that expressed culture as well as thought.

"There are plenty, no doubt, in the city," his companion continued, also in Welsh, "but it is too late to look them up. I am certainly sorry James got sick at this time. Getting some one to take his place in the chorus, of course, would be impossible. But just for giving the translation for the benefit of the audience—seems we ought to be able to secure some one for that."

William lost his interest in the bills in hearing his native tongue spoken and turning quickly saw, what he knew at a glance, to be two of the famous Welsh singers.

In his joy at hearing the language of the childhood home he gained courage, and asked, in Welsh, if he could serve them, as he spoke both Welsh and English.

The cultivated ear of the Welsh singers knew at the first tones of the boy's voice that he could indeed serve them.

"What we want is some one to translate the words of the song we sing into English, as we sing only in Welsh, and much of the pleasure is lost to our audience if the words are not translated before we sing. A number of our boys speak English, but it is with an accent, and they do not wish to do it. James, our one member who speaks beautiful English, is not able to speak tonight and we felt we would be compelled to sing without our interpreter."

"If I was only sure of my nerve," spoke William, "I could sing the choruses through, too, for I know you are to sing the 'Creation,' and I know that by heart."

"You!" exclaimed both of the singers, with an inflection that expressed doubt and surprise.

"Why not?" replied William, "I heard it sung two years ago, over in Wales by this same troupe that will sing it tonight. I sent at once and bought the music and picked it all out on my violin. I sing the soprano of the composition from beginning to end, but I think I could take the tenor, as well, if ever I get over the feeling of nervousness that overcomes me when I hear my own voice in a solo."

The Welshmen, on hearing that the boy's father had been a violinist of note, soon expressed a confidence in William's ability to sustain himself in the rendition of the choruses and in closing up the bargain for the evening said:

"And if you are sure you know the soprano part through we will be glad for your help on that, as well, as James' was one of the voices that could reach the high notes and we have but two others in the party who can do it."

Thus it was quickly arranged that William should read the composition throughout in English to the audience before it was sung, and if he was perfectly sure he could make the high notes, to join in the full choruses.

William was sure his nerve would stand the test in the chorus singing, but reading the composition to such a large and intelligent audience as he knew must welcome so distinguished a party of singers, was the ordeal he knew would require nerve.

When he reached home and explained the matter to Mr. and Mrs. Mader he had not the courage to add that he guessed he had better walk around to the Fallon and give it up.

"William, that suit you wear is not the cut of the ones I see men wear when they sing before large audiences. That man who came from Boston last year and sang in the church wore a white vest and tie, a coat cut off short in the front and left long in the back. And I tell you we expected something of a man that looked so spick and span. And we were not disappointed, either. Now, I don't propose to have our lad walk into that company of gentlemen looking run down at the heels."

"But, Mr. Mader, this is my very best and if I buy another suit for this one evening it will make a pretty big hole in the college fund, don't you think?"

"I certainly do, my lad, but that corn money that was put in the bank for the little extras this winter is not half spent yet, and how would mother feel togged out in her Sunday best and the boy that she mothers being picked out as the one with the black vest and round-about coat?

"No, my boy; you must be remembered as the lad who could sing that great 'Creation' hymn through from beginning to end, without one mistake, and reach those high notes without flatting, as you call it.

"What would the corn money be worth to mother or me if you should lose your nerve because you felt all eyes were upon you on account of your odd suit?

"Come along, my boy, we'll walk to the Fallon and ask those young men to let us see the kind of suit they wear and you shall have one like theirs if this city can supply it."

William and his friend spent the rest of the afternoon in securing the coveted outfit. They came in to supper with a satisfied expression.

Supper was quickly disposed of that evening, when William quietly slipped upstairs with the great package from the tailor's, and Mr. Mader as quietly went to the stable to hitch the bays.

"To be sure it's only a few blocks from the theater, but I want those singers to understand that our lad has a friend or two who is standing by him."

William forgot, in hearing his native tongue, the feeling of fright that generally preceded an appearance in public. When the time came for him to read the oratorio in English he read it through without one outward sign of his inward emotions.

And when the choruses appeared he came in with them, saying, "Well, gentlemen, I'll go in and fill up the vacant spot with my body, but I can't make any promise about singing until the time comes. I'll start out and if my nerves get the best of me, then mum's the word. It will be better, you know, than flatting."

A broad-shouldered farmer sat in the front seat at the Welsh concert that evening and next him sat his sweet-faced wife, gowned in gray and lavender. She wore no jewels, but when the high voices touched the upper notes like the tones of silver bells, diamonds fell from somewhere and settled among the point lace of the gray and lavender silk gown. And the old man never once lifted his eyes over $1,300 for supplies. Seven hundred silk flags have been given to sick soldiers in the national home in Hampton, and knitted trench sets and many-tailed bandages have been furnished in great quantities. Over 800 separate Testaments have been distributed, and 61,441 pages of literature given out to enlisted men. To date over 1,200 filled bags have carried comfort to America's khaki-clad sons.

Norfolk county reported a novel essay contest, the demonstration of which took the form of a chain of postcards, 287 in all, each one containing an entire essay on the effects of cigaret smoking on the human system. In all there were 999 essays written in the state during the year.

The state union feels that it has had a valuable acquisition in the coming of Mrs. F. Page Thornhill from West Virginia to Charlottesville. Mrs. Thornhill will take charge of the work of the L. T. L. Branch.

At the grand gold medal contest, Miss Mildred Vaiden, of the state training school at Farmville, won the medal in competition with eight contestants, her selection being, "Is Intemperance Nothing to You?"

A purse was raised by the appreciative women, as a token of love to Mrs. Clement, and was presented a few moments before the close of the convention. The good treasurer, seeing money apparently about to flow into the state treasury, and obeying the habit of years, rose in her seat on the platform, pulling her successor up to help receive this last gift to the state. Her expression when she learned that she had risen to accept her own purse was well worth seeing, and the incident gave just the right amount of fun to carry us through our good-bys without tears.

from the end of the line occupied by the high voices.

When the concert was over William at once sought his old friends. When he read his success in their faces, he was satisfied.

"The mayor will banquet the company at the Fallon after they are through here and they have asked me to join them. What do you think, Mr. Mader?"

"What do I think? I think you are prepared to accept, my boy, and we will wait around at the house until you return."

The banquet was the most elaborate the chef of the Fallon could devise. The singers ate the different courses with relish and William, after the excitement of the day, the long ride, the light supper, his victory of the evening, needed no urging to follow their example.

William had noticed that the company, the moment they were seated at the table, had turned the tiny wine glasses at each plate upside down, and again, fearing to be conspicuous, he had quickly followed their example and inverted the delicate cut glass at his plate.

When the waiter passed around the table with the bottle of choice wine there was not one glass ready to receive it, for the mayor, in honor of his guests, had also refused.

This little incident of the banquet set the active brain of William thinking more than any of the banqueters imagined.

When the trio arrived at the farm, next day, and the bays were once more settled in their cozy stall, the gray and lavender gown was again placed in the bureau drawer of the spare room, the Sunday suits were once more hung on their respective stretchers in the hall wardrobe. When Mr. Mader had walked over to Smith's to inquire after a sick child, when Mrs. Mader had slipped off into a quiet doze in her great chair beside the fireplace, William quickly and quietly climbed the stairway to the study.

His books were all in their places as he had left them, but his purpose this time was not to study. He opened the "cubby" of the old desk, took out the brown jug with its corncob cork; as quickly and as quietly as he had ascended, he descended the stairway with the jug, and never stopped until he had thrown it with terrific force against the stone fence of the garden.

The jug and the cider parted company; fragments of the jug to slowly disintegrate and return to the soil from which it came, and the cider to sink at once into its mother earth and become an element of growth when spring days required it.

William then returned to the sitting-room and, stealthily, lest he waken the sleeper in the great chair by the fireplace, took the violin from its place and returned to the kitchen bed-room.

When at last spring came, William was again at college ready to enter the class that was to take the examinations.

He showed no fear when the trying time arrived, but being sure of his subjects and sure of himself, entered the contest with a confidence that expressed victory.

WISCONSIN 1917 RECORDS SHOW MEMBERSHIP INCREASE AND MORE ABUNDANT COURAGE FOR THE DRY BATTLE

EVA C. LEWIS

The annual convention of the Wisconsin W. C. T. U. was held in Milwaukee, September 21-25. Over 240 voting delegates and many visitors were in attendance. The report of the secretary showed unusual activities during the past year, and an increase of 528 in membership. Mrs. Mary Harris Armor and Mrs. Florence D. Richard were the convention guests. Mrs. Richard brought to us from the firing line and trenches of the Ohio battlefields the spirit of conquest. Mrs. Armor's presence and addresses imbued us with visions of victory through "grace, grit and git."

Our superintendents' conference, as conducted last year and this, is a splendid departure and is proving a commendable method of instruction to our delegates.

Through the suggestion and efforts of Mrs. Ellen Copp, LL. D., a state board of fair inspectors was created by our legislature last winter, which will practically eliminate immoral shows from our fairs in the future.

Wisconsin unions are to take up the study of law as especially pertaining to women. Books compiled for this purpose were presented to our state unions by Mrs. Copp.

The meetings of the convention had the appearance of a knitting factory. The women knitted, prayed, or sang patriotic songs while the bells of the city rang and the whistles blew their "God speed" salute to the departing soldier boys.

The former state W. C. T. U. officers were re-elected, showing that Wisconsin white ribboners appreciate the faithful services of those who have led during the past months. They pledged continued co-operation in the work of the coming year.

To one who has attended the state conventions for nearly thirty years it seemed that never was the atmosphere of a convention so surcharged with optimism and determination of purpose.

"What is defeat? It's only a spur
To the one who receives it right,
And it makes the spirit within us stir
To go in once more and fight."

Blotters! Blotters!

The Y. M. C. A. will welcome our blotters for use in the soldiers' huts and in Y. M. C. A. writing rooms everywhere. Why not put a total abstinence or anti-cigaret blotter in your letter to your soldier boy?

NOW IS THE TIME

To supply your school with temperance blotters. Put one in every desk. Have them on your literature table at your conventions and meetings.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 0, Washington, D. C.

RECIPE FOR GAINING NEW MEMBERS

VIDA IRENE THOMPSON, Circulation Manager

Our white ribboners are looking for recipes, and especially for those that will help solve the conservation problem. The following has been tried and proved excellent:

Recipe for Gaining New Members

The ingredients are:

Prospective member.

Several UNION SIGNALS (the number varies slightly).

A goodly amount of zeal.

One ounce of curiosity.

One pound of common sense.

Do not use the SIGNALS all at once. The effect is better when added one at a time, without allowing the resulting interest to cool. Combine seasoning of invitations to attend meetings, requests for help that can be given, and appreciation for what is done. Add spice of meetings made interesting through help of UNION SIGNAL and literature, and do not forget the leaven of prayer.

This recipe, with little, if anything, omitted, brought about the following result:

"I have secured a new member for our local union. In my effort to interest her in the work of the W. C. T. U., I placed some copies of THE UNION SIGNAL and Young Crusader in her hands for careful examination. She was so pleased with the papers that she at once said she would join our W. C. T. U. and subscribe for The Young Crusader for her three little daughters—bright, lovely children—and she is a lovable mother. She expects to take THE UNION SIGNAL a little later on. Oh, if I were physically able to walk to see the women, I could secure a large number of subscriptions."

A week after his return to the farm he received his entrance credentials with no apparent surprise.

"You see what Dr. Smith's tonic did for the lad, father," Mrs. Mader said to Mr. Mader when he came in to supper that evening.

William, overhearing the remark, recalled the banquet at the Fallon, the quiet visit to the little study and the little heap of broken crockery near the stone fence of the garden.

The next fall he entered college with enough money saved, mostly through the generosity of Mr. Mader, to see him safely through the first year. "For the second year," he said, "I must manage to earn something during the summer."

A letter reached him before he came to the final "exams" which at once lifted part of the burden of this expense of the second year from his mind. It bore a foreign stamp and was opened with nervous haste. It was written in London and in Welsh, and simply said:

"Friend William:—

"Remembering how well you helped us out when James Williams, our leading tenor, was taken ill last year in America, we again request your help, as finding a Welsh boy who can speak English and sing the 'Creation' is no easy task.

"James' continued ill health compels him to abandon the work for the summer. We are booked to sing in the large cities of the United States in June, July and August. Will you join us? Your expenses and the same salary as paid to James will be yours.

"Respectfully,
"John Cook."

"Will I join? Well, I guess," he said to himself, dancing a Welsh jig in joy at the prospect. "That dress suit is saved spick and span for a time like this."

A steamer carrying mail to London that same week took the boy's reply to John Cook, business manager of the famous Welsh Concert Company. It stated, in a business-like way, that William would be ready and willing to take the part in the concert company as requested and having discovered a cure for stage fright that had previously stood in his way, he would also promise that nervousness would not now interfere with success."

"Now I'll write Mr. and Mrs. Mader," said William, "and surprise them, and in due time they received the following:

"My Dearest Friends:

"What do you think of a boy like me singing in the famous Welsh Concert Company this summer? I send you the letter. Read it for yourself and throw up your hat.

"Of course I have accepted. I knew you would be satisfied. Won't I feel inflated when the company comes to Clearfield next summer and we manage to slip out to the farm and surprise you by singing the 'Creation' song, some moonlight night, under your window?

"The credit all belongs to you, who believed in my power to succeed, for when I knew you trusted in me I made up my mind not to disappoint you and began looking about to see what was standing in my way. I think I succeeded.

"Nerves, you all said, but before you give Dr. Smith all the credit for my present level head before a breathless audience, go out to the stone fence of the garden and you will see the fragments of a little brown jug which you will kindly let remain in their little heap and engrave, 'Sacred to the memory of the nerves of William Thomas, member of the Welsh Concert Company.'"

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD TAKES ITS PLACE IN THE HOMES OF AMERICA

THE Christian Herald is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in great enterprises. It is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents in the most vital way all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the on-marching Church of Christ.

THE WITNESS

By Grace Livingston Hill Lutz

"The Witness," an instalment of which is appearing each week in the Christian Herald, is a truly notable story. It is big in its plot, vivid in characterizations, thrilling in episodes and continuous action, rich in incident, color and feeling, intensely inspiring in its moral motifs, and mellow with human interest.

THE MILLENNIUM

WHAT, WHEN AND WHERE?

An Additional Series of Articles on Prophecy by America's Greatest Expositor, Prof. James M. Gray, D. D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute.

"The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," Prof. Gray's first series of articles, which appeared recently in the Christian Herald, has brought forth such a number of inquiries from students and Bible readers all over the country, that this additional series has become a necessity.

They will be contributions of the most valuable character to the prophetic literature of the times in which we are now living—a period which in the opinion of all of the best Bible expositors, is one of tremendous prophetic fulfilment.

TRAVEL STORIES FROM RUSSIA

By Maynard Owen Williams

Mr. Williams, whose stories of the Orient have made clear so many things before so half understood, is now in Russia, right at the center of the turmoil and ferment of revolutionary plot and counter-plot. Mr. Williams' articles, which appear regularly in the Christian Herald, reveal the action of the forces within the nation which is today so wrapped in mystery.

THE GREATER UNITED STATES

By Frank G. Carpenter

In every Chautauqua Association and in nearly every town and village of the United States, Frank G. Carpenter is known as the man who can come back from some place and then tell about it so that you think you have been there. After going into all the odd corners of the world, Mr. Carpenter has now turned his steps toward the farms and factories of his native land.

HOWARD CHASE

A New Novel by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D. D.

"Howard Chase," Dr. Sheldon's new novel, seems to us to surpass all of his previous works in thrilling human interest and moral power. It is a story of a big man in a small town.

It is a church story, but intensely human and dealing unsparingly with the follies and foibles of church members in their church, community and domestic lives.

"Howard Chase" will be published serially in the Christian Herald.

The Sisterhood of Prohibition States Expects to Welcome Two New Members November 6

IOWA REPORTED TO HAVE WON CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION

As we go to press, telegraphic reports from the Allied Temperance Committee of Iowa indicate that the result of the special election, October 15, is a small majority for constitutional prohibition.

STATE OF UTAH

Executive Office

Salt Lake City, October 3, 1917.

Mrs. C. A. Walker,
President Utah W. C. T. U.,
Salt Lake City.

Dear Madam:

State-wide prohibition has benefited the state very much, even in the short period in which it has been in force. It is too early, perhaps, to give actual figures which will show in a statistical way the good it has accomplished morally and economically, but it is plainly evident that business has quickly adjusted itself to the change brought about by the reform. Buildings formerly occupied by saloons are now used by grocery stores, shoe stores, restaurants, furniture stores and clothing stores. The police courts are doing much less business. We now see no drunkenness. Business men tell me that they have already noted the effect of prohibition in increased collections and an increased amount of groceries and clothing sold to families where the wage earners were somewhat addicted to the use of liquor.

How many homes are happier, how many broken hearts are healed, how many souls are saved we shall never know! I have only an inkling of the great moral effect of the banishment of liquor in the scores of letters from wives and mothers that come to my desk, thanking heaven for the blessings of prohibition. The happiness reflected by these grateful missives is full compensation for the efforts made by the prohibitionists to secure the law.

On August 1, 1917, I should say that 75 per cent of the people of Utah were firm believers in prohibition. On October 1, 1917, I venture to say 98 per cent are ardent prohibitionists. Could we wish for a stronger endorsement?

Respectfully,

SIMON BAMBERGER,
Governor.

Utah Views Prohibition as a Godsend

MRS. C. A. WALKER, State W. C. T. U. President

During the short time that our state has been dry the prophecies of our enemies, the wets, have not been fulfilled. On the contrary, even the financial side of the question is satisfactory.

It may be that some who are engaged in the sale of liquor have left the state to conduct the same business elsewhere, but there is no distress apparent, and if any are out of employment it assuredly is their own fault, as it is difficult to secure sufficient help of any kind.

Possibly a few rooms formerly occupied by saloons are vacant, but the number is not noticeable, while in the downtown district, with hardly an exception, former saloon locations have been remodeled and are now being used for legitimate business.

Bank deposits have increased and merchants report that from actual experience the past two months from every viewpoint have shown healthier trade conditions. The managing director of one of the largest stores in Salt Lake City says, "The volume of sales during the months of August and September was by far the largest every enjoyed within corresponding months." Business investments in large numbers are being made, and houses for rent are scarce.

From the moral standpoint, there is absolutely no question as to the benefits derived. The testimony of mothers and children who suffered previous to the going into effect of the prohibition law is sufficient evidence to satisfy the most skeptical.

The minimum amount of drunkenness among the 6,500 soldiers quartered at Fort Douglas should convince anyone that prohibition is a good thing. While it is true our government has thrown safeguards around our soldier boys by stopping the sale of liquor to those in uniform, the fact that our state is dry has been of wonderful help in this direction.

Without knowing it, hundreds of persons in Salt Lake have saved daylight since prohibition became the law of the state.

Earl Baughman, proprietor of a downtown cafe, is authority for the statement published in the Salt Lake Telegram. He says that as a result of the cabaret night life having almost stopped since Utah became dry many of those who frequented the cafes more or less regularly are now paying attention to going to bed early.

The natural consequence, he comments, is that such persons now get up earlier than they did in the old days, when they often awoke with the "dark brown taste" and "turned over" for another "forty winks."

Mr. Baughman has observed that his breakfast customers are eating at a more regular hour. Other restaurant owners say practically the same thing. Prohibition, they declare, is providing more "early birds" than ever.

The few criminal cases appearing in the police courts of Salt Lake and Ogden are enough to convince any except the most stubborn that prohibition is eminently successful.

The attorney general of the state, the sheriff of the county of Salt Lake, the mayor of Salt Lake City, presidents of banks, and merchants generally, testify to the great benefits derived since our prohibition law became operative. In conclusion, I wish to say that all of the officers of our state, county and city are diligent and efficient in their efforts for the enforcement of the law.

The following letters from representative business men and city officials of Salt Lake City, tell more conclusively than could any words of mine the benefits which have resulted from prohibition:

Department Store Head Cites Record Sales as Result of Dry Law

"In response to your inquiry relative to the effect of the operation of the prohibition law, I have to say that in my opinion, based upon observation as well as actual trade experience of the past two months, the community is, from every viewpoint, healthier under prohibition.

"While a bit skeptical concerning the favorable reports relating to business from other large cities, which had adopted prohibition measures, I am now convinced that they were entirely truthful in their statements concerning improved conditions.

"The volume of sales of the Keith-O'Brien Company during August and September was by far the largest ever enjoyed within corresponding months.

"H. N. BYRNE,
"Managing Director, Keith-O'Brien Company Department Store."

Sheriff Says Success of Prohibition Far Exceeds Expectations

"In response to your letter of the 24th inst., asking for an expression from me as to the operation of the Utah prohibition law, I take pleasure in saying that the success of the prohibition law has far exceeded expectations. While I am not connected in any way with any business, I am inclined to think that the law has benefited the state in many ways, and as time passes, we shall more readily see and feel the benefits accruing from its enforcement.

"JOHN S. CORLESS, Sheriff,
"County of Salt Lake."

Prohibition an Economic, Social and Political Asset, Attorney General of Utah Proclaims

"I am glad to reply to your communication as to whether or not, in my opinion, the prohibition law has been a success in our state. During the short time it has been in force, and because of the effective manner in which its provisions have been administered, the results have been altogether beneficial. If the law continues to be as drastically enforced, I have no doubt that its value will become more and more marked.

"Inasmuch as it is an economic maxim that no law can be properly enforced that does not meet with the approval of the public, and as the sentiment in this state appears to be entirely favorable to the law, I have no doubt that the benefits and advantages accruing from it will be increasingly felt as time goes on.

"W. MONT FERRY,
"Mayor of Salt Lake City and Commissioner of Public Safety."

Mayor Gives Public Recognition to Beneficial Results of Dry Law

"Your letter received, inquiring if in our opinion the prohibition law has brought benefits to Utah. The merchants of Salt Lake City and elsewhere in the state answer that economically it has been most advantageous. The diminution of the number of criminal cases appearing in the police courts of Salt Lake City and Ogden each day, are convincing proof that prohibition has been a success viewed from the standpoint of criminology. The wives whose husbands had formerly dissipated their wages in saloons, returning penniless and abusive to their homes, testify that prohibition has been a wonderful success in the state socially.

"There is absolutely no doubt that prohibition is beneficial economically, socially and politically. The history of politics shows that wherever the liquor interests exist they have corrupted, or have a potential power to corrupt politics. Any such condition which may have existed heretofore, we believe, is now happily passed. "DAN B. SHIELDS,
"State's Attorney General."

Bank Deposits Show Increase

"Replying to your letter of the 24th, beg to advise that so far as the Merchants Bank is concerned we have noticed no particular difference since the dry law became effective, except that our deposits have increased somewhat. My personal opinion is that it is going to be a good thing for the community at large when the property owners are able to re-rent their property to their satisfaction.

"JOHN PINGREE,
"President Merchants Bank."

Satisfaction with Prohibition Almost Universal, Iowa Mayors Agree

More than one hundred mayors of Iowa cities have assured the allied temperance committee that they are in favor of prohibition and will work and vote for it.

"I do not believe there is one gallon of liquor used in our city where there were ten used under the old law," writes Mayor Albert R. Smith of Fort Madison. "Our police court records show about one case of intoxication to eighteen or twenty under old conditions. I think our city is much benefited by prohibition."

"I do not know what association of men David had in mind when in his anger he said: 'All men are liars,'" R. J. Andrews, mayor of Sioux City, says, "but I do know that those who are now saying that there is more liquor consumed in Iowa than in the days when we had the open saloon are direct descendants of the men referred to.

"In my opinion there was more than 1,000 times as much liquor used in Sioux City two years ago as now. We are looking forward to a clean docket—to a time when all of every man's wage will be spent by the man himself for the benefit of himself or his family."

D. Davenport, mayor of Creston, writes: "The enforcement of the bone dry law has been a great advantage to the city in every way. Bank deposits have increased, building and repairing of property has been done to an extent never before known in Creston. There are a number of people in Creston who have always been active wets who are now supporting the amendment."

"Closing saloons has greatly benefited us in every way," is the testimony of M. B. Snyder, mayor of Council Bluffs, which ten years ago was perhaps the widest open city in Iowa. "Business is much better, more money is in the banks, and more people are going to church.

"Council Bluffs would not have the saloons again. Our big booze sanatorium has gone out of business—nothing more to do."

"Our merchants are doing a much better business than when we had open saloons, as many of the people who spent their money at the saloons are now able to pay their legitimate bills," is the word from F. A. Osincup, mayor of Waverly. "There is more money in our banks than ever before. We do not want the saloon, as we are much better off without it."

"The merchants would never stand for saloons again," says C. E. Purdy, mayor of Independence.

Iowa Dry Law Cuts Charity Cases Sixty Percent

H. S. HOLLINGSWORTH, General Secretary Associated Charities, Des Moines, Iowa

It may be interesting to the public to know that about four years ago, when the eighty-six saloons in Des Moines were in operation, we made a study of the causes of poverty coming to us for consideration, and our analysis revealed the fact that twenty-six per cent of all such families coming under our observation came because of liquor drinking.

In the early part of 1916 we again studied the families with which we had had dealings during the year 1915, a full year without any legalized saloons in Des Moines, and less than ten per cent of these cases were impoverished because of drink. In other words, a sixty per cent reduction from this one cause followed the closing of the saloons.

STATES WHICH VOTE IN 1917

Ohio New Mexico

Canada's White Map

Provincial prohibition is now in operation in the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and British Columbia. At the time the above map was made the province of Quebec was 84 per cent dry. Since then Missisquoi county and the city of Quebec have voted dry. A proposal by Yukon territory to petition the Dominion Parliament for territorial prohibition was defeated by the narrow margin of three votes. In the remaining part of the Dominion of Canada, generally known as the Northwest Territories, the sale of liquor is prohibited, and strong drink may only be imported on special permits, specifying the kind and quantity of liquor which they cover.

Prohibition in Nebraska Converts Prominent Opponents

M. M. CLAFLIN, President Nebraska W. C. T. U.

The dry majority of 30,000 in November, 1916, would be swelled to twice or three times that number if the vote were to be taken one year later, or after six months of splendid law-enforcement. This is not the testimony of radicals, but the generally expressed opinion of men from all parts of the state who were heretofore hostile to the dry policy.

Omaha, the citadel of liquor, is believed by people of cool judgment to be sure to roll up a majority for prohibition, in case of a call. Mayor Dahlman, the kingbee of the hive, has publicly declared his refutation of the wet policy, and his gratification with the results under the new law. Rev. T. J. Mackey, the Omaha clergyman who became such an asset to the Prosperity League last year, has also joined the ranks of the converts, and admits he was on the wrong track in his opposition to prohibition.

One of the vice-presidents of the Prosperity League, a merchant of high standing in his community as well as of wide acquaintance in the state, recently said to the writer, "My county" (which, by the way, is strongly German) "sent in a majority of less than 100 last year for the wet side. If the vote could be taken this year, it would be 500 for the drys. I, myself, am willing to admit my error. It has been other than I expected. Not only are business conditions better, but homes are happier." A significant statement for a man to make, who last year was working with influence and money for the defeat of prohibition, and making the same dire predictions as to the disastrous effects of such a law that are being made in campaign states today.

The great state fair, held early in September in Lincoln, was a test of the limitations prohibition puts on criminal operations. With an attendance of 200,000—an attendance which broke all records—there were but two arrests for drunkenness both in the city and on the fair grounds.

The late report of the Social Welfare society of Lincoln gives prohibition the credit for eliminating the charity cases coming from drink, while at the county jail the number of meals served to prisoners has fallen off so much that it is not easy to provide for them by contract.

The record of Nebraska has been remarkable in the enforcement of the law. Officers in the counties, in the main, have been diligent and faithful. The governor, although elected on another issue, has been absolutely true to his pre-election promises to enforce the amendment if it were adopted. One of his first acts was to send a letter to all county officers whose duties included the enforcement of this law, outlining his policy and asking for their co-operation. A county attorney recently told the writer that of 30 cases which had come before him, he had, at that time, secured convictions in 27.

If no other good results had followed the enactment of this law, there has been a world of satisfaction in the fact that during the weeks and months of the mobilization of the Army, not a soldier in uniform, or without, has been tempted by the open saloon within the borders of his own state. And naturally, there has been a minimum of complaints of the dissipation of the soldier, in Nebraska. Would to God other camps where our Nebraska boys must go to train were as free.

Colorado's Dry Law a Panacea for Economic and Social Ills

LESLIE E. HUBBARD, Attorney General of Colorado

The child is no longer attracted by the red spot on the stove. There is a reason. Experience is our greatest teacher. The people of Colorado have satisfied themselves that "booze" is a monstrous stumbling block to progress and civilization. The highest courts of our state and nation have branded it an outlaw and it is being driven from shelter to shelter like a hunted fox, aware of its destiny.

Mr. Justice Field, in Crowley vs. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, speaking on the subject says, "By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community, there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dram shop." Mr. Justice Bailey of our own Supreme Court quotes this language approvingly in Schwartz vs. People, 46 Colorado, page 249, and says, "No citizen ever had a common law right in Colorado to carry on the business of dealing in intoxicating liquors."

No longer will intelligent people allow "booze" to cover its hideous forms of brutality, disease, misery, sham, poverty, immorality and crime with cloaks of respectability. It cannot be long until the people of this nation will carve this deadly cancer from the breast of its civilization by one deft and speedy stroke of their combined will.

Prohibition Enacted to Save Sons and Daughters from Peril

The first step toward prohibition was effected in this state in 1907, in the form of local option. By steady gains, the year 1915 found about half of our population in dry territory under local option rule. This condition, though a necessary step, was not at all satisfactory, for while the evil was not immediately present in the "dry spots," it was conveniently near. The people occupying the "wet spots" watched the battle patiently, observed the merits of the adversaries and marked the strength and valor of each. Conviction seized them, and at the general election in November, 1914, they voted into our state constitution a prohibition amendment, to become effective January 1, 1916. The majority consisted largely of people who had been converted by observation and experience. The victory was alike the work of moralist, scientist, philosopher, substantial business man, wife, mother and father, and a great number of those whose talent had been blighted by the scourge. Men and women determined to restore lost happiness. Fathers and mothers determined to save sons and daughters from the peril. Here and there a pitiful and homeless outcast, stricken down to degradation by his unconquerable foe, summoned all remaining power and joined the final assault. Business saw the deception to which it had previously submitted and took a fearless stand.

Prohibition Sentiment a Steady Growth

That prohibition is a victory of experience is conclusive from the figures at hand. In 1912 thirty per cent of the voters of this state voted for prohibition; in 1914 fifty-two per cent voted for it, and in 1916, when an amendment was offered to permit the manufacture of beer in the state, 67.9 per cent voted against it—virtually a vote for prohibition.

Colorado no longer has to weigh the arguments from sister states on one side and the other. She knows now; and it is not too much to say that were a question submitted to our voters to return again to the wet column it would be rejected by a majority of 175,000, or an approximate ratio of 3 to 1.

It can safely be asserted that there is less room for difference of opinion upon the highly beneficial results of state-wide prohibition to our commonwealth than upon any other of the various social, political and economic questions confronting its people. Social, political and economic powers combined for prohibition, and it has come to stay.

Who Pays the Bill?

Despite the fifty per cent increase in the cost of living and only ten per cent to 15 per cent increase in wages since 1915, the families of dry Colorado enjoy one-third more food, clothing and necessary comforts than did those of wet Colorado and the merchant's loss is reduced practically to a minimum. The grocer's collection of accounts has improved over fifty per cent and other retail collections twenty-one per cent. Speaking in round numbers, the total savings deposits in state banks throughout the state were $2,000,000 in 1915, $3,000,000 in 1916 and $8,000,000 in 1917. Bank deposits in general have practically doubled under prohibition and the number of persons placed by employment agencies has increased over 150 per cent.

The Jail-Keeper Is Lonesome.

Except for the bootlegger, the jailkeepers throughout the state have few cares. There was a 32 per cent to 40.5 per cent decrease in inmates of the county jails of this state in 1916, as compared with the five preceding years, and September, 1917, except for bootleggers, finds them comparatively empty. This latter fact has been definitely ascertained and is not a mere guess.

The Best Cure for Social Cancers

There is a decrease in offenses against our criminal laws of approximately 37 per cent in 1916 and 1917, as compared with 1908, 1912 and 1915, which latter years afford a comparative average of all years from 1907 to 1915, while homicide and suicide have decreased 62.2 per cent. Other offenses have decreased in this state under prohibition in the following percentages: Vagrancy, 69 per cent; disturbance, 31 per cent; gambling, 32.4 per cent; keeping gambling houses, 70.4 per cent; contributing to houses of prostitution, 92.3 per cent; keeping houses of prostitution, 85.3 per cent. The improvement in 1917, as compared with 1916, is very marked.

Effect on the Home.

The state's greatest power for might and righteousness has been conserved and increased. Under prohibition divorce decreased 30 per cent, non-support 33 per cent and juvenile delinquency 42 per cent. Colorado families have more food, clothing, pleasures and advantages under prohibition.

Church Bids for Surplus

Warden Tynan states that for every three prisoners received at the Colorado penitentiary in 1915 one prisoner is received in 1917. The institution had 827 inmates on March 1, 1916, now has 630, and thirty releases will be made next month. Of all prisoners formerly received at the penitentiary 70 per cent were non-residents. Reports from bordering wet states indicate that a large proportion of this class of trouble makers has moved. The number committed to the state reformatory has decreased an average of 11 per cent this year.

A 10 per cent comparative increase in Sunday school attendants is registered in state and church membership, attendance and contributions have increased, fairly estimated at 18 per cent.

Increase in Tourist Travel

Visitors spent $10,000,000 while enjoying Colorado's mountains and sunshine in 1916, which broke all previous records and, so far as estimates show at this time, the present year will exceed 1916 by $5,000,000, or 50 per cent. The increase in hotel and restaurant patronage corresponds.

Decrease In Liquor Consumption

It is estimated upon the Federal government's statistics that the consumption of intoxicating liquor in Colorado during 1913 was twenty-two gallons per capita. Figures for 1914 and 1915 are not at hand. In 1916 this per capita consumption decreased to five gallons and this figure is attributable largely to quantities shipped into the state in anticipation of state-wide prohibition. Recent laws have reduced the intoxicating liquor consumed in Colorado at the present time as a beverage to that unlawfully imported or sold or remaining on hand in private residences.

Denver Re-Born

It was the opinion of many that prohibition would prove harmful to business in cities throughout the state, and especially to Denver. Such is found not to be the case. The value of building permits increased 52.9 per cent in 1916 over 1915, and thus far in 1917 there is a substantial increase over 1916 despite the scarcity and high cost of building materials. The tenantable buildings in Denver are practically 97 per cent occupied under prohibition rule and at the present time, while 90 per cent occupancy of business property and 85 per cent occupancy of residence property are generally taken to indicate prosperity in a community. As to business property in the heart of the city, there were 178 vacancies on April 5, 1917, as compared with 242 on November 27, 1914, and 251 on August 24, 1915. Denver compares favorably upon all figures and estimates given for the state.

When Is a Man Drunk?

Denver's arrests for drunkenness averaged per month as follows: 1914-1915, 224; 1916-1917, 137, a decrease of 63 per cent, notwithstanding the fact that this year the police department has arrested all persons suspected of intoxication and when the state was wet it was the rule of the department not to arrest an intoxicated person until unable to walk. Cheyenne, one-twelfth as large as Denver, registered an average of arrests for drunkenness per month as follows: 1915, 104; 1916, 209, and the number for 1917, if at hand, would undoubtedly prove interesting.

Bootleggers Have Cause for Alarm

Experience has taught us that prohibition laws can be enforced, and the active enforcement of these laws throughout the state is gratifying. Colorado has profited by the mistakes and experience of other states and has speedily taken up the enforcement of her prohibition laws with an iron hand. As a result, violations of these laws have been reduced to a minimum. One indication of this is the fact that bootleggers ask five to ten dollars per quart and upward for whisky when obtainable.

The effectiveness of the new law is fast becoming felt. The number of convictions under it thus far is very satisfactory. This statute provides for commitment to the state penitentiary for sec-

DIFFICULT TO FIND AN ANTI IN SOUTH DAKOTA

HON. FRANK M. BYRNE, Former Governor

The people of South Dakota are well satisfied with state-wide prohibition, and have no doubt of its advantages and no thought of abandoning it.

The constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture, importation or sale of intoxicating liquors was adopted by the voters at the fall election in 1916 and went into effect July 1, 1917. The legislature enacted a very comprehensive and effective statute to carry the provisions of the amendment into effect.

The changes wrought by this amendment and law were not so extreme as though the licensed saloon had been in vogue in all parts of the state. When the constitutional amendment and the statute for its enforcement went into effect, July 1, three-quarters of the area of the state had already for varying lengths of time been dry territory. For some years, at the spring elections, increasing numbers of towns had refused to grant license and the dry territory was constantly extended and the number of saloons reduced. The campaigns for and against license in the spring of 1915, and again in 1916, were really preliminary to the final campaign for constitutional prohibition in the fall of 1916. In the spring of 1915 many of the larger towns of the state voted against license and banished the saloon. In the spring of 1916 numerous additions were made to the list of dry towns and none of those already dry voted wet. It is worthy of note that at each of the spring elections the dry area was considerably extended, and nowhere was there any indication of going backward. So the adoption of the constitutional amendment and the enactment of the statute to give it force and effect were but the final acts in a general anti-saloon campaign extending over a good many years. It was in no sense a sudden or impulsive action based on temporary enthusiasm, but was the deliberate, well considered determination of a great majority of our people.

Having thus deliberately adopted state-wide prohibition, after years of experience with local prohibition under our former local option law, there is no danger that the people of South Dakota will go back to the licensed saloon with all its attendant evils.

The improvement in conditions, morally, socially and economically is very marked, and is commented upon by all classes of people. In fact, it is now very difficult to find any one who will openly advocate the repeal of the prohibition law or the return of the saloon.

Crime and disorder are much lessened and the only activities curtailed by the prohibitive law are those of the courts, police officers and jails. The chief of police of the city of Sioux Falls, which until July always had saloons, recently reported six arrests last month, as against 172 in the corresponding month last year, and attributed the falling off largely, if not entirely, to the absence of saloons. This is typical of the changed conditions in other cities and towns that until recently had saloons. It is the universal experience of towns and cities as they have abandoned the saloon that decency and order take the place of crime and disorder.

Bank deposits have greatly increased in towns where the saloon has been put out, and all lines of business feel an impetus and improvement. Money that formerly went over the bar at the saloon now goes to purchase more and better clothing for the women and children, for groceries and family supplies, to make better living conditions, and into the bank as savings. This promotes business, and consequently the prosperity of merchants, banks and business men generally, and increases the comfort and happiness of the people.

In the interest of efficiency, in the interest of certain and speedy success in the war and especially in the interest of the welfare of the splendid young men who make up our Army, no intoxicating liquors should be permitted to be sold anywhere in this country during the period of the war.

SOUTH DAKOTA THROUGH WITH THE SALOON

EX-GOVERNOR FRANK M. BYRNE

In South Dakota we are done with the saloon because we know its every influence is bad—bad, morally, socially and economically; because it degrades manhood, dishonors womanhood and defrauds childhood, and never under any circumstances or in any place is it a benefit to any one. It fills jails, police courts, poorhouses and insane asylums; it empties churches and schools and wrecks homes. We know something of its work, but have now found the better way, and we are in no danger of turning back.

Liquor Menace Forever Banished from Arkansas

MINNIE RUTHERFORD FULLER, President Arkansas W. C. T. U.

Arkansas will never "revert" to the liquor traffic stage of civilization!

When a few years ago our battleships were in the Bay of Naples, I happened to be in that city. We Americans heard on every hand complaints on the part of Italians of the conduct of our drunken sailors until sometimes we feared that the serious dissatisfaction would result in international complications. This was nothing new, however, in the history of the sailors and liquor towns.

It has often been said that the conduct of drunken soldiers has always brought discredit upon the uniform of the United States Army; but I have not seen a single drunken soldier in all the months of their stay in Little Rock, either in the officers' training camp or at Camp Pike; and along with the absence of liquor there is a determined effort to keep the camp and environment free from vice, an effort in which soldier and civilian alike join and with success, relatively speaking.

In civil life the benefits of prohibition are everywhere apparent. There are violations, and in a few of the medium-sized places conditions are far from ideal. With these we are trying with might and main to deal, and are sure of ultimate success. In these few towns the better class of men are doing their best to enforce the law, while the violation is for the purpose of gain alone. On the other hand, the larger towns that always have been notoriously misgoverned have had a new vision and are steadily improving. As usual, the vice districts are rapidly disappearing from these towns.

Former Liquor Dealers Like Being Respectable Citizens

The prosecuting attorney of Pulaski county, in which Little Rock is situated, says that his business is materially "damaged" and he is correspondingly delighted. The head of the liquor traffic in the state has put his ill-gotten gains into up-to-date farm machinery and now conducts ably the "Southwestern Supply Company." Another liquor dealer of this city has an excellent coffee house and announces that he feels like a respectable citizen. Jails all over the state are in a sanitary condition for the first time in years, because there has been opportunity to air and clean them thoroughly in their "empty" state.

Men who have always "taken their toddy," yet claimed to be good citizens, have discontinued the practice, not wishing to be law violators.

Little Rock's municipal docket shows a decrease of at least fifty per cent in cases. Pulaski's grand jury, the first after the prohibition law went into effect, reported as follows: "It will be found by comparison with the reports of former grand juries that this grand jury has served less time, returned fewer indictments and incurred less expense than any preceding one for many years."

Our department of Public Education reports that with booze removed much "rural center" work is being done. This was never before possible of achievement.

Sheriff Hutton reported, for the first year of prohibition, a decrease in the number of persons in jail of over one-half. In other counties the number was reduced two-thirds. Figures such as these could be given at great length, but the best evidence that we are through with the liquor traffic is that when a repeal bill was voted upon at the last election it was completely "snowed under" at the polls and the last session of our general assembly passed without effort and with the hearty approval of the entire state a "bone dry" law and for the most part welcomed the Federal "bone dry" law with enthusiasm.

The officers of our Federation of Woman's Clubs, in a board meeting, unanimously adopted a resolution in support of the Federal prohibition measure.

GOVERNOR BROUGH OF ARKANSAS URGES SIGNING OF PLEDGE TO ABSTAIN FROM USE OF LIQUOR DURING WAR

"I believe strongly that the use of alcoholic beverages lessens the man power of the soldier and sailor, and equally the efficiency of those upon whom both Army and Navy are dependent for food, supplies and munitions, and also, that the grain consumed in their production should be conserved for food," says Governor Brough of Arkansas in a statement to the people of his state. "Early in the war I wired the President favoring the passage of a law by Congress prohibiting the use of food stuff for the manufacture of alcoholic beverages, and am gratified to know that Congress did take a long step in this direction by practically commandeering food stuffs used in the manufacture of liquor.

"I devoutly hope that the day is not far distant when we shall have nation-wide prohibition. State-wide prohibition in Arkansas has proven an unalloyed boon to our people, meaning a social, mental, economic and moral uplift. The efficiency of our man power has been greatly increased; our homes have been made happier and our firesides more cheerful by the abolition of the nefarious liquor traffic, which each year has demanded its tribute of American young men, even as the Minatour of Crete demanded its tribute of Athenian maidens.

"Since state-wide prohibition has proven so successful in the states where it has been tried, the argument for nation-wide prohibition has even greater potency and moral force. I sincerely trust that every patriot will sign a pledge, agreeing to abstain from the use of alcoholic beverages during the period of the war."

Four Vital Reasons for Prohibition

R. B. GRIFFITH, Proprietor of the Largest Department Store in North Dakota

First.—Prohibition helps the homes of the people. It brings to many mothers and children comforts that they would not have if the sale of liquor were permitted to debauch and pauperize the father and bread winner.

Second.—Prohibition creates a better moral atmosphere in which to rear a family. With booze banished we have less vice and crime.

Third.—Prohibition is an aid in the creating of wealth in any community. Under prohibition we have more thrift—laborers, mechanics, business men and farmers all have more earning ability and save more money.

Fourth.—Prohibition territory secured through local option is of value, but it is difficult to enforce the law when the sale of liquor is permitted in other nearby sections—the wider the prohibition area the better. State-wide prohibition is much better than local-wide prohibition and national prohibition is the only final satisfactory settlement of the liquor question.

Three Strong Arguments in Favor of Prohibition

MELVIN A. HILDRETH, United States District Attorney

I believe that the general happiness of the people, the healthy, well clothed children, the large amount of deposits in the savings banks, are strong arguments in favor of state-wide prohibition.

Governor, State and City Officials and Press of Tennessee Unanimous in Praise of Prohibition

MARY P. BANG, President Tennessee W. C. T. U.

Tennessee has had a prohibitory law since 1909, but for a number of years it was violated in the large cities, whose officials not only winked at but openly encouraged its non-observance. Many of these gentlemen have been ousted and law enforcement has become the order of the day. An intelligent observer with half an eye cannot fail to note the change for the better that has come to pass in the last two years.

"All the benefits foretold for prohibition have come to be a part of our experience in Tennessee," says Governor Tom C. Rye, "and none of the calamities predicted have come to pass. The public conscience is more acute and a higher standard of public service and efficiency is required. A new and more vigorous moral force has taken hold of our people individually, making for better citizenship. Public drunkenness has disappeared and the state is spending more money for free schools and charity and less for criminal prosecutions than ever before."

"I have been charged with the enforcement of the soft drink stand law, which was so enacted that it was possible through it to exterminate, to a very large extent, the sale of liquor," says Mr. Harry L. Eskew, state food and drug commissioner. "Perhaps I, more than others, have come in contact with the poverty and crime resulting from the use of whisky. Today, notwithstanding the short time since this law has been enforced, we are able to report greatly improved conditions among those who formerly were the victims, directly or indirectly, of liquor."

Mr. J. J. Keyes, superintendent of the Nashville schools, asserts: "Since the state-wide prohibition laws have been strictly enforced the children are better fed, better clothed and fewer requests are made for help from families that were formerly seriously handicapped because their heads were spending their money for drink."

Opinion of the Press

Mr. M. B. Morton, managing editor of the Nashville Banner, says: "There is a very great decrease in drunkenness since prohibition became effective. Whisky is hard to get and few boys are forming the drink habit. One of the greatest benefits of prohibition is that politics are no longer in the control of saloons and saloon hangers-on."

Mr. G. F. Milton, owner and publisher of the Chattanooga News, declares: "Evidences of the wisdom and justice of the prohibitory laws accumulate daily. We now have near here an army camp with 25,000 soldiers, who throng the streets of Chattanooga. I have yet to see a drunken soldier. If the question were submitted to the people of Tennessee now there would not be a corporal's guard in favor of whisky."

Mr. Ralph Runyon, editor of the Nashville Tennessean and American, sums up the situation as follows: "Our jails have fewer inmates and crime has steadily decreased. Prohibition has been a blessing to Tennessee, and the women are to be congratulated for what they have accomplished in its behalf. Tennessee is prospering under prohibition and her revenues are adequate to meet all expenses."

The good effect of the strict enforcement of the "bone dry" law in Nashville is evidenced in the falling off in the number of arrests, according to published police reports:

In May, 1917, before the bone dry law became effective the total number of arrests was 1,200; in August, the second month after it went into effect, the total number of arrests was 878. In September the total number of arrests was only 555, and this, too, when tens of thousands of people were crowding the streets during the week of the state fair. In all the crowds that thronged the fair grounds that week no intoxicated person was seen and the best of behavior prevailed.

In Knoxville, the difference has also been marked. In May, the number of arrests was 420. In August, the second month after the "bone dry" law went into effect, the total number of arrests was 242.

Mr. C. P. J. Mooney, in an editorial in the Memphis Commerical-Appeal, September 27, remarks: "This year we have not seen a drunken man upon the streets during the week of the fair. There is not a place in Memphis where a man can get a drink unless he is a forty-ninth degree adept. There is not a gambling house open. There is not a negro or a white dive operating. The killing record has been reduced. There are no drunks on the street cars. The red light district, in spite of the erroneous theory that such a place always will exist and might be necessary, is done for. Life is safer in Memphis today than it ever was before. Gambling as a system is done for. Liquor selling is a thing of the past. We submit conditions in Memphis as they exist today, in business, in sobriety, in order and obedience to the law, to the visitors to the tri-state fair and leave it to them to say how much has been the improvement in the last two years."

With a Christian man, unwavering in his advocacy of prohibition in the governor's chair, with a higher class of men being elected to office in our large cities, with our splendid press unanimously in favor of the strict enforcement of our "bone dry" law, Tennessee is forging to the front along all lines of progress, material and spiritual, and an era of undreamed prosperity is dawning for the Old Volunteer State.

PROHIBITION ALMOST TOTALLY ELIMINATES CRIME

WILLIAM LANGER, Attorney General, State of North Dakota

My experience in Morton county, which until recently was the largest county in the state of North Dakota, conclusively proved that the strongest argument for state-wide prohibition, if enforced, is the almost total elimination of crime. Since becoming attorney general of the state of North Dakota and consequently ex-officio a member of the pardon board, I have found that 95 per cent of the men applying for pardons got into the penitentiary because they committed their crimes while under the influence of liquor. Decrease of crime means decrease of expensive lawsuits and permits the money saved to be put into good schools. In my judgment the entire elimination of liquor has raised our citizenship to a much higher standard than I believe can be found in any wet state.

The Educational Value of the Prohibition Law

W. C. MACDONALD, State Superintendent of Public Instruction for North Dakota

As a school man I consider the strongest arguments for state-wide prohibition are, first, that prohibition does prohibit as shown by the records of our state, and that in doing so, it makes for the health, wealth, and moral integrity of the people; and, second, that the very existence of a state-wide prohibition law is in and of itself a thing of highest importance, for it serves to develop in the minds of the young high ideals regarding clean and honorable living.

Conservation of Manliness, Character and Life Far Excels Conservation of Property

ANDREW A. BRUCE, Chief Justice of Supreme Court of North Dakota

The strongest, and it seems to me the only necessary argument for state-wide prohibition is, that a nation cannot be stronger or better than the sum of all of its individual parts or citizens, and that through the centuries the use of liquor has done no real good to anyone, but, on the contrary, incalculable harm to countless millions. The sum total of the strength and virility of its individual citizens is a nation's greatest natural asset, and the conservation of property is far less important than the conservation of manliness, character and life.

MIGHTY CHANGE WROUGHT BY PROHIBITION IN VIRGINIA

SARA H. HOGE, State W. C. T. U. President

The prohibitory law became effective in Virginia November 1, 1916, and its beneficial effects were apparent at once. From the mountains to the sea comes the same testimony: less drunkenness, fewer arrests, better business, happier homes.

In the capital city, Richmond, during the first eight days following November 1, the total number of arrests for drunkenness was eight, while in the eight days preceding November 1 there were 122 arrests for the same cause; in the eight days following November 1 the previous year the arrests for drunkenness were 103. Within a month after prohibition became effective the city jail in Richmond had lost 120 prisoners over and above the number received, and the Monday police court, which usually lasted for hours, disposed of the entire docket in less than an hour.

General Decrease of Crime Follows Prohibition

The total arrests for all causes in Richmond showed a decrease of over 300 in January, compared with the same period in 1916. In February there were 508 fewer arrests than the previous year and of this number 130 were arrested for violations of the prohibition law. In the first six months of prohibition the bank deposits of the city had increased more than $12,000,000.

Judge Hoge Ricks of the Domestic Relations and Juvenile court of Richmond gives us figures showing that in the first six months under prohibition, compared with the preceding six months, the cases before his court for non-support had decreased about one-third, while those for wife-beating had decreased about two-thirds. Under date of September 21 he says, "I might add that before prohibition went into effect the number of young boys (Juvenile division) taken up for drunkenness was becoming alarming. Since that time we have not had more than two or three cases."

A letter of inquiry addressed to John J. Crutchfield, police justice, concerning the effect of the prohibitory law on the police courts brought the following response:

Throws Safeguard Around Young Men

"In my opinion, gathered from the records in my office for the past year, the strongest argument for prohibition is the elimination of the open saloon. Such elimination takes the temptation to drink from young men, and prevents the gathering together of men who are made drunk by constant treating and 'setting them up.'

"With this temptation taken from them the rising generation has more opportunities for rising in the world, and I believe the next generation will disclose more bright minds, due largely to the elimination of strong drink.

"A glance over the records in the office of the police court, shows that a very small percentage of the 'drunks' registered are young men. The great majority are what are termed 'old stagers' or 'old soaks.' Nothing will prevent them from getting their drinks and the result is inevitable.

"While prohibition does not entirely prohibit, any more than the laws against murder and robbery stop the commission of those crimes, it does throw a safeguard around young men."

Vacant Saloons Soon Fill Up With Other Lines of Business

In Lynchburg, two days after the prohibition law went into effect, it was announced through the press that practically all of the places left vacant by the closing of saloons had been rented for mercantile stores or restaurants. The records of this city showed twenty-nine prisoners in the jail November 1 and at the end of four weeks but ten; three weeks later there were but five, the smallest number in seventeen years, "attributed chiefly to the effect of the prohibition law," said the Lynchburg News.

Passing on to July, 1917, the total arrests in this city numbered 330, as compared with 489 for the same month the previous year; the number of charges for drunkenness this year was seven, and last year seventy-one. In August, comparison showed six drunks in 1917, against 102 in wet August, 1916.

Newport News, a city with a large foreign population, has shown a marked decrease in the number of arrests. Concerning this the chief of police says, "There have been few serious criminal cases since the state went dry. Most of the murders, shootings and cuttings were the outgrowth of whisky, and with the going of whisky this class of crime has been lessened."

At the end of the first four months of prohibition the statement was made that the jail population in the one hundred counties and fifteen city jails had decreased 1,741.

Records recently published of prisoners received at the state penitentiary show a great decrease in crime. Prisoners received from January 1, 1916, to August 31, 1916 (before prohibition was in effect), 588; prisoners received from January 1, 1917, to August 31, 1917 (after the coming of prohibition), 288; decrease in 1917 from same period of 1916, 300.

The proportion of jail men sent to the roads has fallen off 730 during the past year. In a published interview, Major James B. Wood, superintendent of the Virginia penitentiary, gives his opinion that "state-wide prohibition is responsible for cutting nearly in half Virginia crime statistics in the last eight months."

Health Aspect Strong Argument for Prohibition

Mr. Harris Hart, superintendent of Roanoke city schools, and Democratic nominee for state superintendent of public instruction, in endorsing state prohibition, says, "The health aspect of the proposition is fundamentally the best argument for prohibition. We are simply bound to give more serious consideration to the question of raising strong, healthy men and women than we have ever given in the past. The unreasonable drinking of liquor and intemperance along all lines serves to leave a distinct hereditary trail in one form or another. The social aspects of this problem should appeal to one strongly. It is not only the business of one generation to live justly and correctly, but it is its further business to insure that the generation following will not be handicapped by its own intemperance or immorality."

Press Recognizes Benefits of Law

Newspapers of the state that opposed prohibition bitterly are speaking of the benefits of the law. The Richmond Evening Journal, one of the best known of these papers, stated in its issue of January 29: "Three months of prohibition in Virginia have done more to convince skeptics of the desirability of the measure than all the arguments put forth by the dry advocates for years prior to the passage of the Mapp law. We doubt if there is a newspaper in the state that remains unregenerated on the question. The beneficent workings of the prohibition statute are so marked that the stubbornest wet contender must perforce yield. . . . The state has made no mistake in banishing the menace of the open saloon, and that Virginia will never go back to the old regime cannot be questioned."

So declare we all. To states that have not yet adopted prohibition we say, hasten to drive out the legalized liquor traffic and see what a mighty change will be wrought within your borders.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA
Bureau of Labor
Department of Weights and Measures
Samuel B. Montgomery,
Commissioner
Charleston, October 4, 1917.

Editor Union Signal,
Evanston, Ill.

West Virginia is dry and will be forever!

All classes are so well satisfied and so much in love with dry West Virginia that no effort worthy of notice will ever be made to resubmit the question. The wet influences outside of the state—there are none inside strong enough to be felt—know better than to undertake it. John Barleycorn is making a death struggle to keep a clutch-hold upon the remnant of states that are surely slipping away from him. He is in the last trench and about out of ammunition.

Certainly a number of West Virginians take a drink yet—when they can get it—which is seldom, but at the first opportunity these few drinkers will vote for national prohibition. They are convinced from what they see, feel and experience at home.

Since the state went dry West Virginia has built seventy-two new high school buildings at a total cost of approximately $2,800,000, the enrollment in high schools in the state has increased 131 per cent, and there are now nine colored high schools. Almost as many churches of the first class have been dedicated, and preachers' and teachers' salaries have been noticeably increased. A larger number of state and national banks have been organized than in the ten previous wet years. One lone bank in Fayette county has 800 more saving accounts than it had in the last year before prohibition.

The industrial centers would vote more solidly dry now than they did in 1912, when all industrial counties went dry except ONE.

On Labor Day I addressed a large mass of coal miners at Blaine (Mineral county, West Virginia), and Kitzmiller (Garrett county, Maryland), the two towns being separated by the north branch of the Potomac River. Westernport, the wettest town in Maryland, was only a few miles distant, special trains were run, three bands furnished music, there was a ball game and other sports and amusements, and NOT A DRUNKEN MAN WAS IN SIGHT. There was absolutely no drinking. When the long parade was reviewed, in which some two hundred school children carrying American flags was a feature, the president of the local union pointed out man after man in the parade who was NO GOOD when there were saloons in the two counties, but who now possessed savings accounts in the local banks. A few years back I addressed a similar meeting in the same locality, and it was a drunken carousal. It was a notable change—beautiful and inspiring. It made me feel that God is always good, and I thanked Him that West Virginia had cast her lot on the side of humanity.

Very truly yours,
SAMUEL B. MONTGOMERY,
Commissioner of Labor.

THE "SUCCESS" ARGUMENT

The "success" argument is the winning factor in present-day prohibition campaigns. Wherever and whenever proclaimed it effectually silences the liquorites; it makes the indifferent "sit up and take notice," and it stimulates the sluggish worker to activity. It is the final, conclusive and unanswerable word on the prohibition question. You have won your case with any jury when you have established your claim by a preponderance of evidence, and that is what the advocates of prohibition are doing in bringing to the attention of the public a great volume of first-hand testimony from governors, attorney generals, mayors, sheriffs, heads of big business, bankers, commissioners of labor, et al., virtually unanimous in their approval and praise of the no-saloon, no-brewery and no-distillery policy. This issue of THE UNION SIGNAL is packed from cover to cover with "success" arguments, secured directly from prominent residents of prohibition states. The articles or letters represent the time and effort of busy men or women of affairs. Yet so impressed have they been, in their own experience, with the value of prohibition to their business, their civic life, their social and moral interests, that they have promptly and even eagerly welcomed the opportunity to give publicity to their knowledge of what the dry law has done for them and their community. The "success" arguments given in this issue are not only authentic, they are comprehensive. Every phase of the wet and dry problem has been dealt with by experts.

We have assembled these communications from many different states in the hope and expectation that through them their authors may speak to doubtful, uninformed or indifferent voters in cities and states now in campaigns. We have done our part. Will you who are reading this page lend us your assistance in putting this accumulation of vote-making material in the places where it is most needed and where it will be of the greatest benefit to our cause. We shall count upon your help!

National W. C. T. U. Convention, Washington, D. C., December 2-7, 1917

Congress having adjourned the Washington Letter will be discontinued until it convenes again in December. Mrs. Margaret D. Ellis, National W. C. T. U. Legislative superintendent, has taken advantage of this release from her urgent duties at the Capital, and is spending with her daughters at Newark, N. J., the weeks intervening before the National W. C. T. U. Convention.

Unusually interesting reports of state conventions have been received and we regret that the limitations of space in this special number—a Campaign Edition—render it impossible to publish them this week. They will appear in the next issue.

STATES ON THE FIRING LINE

Before we go to press we expect to receive word by telegram of an overwhelming victory for constitutional prohibition in Iowa, which voted Monday, October 15. The testimony of mayors and prominent citizens of the big cities published in this number reflects the sentiment of the people on the prohibition question. Not even the unavoidable abandonment of the spectacular event of the campaign, the flight of the water-wagon airship, because of the machine being tampered with by enemies in a most suspicious manner, can prevent a victory at the polls.

Our National president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, writes from New Mexico that the outlook gives promise that the state will be white on the map after November 6. Having the official sanction of Governor Lindsey, the attorney general, secretary of state, United States Senators, supreme court judges, the dry cause is proving popular with the classes and the masses. At the annual meeting of the State Federation of Woman's Clubs, recently addressed by Miss Gordon, the president of the organization urged the women for the next few weeks to give secondary place, if necessary, to their war work, and devote themselves to efforts for state-wide prohibition as the most practical way of demonstrating their patriotism.

But one thing can prevent a landslide for prohibition in Ohio next month—a lack of interest on the part of its citizenry. With the evacuation of General Apathy, John Barleycorn's doom is assured. Only blindness or deafness can excuse any resident of the state for being ignorant of the merits of the issue to be voted on. The benefits of prohibition and the dangers of the license system have for months been advertised in the street cars, on billboard posters, by means of soap-box oratory and in a dozen other ways. And now Mary Harris Armor, the champion "disturber of consciences," is sweeping through the state and in her breezy, persuasive way carrying conviction to the hearts and intellects of her hearers. Judging from the reports, letters and press clippings that come from the Buckeye state, every worth-while individual and enterprise is lined up on the side of prohibition, and that in no half-hearted way. Unless all signs fail the liquor dealers will be purchasing tickets for some of the few moist sections of the country shortly after November 6. But where, oh where, can they go for permanent residence?

LET LABOR SPEAK FOR ITSELF

Someone asks, "Is organized labor really opposed to prohibition as the liquor interests insist?" The representatives of labor in the prohibition states seem not averse to answering that question with a decided negative. For instance, Otto R. Hartwig, president of the Oregon State Federation of Labor, a recent convert, by the way, says: "Since prohibition has become a law the benefits derived have been so great that I am a champion of prohibition from now on."

Listen to a voice from Idaho. Ernest Beckman of Wallace, Idaho, deputy organizer for the American Federation of Labor, and also business agent for the local union of the Carpenters and Joiners of America, speaking to his comrades in Ohio, urging them to vote dry, says: "My opinion of prohibition is that it is the best thing that ever happened in this district. The workingmen here now almost all have a bank account to fall back upon, and they do not have to take the first job that offers itself unless that job pays a living wage. The men dress themselves and their families better and are better fitted to bring up their children to be future citizens of this country."

A dozen champions of prohibition among labor representatives in Colorado could be cited, but it is sufficient to remind all whom it may concern that the special annual convention number of the Denver Labor Bulletin gave generous space to boosting prohibition as a valuable asset to the workingman.

The president of the Arizona State Federation of Labor is of the opinion, to quote his words, that "Arizona workers are certainly better morally and financially than they were before prohibition was adopted and are in shape to fight for better wages and better working conditions." Of the same purport is the statement of the president of the Washington State Federation of Labor, E. P. Marsh: "From a labor standpoint—an organized labor standpoint—let me say that the change has been noticeable in that we have had a different class of men to deal with right away—sober, a little money in their pockets, amenable to discipline and sound reasoning. It may be significant—I think it is—that the last twelve months have seen the task of organizing the working people of this state vastly easier than in the old saloon days. You can talk sense to sober men, men with a dollar in their pockets to pay their initiation fee."

The time is not far distant when every honest labor leader will be willing to declare his conviction, as did Chief Arthur of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, "If I could I would inaugurate a strike that would drive the liquor traffic from the face of the earth."

Survey of Past Month of National W. C. T. U. Patriotic Service

"Sacrifice and Service" is suggested by the president of the North Dakota W. C. T. U., in her annual address, as the slogan for the coming year. It is as well a most apt rally cry for the white ribbon hosts of the nation, for it epitomizes not only the spirit they display but that which has actuated them ever since the announcement of the Patriotic Service Program of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Work Among Soldiers, Sailors and Marines of Broad Scope

Varied and numerous are the enterprises in behalf of the soldiers, sailors and marines. Recreation rooms and places of rest in the neighborhood of military camps, naval stations and cantonments are proving a real panacea for home-sickness among the enlisted boys and men. From ocean to ocean these little "homey" corners are being established by white ribboners. The Massachusetts W. C. T. U. home at Ayer is soon to be opened. A Washington state worker writes that a bungalow or lodge, to be "mothered" by a white ribboner, is being erected near Camp Lewis, in the neighborhood of Puget Sound.

Comfort bags or kits by the hundreds and thousands have been made by the W. C. T. U. members and distributed according to the plan heretofore outlined. The boys' appreciation of these gifts is unstinted. So popular have the W. C. T. U. bags become that requests for them are being made of Army officers and forwarded to the various state headquarters. As an example, the Fourteenth company, Coast Artillery, Camp Kearney, Linda Vista, California, sent in a petition to the Southern California W. C. T. U. headquarters, signed by thirty-two officers, asking for comfort bags for themselves and their men. "Do they care for the Testament?" someone asks. Let this note sent by the recipient of a Missouri bag answer: "I never had a Testament of my own and always wanted one." Another wrote, "I am following your advice and have nearly read the gospel of Matthew through."

Candy an Appreciated Gift

Many local unions and individual white ribboners are acting upon the "sweet suggestion" of our National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, and are making home-made candy to send to the American soldiers in France. Time is of the essence of this enterprise, for unless these packages are in the mails before November 10 they will not reach France by Christmas. Mrs. Thacher instructs that the candy, especially chocolate, must be carefully wrapped in oiled paper, in order to insure its reaching its destination in good condition. Each package must be marked "Christmas Mail." The name and address of the sender should be placed in the upper left-hand corner. Give complete address of soldier, including company or regiment, etc. Packages must be mailed not later than November 10, and must be mailed direct from main office. They will not be accepted at branch offices or through mail boxes.

Not only the boys in France, but those in the camps and cantonments in America will appreciate sweets. Perhaps in no wiser way can we counteract the tobacco habit among them than by supplying them with wholesome confectionery. Let us economize on sugar in our homes if we must, but so far as possible "sugar coat" some of the hardships of camp life for our defenders by our gifts of candy.

Women Repair Soldiers' Clothing

That was a fine practical service that was rendered by twenty-five women of East Orange, N. J., who voluntarily undertook the task of keeping in repair the uniforms and other clothing of the New Jersey soldiers encamped at Sea Girt. No doubt similar kindnesses have been performed in other places.

If the many-tailed bandages that have been cut and rolled by white ribboners could be assembled they would make a fine showing of the work done by the devoted hands of our women. Mrs. Thacher recently visited Mrs. G. Mulliner of the British War Relief Association. In most enthusiastic terms she expressed her gratitude to the W. C. T. U. for its co-operation. Mrs. Thacher said that as she looked upon the more than 10,000 many-tailed bandages ready to be packed into boxes to be "shipped across" she felt that a great need had been supplied by the efforts of our workers.

"Bundle Day" Practical Form of Service

A form of practical war work which will appeal to every white ribboner is the collection and preparation of material for the National Surgical Dressings Association. The following community plan has been successful: Request is made through the press and church bulletins that the people of the town, on a certain day, to be known as "Bundle Day," will collect all the old clean cotton and linen they can spare, tie it up, and leave it on their porches, marked for the W. C. T. U. Arrangements are made for automobiles to call and collect these donations, some communities asking the Boy Scouts to help in the work. The bundles are then packed and sent to the state headquarters of the National Surgical Dressings Association, to be forwarded to hospitals in the war zone.

Relief Work at Home and Abroad

Recently the Oklahoma state council of defense asked every local council to secure a "soldier at home" for every soldier from the county who was in actual service. This voluntary substitute agreed to look after the family and business interests of the absent defender of the nation. Every one who is helping in the department of Relief is "a soldier at home." The W. C. T. U. is constituting itself a clearing house for the care of families of some of the men who have been drafted into the Army. The other day there came to National W. C. T. U. Headquarters a letter from the parents of a drafted man in Chicago, telling of the needy condition of the daughter-in-law, who was left without means of support, and asking help to have her brought to her husband's parents in a distant state where she could be taken care of. By addressing the proper authorities, transportation was arranged and the problem solved. Every day the adoption of French and Belgian orphans grows increasingly popular. The appearance in THE UNION SIGNAL of a picture of the French orphan adopted by the North Carolina W. C. T. U. so aroused the sympathy of a young man reader that he immediately sent in a contribution to the fund. Not infrequently during the past weeks one has seen in the columns of the state papers items like the following: "The La Mesa W. C. T. U. has arranged to adopt a French orphan."

Moral Education

It is suggested by the National superintendent of the department of Moral Education that the special work for October be to secure the co-operation of pastors, priests and rabbis in bringing to parents in their respective congregations the responsibility of urging upon their sons and daughters the maintenance of high standards of morality. Perhaps in no better way can the rank and file aid in this work than to help in the many recreational movements in the vicinity of camps and cantonments. Secretary Baker of the War Department has recently said, "The task of organizing towns and cities in the vicinity of camps along recreational and social lines is an opportunity for service which cannot be overlooked. There is so large a task before us in surrounding our troops with a healthy environment, that I trust all groups can co-operate in this work."

The bringing of the residents in these military centers into the environment of a Christian home will do much to fortify them against possible temptation. One Christian father and mother, whose only son is in France, have for months been inviting to their apartments in a family hotel, each week, ten young men from either the adjacent Great Lakes Naval Training Station, North Chicago, or from Fort Sheridan. They arrive on Saturday night in time for a family dinner, to which are invited a few carefully chosen young women; the evening is spent in sociability of some kind, the mothers of the young women being also present. Before retiring they are given cards with the names and locations of the churches in the neighborhood and are invited, if they care to do so, to accompany their host and hostess to service, or are made to feel free to stay at home and rest or read, as they see fit. The "boys" assemble with the family at dinner and after a quiet, homelike afternoon they leave for camp, refreshed and recreated in body and soul. Every woman who is so situated that she can thus entertain may well consider it a high and holy privilege.

Women in Industry

The demand in the labor market for women workers grows more insistent daily. It is reported by the press that thousands of women are to be employed in aircraft factories. Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt is quoted as saying that the Navy department has given serious consideration to the question of employing women in government navy yards in every capacity where their services can be used; the two big naval clothing factories are now virtually run by women. Women, wherever employed, should be safeguarded as to sanitary surroundings, proper hours of labor and fair wages.

AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

In writing of the food conservation work that has been done by the women during the past few months, Mrs. Lucia F. Additon, National superintendent of Temperance and Labor, tells of an interesting patriotic hour at the close of the Oregon state convention, participated in by the six departments included in the National patriotic service plan. As the representatives of these departments marched down the aisles of the church they brought packages neatly wrapped and labeled for the emergency closet of the Oregon Labor department. Mrs. Additon urges the establishment in every local union of these closets, in which shall be placed the donations of members from time to time of dried fruit and vegetables, ready for the emergency calls that are certain to come this winter.

Americanization

The subject of Americanization is receiving attention at the state conventions and many states are planning for the definite work of visiting foreign speaking people in their community; arranging for classes to teach them the English language, and interesting them in other ways in patriotic enterprises.

Temperance Truths in Pictured Form

The stereomotorgraph fund is assuming large proportions. Some of the states have sent in their full apportionment. As heretofore stated, the truth concerning the liquor traffic is presented to the boys in a pictorial and very convincing and eloquent fashion. It is planned later to supplement this feature of the work by addresses by some of America's able temperance orators.

Money Making Enterprises

White ribboners are showing themselves very ingenious in planning for money-making entertainments to raise money for war work. Pantry sales, ten cent teas, H. C. L. socials have proven popular. Nothing, however, can rival the good old-fashioned way of giving outright from a cheerful heart.

Community Spirit Marked

The co-operation with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in patriotic service has been a gratification. A case in point is the request received from the Michigan Federation of Woman's Clubs for literature concerning the National W. C. T. U.'s Patriotic Service plans for distribution at its annual meeting.

Patriotic Service an Avenue of Introduction to the W. C. T. U.

Reports of membership gains received from the different state conventions indicate that enthusiasm for patriotic service has in no degree lessened zeal in W. C. T. U. organization work. On the contrary, there is much evidence to show that through it outsiders have been led to appreciate the white ribbon organization as never before. One state W. C. T. U. sent personal circular letters to every church woman's organization in the state, inviting them to make comfort bags for the W. C. T. U., stating that a Testament was always enclosed, and that certain objectionable articles found in other bags were omitted, thus enlisting their hearty interest and sympathy. Never was there such an opportunity for gathering into our Union the mothers of the boys "somewhere" in France and America! Let us not fail to take advantage of it.

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. Summarize the results of two months of prohibition in Utah, as given by Governor Bamberger.

2. Why will Arkansas never revert to the liquor traffic stage of civilization?

3. Tell how the dry law has lowered the cost of maintenance of penal institutions in the state of Washington. What can be said concerning increase in bank deposits in that state?

4. How has prohibition in Virginia thrown a safeguard around the young men of the state?

5. What percentage of crime does the attorney general of North Dakota attribute to the liquor traffic?

6. Why does ex-Governor Bryne say that South Dakota has severed for all time its partnership with the saloon?

7. What does the attorney general of Colorado say concerning the effects of prohibition?

8. Explain how prohibition has affected labor conditions in West Virginia, according to the statement of the labor commissioner of the state. What can you say concerning the labor situation in Oregon and other prohibition states?

9. What is the testimony from Tennessee and Georgia concerning the value of prohibition to states where training camps are located?

10. How has prohibition in Nebraska won to its support former prominent liquor advocates?

BEER, THE WAR PROFITEER

MARGARET WINTRINGER

The story of the trade's requital of the generous consideration shown it at the beginning of the war, has been published by the British government as one of the official White Papers, entitled "Report and Statistics of Bad Times Kept in Shipbuilding, Munitions and Transport Areas." It forms an illuminating war tale.

First of all, the trade seized an unfortunate plea of Mr. Lloyd George and converted it into an advertisement, and when I was in Great Britain, billboards, posters and full page "ads" in the leading papers proclaimed that "Every man who took his half pint was helping to carry on the war."

Before war work was fairly under way, the trade enlarged facilities for drinking and made overtures to the very classes whose sobriety was most important to the nation. In the neighborhood of all works for war purposes, drinking places were erected with immense circular bars designed for quick service. I found one such place which boasted a capacity for serving at one time two thousand customers. Hardly was the war started before it became evident that drink was operating against industrial efficiency.

Liquor Causes Appalling Delays in Munition Work and Ship-building

Just when Great Britain needed ships, the drinking of workmen slowed down shipbuilding and repairs on the Clyde, congesting the docks, and delaying the sailing of transports carrying soldiers to the front twenty-four to thirty-six hours. With the call from the trenches for more shells, munition factories complained to the Ministry of Munitions that the "margin of lost time before the war has now to be doubled." Shipbuilding firms sent letters to the First Lord of Admiralty explaining failure to furnish ships as per contract,—"a considerable number of our men absent from duty today, drinking." It signified little that in some instances the trouble was with a minority of the workmen only, since "whole gangs are thrown out owing to the absence of three or four hands."

Appalling loss of time attended every industry upon which victory depended. The tables of lost time, which appear in the White Papers, include riveters, platers, caulkers, drillers, iron workers, carpenters and their helpers—all men whose work determined the war output.

Drink More Deadly Than Submarines

From the most unexpected quarters came the demand for prohibition. Glasgow iron masters ordered water instead of whisky with their mutton and urged prohibition. The London Times, the Spectator, the Manchester Guardian and other influential papers declared their readiness to support any prohibition measure the government might put forth. Mr. Lloyd George delivered a surprising war speech, charging to drinking workmen the loss of time which was hindering the war, with the historic declaration that "Drink is doing us more damage than all the German submarines put together."

The drink evil grew with startling rapidity. Just four days after Mr. Lloyd George's speech, Captain Greaterox of the Royal Navy paid a visit of inspection to the shipbuilding district of the Clyde, as director of Naval Equipment. He found "the condition of labor so deplorable owing to drink, that at any time the whole of shipbuilding on the Tyne may come to a standstill," and wrote to the Third Sea Lord, urging the "total closing of all public houses."

Within ten days the Munition's Department received the following warning from a works engaged in the manufacture of high explosives: "Unless drastic steps are taken to lessen the sale of drink before long we shall find it impossible to deliver anything like the quantities of trinitro-toluene we have undertaken to supply your department."

Adapted from Manchester Union.

What Uncle Sam Ought to Say!

Again and again in this startling government document, the schooner of beer is cited before the bar with the half gill of whisky as "an equally criminal creator of treasonable inefficiency."

"I am very uneasy about the situation on the Clyde," Admiral Sir John Jellicoe wrote a week later. And this was the reason for his anxiety: The German submarine warfare had just begun. It behooved the British Navy to act speedily. Yet the admiral writes, "My destroyer dockings and refits are delayed in every case by these labor difficulties and they take twice as long as they need to."

The situation was so serious that Admiral Jellicoe followed his letter with telegrams. The Directory of Transport's reply to these messages was, "To carry out operations with speed and efficiency it is necessary to withdraw all licenses to sell intoxicating liquors throughout the country."

Mr. T. Royden, member of Directory of Transports Advisory Committee, followed this report with a letter to the First Lord of the Admiralty stating that, "The most of all the trouble is drink." He, too, urged absolute prohibition, logically arguing, "If sailors can and do abstain from alcoholic refreshments while at sea, it does not seem unreasonable at a time of national urgency that those whose work keeps them at home should do likewise."

Drinking Habit, Not Drunkenness, Cause of Trouble

An important delegation from the Shipbuilders' Employers' Federation paid a historic visit to the government—a delegation in which there was not a total abstainer, but all willing to forego their liberties to obtain prohibition! The startling thing they emphasized was that "It was the drinking habit rather than drunkenness that caused the trouble." They made no charges of excessive drunkenness against the workmen, but with statistics and evidence that was irrefutable, established the evil effect of the normal use of drink.

A brother of Lord Northcliffe was a member of this delegation which urged as an emergency war measure, total prohibition "that should apply not only to public houses, but to private clubs and other licensed premises so as to operate equally on all classes of the community."

In his reply Mr. Lloyd George said, "Having gone into the matter closely, I am convinced that if we are to settle with German militarism, we must first of all settle with the drink."

While the visit of the Shipbuilders' Employers' Federation did not accomplish its purpose of immediate war prohibition, it called the attention of the whole country to the disastrous effect of drink and uncovered a foe greater than any foreign enemy. With the royal indictment that "The continuance of such a state of things must inevitably result in the prolongation of the horrors of this terrible war," the King closed his wine cellars, banished wine, spirits and beer from the royal households and for the first time in history, a teetotal king rules Great Britain.

Delayed Victory the Price of the Brewers' Gains

The speech of Sir John Ellerman, Baronet, head of a great Northeast Coast Brewery, affords very significant reading to American readers at the present time: Boasting that "brewers have substantially maintained their profits in the face of war," he explains, "This they have been able to do by opening out new and extended fields of operations, by making a considerable recovery of their bottle trade and by undertaking extensive military canteen contracts." Another reason why they have succeeded so well is that in addition to their bottled trade, "they have been able to get into other districts" (prohibition areas); "higher wages prevailed and the margin which the workmen had to spend had been greater than in former years." In other words, the trade had won out in the munitions, mining and shipbuilding areas, even at the price of victory.

Does not the exemption of beer in the United States threaten further prolongation of the war, and beer dividends paid for in the lives of thousands of our soldiers at the front?

"GOD'S COUNTRY"

JANE REDFIELD HOOVER

The Tale of a Symphony that was to Music what Jack London's "John Barleycorn" and De Quincy's "Confession" are to Literature.

"It is not enough that I leef Gott's only spot in this land of Philistia and condense myself to make tour to play to ox-boys and Indians—that even my soul's own—my violin—ach himmel! should suffer!"

Von Wehmeier was quite forgetting to thank the Almighty for the almost miraculous preservation of life from the railroad wreck near Cheyenne, in his grief over the havoc wrought to his Stradivarius. His soul's own, in very truth, it had come to be. It must lie near to inspire him, even when he was but wielding the baton before the fifty tried men and true who made up von Wehmeier's famous New York Symphony orchestra.

"It is that one should a violin-fixer find in the desert?" he scoffed, incredulous, to Smithers, the theater-manager, who had met him at the Montado station.

Smithers said it was indeed so. "And he's a cracker-jack! There ain't anything he can't do to a fiddle, believe me—when he's sober!"

So it was, that ten minutes after striking town, unshaven, tousled, nerve-racked and irascible, von Wehmeier, tucking the precious case under his arm, followed Smithers up an elm-arched street that seemed to lead straight into a far wall of opalescent foot-hills.

When they reached the sign of "Vallman: Violin-Maker," up a quiet side street, they found the dinky little shop shut and silent as a tomb.

Smithers raised a significant brow. "Pickled again!" he said.

"Was is das? Peekled?"

"Yepp, soused—stewed—just as I expected. You won't get any work out of him this week! Sorry, Professor!"

"Aber lieber Gott in himmel, I must! It is my soul's own that suffers! It possesses me—I cannot conduct, even, mit aus! Much less can I the solos play that your ox-boys and Indians expect from the divertisements of me! Come! Ve vill find and render him sober!"

In the squalid room back of the shop they found Vallman—prone.

Fortunately, the orchestra had from Saturday noon until the concert date Monday evening, in Montado.

As Herr von Wehmeier aided doctor and nurse in the complicated sobering up process to which they subjected the violin-maker during the next few hours, he chuckled reminiscently. "Ach ya! It is many times already yet have I the same in Leipzig done! I vonce have a friend. To him vas alcohol his devil. Yes, it is a good—'formal acquaintance, as you say?—a bad bed-fellow! Nicht wahr! I have helped to make sober Hallstein for many such a concert. Poor Hallstein! he might have been greatest of us all!"

It was done. By Sunday afternoon, a pale and wobbly but contrite and sobered Vallman took von Wehmeier's beloved as reverently in hand as even the master himself could desire.

Seeing that the instrument was with Vallman as a child with a tender foster-father, von Wehmeier did an unprecedented thing—left his "soul's own" at the shop, to be wrought upon all Sunday night, while he sought much needed rest against the demands of tomorrow.

Quite restored to his normal well-groomed and gracious habit, he looked in on Vallman from time to time on Monday. Rest, the good food, and best of all, the excellent coffee, at Montado's new hotel, had done their work. "This hostelry in the desert is civilized! Gott sei dank!"

By Monday afternoon he was feeling chatty—but not so, Vallman! His German accent had aroused pleasant anticipations in von Wehmeier's lonely alien breast, only to comfort them with the rebuff of a cold, impenetrable taciturnity: "No. I have never been in Germany. My parents, yes, German, but I was from—Milwaukee. No, I do not play the violin—that is, only enough to test the tone, after I have repaired one."

This being all that could be gotten out of him, von Wehmeier had to content himself with paying him well, giving him a concert-ticket and taking formal leave. Von Wehmeier was entirely unaccustomed to lack of response to his overtures. He was puzzled and he was a bit hurt—and more than a bit provoked at himself for caring.

Music-hungry, the best of Montado filled the opera-house—as "creative listeners" as the exacting orchestra-leader himself could have asked. The engagement, financially (and what was infinitely more to von Wehmeier) appreciatively, was far beyond the confines of his former concept of the west, and after the final number the audience refused to leave until he spoke to them.

"Friends of mine of the vest," he said, "I vill but only say that you have this night to us giffen the one great surprise of our lives and ve vill be happy to come again to Montado vonce again and effry time ve leef New York. We thank you! Auf wiedersehn!"

So it was a delightfully mellowed lion for whom the Penningtons, those indefatigable stalkers of big game, waited in the foyer, the concert ended.

From their exclusive supper-party wafted these bits of talk:

"With Oregon gone dry, it's getting very near, boys!"

"No more good old times like tonight when the wave hits us!"

"Eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we thirst!"

"Bally dubs—can't take their liquor like gentlemen and then kick up a row for all the rest of us!"

"Well, I'm having a secret cell made in our basement. I wouldn't undertake to live with Billy Cruger, if he couldn't have his cocktails and Scotch when he wants them—no, not for a million worlds!" This last, from a smart young matron whose game attitude toward her bibulous but generous spouse, was much admired in the Pennington group.

For sheer materialism take him who has achieved it. Those born to it, being unaffectedly swinish, we can pity; and those who have materialism thrust upon them are endurable; but your cultured, highly specialized sensualist is an abnormality spurned of nature herself!

Brushing against the Pennington group there passed out into the night alone, a gaunt wreck of a man who walked as in a trance. He was of all that audience, richest—in largess received of von Wehmeier's marvelous orchestration.

This dream of purity and beauty sufficed him—lifted and strengthened him—tired soul—struggling alone and unaided against his arch enemy—until the time came again inexorably, when the devils invaded his blood, and the devils' markets lured him—and again Vallman lay prone, in the squalid little room back of his workshop—and this time there came no von Wehmeier. Vallman was alone.

And Montado was a merry place! Traveling-men came out of their way to cross the Oregon line and spend week-ends in Montado's new hotel. For Montado, you see, was "wet" and proportionately merry, and the Pennington set had as yet no use for their secret basement vaults.

Yes, Montado was a merry place—but the wave was creeping on—and Vallman lay prone.

Three years—and again von Wehmeier's orchestra was booked for Montado.

His eyes opened, on his former tour, to the many beauties and astounding amenities of the West, the meister this time was not rebellious; he was even complaisant over the prospect.

Many an alien had been pilloried for less of criticism of the west in general and of Montado in particular than von Wehmeier had voiced during his visit of three years before. What had saved him was his sweet readiness to change his point of view—his absolutely ingenuous astonishment at finding urbanities and musical appreciation, way out here in Montado. To have genuinely surprised someone with a revelation of our importance is so perfect a joy that we are ready to forget former attitudes, preening in self satisfaction over this! Once shown, once really won, von Wehmeier offered libations full and running over, his praises being ungrudging and spontaneous as a child's. For this, much had been forgiven him, all his life.

No wreck this time, and it was in fine fettle that the orchestra came out of the sage-brush wastes into the grateful verdancy of Montado Valley, and on to the pleasant hospitality of Hotel Montado.

His "soul's own" being in immediate need of a little minor surgery, the orchestra leader, recalling Vallman, once more set out upon that elm-arched street that seemed to end afar off in a wall of opalescent foot-hills.

If you have never been in Montado early in May, you have one more dream of beauty before you. In every home yard bloomed peach, apple and cherry trees and varied early fragrant shrubs; linnets and robins fraternized tunefully overhead in the maples and elms; the sky's blue matched the wings of the bluebirds in the blossoming trees.

And the air was warm and ineffably sweet, yet tangy with the ozone of altitudes. Its clarity worked a miracle, the snow summits o'ertopping those cloud-shadowed foot-hills, seeming only a little way ahead, down the tree plumed vista of the shady street, though, in reality, many miles away.

"It is that someone should a symphony compose of all this," reflected von Wehmeier, on his way to the violin maker's. "There is much, much of beauty, and I doubt not, much of passion and pathos in the heart of such a community—a metropolis evolved in a little fifty years from a trading post, already."

The pleasing transformation that Vallman's place had undergone, the last year or two, was well nigh incredible: The shop was entirely renovated; the back room was now an attractive pupil studio. A good looking bungalow was going up alongside the building, and von Wehmeier found a regenerated Vallman whom he recognized only after prolonged scrutiny consulting with the carpenters, with evident proprietorship in the bungalow.

This new Vallman quickened again that illusive, tantalizing memory that had troubled the orchestra leader's mind whenever he viewed the scars on his beloved's side and contemplated the expert surgery that had made her whole.

"Is it that I could this man have known before? Aber nicht, it could not be—he

"If You Try It Once You Will Never Be Without It"

JENNIE M. KEMP, President Oregon W. C. T. U.

Sidney Lanier has said: "It is idle to argue from prophecy when we may argue from history." The general and continued satisfaction expressed by Oregon press and Oregon people with our prohibition law is a matter of great encouragement to those who worked so hard to secure it. Governor Withycombe never misses an opportunity to tell of the benefits prohibition has brought to the state. Other officers of state, counties and cities tell the same story. The hopgrowers found prices better than usual this year, and there was no discrimination against Oregon hops in spite of their apprehension of evil results that might come to them when the state voted dry.

January 1, 1916, when the Oregon saloons closed, there were 588 persons in our state penitentiary. Twenty months later, September 1, 1917, there were but 335, a decrease of over 43 per cent. During July, 1917, but three prisoners were received, the smallest number admitted in any one month in the sixty or more years since the penitentiary was established. During the same time prohibition has reduced the number of boys in the state reform school one-third.

In 1914 but two Oregon counties, Multnomah and Clatsop, failed to record a prohibition majority. The results of prohibition in Portland and Multnomah county caused it to give a good majority at the last election against re-opening of the breweries. Business men are a unit in favor of prohibition conditions. Its result to the laboring man is given by Arthur W. Jones, director of the Portland Municipal Employment Bureau for Men. He said recently to a conference of employers: "You will have to pay more than $3 a day to common labor if you want men. There are at this moment not less than 5,000 men in the North End district waiting to select their jobs. They will wait as long as they have a dollar in their pocket and that is a lot longer than they used to when we had booze in Portland."

And what of Clatsop county? A newspaper writer, who recently wrote of the great financial prosperity of Astoria, said: "The old grog days are gone and there's not an Astoria business man who would have them return. There's as much difference in the city under dry rule when compared with the whisky days as between a baby's rattle and a rattlesnake."

A leading Astoria citizen told this reporter: "I used to like a glass of beer or a drink of wine every day, and I thought the world was coming to an end when the 'prohi's' won, but let me tell you, we wouldn't let the saloons come back here again if they tried to break in with dynamite."

Oh, yes, we certainly approve of prohibition in Oregon—the "bone dry" variety, too. We confidently recommend it to other states and the nation. As the advertisements say: "If you try it once, you will never be without it."

Prohibition a Boon to Washington

HARRIET B. DUNLAP, President W. Washington W. C. T. U.

Prohibition in the state of Washington has become a settled policy, if we may judge by the attitude of the business world, the press and the expression of sentiment generally. After a little more than twenty months' experience we find the calamities predicted, should prohibition prevail, have not come to pass, but that reverse conditions obtain.

Figures are a most convincing argument. Spokane, with a population of 105,000, had 160 saloons when the state went dry. In January, 1917, after one year of prohibition, the Spokesman-Review, the leading daily of the city, had this headline, "Bankers, Merchants, Realty Men and Amusement Men Tell the Same Story, 'BUSINESS IS BETTER.'" Another heading read, "Four Million Dollars Saved for Spokane Pockets by Dryness."

In 1915 Spokane spent for booze $4,800,000. In 1916 approximately $700,000 was spent for liquor illegally. Deducting this from the sum spent the year previous we have $4,100,000 flowing into legitimate business channels, or about $35 per capita or $100 for the head of each family; or enough to operate the city one whole year.

The average number of inmates in the county farm of Spokane county was reduced from 172 in 1915 to 117 in 1916, a net saving to the county of $6,000. The county physician treated 120 cases of delirium tremens in the county jail in 1915 and 11 cases in 1916 under prohibition.

It cost $35,000 less to administer the jails, courts, infirmary and indigent relief in 1916 than in 1915.

This same county shows 439 arrests in 1915 for burglaries, forgeries and robberies, compared with 166 for the same offenses in 1916.

Yakima county, the next county of importance in East Washington, shows a saving of $18,446 in operating the superior court, justice court, prosecuting attorney's office, county jails, constable's office, indigent and relief, county physician's office and county farm under prohibition during the first year.

Other large counties of the state report no inmates in the county jails many times during the same period.

Naturally interest centers around Seattle, the largest dry city in the United States during the period under consideration, a seaport city of 350,000 population. The police blotter of the city shows the total number of arrests to be about 37 per cent of those under the saloon regime, while arrests directly traceable to liquor have fallen off from 33 per cent to 73 per cent. In 1915, 2,978 persons applied at police headquarters for a place to sleep, while in 1916 but 1,644 made application, 40 per cent of these in the first month, while prohibition was coming into operation; only three applied in October, nine months after the law had been in effect. It cost $16,000 less for the board for prisoners in the city jail of Seattle the first year under prohibition than the year previous. Comparison of police records for the last year under license and the first year of prohibition in Seattle shows a decrease in arrests for sleeping in box-cars, 54 to 2; begging, 708 to 72; vagrancy, 70 to 25; fighting, 386 to 101; manslaughter, 9 to 1; general disorderliness, 2,621 to 887; disorderly conduct, 1,719 to 602; abandonment of family, 15 to 2.

Dr. Kellner of the hospital for the insane at Stillacome reports 308 less patients admitted during the first year of prohibition than the year previous under license.

Mrs. Blanch Mason, head of the woman's division of the police department of Seattle, says, "No greater factor has entered into the sum total of human happiness in Seattle than the prohibition law. The destitution and poverty formerly dealt with in this division have greatly decreased owing to the fact that heads of families are now able to hold steady jobs and spend their money for legitimate needs of the home."

The state budget for the operation of penal institutions was reduced $500,000 by the last legislature, made possible by the decrease in the number of inmates committed. The state bank examiner has just issued a statement showing an increase of $18,371,960 in bank deposits during the past year and despite the heavy drains due to liberty loan and Red Cross appeals, the savings accounts show a gain of $155,743 for the year.

The result of prohibition is: Happier citizens, increase in riches, decrease in crime, less insanity, fewer broken homes and fewer delinquent children. During the first year Seattle has gained in population, bank deposits have increased, new industries have sprung up, tourist travel has increased, delinquent taxes have been reduced, savings bank accounts have increased and merchants have sold more and better goods.

Business men have learned that you cannot spend money for booze and still have it to spend for groceries, clothes, and shoes, or to build homes.

said he was never in Germany—that he does not play. If he had but said that he plays. Poor Hallstein! He was incomparably the greatest of us all!"

The violin maker this time, freed of shame, was frank and upstanding as one man to another. But he was non-committal as before. It was not until he had again taken the Stradivarius in his reverent hand that secrecy dropped from him as a cumbering mantle; his face all at once lighted in unmistakable restoration to his former likeness, and he lifted the Stradivarius—and played!

Montado will never forget von Wehmeier's second concert.

The program, naturally enough, had aroused no slightest suspicion of the surprise in store. The name, "Otto von Hallstein," only indicated to Montado a new solo violinist, who, appearing under such auspices, would, no doubt, be worth hearing. The seventh number, "A New Symphony," also conveyed little; probably a new composition of the great orchestra leader himself, which he purposed "trying on the dog" before essaying its performance in New York.

When "Otto von Hallstein", came forward for his solo, an excited murmuring rustled through the crowd like a light breeze stirring. Vallman, degenerate—Vallman, regenerate—both were familiar figures in Montado, so that this sudden transfiguration to immaculate evening dress was, though startling, by no means an effectual disguise.

Kreisler and Mischa Elman—yes, and Paganini, we doubt not, were one with Hallstein that night, as he held von Wehmeier's "soul's own," and played as never Montado had dreamed violin could be played!

Certain supreme achievements of the bow—mysterious, magic, tones that had instantly identified to von Wehmeier his derelict genius comrade of the old Leipzig days, now held the audience entranced.

Such an ovation has never been known, before or since, in the annals of the Montado Opera House.

The great orchestra leader came forward after Hallstein had played his third encore, and the house awaited his word in strained silence.

"God's Country"

"My friends," began von Wehmeier, "I see you understand how I haf introduced to you my old friend und compeer, von Hallstein, whose enemy haf vonce laid him so low he felt he must efen his name renounce—und I see how you velcome and appreciate this supreme chenius you haf so long unknownst among you had.

"I haf this night to Herr von Hallstein offered a place by my side—at the top—in New York—und he has—refused!

"Ladies und shentl:men, do you realize for one moment what this may to your beautiful city be, to keep this chenius in your community? I know you do—und that you vill to him giff all your backings, to make of Montado the great musical center of this vonderful vestern country. Und let me say but vonce—I now see that your proud phrase, 'Gott's Country,' has on itself a beautiful new meaning taken, since I was here before und beheld my old friend laid so low by his inberited enemy und no vone to help him up. He vas too proud to tell me then—even me, bis old friend, Fritz! You haf giffen to 'Gott's Country' a new meaning—it is where I am 'my brudder's keeper!' 'Gott's Country' is dry!"

There was not a stir—not a smile at this. Von Wehmeier's intensity held the house taut, as he went on: "Und ven you hear the new symphony tonight, know that you are first to baf the honor of hearing an immortal work of von Hallstein. Es ist wunderschön! It is big as all of life itself is big and deep, und sad, und beautiful und bappy! He has it not yet named. I do not know what we will call it, but it is—how sball I say?—it is to music what London's great book, 'John Barleycorn,' wbat De Quincy's 'Confession' are to literature—do you see? Hallstein could not speak to you tonight—he is feeling too mucb for words—but ·he will to you und to all men speak forever, in this symphony!

"It tells the story of a man's life struggle with bis arch enemy, his inherited devil, und then it ends—wunderschön!—in a movement of heffenly calm und beauty—man's humanity to man, triumphant—und peace—peace after pain—und serenity und love, after torment—!"

And so the world's incomparable violinist remained in a western city, which now boasts of sight-seeing autos and a megaphone-man to call out the famous citizen's home as you ride past.

Von Wehmeier received this word from Montado, a few months after the memorable concert: "... and best of all, old friend, you vill rejoice with me! Minna and the kinder have come back to me! I have a home again! It is for her I am so glad of good fame. She shall now be proud and bappy again. We are happy indeed, and here we stay. Many are the kind friends in Montado since you told them, Fritz! Is not all the unkindness in the world only because—like those who clamored for His crucifixion,—they do not know?

"And the Pennington—you will remember her—she is most kind and generous with backing of my orchestra. We start on our Oregon tour next month.

"I have just bought me, with your kind help from the symphony, a real violin of some age and mellowness—not like your 'soul's own,' but very good .... Ya wohn; Fritz, this is indeed Gott's Country!"

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 60, Washington, D.C.

Exit John Barleycorn; Enter the Humble Bovine!

MARGARET B. PLATT

Women who in former days, half-starved, went every week to their husbands' employers to get their pay checks, now live in comfort and bless the dry law. Husband brings home his pay check and wife spends it for the support of the family.

Teachers tell of the improved condition of their pupils. Children come to school better clothed, better shod, better fed and in every way bear witness to the good that has been wrought in their homes by the absence of strong drink. So marked is the change that former enemies of prohibition, even saloon people themselves, willingly admit it. A prominent physician who had a large practice among saloon people said that they themselves would not return to the former conditions if they could.

The jail matron in one of Washington's largest cities reported that formerly it was not unusual to have from twenty-five to thirty women inmates. Under prohibition the number is reduced usually to one or two.

A gentleman for years employed in Seattle and having wide observation of conditions among laboring men was questioned as to the sentiment prevailing concerning prohibition. "Would the men vote to bring back the saloon if they could?" "Emphatically no," he replied. "They realize that the absence of the saloon and its temptations has been a great blessing to them and their families. The only danger there could ever be in voting again on prohibition would be that the people as a whole would be too sure of the success of prohibition and fail to vote. Prohibition has proved its value. The people are satisfied with it. The liquor traffic is dead."

One of the institutions which has reason to note the advent of prohibition is the public library. There is an increase in the number of books loaned, the users of the reference library, and the number of visitors. Enlargements and improvements of buildings and additions to the number of volumes, do not indicate any loss of interest on the part of the people in the opportunities afforded by the public library. Increased patronage of libraries followed the closing of the saloons. Doubtless of those who drifted there in search of physical comfort a good proportion became constant patrons, as their minds, freed from the benumbing influence of drink, became able to grasp the opportunities for self-improvement offered by the library.

Seattle Shipbuilders Great Drinkers of Milk

It is said that the 12,000 men employed in the Seattle ship yards are hard drinkers. Every noon there is a mighty rush for bottled goods and dealers say they have hard work to keep up with the demand. Exit John Barleycorn, enter the humble bovine to satisfy with health-giving milk the thirst of myriad workers. And let us note in passing that the glass factories which formerly made beer bottles may now divert their attention to the manufacture of milk bottles and thus circumvent the ruin which was declared ready to swoop upon them with the advent of prohibition.

Before prohibition prevailed the brewers asserted that the farmers were dependent upon them for a market for their barley. But prohibition came and the amount of acreage in barley in Washington is greater this year than ever before. But the barley is not being used for beer. The ex-saloonkeeper cannot understand the business boom that came with prohibition. Nothing about it so very hard to fathom if one thinks it over. Money spent for booze cannot be spent for rent, fuel, clothing, food, books, amusements, etc.—can it? Store rooms used as saloons cannot be used for shoe stores, dry goods emporiums, factories, hardware shops, markets, etc.—can they? It is the universal experience, repeated over and over, that when strong drink goes out better business comes in. When people stop spending money for booze they have it to use for constructive articles of trade, do they not? The man who for years hands his money over the bar to help the brewer build a mansion and buy a yacht seldom lives to see his own family established even in a four-room cottage of his own and his vacations are usually taken in the "cooler," instead of on a luxurious seagoing boat. Hard to understand? No, it is but the stern logic of fact, cause and effect, patent to any observer who will seek with open vision the truth. And in this case the truth is so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool or a United States Senator, need not err.

Georgia's "Bone Dry" Law a Protection for Soldiers

LELLA A. DILLARD, President Georgia W. C. T. U.

Georgia seems to have run the whole gamut of prohibition. She has tried high license, local option, the dispensary, and experimented with "near beer, not containing more than two per cent," that made violation an easy matter. Then, for nearly one year, the prohibition law was modified to allow each person, under certain restrictions, to order for personal use "two quarts of whisky, or three gallons of wine, or five gallons of beer a month." This law occasioned much criticism from other states and proved so unsatisfactory to Georgia itself that the general discontent brought about the extra session which resulted in the passage March 28, 1917, of our present "bone dry" law.

The fact that only a feeble effort was made at the regular session of the legislature this summer—and unsuccessfully—to legalize the making of domestic wines, proved the general satisfaction of the people of the state. One incident shows how far Georgia has progressed. There was a legacy of wine, valued at $40,000, left the state university by Mr. Hand of Pelham. Under our present law, it could not be sold nor given away, so after much debate in the last legislature over the several bills for its disposal, it was decided that nothing could be done with it but to destroy it. This summer, an open sewer was made from the cellar of the Hand residence at Pelham and flushed with 20,000 gallons of wine made from Georgia "scuppernongs."

The placing of the big cantonments and training camps in the state has doubtless had great influence in producing the state-wide satisfaction. Even lukewarm prohibitionists realize the serious problems that might occur outside the "five mile zone" were it not for the "bone dry" law. We who wear the white ribbon see the guiding hand of our God leading us, before we dreamed that war would be declared, to besiege Governor Harris with petitions signed by prominent voters asking that the extra session be called; for it is a fact that the session would not have been called but for the concerted activity of the W. C. T. U.

WHY NEW MEXICO IS GOING DRY

"New Mexico is going to vote herself into the dry column this fall," predicts the Santa Fe New Mexican, the oldest newspaper in the state. There seems abundant foundation on which to base this prophecy. As the paper above quoted asserts, the prohibition forces are better organized than ever before, the publicity campaign they have in view cannot be excelled, and they will have the assistance of able and gifted national speakers who are coming to the state during the last weeks before the election. They are also most fortunate in having a governor who is heart and soul in favor of a constitutional prohibition amendment. In a recent letter given out through the press Governor Lindsey said:

"Booze and business efficiency cannot occupy the same ground. I believe in the redemption of mankind on earth and right here in New Mexico. If we abolish the saloon, banish graft from our politics, purchase from our elections, enforce the laws and go to work, our salvation is as inevitable and will be as glorious as our mountain sunrise. Booze and business efficiency cannot occupy the same ground. Business efficiency, the dread of economic waste, the gospel of hope for the salvation of mankind on earth, each and all militate for the prohibition of whisky. On November 6 next, opportunity knocks at our door. Heaven help us to be ready to open the door and let it in."

The entire supreme court of the state has declared unequivocally for prohibition.

The secretary of state, Antonio Lucero, and Attorney General H. L. Patton have both publicly endorsed prohibition. "The closing of the saloons in New Mexico will mean, in my opinion, the opening of more school houses and a considerable decrease in the number of unfortunates in the penitentiary," says Secretary Lucero. "A man who has the welfare of the state at heart ought not to have any trouble in deciding how to vote upon the prohibition question on November 6."

"I am heartily in accord with the cause of state-wide prohibition in New Mexico, and from expressions I hear from all parts of the state," says Attorney General Patton, "I am confident that the saloons will be banished at the coming election in November."

As the New Mexican well sizes up the situation: "The dry forces will have the benefit of a growing national sentiment against booze; of an educational conservation campaign, the aim of which is the elimination of waste and luxuries, and of an educated business sentiment against alcohol which has entirely supplanted the alleged 'crank' opposition of years ago. In addition, the flat statement of New Mexico's United States Senators that they will favor and will vote for the dry amendment will not in any degree retard the campaign."

ond offenses, and it has been the policy on the part of the authorities in most sections of the state to accept the culprit's plea of guilty and a small fine for the first offense. The person offending a second time must stand trial for a felony. Because of these facts, it will require a little more time to carry the law to its fullest extent of enforcement. The outlook is encouraging.

Colorado: The Land of Prohibition and Prosperity

Colorado! Boundless treasure lies in the rugged folds of her wonderful mountains; vast wealth springs from her broad plains and fertile valleys; gracious gifts of nature bless and nourish her abundantly; opportunity welcomes all her children and success crowns their honest effort and endeavor. Prosperity woos her, and she is quick with life of cities to be born. Since the advent of prohibition she has suffered less crime, less poverty, less misery, less debauchery and shame. Her families enjoy more necessities, comforts and luxuries of life—more happiness and health. She will never return to the old order, for Colorado has found that prohibition is a public necessity, paying liberal returns to the people in good government. The churches are filled with people, the avenues of commerce with business and the homes with happiness. The dinner pail, once filled with booze, is now filled with food.

God placed Colorado on the crest of the continent; prohibition placed her on the crest of morality, made her the storehouse of prosperity, the haven of peace, the mecca of happiness and the paradise of contented homes.

OUR NATIONAL CONVENTION CITY

WASHINGTON'S FAMOUS PARK SYSTEM

EARL GODWIN, Washington, D. C.

The national capital is famous the world over for its park system, which though incomplete is almost the equal of the famous Paris and Berlin systems. When the Federal government park plan for Washington has been completed there will be nothing like it in all the world. The system is the result of the work of the nation's foremost city planners, engineers, artists, architects and statesmen. It contemplates a capital greater in architectural beauty and artistic wonder than anything the Romans or Greeks dreamed of for their boasted civilization, and outdoes in boldness the schemes of French and German landscape authorities.

The American idea is seen in the remarkable strip of virgin forest, running squarely through the city on the steep slope of Rock Creek. From the Capitol to the depths of an oak and hickory forest is but a matter of eighteen minutes by taxicab or automobile running at the extremely cautious rate allowed by the Washington traffic authorities. No city has included within its busiest area such a bold forest conservation scheme as this one, and inasmuch as there are no forests left in our cities, there probably will never be just such another sight.

Rock Creek is one of the prettiest streams in America, although it is but a few miles long. In Switzerland, in England, or in any storied and overdone tourists' section of the globe Rock Creek would be the subject of poems, postcards and rhapsodies. It flows turbulently and madly through the District of Columbia into the Potomac River, through a little valley of its own making, and on the sides of the hills through which this brave little stream runs there are some of the most gorgeous oak and hickory trees in the entire temperate zone.

Before Washington grew up, and became a real city, the government set aside that whole valley, spent millions of dollars to build roads through it, and then left the forest just as it was made by nature. The result is a perfect woods, as wild as any you will see in any mountain region, traversed by some of the best roads in America. Careful artists and army engineers planned those roads so that the visitor, afoot, on horseback or in an automobile gets the benefit of the best views and the most exhilarating air.

Along the hillsides are footpaths, cut by order of ex-President Roosevelt, who was the premier pedestrian of the city when he was here; also there are roads especially for horseback riding, and it is here that the biggest men in the city and nation's life take their morning exercise.

Adjoining the park is the Zoological Collection, another federal government institution. Some of the animals now on exhibition were brought here alive from Africa by ex-President Roosevelt.

"PROHIBITION WORKS OUT ALL RIGHT," SAYS MAYOR OF OMAHA NOW

"I Can't Make Speeches for Saloons Again and Be Honest; My Arguments Are Shot to Pieces; the City Was Never in a Better Condition," He Tells Visitor

From the Omaha Daily News

The mayor of Omaha, one-time leader of the wets and determined opponent of prohibition, has deserted his former allies and now is lined up with the men who believe prohibition is a good thing.

For years the mayor opposed closing the saloons on the ground that their abolition would mean ruin to a city and that taking away a man's right to freely buy intoxicating liquor would mean taking away his personal liberty.

The mayor's municipal campaigns were made chiefly upon the "personal liberty" issue.

During the existence of the eight o'clock closing law, the mayor on various occasions denounced that measure and took no active steps to enforce the law.

In those days the mayor stood for a "wide open" town.

He led the fight against prohibition last November, lined up the Democratic machine against the drys, formed political alliance with the wets and did everything one man could do to defeat prohibition.

Mayor Has Changed Front

But the mayor has changed front. Confronted by the facts demonstrated by five months of prohibition in Omaha, he now acknowledges that Omaha has benefited by the abolition of saloons.

He explained his changed attitude in a recent interview with William J. Johnson, associate secretary of the Presbyterian board of temperance.

So strongly did the mayor present the virtues of prohibition in Omaha that Mr. Johnson uses his statements as an argument for a "dry Chicago." He is quoting Omaha's mayor as follows:

"I found the mayor to be very approachable, genial and frank in his discussion of the prohibition question.

"I said to him, 'Mayor, we are getting ready for a big fight on the saloon question in Chicago and I have come here to see how prohibition has hurt Omaha.'

"He said: 'Prohibition has not hurt Omaha; everything is all right.'

"What effect has it had on crime, on the number of arrests?

" 'There is not so much crime, not nearly so many arrests. There is not so much quarreling between husbands and wives, not so many cases of non-support, and not so many divorce cases.'

"Of course it has hurt business?

"He said: 'It has helped business. People are able to buy more and collections are much better. It is easy to understand that when we had saloons a man would stop in a saloon and spend half of his week's pay before he went home. Now, he takes the money home to his family. In the evening he will clean up, eat his supper and come down town with his wife to buy groceries.'

"There must be a great many vacant buildings, which were formerly occupied by saloons?

" 'There has not been time for a complete readjustment, but most of the property is rented.'

"The rentals can't be as good?

" 'They are about the same and in some cases better.'

"I have been walking all about the business section and have seen only two vacant buildings which were formerly rented to saloons, but I suppose there are a great many more farther out?

" 'No, there are very few. Nearly all of the saloon property is rented. The rentals are about the same as before, and in some cases better.'

"I assume that there are many men who were bartenders and workers in the breweries who are out of employment?

" 'No, there are no unemployed; there is plenty of work. You know I used to be wet and used to make speeches on the wet side, tell how many people would be thrown out of employment, how many millions of dollars of business would be lost, and the lot of vacant houses there would be, but it has not panned out that way. Arguments, outside of that of personal liberty, so generally used by anti-prohibitionists, are shot to pieces so far as our city is concerned, as they have not materialized.'

"What about the confiscation of the breweries?

" 'Oh, they are all busy making soft drinks and other things, and are employing as many people as before.'

"As we walked toward the elevator I took him by the arm and said: 'Mayor, would you make speeches for the saloon again?'

" 'I couldn't, and be honest, and I wouldn't be dishonest. I used to think prohibition would be a bad thing, but it has not turned out that way.'

"As I grasped his hand to say good-by I said, 'Mayor, I am glad you are converted.' He smilingly replied, 'I cannot go against the facts.' "

Result of Iowa's Special Election to Be Decided by Official Count

IDA B. WISE SMITH, President Iowa W. C. T. U

The prohibitionists of Iowa do not confess defeat in the election October 15. We will accept no result save that to be announced by the official canvass of the returns by the executive council of the state, some days hence. The unofficial returns of the counties seem to give a wet majority of 887. The official count now in progress is reducing this in some instances.

Whatever be the result, deferred amending of the constitution, or passage by a small majority, one great reason for either stands out very clearly—the 100,000 Iowa voters who failed to register their opinion on election day. There were just that many that failed to vote. There is no doubt that every wet voter cast his ballot. This vote is much larger than any ever cast before on any question that could be counted wet and dry. But even the great wet vote would have been as nothing had every man in favor of prohibition cast his ballot.

This was the slogan of the campaign—"Get out the vote."

Why did they stay home? Over confidence! General Apathy led his slackers to shameful defeat. They said, "We have prohibition, why trouble further?" The liquor papers fostered this idea. They trusted in state and national "bone dry" legislation, refusing to see that these are as unstable as statutory prohibition. Everywhere men scoffed at the idea that there was any danger.

The liquorites' campaign was most subtle and covered. Their workers went about so quietly but persistently; their literature was so filled with patriotic appeal for "Liberty" and "Democracy" and the state was so flooded the last days with the old tax argument and "Don't tinker with the constitution" that again men were deceived. But how could they be when every piece of literature but one bore the imprint of the United Brewery workers of Cincinnati, Ohio.

Iowa still has statutory prohibition but the problem of law enforcement will now be harder. We shall rise to the occasion to the best of our ability. No prohibition worker in this state will do less than his or her best to rid the world of the liquor traffic.

Dry Zone Requested for Mare Island

A dispatch from the West coast states that Capt. Harry George, commandant at the Mare Island Navy Yard, informed a committee of Vallejo's citizens, October 1, that a presidential order creating a five-mile dry zone around the Mare Island Yard, as a war necessity and to "maintain the perfect efficiency" of the enlisted men, had been requested.

Hotel Bar Unnecessary to Success

A group of business men of Dubois, Pennsylvania, recently purchased the Commercial Hotel, the best in the city, closed up the bar, kicked the license out of the door, and will run the place as a temperance house, according to the North American of Philadelphia. These business men are convinced that a first-class hotel can be conducted successfully without a booze attachment.

President Wilson Appoints Day of Prayer for Nation

Pursuant to a resolution adopted by Congress October 4, asking the President to name a day for supplication and prayer, President Wilson has issued a proclamation fixing Sunday, October 28. The resolution reads:

"I earnestly exhort all my countrymen to observe the day according to their separate faith in solemn prayer that God's blessing may rest upon the high task which is laid upon us, to the end that the cause for which we give our lives and treasure may triumph and our efforts be blessed with high achievements."

No "Morning After" Effects for Circus Men in Dry Territory

A circus manager is reported by a Kansas paper to have said that in dry territory the canvasmen are always able to get out early in the morning and "set up" the show, while in wet territory it is a task to get the big top up in time for the afternoon performance.

National Prohibition Expedient as a War Measure

MAJOR GENERAL EDWARD H. PLUMMER, U. S. A.

A successful general was asked why he was always successful. He replied, because he took every possible precaution, neglected nothing, no matter how trifling it seemed, in his preparation for a battle or campaign. We should now take every possible precaution, neglect nothing, no matter how trifling it may seem, if it may help in any way to make sure success in the great world war. It is not a time now to consider our personal views and feelings in regard to prohibition. We know that accidents of all kinds have occurred through drunkenness. The drunkenness of one general, one officer, one sentinel, one single soldier, might cause the loss of victory in war.

Improper use of alcoholic liquor is dangerous to the health, and every man in the United States should be willing to support and to enforce prohibition, forever, in order to prevent the possibility of the health of one single soldier being impaired now. Aside from all question of expediency from other reasons, the expediency of prohibition, as a measure to insure success in war, is unquestionable, and paramount, at this time, and should be loyally supported by every citizen in the United States.

Prohibition in Des Moines Responsible for Completion of Cantonment on Time

The fact that Des Moines, Iowa, is a prohibition city is cited by Mr. Fred Weitz, who had charge of the erection of the cantonment at Camp Dodge, as the one circumstance responsible for the completion of the work in time to receive the troops.

"If we had had saloons in Des Moines the past three months, Camp Dodge cantonment would never have been completed ready to receive the various allotments of men as directed by Secretary of War Baker," says Mr. Weitz.

"The lack of one week's training of 45,000 men might be a very serious matter. This statement is no reflection on the thousands of loyal workmen who participated in the building of this cantonment.

"At no time during the work of construction have we been able to obtain a sufficient number of men, this largely because of the fact that all workingmen within a radius of 200 miles of Des Moines were well employed previous to the beginning of the work. Because of the shortage of labor the men work ten hours instead of the customary eight hours per day.

"It is, therefore, apparent that the highest grade of efficiency of each man was at all times necessary. Had we had saloons in Des Moines, or in the vicinity of Des Moines, efficiency would have been seriously impaired and the work would have been delayed accordingly."

Vancouver Policemen Idle

Twenty-four hours after prohibition became effective in Vancouver, B. C., police headquarters reported that not a single arrest had been made during that period. "Not even a hangover was captured by the police." Certainly an immediate and gratifying result following John Barleycorn's dismissal.

EVERY LINE OF BUSINESS IN COLORADO TESTIFIES TO THE BENEFICENT EFFECTS OF PROHIBITION

MRS. ADRIANNA HUNGERFORD, State W. C. T. U. President

Every line of business, except that of pawnbrokers, testifies to the benefits of prohibition. Savings bank accounts in Denver increased by $19,975 during the first four months and a bank in Ouray, a small metal mining town, had two hundred new depositors and one hundred savings accounts in six months. Bills and taxes are paid more promptly and there has not been one serious strike with the rioting and bloodshed which used to occur under the liquor régime.

Miners Make Large Contribution to Red Cross

The employers of men are acceptable witnesses and we are privileged to quote some of them: J. F. Welborn, president of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, writes: "The benefits of prohibition are evidenced in the camps and at the steel plant, where some 6,000 men are employed, by fewer idle men following pay days. . . . Many wives of employes, who had previously spent much money for liquor, express themselves as having more money for setting the table and buying wearing apparel."

H. L. Littell operates mines in Crested Butte, a town of 1,000 inhabitants, that formerly supported fifteen saloons. Mr. Littell reports that under the saloon régime there was a shortage of workmen following pay day. Under prohibition the men report promptly and are in good condition, so the operators are benefited as well as the miners. Crested Butte with its thousand people, a majority of whom are foreigners, many being Austrians, contributed $3,000 to the Red Cross fund and have asked their employers to deduct additional amounts from their pay checks for the same purpose.

"Bone Dry" Law Speeds up Convention Business

The Denver Labor Bulletin, in commenting on the recent convention of the International Typographical Union held in Colorado Springs and the completing of business in an exceptionally short time, states, "It was the first convention held in a 'bone dry' state and that may or may not have had something to do with expediting business because every delegate was on the job all the time and there were no 'dark brown' mornings. This alone saved the I. T. U. and the delegates thousands of dollars. Since the state went 'dry' there have been more and better national conventions than before during a like period. Every hotel in the state has been crowded to capacity this summer. Convention delegates prefer to go where they can meet up with decent people under decent conditions."

Miss Emily Griffith, principal Opportunity School, Denver, observes great benefits from prohibition. This school during the last year has handled 2,300 pupils, old and young, married and single, male and female, at least one-third being foreigners. She says prohibition has practically solved the problem of the foreigner, as the first thing he used to learn was to drink. There is a marked increase of men at night school, many of whom used to spend their time drinking liquor. The number of girls who work days and attend school at night has decreased by two-thirds, since their fathers are supporting their families instead of saloons.

Married Many Years Wife Receives First Dress from Husband

Many women tell Miss Griffith that she does not need to supply them with groceries and clothes at holiday time, as their husbands receive good wages and are spending them on the home. Soon after prohibition went into effect a woman exhibited, with great pride, the first dress that her husband had ever purchased for her, although they had been married long enough to have a child in the eighth grade, and she added that he had a new suit, too.

Warden Tynan of the state penitentiary reports that institution 200 "short" on prisoners as a result of prohibition and one cell house closed.

UTAH ON HIGH ROAD TO PROSPERITY

Notwithstanding a supposed plot on the part of the liquor interests to injure his business by tampering with the mails, Mr. George A. Startup, president of the Startup Candy company of Provo, Utah, continues to champion the prohibition cause. In a letter of recent date, addressed to the state W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. C. A. Walker, in response to one from her, he says:

"Answering your inquiry as to whether, in my opinion, the prohibition law has injured or benefited the state, I will say that even casual observation in the formerly wet places of the state will convince the most antagonistic individuals that the closing of the saloons and cabarets has worked wonders in a business, social and moral way. I spent two days in Salt Lake City recently and saw only one drunken person, a Chinaman, while the odor of liquor could not be detected in any of the saloons which are now trying to exist as temperance stores.

"One merchant, a stranger to me, while chatting on a street car, said he had always voted wet for business reasons, but after a month of prohibition he had discovered that his business had increased as much as 35 per cent; young men who formerly had been drinking heavily were now buying better clothes from him. Many other merchants said business had increased very materially.

"Anent this phase of the question, please note the following figures which I obtained recently from the court records in Salt Lake, brought to light in a divorce proceeding, wherein the saloonkeeper was compelled to reveal his deposits in one bank for a month: $734, $317, $42, $397, $2,400, $503, $1,998, $533, $290, $330, $2,769, $661, $302, $1,282, $153, $268, $2,611, $874, $24, $1,876, $1,520, $185, $2,399, $526. Total, $22,994 deposits for one month for one saloon. And this saloon was not in the best location, being nearly two blocks off main street. These figures show the immense profits in the sale of liquors. That money diverted to kiddies' shoes, groceries, clothing, home building, etc., spells happiness, contentment, good citizenship, improved morals, as against heartaches, bad health, vice and crime, not to mention gnawing poverty.

"Utah is on the high road to prosperity, so far as the banishment of booze is concerned; and the politics of our state stand a better chance of serving the people instead of the domination of the liquor crowd which has for a decade held by the throat powerful political parties.

"GEORGE A. STARTUP."

New York Faces Loss of Saloons

The outlook for John Barleycorn in New York state is not promising. The press is reporting a reduction of 2,000 saloons in the state, owing partly to the going into effect of a law limiting the number of saloons in cities having less than 55,000 inhabitants, to one for each 500. Many saloon-keepers are being driven out of business because the heavy internal revenue taxes are preventing brewers and distillers from giving them credit, as heretofore. In forty counties the rural communities will vote this fall on no-license and under the Hill-Wheeler bill, which passed the legislature last winter, it will be possible next spring to inaugurate campaigns in all the cities of the state, with the possible exception of New York City.

Paragraph from a Letter from Dad to His Boy

I would be mighty wary in those play hours of the wines of France. A man never needs alcohol in his being, and he never needs it so little as when he is up against the "trick" that you and your fellows are going to "put over" in France. You will need every bit of real vitality; of strength; of clear-eyed vision that you can muster, and not one of these comes from alcohol, which, after all has been said of it, for and against, is the chief mantrap in the world. You will want and have your convivial intervals. They will be welcome from the tension of camp and trench life. But convivial times can be had without playing the mischief with your head and your body.—Ladies' Home Journal for October.

300 San Francisco Saloons Closed This Year

Since the first of the year 300 San Francisco saloons have closed their doors, and the indications are that many more of the small saloons will be compelled to close as a result of the war tax on whisky. A prominent liquor dealer of the city is reported to have predicted that prices of drinks will soon be double the old charge.

"The smaller saloons, where a slug of whisky has cost a dime, will be forced to demand 20 cents," continued the dealer, "and in those places where walls are covered with rich tapestries and floors are tiled or of hardwood, two bits will be the fee. Inevitably patronage will fall off, and the little fellows will be driven out of business."

CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN CANADA SOLID FOR PROHIBITION

DOMINION-WIDE PROHIBITION THE ONE THING MORE DESIRABLE THAN PROVINCE-WIDE

An investigation to ascertain the results of prohibition in the Dominion of Canada has recently been conducted by the Council for Social Service of the Church of England in Canada. In the main the clergymen who responded to the questions of the Council for Social Service agreed that prohibition had accomplished untold good. We quote briefly from The Pioneer, Toronto, which reviews at some length the evidence collected by this organization:

Prohibition in Toronto Far Exceeds Expectations

"The figures from Ontario are remarkable, nearly 87 per cent out of a very large number of papers pronouncing the law a distinct and unqualified success. The evidence from Toronto is highly gratifying, and unequivocal in its testimony to the success of the act. Without exception, every clergyman asked has replied that the difference is marked, and that the act is efficiently enforced. The figures with regard to the number of cases tried for drunkenness in Toronto during the first five months of 1916 and 1917 are interesting in this connection.

"Month—	1916	1917
January	747	289
February	803	366
March	861	437
April	869	410
May	1,034	411

"At the end of 1916 the chief of police of the city made the following statement: 'The abolition of the bar has, in my opinion, based on well ascertained and unquestionably accurate facts, been beyond the most sanguine expectation successful in accomplishing precisely what the advocates of bar abolition aimed at. The outstanding fact and incontrovertible proof is that, while there were in the past six weeks only 214 arrests for drunkenness, there were 1,059 in the corresponding six weeks in 1915.'

"Evidence from others of the larger cities of Ontario, such as London and Ottawa, is of the same nature, and the conclusion is irresistible that prohibition has worked as efficaciously in the urban centers as in the country districts.

Drunkenness in Manitoba Drops 85 Per Cent

"The evidence from Manitoba is nothing short of astonishing, it being practically unanimous in favor of prohibition, only an inconsiderable minority saying that it is only partially successful, while in not one single instance was an answer received indicating that the act is a failure. Here again the evidence of the authorities is striking. Prohibition reduced drunkenness in Manitoba more than 85 per cent during the first half year that the act was in operation, according to a statement by Mr. J. N. McLean, chief inspector of the provincial license department. In the city of Brandon there were during the six months, January to June, 1916, 455 cases of drunkenness. In June, 1916, the law came into operation, and during the next six months, July to December, 1916, there were only 46 cases, an almost astounding decrease."

Benefits Almost Incalculable

The Council of Social Service sums up its findings in the following paragraph which declares that the Church of England is wholeheartedly in favor of province-wide prohibition until it can be strengthened by a dominion-wide measure:

"Prohibition laws in the six provinces that have enacted them are working well; but the measure of their success is in exact ratio to the determination of the authorities to enforce them. While provincial prohibition is good, dominion prohibition would be infinitely preferable. The benefits gained from these laws are almost incalculable, and the very thought of going back to the old system is out of the question. In a word, the Church of England in Canada is solid for prohibition."

PROHIBITION A FIXTURE

MAYOR FISHER of Ottawa, Ontario

"The longest step ever taken towards bettering social conditions was made a year ago when prohibition was introduced," said Mayor Fisher of Ottawa, Ontario, recently in welcoming to the capital city the Canadian Conference of Charities and Correction. "Whatever view prevailed when the measure came into force, I do not believe, if a vote were taken today, five per cent of the people would vote for a repeal of this legislation."

MONEY IS SPENT FOR "EATS," NOT "DRINKS," UNDER PROHIBITION

MARGARET B. PLATT

As a state is made up of towns, cities and counties it follows that whatever affects the smallest unit, either for good or ill, must affect in some degree the welfare of the entire state. Therefore, the summing up of the effects of prohibition upon a state is largely a rehearsal of its working out in smaller units. While occasionally there may be here and there lax enforcement of the law, the evidence is overwhelming that in the main prohibition is proving itself all that its friends claimed, and disproving all the calamitous prognostications of its enemies. Nowhere is this more obvious than in the state of Washington, which but a few years ago was considered one of the most impregnable strongholds of the liquor traffic and one which would be among the last to bid adieu to Alcohol, Booze & Co.

Prison Population on the Wane

Apropos of the effect of prohibition upon crime, an illuminating and interesting paragraph comes to our attention in the Seattle Daily Times relating to affairs in King county, which embraces the city of Seattle, a number of smaller cities and considerable rural territory. Having under discussion the matter of suitable jail quarters for county prisoners the statement is made that "Since the enforcement of the dry law became effective the number of county prisoners has been materially reduced. There are sixty-six now under lock and key and the sheriff is of the opinion that two 'tanks' will hold all that are committed for several years to his care or that of his successor." Formerly under liquor license laws the problem was how to provide sufficient storage room for a constantly increasing grist of prisoners.

Unequalled Attendance at Dry County and State Fairs

County fairs constitute no mean factor in the growth and development of a state. Previous to the enactment of the prohibitory law large displays of intoxicating beverages were made at these fairs. The officials in charge having granted to brewers et al. the privilege of exhibiting their wares, it was hardly in keeping to maintain too close a supervision over the distribution of the wet goods. It was maintained, too, when protest was made against any exhibit of brewery or liquor products, that the traffic was licensed by law, therefore legal, and besides it paid a goodly sum into the treasury of the fair association for choice situations on the ground, which doubtless included also unnamed privileges, though this could not always be proven!

However, the fair season of 1917 has demonstrated that the state was in no wise dependent upon liquor products for its prosperity. From all quarters come reports of unequalled attendance at both the state and county fairs, exhibits unsurpassed in any previous year in volume and quality, and in the state fair an increase of $10,000 in receipts over the previous high record. Prosperity was evidenced in all the surroundings and happiness shone in the faces of the people. No one wept over John Barleycorn's absence or wished for his return. So far as might be ascertained, amid all the festivities he was as one forgotten. If given a passing thought it was to rejoice that he was no more present.

If any fear the effect of prohibition upon general business, the experience of Seattle should be proof conclusive that their fears are unfounded. The following paragraph from a Seattle journal is authoritative and sets forth the facts:

Seattle Bank Deposits Still Climbing

"The increase in bank clearings for the first nine months of 1917, as compared with a similar period in 1916, shows an advance of more than a quarter million dollars. Perhaps some may say that this is not due to prohibition! Perhaps! But at least prohibition has in no wise hindered the forward movement. The reports of business houses dealing in food products, household supplies, clothing, shoes, hardware, etc., are staggering in their totals. How could it be otherwise since the saloon is no longer emptying the pockets of the workers? People now spend their money for 'eats' instead of drinks!"

SHALL WE DEADEN THE SOLDIER'S PAIN OR THE CIVILIAN'S BRAIN?

MARGARET WINTRINGER

Alliance with the world's greatest republic has changed Britain. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the battle for prohibition which has been on ever since the war began. A year ago I attended many dignified convocations of temperance leaders in London and other British cities, and humble petitions to the throne or the ministry against the abuse of alcohol were the order of the day. But at the great temperance rallies now held throughout Great Britain a new and dominant note is struck. There are no prayers to the throne—one great meeting actually convened and adjourned without singing, "God Save the King!" Demands are made upon the government for a more efficient handling of the drink problem.

Paid Dry Advertisements in Great London Papers

Today Great Britain has no politics and no parties. The one object is to help the government win the war. The British temperance movement has sought the man on the street. Millions who never go to temperance meetings have been reached with pungent advertisements in the columns of the London Times and Telegraph and the Daily News, paid for at regular rates and as chock full of convincing argument, sane reasoning and hard facts as the "ads" that bring a new business enterprise before the public. Every man and woman has been given the chance to examine the cold hard facts and weigh the trade against national needs, and the profits of the brewers and distillers against the losses of the nation in the time of national peril.

Hence, after three years of war, public opinion has come to be overwhelmingly in favor of immediate and absolute prohibition. The demand is not alone supported by Britain's most eminent statesmen, men of letters, scientists and business men, soldiers and wearers of the Victoria Cross. The Labor party has never angled for the liquor vote; its club rooms are largely free from the sale of drink; and labor representatives in Parliament are counted the best friends of temperance legislation. Mr. Robert Stewart, a representative of the working classes, who has behind him an organization of 500,000 members in Scotland, largely working men in the Clyde Valley and the mining and steel districts, has recently declared that "It is an unjust stigma to place on the working man, that he would lay down his tools upon the enactment of a measure to hasten the end of the war." "British workmen favor prohibition twenty to one," says Mr. Stewart.

Not Enough Food to go Around

Another prominent labor leader writes: "If Mr. Lloyd George will take his courage in both hands and go for prohibition, he will have the country behind him and the support of the working men."

In Great Britain, as throughout all Europe, the workmen have learned that inevitably the suffering and privation of war fall chiefly upon those least able to bear it; that despite the abnormally high wages of war times, prices climb higher still. They are confronted by the fact that there "isn't enough to go around." And they have Sir Alfred Booth's recent declaration that "The tragedy lies in the fact that the suffering and privation which confronts Great Britain could have been avoided if the government had bravely faced the situation two years ago, or even a year ago, and prepared to meet the famine of the U-boats by protecting her people against the destruction of foodstuffs through their conversion into what was at best an entirely unnecessary form of consumption, and forbidden the use of their depleted transport facilities by land and sea for the same useless purpose."

They have listened to the great shipbuilder's latest message, "With our sunken ships lying at the bottom of the sea, we must sacrifice every non-essential, for in so far as we do not, we shall simply be taking the bread out of our children's mouths."

That is why, today, the British people are demanding that the first non-essential which must go, root and branch, is alcohol.

Men of business have been won by the discovery that prohibition no longer means financial loss to trade, and does not seek to close the brewery and distillery. As Major McAdam Eccles, of the British Army, recently pointed out, "Prohibition is simply the up-to-date demand of world progress that alcohol be taken out of the criminal ranks and converted into a beneficent agent." In other words, as this British Army surgeon pointed out in a late talk to the brewers and distillers, "Alcohol is in a thousand ways so at the root of modern industry, both in war and peace, that there is an honest use for every drop of alcohol that is prepared at the present time, and so valuable a compound should not be diverted from its industrial use into a curse to humanity."

Honor Demands Enactment of Prohibition as Aid to Soldiers

Thus far in Great Britain, the strongest arguments advanced for prohibition have been on behalf of the soldiers. Who that heard it will ever forget Mr. Lloyd George's appeal in the House for power necessary to increase the output of munitions, "Their" (the soldiers') "gallantry is beyond description. They are constantly appealing to us to send them more munitions, more material, to enable them to cope with their terrible task. . . . They ask us to help them get through without unnecessary loss. . . . Their appeal is for a fair chance in the fight. Honor demands that, whatever it costs, we shall give them it."

British hearts were stirred and I was assured that following that appeal the government could have done what it would. Since that burning appeal 7,000,000 have been killed in battle; there have been over 47,000,000 wounded. The terrific demands on surgery and medicine have created a shortage of anaesthetics. The alcohol necessary for the manufacture of chloroform and ether goes to the distiller and the brewer. In Great Britain the medical profession are urging that "so long as we are unable to supply in sufficient quantities the anaesthetics needed to lessen the agony of the dying and the suffering of our wounded heroes at the front, not a drop of alcohol should go into the digestive tract of human beings." What wonder that audiences have listened with tense, tear-wet faces to that plea, and mothers of soldiers have thanked God at the arousement of Britain's heart?

WHY I AM FOR PROHIBITION

JUDGE W. H. McHENRY, Former District Judge of Des Moines, Iowa

I have recently been asked this question, "Why are you for prohibition?" and as I answered it then, I will answer it now. Thirty-five years ago I began to practice law and from that time to the present I have spent my life in an environment where I have constantly been face to face with the cruel and cursed consequences of drunkenness. I have seen my neighbor boys of school days ruined by liquor, convicted of crime, their families disgraced and pauperized; I have seen them rotten with disease and insane as the result of drunkenness.

I was judge of the district court of Polk county for fifteen years and in the discharge of my duty was compelled to send my playmates of childhood days to penitentiaries, inebriate asylums and to the jails as a consequence of saloons in Des Moines. During that fifteen years on the bench, I spent four years in the criminal division. I sent more than a thousand men to penitentiaries and jails for criminal offenses committed by them and I know that ninety per cent of these crimes were caused by drunkenness originating in saloons.

I granted more than 1,000 divorces and I know that ninety per cent of them were the consequences of drunkenness, and the drunkenness was due to the saloon. I have taken thousands of children from the homes of drunkards and placed them in state institutions for public protection and education. I have seen and know the moral depravity, the poverty, the disgrace, the ruined hopes of mothers and children, the insane asylums and poorhouses crowded until the accumulated curses that I have seen springing from the presence of the saloon condemn that institution as the vilest influence that infests this world today.

PRESENT CRISIS DEMANDS PROHIBITION

GOVERNOR CHARLES S. WHITMAN of New York

A clean body usually goes with a clean mind. Physical vigor superinduces the mental vigor. During the years in which I served as district attorney of the city of New York, and also when I sat upon the judicial bench, nothing came so clear to my mind as that idleness, drink and flabbiness were back of the crimes.

As a magistrate I found, by actual tabulation, that 72 per cent of the offenses that came before me were directly traceable to drink. In fact, in the great percentage of cases intoxication was urged as a defense. How far it influenced the remainder I have no means of knowing, but it is safe to say that, in one way or another, it was responsible for many of them.

Out of an experience which has touched all classes and conditions of men, I am willing to state my belief that in this present crisis the United States would be better able to meet the high duties before it if prohibition were general and absolute.—Hearst's Magazine

Maine W. C. T. U. to Continue Campaign for Woman Suffrage

Special Correspondence

A large attendance, hearty enthusiasm and keen interest characterized the entire proceedings of the recent annual convention of the Maine Woman's Christian Temperance Union held at Calais, September 19-21. The state president, Mrs. Althea G. Quimby, presided over all deliberations with ability and grace. Her annual address was a storehouse of helpful suggestions and information. Mrs. Quimby accomplished a large amount of work in the recent suffrage campaign and her efforts are thoroughly appreciated. Miss Anna A. Gordon, National president, has been for years a much prized visitor at our conventions and we greatly regretted that she could not come to us this year. We, however, received a greeting from her to which we sent a response. Several well known women were on the list of convention speakers—Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, Mrs. Katharine Lent Stevenson, and Mrs. Effie Lambert Lawrence, all of whom delivered eloquent addresses. Mrs. Edna Rowan Harvey had charge of the children's hour and Mrs. Ellen R. Richardson, president of the New Hampshire W. C. T. U., was present during part of the convention.

On Welcome Night Mrs. Jennie McAndrews, president of the Calais W. C. T. U., Hon. Ashley St. Clair and Rev. R. A. MacDonald gave cordial addresses. Governor G. W. Ganong of the province of New Brunswick, which is adjacent to Maine, welcomed us. At the time of our meeting the provincial W. C. T. U. was in session at St. Stephens, just across the river from Calais. One afternoon it took a recess and the officers, led by Mrs. McWha, president, and several delegates, paid our convention a visit. Later, Mrs. Gertrude Stevens Leavitt visited the provincial convention as a fraternal delegate from the Maine W. C. T. U. Mrs. Frederick Abbott of Saco, Maine, representing food conservation interests, urged upon our organization the necessity of wise household administration.

On every hand one heard expressions of appreciation of the wonderful aid given by Governor Carl E. Milliken to the cause we represent.

Aside from national prohibition, perhaps the two subjects receiving the most attention were suffrage and war relief work. Under the capable direction of Mrs. Quimby and Mrs. M. K. House, state superintendent of the Franchise department, the women of our organization have done noble work to bring about the enfranchisement of Maine women. It goes without saying that Mrs. Livingston, National superintendent of Franchise, and campaign manager of the Suffrage Association, has worked arduously in the interests of suffrage. That we did not succeed in winning what we sought at the last election is not recognized as defeat. The Maine W. C. T. U. will go steadily forward, feeling sure that before long victory will come. We shall work for the Federal amendment and in all other legitimate ways to bring the desired end.

During the summer our local unions have been busy making comfort bags and hospital supplies and are still hard at work.

The election of officers resulted in returning the same board which has served for some time. When Mrs. Quimby was re-elected beautiful flowers were presented to her and our musical director, Mrs. Vaill, voiced our love in the following brief song:

"Our hearts give thanks for our leader brave and true,
We pledge our love and consecrate anew
Our hearts, our hands, our time, our talents too—
God bless and guard and guide our leader long years through!"

The People's Prayer

God bless our dear United States,
Preserve the land from evil fates,
Lift high her banner fair and free,
And guard her bounds from sea to sea.

From foe without and foe within,
From open shame and hidden sin,
From boastful pride and greedy store,
God keep our nation evermore.

Forever may her friendly hands
Receive the poor of other lands
In kindliness of sisterhood,
And fill their arms with ample good.

Assailed by battle hosts of wrong,
God help our country to be strong.
Assailed by falsehood's crafty crew,
God help our country to be true.

God hold the nation's aim sincere,
God save her heart from coward fear,
God prosper her in true success,
And crown her head with worthiness.

God bless our dear United States,
Preserve the land from evil fates,
Lift high her banner fair and free,
And ever guard her liberty.

—Amos R. Wells, in Christian Endeavor World.

"State-wide Prohibition for Kentucky," Slogan of State Convention

Special Correspondence

With the question of prohibition constantly before the people of this and other nations, with the passage of the food bill closing the distilleries of the United States for the period of the war, with a national prohibition amendment before Congress for consideration at the next session, and with the issue sure to come up at the next meeting of the state legislature, the thirty-fourth convention of the Kentucky W. C. T. U., which closed October 2, was, in many respects, the greatest in the history of the organization.

The work of the year was shown in the reports of the manifold departments, that of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, perhaps, taking precedence of others at this time. The enormous amount of work done by the white ribboners in cooperation with the Red Cross was a revelation to many. The thousands of comfort bags made, the bandages and clothing furnished the "boys," the articles knitted, the contributions to the National W. C. T. U. Ambulance Fund, the entertainment and recreation provided for the young defenders of our country, all were the quiet, unobtrusive work of our splendid women.

The little city of Dawson Springs held open house for the delegates, and the fact of its being a dry town gave it a just pride in the entertainment of its guests. The New Century Hotel courteously offered its ball room for the use of the organization during its day sessions, as well as its parlors for committee rooms. The evening meetings were held in the Presbyterian church and in the auditorium with a capacity of five hundred.

The furnishing and equipment of the new machine, the stereomotorgraph, has been accomplished and it will be shipped at once to Camp Zachery Taylor. Believing that if we are to win, the soldiers must be shown that alcohol makes for poor marksmanship, lowers resistance to disease and exposure, and increases the shock from wounds, the women are using the war as an opportunity to educate the young men of America on the subject of the drink problem. Temperance charts and pictures will be shown steadily several hours every day in the "huts" in each cantonment. They are prepared by a special committee and will also teach the effects of venereal diseases upon the body and mind. Mrs. Kate Shaw of Ft. Thomas has charge of this work and gave an excellent report.

On the opening night, the convention was welcomed by leading citizens of the county, whose addresses were graciously responded to by Mrs. Shaw of Ft. Thomas and Mrs. Dr. Pearson of Wilmore, secretary of the Young People's Branch of the state. The annual address by the president of the state W. C. T. U., Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, was given at this session. Mrs. Beauchamp's appeal that the women lift their standard in demanding that our government give us prohibition for the war was received with great applause. "To ask women who turn their dresses upside down and inside out and make them over time and time again, to save, and at the same time permit men to use the soil of God's green acres to produce tobacco with which to poison the blood of future generations, is, to put it mildly, but false economy. Cigars and cigarets will lower vitality and lessen power of resistance to disease, yet the government raises no protest and calls upon self-denying mothers to eat less for economy's sake.

"If, instead of asking our men, our women and our children to eat less, we simply refused to allow our grains and foodstuffs to be used for the production of liquor, we would not only avert the destruction which commonly results from its consumption, but we would save enough grain to supply continuously the bread rations for our own army and for the combined armies of our allies."

The spirit of the president's address was embodied in the resolutions unanimously adopted by the convention, namely, that all efforts be concentrated in securing the submission by the state legislature to the voters of Kentucky of an amendment which will forever prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of all alcoholic liquors. Further, that petitions be sent each Senator and Member of Congress from Kentucky calling upon them to stand for the national constitutional amendment including beer and wine, and for the striking out of the clause limiting to a term of six years the ratification by the states.

Strong protest was entered by the delegates in regard to the giving of tobacco to the soldiers by other organizations, and a cheer went up when it was announced that the Red Cross bags would contain no more cigarets.

The first diamond medal contest ever given in the state was held in connection with the convention. Most of the contestants were from Allen county. Miss Lois Neal of Scottsville was the proud winner of the medal.

On Sunday a large mass meeting was held, at which Mrs. Beauchamp spoke on "The Sabbath," giving many helpful and beautiful illustrations in regard to the observance of the Lord's day.

The addresses Sunday afternoon and evening by Dr. W. A. Ganfield drew large audiences and contained a direct and powerful message. Dr. Ganfield always has something to say and says it in a way one cannot fail to remember.

One of the most enjoyable speakers of the convention was Mrs. Post of Paducah, who brought fraternal greetings from the Kentucky Equal Rights Association. Mrs. Post charmed her hearers with the bright and breezy speech she made, in which she told of the progress made by suffrage in the state and throughout the world. Mrs. Addie Boileau Parsels of Philadelphia made two great speeches.

The convention was one of the most successful and enthusiastic ever held. The state officers were re-elected.

ALL GOING WELL WITH NEW MEXICO

While declining to assume the role of a prophet, Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, after a month spent in helping the prohibition campaign in New Mexico, speaks hopefully of the outlook for victory November 6. "The last person I talked with before leaving the state," said Miss Gordon, "was the sheriff of Santa Fe county. As his parting word, he guaranteed to see that his county rolled up a good majority for our side on election day. On every hand one meets prominent men and women who seem equally confident that the battle of the ballots next month will result in an overwhelming triumph for righteousness."

PRESERVE FOR FUTURE REFERENCE

Valuable information concerning the National W. C. T. U. convention at Washington is given on this and the next page. We suggest that all who expect to attend that great meeting preserve these parts of the paper for future reference.

The National W. C. T. U. Publishing House would appreciate receiving orders for literature and supplies sufficiently early to allow a little extra margin of time for delivery. Owing to war conditions, the U. S. Postoffice Department and the express companies are working under somewhat unusual conditions and delays are occasionally unavoidable.

OFFICIAL CALL FOR THE FORTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

WASHINGTON, D. C., DECEMBER 2-7, 1917

"On to Washington" should be the W. C. T. U. watchword for December 2-7, 1917. This is the year of all years for a record-breaking convention in numbers, in enthusiasm and in spiritual power. Numbers will impress Congress, enthusiasm will generate enthusiasm, and spiritual power will enthrone the golden rule of Christ. The pressure for war prohibition and for the passage by the House of Representatives of the Sheppard-Webb resolution for National Constitutional Prohibition must be unprecedented and powerful.

In an especial manner our organization was prepared to meet the vicissitudes of the extraordinary world crisis in which our nation is an important factor. For four decades, in the spirit of our motto, "For God and Home and Every Land," we have been educated as patriots. For four decades members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union have counted it joy to save, serve and sacrifice. Today we can render our beloved country no better service than to maintain the high efficiency of our own units, local, state and national, while in co-operation with other organizations we render all forms of emergency service.

Let us make this convention, to be held in our capital city, large in numbers, strong in action, and Christ-like in spirit.

Article V of the National W. C. T. U. constitution defines the membership of the annual convention as follows:

Section 1. The annual or biennial meeting shall be composed of the executive committee, chairmen of standing committees, one delegate-at-large from each auxiliary state union, one delegate for every five hundred paying members of auxiliary state unions, state vice-presidents-at-large, state corresponding and recording secretaries and treasurers, the editors of state W. C. T. U. papers, state secretaries of the Young People's Branch and state secretaries of the L. T. L. Branch. Territories and the District of Columbia may be represented on the same basis.

Sec. 2. The Young People's Branch of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in each state shall be represented by its Branch secretary, and one delegate for every 500 young women paying dues. The Loyal Temperance Legion Branch of the National W. C. T. U. shall be entitled to one delegate-at-large from each auxiliary state union and one delegate from each auxiliary state union for every one thousand members having paid $50 into the national treasury; all such delegates to be active members of the W. C. T. U. and active workers in the L. T. L.

According to Article IV of the constitution, the executive committee consists of the General Officers of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the presidents of states, territories and the District of Columbia, the general secretary, the field secretary and the college secretary of the Young People's Branch, the general secretary of the L. T. L. Branch, the board of superintendents, the board of organizers, the lecturers, the evangelists, the director of the Bureau of Publicity, the managing editor of The Union Signal, the managing editor of The Young Crusader and the National musical director.

President
Frances P. Parks,
Corresponding Secretary

CALL TO PRAYER

In connection with the annual convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union at Washington, D. C., December 2-7, there will be an evangelistic conference for prayer, Scripture study and worship, to be held Saturday, December 1, in the First Congregational church, 10th and G. Sts., N. W.

There never has been a time in the history of our organization when there was such urgent need of heartfelt concerted prayer as at this critical period in national affairs.

The conditions call for God's people to bow humbly and wait patiently and pleadingly for the coming of Him who is our God of deliverance.

It is a time also for praise and thanksgiving for the splendid prohibition victories of the past year. Therefore, we should appoint a season of prayer, an hour for devout worship and a consecration service, together with a love feast for praise and Bible thought.

To this end we urge every white ribboner to remember our evangelistic conference in secret prayer, and in all union meetings may the Christ incarnate be in every heart and the holy Shekinah in his temple, till there shall come a deep consciousness of God's presence in the midst of His people.

As ye go, pray, and as ye work, pray, since it is not the length or multiplied words of prayer that prevail, but that which we pray from the depth of the heart that touches the heart of God, that moves Him to send the hosts of heaven to fight in favor of our just cause, as "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera" and as hailstones and coals of fire followed the breath of Jehovah and slew the enemies in olden times.

Ours is a battle for righteousness, prohibition, and freedom against all wrongdoing and unjust rule.

Now is the golden opportunity to show ourselves strong on behalf of righteousness and nation-wide prohibition.

Therefore, "be of good courage" while in prayer with a mighty faith that overcomes even unto the end.

Mary E. Kuhl,
National W. C. T. U. Superintendent,
Evangelistic Department.

ANTE-CONVENTION MEETINGS AND CONFERENCES

The official board will meet at 1:30 p. m., Friday, November 30, at Hotel Powhatan, Pennsylvania Avenue, 18th and H. Sts., N. W.

The Executive Committee will meet in the same place on the same day at 7:30 p. m.

Conferences of the Young People's and L. T. L. Branches will be held in the parlors of the First Congregational Church, 10th and G. Sts., N. W., beginning Saturday afternoon, December 1.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION TRANSPORTATION NOTES

Already many inquiries in reference to special trains for our great National Convention at Washington, D. C., December 2-7, are being received. Members of the Official Board and Executive Committee will need to be in Washington by noon, Friday, November 30. Delegates may prefer not to arrive in Washington until some time Saturday, December 1. As the government has prohibited the running of special excursion trains during the war we are designating certain trains on which reservations may be made and to which additional cars may be attached. The Pennsylvania Railroad has been selected as the official road from Chicago and from New York.

We recommend that members of the Official Board and Executive Committee take the Manhattan Limited, leaving Chicago at 10:30 a. m., Thursday, November 29. This train is due to arrive in Washington at 8:26 Friday morning. We recommend that delegates and visitors who do not care to arrive so early take the same train on Friday morning, November 30.

Applications for sleeping car reservations should be made to C. L. Kimball, 175 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Illinois, accompanied by money order or draft. The rates are: Lower berth, Chicago to Washington, $4.50; upper berth, $3.60; drawing room, $16. Be sure to indicate plainly the date on which you wish your reservation.

Round trip tickets may be purchased from Chicago to Washington and from all points in the Central Traffic and Trunk Lines Association. These tickets must be stamped at Washington.

From New York members of the Executive Committee will take the train leaving the Pennsylvania Station at eight a. m., November 30, and delegates and visitors the eleven a. m. train from the same station on Saturday, December 1. Parlor car reservations may be made on application to Mrs. L. M. De Silva, New York state W. C. T. U. headquarters, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City. That sufficient coach accommodations may be provided for all who desire to take these trains, notification of such intention with the date of the train should be sent in advance.

There is every indication that the convention in Washington will be very large. Early planning will add to the comfort of all who go.

ELLA A. BOOLE,

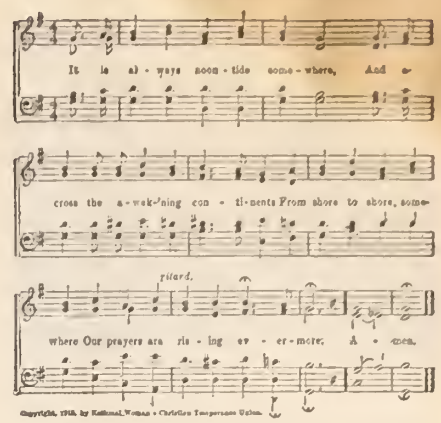
TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What was the conclusion arrived at by the Church of England in Canada as the result of its recent investigation of the success of prohibition in the Dominion?

2. How has the mayor of Ottawa, the capital city of Canada, expressed himself on the subject of prohibition?

3. By what course of reasoning does Governor Whitman of New York justify his antagonism to the liquor traffic?

4. Why does Major-General Plummer, commandant at the Des Moines cantonment, believe that war prohibition is expedient as a military measure?

5. Did the absence of saloons in Des Moines prove a detriment or a help to the architects in the erection of the buildings at the cantonment near that city?

6. How is prohibition helping to solve the Americanization problem in Colorado?

7. In what way is the continued use of alcohol as a beverage affecting the supply of anaesthetics in the war hospitals of Europe?

8. Which state institution of Colorado is having its business reduced to a marked extent by the outlawing of the saloons?

9. Name some of the reasons given by prominent residents of Utah for their enthusiasm over the new prohibitory law.

10. How may the close vote in Iowa on October 15 be explained?

AMONG OUR WORKERS

The thirty-eighth annual convention of the Monroe county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U., held at Rochester, was distinctive for the patriotic note sounded. Superintendents' reports showed much work done along this line, and department conferences were devoted to the topic, "How Can Our Department Work Help Arouse True Patriotism?" National W. C. T. U. patriotic service plans were presented by eleven women, and an address on "Ballots for Both," told how women can help when given the right of suffrage. A prize of $5 was awarded the winner in the public school essay contest, twenty essays having been submitted. Echoes from the Y. P. B. convention and Federation of Clubs meeting were given and a grand gold medal contest held. Mrs. Lora S. La Mance, National organizer, interested and instructed by her fine addresses. Mrs. Mary H. Bishop, who for thirteen years has been the honored president, declined re-election. She was made honorary president and presented with ten dollars in gold. Mrs. J. H. Roberts, the corresponding secretary, was made president.

The Adrian (Mich.) W. C. T. U., Caroline R. Humphrey, president, has made an enviable record in the amount of war emergency work done by its members. The union has adopted a French orphan boy, purchased for the soldiers 375 copies of the gospel of St. John, enclosing President Wilson's war message and a personal letter and the Home Series leaflets. Four barrels of clothing, some of it new and all of it in excellent condition, have been sent to the "Yacht Club de France," an organization which is looking after crippled soldiers and the widows and orphans of those who have been killed. The union has also adopted six soldier boys in the French Hospital and as "marraines" or godmothers the union is expected to write to each boy once a month and send him a small box. The Christmas boxes are being filled at this time so they will reach the boys in ample season.

Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., was a speaker at the evening meeting of the Schuylkill county convention held in Ashland, September 13. England raises grain enough for only one loaf of bread out of every six, Mrs. George said. Other nations supply the grain for five-sixths of England's bread, and yet in war time grain is wasted in making beer. Other numbers on the program were a suffrage address by Miss Mariam Griscom and music by the three daughters of the county president. Three new unions have been organized in Schuylkill county this year, and 305 new members added to the county enrollment.

Friends of Mrs. Jennie M. Kemp will be interested to know of the honor recently conferred upon her through her appointment by Federal Food Administrator, W. B. Ayer, as a member of his staff with field work throughout the state as her special branch of the conservation work in Oregon. This appointment is the reason for her declining at the recent Oregon state W. C. T. U. convention to serve as president of the Oregon W. C. T. U. another year. Mrs. M. Frances Swope, former vice-president-at-large of the Oregon W. C. T. U., was elected to succeed Mrs. Kemp as leader of the Oregon white ribbon forces.

New Castle county, the last stronghold of the liquor traffic in the state of Delaware, is to vote on prohibition at the November 6 election. The campaign is being vigorously prosecuted. Preceding a monster prohibition rally in Wilmington recently the children of the L. T. L. of the Harrison Street M. E. church took part in a temperance parade. As the procession made its way to the church in which the meeting was to be held the rally cries of the boys and girls attracted much attention. Many spectators joined the marchers and attended the rally.

The thirty-second annual convention of the Burlington county (N. J.) W. C. T. U. gave careful consideration to plans for work for the soldiers and sailors. In response to the suggestion of Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, and honorary president of the county organization, a committee was appointed to co-operate with other unions in efforts on behalf of the boys at Camp Dix. Miss Esther H. Elfreth, president of the state W. C. T. U., discussed "The Present Day Status of Temperance," The subject of the evening address by Elizabeth H. Goodwin was "The Temperance Question of Today." The county officers were re-elected, with Mrs. Emily V. Street as the leader for the coming year.

The Ellenville (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. has been the recipient of a beautiful new headquarters building, now nearing completion, the gift of the late John R. Hunt to the organization of which he was an honorary member, his wife having belonged to the group of women who organized it thirty-three years ago. The Hunt Memorial Building, the cornerstone of which was laid in May of this year, occupies a choice piece of ground in the heart of the town. The cost of the lot and the building with the furnishings will reach nearly $50,000. The dedicatory services will probably be held early in December. Not only the members of the Ellenville union, but the entire population of the town, are proud of the beautiful W. C. T. U. building which stands out so prominently for temperance.

It is with sorrow that THE UNION SIGNAL records the sudden translation to the other life of Mrs. Kate A. Levick, well known to many of the workers at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters and white ribbon friends elsewhere. Mrs. Levick's summons to the heavenly Home came as the result of a fall after which she lingered but a few days. As president of Somerset county, New Jersey, she was making preparations for its annual convention and her message was well under way. Thus she went, as she would have chosen, still active in W. C. T. U. work in which she delighted. For years Mrs. Levick was numbered among Illinois W. C. T. U. comrades and at the time of the illness of a former National treasurer, Mrs. Brand, helped to carry the many responsibilities connected with the office. Her tender ministrations to children, especially friendless little ones, her faithful devotion to the great cause she served so well, her joyous, self-sacrificing service of many kinds in the name of the Master she followed, greatly endeared Mrs. Levick to those who were privileged to know her.

"Sacrifice and Service," the Slogan of the North Dakota W. C. T. U.

Special Correspondence

Patriotic service was the keynote of the twenty-eighth annual convention of the North Dakota W. C. T. U., held at Valley City, September 20-24.

The magnificent address of the state president, Mrs. Elizabeth Preston Anderson, showed clearly that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union labors not only to make the world safe for democracy but to make democracy safe for the world.

As each superintendent showed the patriotic value of her department she gave a convincing argument for its continuance. For the department of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, the state superintendent, Mrs. Kate S. Wilder, reported more than 1,200 comfort bags made, a generous contribution to the fund for the ambulance furnished by the National W. C. T. U. and the promise of similar support for the stereomotorgraphs at cantonments. This important work is carried on at state headquarters at Fargo where the state treasurer, Mrs. Minette B. Bowe, who is also office secretary, fills all orders with the help of an assistant. North Dakota white ribboners are responding loyally to the call for service. Most of them have joined the Red Cross society, but are anxious to work through our own organization as much as possible.

The first evening of the convention a social tea, for economic reasons, took the place of the usual banquet. The toasts of welcome were unusually bright, as were also the responses by Mrs. Frank Beasley of Fairdale and Mrs. Lillie B. Bowers of Fargo.

The music was up to the high standard of Valley City and was greatly enjoyed by delegates and visitors.

Deep regret was expressed at the absence of the National president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, but we were thankful she could help New Mexico in the exigencies of the prohibition campaign.

Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, the able president of the Iowa W. C. T. U., came to us from her strenuous campaign, endearing herself to every one by her charming personality, the wisdom of her words and the breadth of her vision. She gave valuable assistance through the convention, preached the annual sermon Sunday afternoon and delivered a strong address Sunday evening at a union service.

Another address greatly appreciated was that of Attorney General William Langer, who is making his influence felt for law enforcement all over the state. We are proud to have his name enrolled as a life member of the state W. C. T. U. Mr. Hewison Pollock of Fargo favored the convention with an able interpretation of "The Wine Press."

For the benefit of our women voters a study of state and national government was presented through means of a carefully prepared chart, the work of the state superintendent of Franchise, Mrs. Ella M. Shippy.

With only eleven months between conventions, with the present war conditions and with another crop failure in the western part of the state, it was not surprising that the treasurer's books showed a slight decrease in membership, but all bills were paid. We expect that the gains on our patriotic membership day may more than offset the loss.

This has been a good year for the Loyal Temperance Legion. Mrs. Lillie B. Bowers, while in the field, succeeded in introducing the work into many public schools, the teachers acting as instructors. Schedules have been arranged for local and district unions, whereby they may become banner unions, each receiving a prize pennant and due recognition at state convention.

The former officers were re-elected with the exception of the vice-president, Mrs. Abbie W. H. Best, who resigned. Mrs. Fred M. Wanner, president of the Twelfth district, was elected to succeed her.

Our slogan for the year is "Sacrifice and Service;" our goal, a working unit of the W. C. T. U. in every community.

Plans for 1918 Minnesota Dry Campaign Enthusiastically Adopted at Annual State Gathering

Special Correspondence

The Minnesota Woman's Christian Temperance Union held its forty-first annual convention in Wesley M. E. church, Minneapolis, September 26-28. The two and one-half days were packed full of work and enthusiasm and there was not a dull moment. Delegates from every part of the state, 252 in all, were in attendance. The Eighteenth district, St. Louis county, flushed with its recent dry victory, had a large delegation and received the banner for the largest net gain in district membership. For the first time this district was enabled to elect its own delegates to the National Convention, as its paid membership is more than five hundred. Five districts this year had this distinction. The Eighth ward W. C. T. U. of Minneapolis received the banner for the largest local union membership, 359, and the Ida Y. P. B., with an enrollment of 126, won the "Y" membership banner. The total net membership gain in the state is 544, thus assuring Minnesota a place on the honor roll at the National Convention.

Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, treasurer of the National W. C. T. U., was again a welcome guest and helper. She gave the convention address the first evening and Daniel A. Poling, associate president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, was the speaker the second evening. His theme, "America Safe Is America Sober," dealt with the highest type of patriotism. He stopped often to ask, "What is patriotism?" answering with telling up-to-the-hour illustrations showing the self-effacing, sacrificial spirit of true patriotism.

Miss Rozette Hendrix, president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., gave her eighth annual address before the white ribboners of the state. It was a message replete with strong patriotic utterances and urged the women to continue W. C. T. U. work as the most patriotic thing that can be done for the nation. To help free our beloved land from the saloon and its baneful influences, that the young men may be fit when the nation has need of them, is true patriotism. At the close of her address, which was ordered printed in the state minutes and state paper, a splendid ovation was given Miss Hendrix.

The reports of Mrs. Kate Kercher, state corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Della R. Mandigo, state treasurer, were the best ever presented at a Minnesota convention. There was a patriotic hour in which Mrs. Horace Lowry spoke for the Red Cross, Mrs. Della R. Mandigo for the Minnesota Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense and Captain Robert Alcott of our work for the soldiers. Mrs. Nella Wash, state superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, reported 2,748 comfort kits made by the women of the local unions at an expense of $1,450.10; 978 days of sewing and work given to the Red Cross; $576.99 donated for Red Cross hospital supplies; 210 pairs of socks knitted by the women of the W. C. T. U., and the women were still knitting at the convention! The Minnesota unions have given $525 toward the two Army ambulances purchased by the National W. C. T. U., the second largest amount given by any of the states.

A message was sent President Wilson, pledging the loyalty of the 8,000 members of the Minnesota W. C. T. U. in the nation's stress, and urging him to use the power conferred upon him by Congress to prohibit, in the interest of conservation of food and the splendid khaki-clad manhood of the country, the manufacture of beer and wines. Messages were also sent Minnesota members of the House of Representatives, asking them to concur in the joint resolution recently passed by the Senate, to submit to the several states the prohibition amendment to the Federal constitution.

Oscar Christianson, a student at St. Olaf College, Northfield, received the twenty-five dollar prize for the best temperance essay written by a college student, Dora Nelson of Kensington, the twenty-five dollar prize for the best essay written by a high school student, and Agnes Olson the grade school prize of fifteen dollars.

Thursday afternoon an hour was given to the consideration of plans for securing state constitutional prohibition. The State Suffrage Association, through the president, Mrs. Andreas Ueland, pledged its co-operation in this endeavor, as did Mrs. J. C. Buchanan for the Federation of Woman's Clubs, and Mrs. Frances Buell Olson, president of the Federation of Fraternal Orders, for the organization she represented.

Mrs. Bessie Lathe Scovell explained W. C. T. U. campaign plans, Rev. Geo. B. Safford represented the Anti-Saloon League, J. A. Shields the Prohibition party, Frank Vroman the young people's societies of the churches, and W. L. Smithies the Dry Ordinance Federation of Duluth. This agitation was the means of starting a Minnesota Dry Federation to direct the campaign for the constitutional prohibition amendment which will be voted upon in November, 1918.

Mrs. Cornelia Forbes, former president of the Connecticut W. C. T. U., Miss Agnes Duff, secretary of the Toronto (Can.) Y. W. C. T. U., Mrs. Helen Thorbilson of the Alaska W. C. T. U., Mrs. A. T. Anderson, former president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Susan McKenzie, member of the Frazee union, who will be 100 years old on her next birthday, were interested and interesting visitors. The 1918 convention was invited to Duluth and the invitation was accepted.

We record here the names of comrades and friends who have recently passed to the higher life:

Ulysses Arnett Clayton, Fairmont, W. Va., a loyal champion of both prohibition and woman suffrage. In the days when friends of prohibition were few Mr. Clayton boldly proclaimed the duty of Christian people to do the will of God at the ballot box. In his promotion the cause of prohibition has lost a firm friend.

Rev. Mary J. Borden, Walnut Creek, Calif., entered into rest just six weeks after the death of her husband. For many years she had given herself to the work of the California W. C. T. U. as lecturer, organizer and county president. Before making her home in that state, she was for seventeen years president of the New Mexico W. C. T. U.

SAVING "OLD SLIM"

A STORY FOR HALLOWE'EN

GRACE BOTELER SANDERS

Because the Aid Society of Randolph had promised to give fifty dollars for the support of the minister, its officers decided to hold a Hallowe'en social in the mayor's office, which was located in a building on the corner of Main and Xenia streets. As but few belonged to the society, all the ladies of the church were solicited for donations. Mrs. Nelson, the jeweler's wife, who was kept indoors much of the time caring for her six-months-old baby, promised to help by baking three pumpkin pies.

"I'd love to wait on table and be in the thick of things," she told her husband, "and I'd like to teach in Sunday school every Sunday morning. But I had my day, before I was married, if I never again do! Besides, raising the baby and training him properly is my part in the work of the Lord, just now." She looked at him for confirmation.

Her husband kissed her fondly. "You're one of the grandest little women," he declared. "Do you think I could cheerfully meet unpleasant customers and keep up my courage and do my work well, if it weren't for you, praying for me at home? I should say not. Be content, honey, as a member of the Home department, and if you want to do missionary work, try your hand at reforming old Slim." Mr. Nelson nodded toward a shack on the edge of the plowed ground which joined their garden. "If some one could find the divine spark in that poor old reprobate's heart, it would be worth a dozen Hallowe'en socials." He kissed her and went hurrying away.

Wafted back to her came her husband's merry whistle and unconsciously Mildred Nelson sang the words: "Look all about you, find some one in need. Help somebody today."

The old man whom her husband had mentioned was working in his garden. The brisk wind waved his tattered garments like banners. He lived alone, worked alone. No one cared for him nor knew his name. The boys taunted him when during periods of intoxication he tottered down the street. Many good people averted their eyes when they met him.

Mrs. Nelson had not quite decided as to her duty, but her husband's words had put into her mind tender thoughts. As she rocked her baby boy, she pictured the blear-eyed old creature working in his yard as a dimpled, blue-eyed baby like her Junior now crowing in his happy mother's arms. Was it possible that man could so mar God's most perfect creation? She sighed and looked out the window again at the unshaven face of the toiler, lined with care. Weather beaten and unkempt, he bent over the brown tubers he was gathering.

"Why does he work? He spends at the saloon every cent as soon as he gets it?" queried Mrs. Nelson, unconsciously speaking aloud. "I do wonder if one could find a divine spark in him."

A neighbor who had entered the house laughed softly. "If you're thinking of trying to reform that old pill, you might as well rest your thinker. Everybody this side of town has wasted energy and tracts upon him, only to be insulted. If you take my advice, you'll let him alone."

"It seems terrible to have a fellow creature go to destruction before your eyes without a protest. He was some mother's boy," sighed the young matron, looking down at the babe asleep on her breast.

Her friend nodded indifferently. "But he got there by his own act," she said, decisively. "We can make ourselves what we will. It's all habit."

Mrs. Nelson's clear voice queried, "And how do we get the habit?"

The friend laughed. "Oh, everybody knows that if we're all right, our parents or some relative gave us a lift! But I've no time for preachments; I came to get the recipe for your pumpkin pie. I promised to make some for that social. I'd rather give money, though, than bake these hot days."

The little mother laid the baby in the crib and brought out her cherished recipe book, the gift of her girl friends at home, who had made it for her before her marriage. She took out a leaf, gave it to her merry young neighbor and stood watching her make her way home. Then her thoughts reverted to the stranger who was going down to death at her gate without a word from her. A bright yellow pumpkin in the man's garden attracted her attention. She ran out impulsively and smiled brightly at him, calling him at random, because she did not know his name, "Mr. Smith."

The laborer looked up quickly, with a tinge of interest in his bleared eyes. "I was wondering if you would sell me a pumpkin. You see, we're each to donate something for the Hallowe'en social tomorrow evening. I promised three pumpkin pies, but I've no pumpkin." Now, if I could get one of yours," with a very winning air, "I'd be so glad."

Without hesitation the man picked off a great yellow globe at his feet and handed it to her. "That will make twenty I've raised," he commented in a gruff voice.

"I thank you. How much is it?" He turned on his heel. The answer came in jerky fashion through his ragged beard. "I ain't give—nothin' to the—church for years. If you will just take it—as my donation."

He was walking away, head down, when Mrs. Nelson ran after him. "And who shall I say gave it? The church wants to know its friends."

The man grinned grimly, looked down at his tattered garments and up at her sweet face. "I don't look much like a friend of the church," he half sneered. "If you knew me, mebbe you wouldn't talk to me. I'm Slim, the saloon bum." He leered defiance at her, but when she did not shrink from him he added, almost gently, "Could you keep on calling me—'Mister Smith?' That name will do as well as any."

As she pared the perfect fruit and cubed it, then dropped the yellow squares into her blue kettle, Mildred Nelson forgot the charm of the contrasting colors and saw instead only brown, all brown, and a man's despairing face.

Her husband laughed that night when she told him the story, and added: "Anybody, old soak or not, would give you a pumpkin. They're cheap this year." But Mildred Nelson knew the gift was something more than an ordinary one.

She thought of the man during the hot morning when she placed the perfect golden pies on the white shelves for cooling. "The poor soul lives alone with no one to cook for him. I wish he had one of these pies," she murmured. "If I could only catch him out in the garden, I'd offer him one."

But the reprobate whom she had dubbed "Mr. Smith" did not appear. The church committee came for her pies and carried them away. Evening arrived and her husband returned to the store.

She was almost afraid tonight, for it seemed there was no one in that end of town except herself and her baby. Masked youngsters went howling by. One tapped at her window and held up something. Though she knew the horrid, grinning thing was but a pumpkin face, she fairly trembled with nervousness. Suddenly she heard a commotion in the alley. Some men seemed to be quarreling. She recognized the voice of one of them as that of "Mr. Smith."

"I'm not going to drink a drop tonight, and I won't help rob that jewelry store. He's a fine man and his wife's been good to me. Not much I won't."

Mildred Nelson, trembling, looked from the windows, and by the light of the street lamp saw three men, one of whom was imbibing from a whisky bottle. All at once she had an inspiration. She ran to the cradle, picked up the sleeping baby, and going quickly to the door, called, "Oh, Mr. Smith, won't you come here please?" The others took to their heels. "Mr. Smith" came at her bidding, though he looked uncomfortable.

"If you're not busy, I wish you'd stay with me until Mr. Nelson returns. I know it's silly, but those horrid pumpkin faces make me nervous." The man hesitated and then came slowly in.

It was when her visitor showed signs of leaving that Mrs. Nelson played her last card.

"I'm hungry as a bear. Are you?" she asked. Before he could reply, she added, "Come have some of my pumpkin pie. Perhaps it's like those your mother used to make."

She pretended that she did not notice his tears as he sat at the kitchen table with ham and cheese sandwiches and pie—plenty of it—spread out before him. He huskily voiced his thanks. When Mr. Nelson came home, "Mister Smith" awkwardly left.

After he had gone, Mildred's husband walked to the phone. "I'll tell the police to watch that old fellow," he said. "Talking about a robbery, was he?"

His wife flew at him. "Don't you dare do that," she cried. "Have you forgotten that he and I are friends?"

Charley Nelson looked at her curiously, scratched his head and hung up the receiver.

A year rolled by and another Hallowe'en was approaching. Within a week would be counted the votes which would decide whether Randolph had measured up to its duty as a Christian community and helped to make the liquor traffic an outlaw. The Nelsons, intensely interested in the campaign, had been working with the dry committee for weeks. One afternoon Mrs. Nelson looked out of the window and saw coming up the walk a tired looking man, neatly dressed and with something of a spring to his step. She hastened to the door to meet him. It was "Mister Smith."

"Why, how do you do?" she said. "You are always welcome, you know." She looked at him searchingly, for, although the man, with many exhortations from her husband to "Keep it up, old fellow. We're counting on you. God will help you," and smiling words of helpfulness from her, had managed for a long time to steer clear of his enemy, Mrs. Nelson often had a sinking at the heart for fear he would again lose his grip and fail. To be sure, he attended church regularly and seemed wholly different, but she would never rest content, she felt, until temptation was removed from his path. Yes, saloons must take their evil selves away, driven off by the ballots of good people.

"Come right in, Mr. Smith," she continued. "You have something special to tell me. I can see it in your face."

Mr. Smith looked embarrassed but happy. "Why, Mrs. Nelson," he said, "I came to tell you that I have the promises of one hundred men to vote against liquor on election day. I had to—to—work pretty hard to do it, but I've got them. Here they are." With a flourish, he drew forth a long sheet of paper on which was written name after name. Mrs. Nelson examined them closely. Many prominent people had affixed their signatures to this important document, and she knew it meant victory for the cause. A week later Randolph voted dry.

WORLD TEMPERANCE TOUR AMONG THE BROWNIES

MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, World's W. C. T. U. Superintendent Sunday School Work

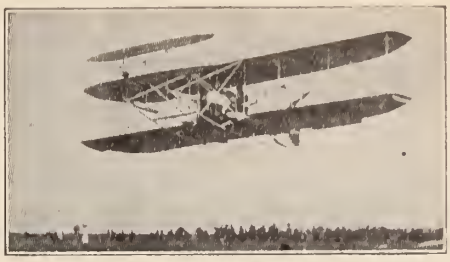
NOTE: The following travelogue is a picturesque way of telling the children on Temperance Sunday, November 4, or at any other time, the story of the progress of temperance around the world, particularly in these war times. The Brownies may be represented by rather small children. As they can hardly be expected to give the information, adults may do the talking, a different one for each nation. An aeroplane drawn on the blackboard or represented in miniature would add much to the effect. It will be noticed that the Brownie pictures are outlined by dots. These can be drawn or printed on cards and given to the children to stitch with colored worsteds at home. In fact, many hundreds have been made by children. They may be ordered of the Patriot-Phalanx at 2 cents each, or 5 cents per dozen.

Brownies are not sure-enough folks; they are a race of fairies. In some ways fairies are wiser than folks, for the reason that they can go about faster, even faster than flying birds, and they can get into places into which real folks could not possibly squeeze; and because Brownies can make themselves invisible, they can hear things that are being said where real folks would not dare to stay. A little girl after hearing about Brownies and seeing pictures of them drawn on the blackboard, asked, "And they are alive?" Yes, very much alive in the realm of thought.

Now, in order to take a tour among the Brownies we must use an aeroplane. It is a newer way of getting into fairyland than the "magic carpet." Word has been passed to the Brownies in every country in the world so that in all lands they will be expecting us, and will be ready to receive us when we drop down upon them.

Our first stop is in Great Britain, where we are met by the Crown Prince of the Brownies. "All the Brownies in Great Britain are for temperance," he says, "but the same cannot be said of all the folks. It must be told, however, that two million people have signed a petition to have prohibition during the war and for six months afterward. King George and all of his family have become total abstainers, and that is a grand lead, but despite that not less than $2,500,000 is being paid into barrooms every day for drink. I, myself, was present in Parliament, though unseen, when the Right Hon. Donald McLean, deputy chairman of the British House of Commons, made the astounding statement that since the war began Britain has spent 512,000,000 pounds ($2,560,000,000) for drink. That was in July, 1917, and since then that amount has been increased at the rate of $2,500,000 a day. Cannot some of you school boys and girls figure out what the amount would be on this World's Temperance Sunday, November 4, 1917?

"I'm the Crown Prince of the Brownies of Great Britain"



"We Brownies have had several peeps into that wonderful book called, 'Defeat or Victory.' There is one passage from it that says, 'The brewers are having the time of their lives, for beer lays its toll on our ships at home; it lays its toll on our land; it hampers the army and navy; it robs us of our food; it destroys our wealth; it weakens every arm that lifts itself to strike the enemy. Even Belgium, perishing for bread, can get beer, or barley for beer, from England in our British ships.'"

"You should certainly drop down into the trenches on the battlefields," the Brownie Crown Prince continued, "and see how rations of rum are served to British forces, two tablespoonsful a day. It is enough to make Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener, once national commanders of the British forces, turn over in their graves. You should hear the remonstrances that temperance folks have made against the shipment of thousands, yes, millions, of gallons of rum to the army."

Here we are in France. Brownie Louis le Blanc is an epitome of the true French gentleman. We will translate into English what he told us in French with many a characteristic shrug of his shoulders. "French Brownies are every one total abstainers," he said. "Even when the vintages are the largest they never taste a drop of wine, and as to absinthe, it is so vile in its effect on folks they will have none of it. Beer seems to Brownies most vulgar and they wonder how it could ever lure persons of any refinement whatever. But let me tell you that drunkenness and death from drunkenness have so increased in France among the folks that warnings against alcoholic drinks have been printed on large posters, and ordered put up in public places by the city governments. Even the school children are being mobilized against King Alcohol. Recently, as a part of their examination, they were asked to write an essay on 'The Door of the Saloon Opens Into the Hospital.' They were told to explain the sentence and show the truth of it by developing the fatal effects that intemperance carries with it for the individual and the family. They were also asked what an intelligent youth should do in regard to the alcohol habit. Some of these children come from homes where the breakfast consists mostly of potato chips and a piece of bread soaked in absinthe or brandy. It is needless to tell you that such conditions as these are never found in Brownie homes. But what a change has been brought about in the homes of France since the mothers have organized a National League for the Deliverance of France from Alcohol and have urged that warnings against alcohol be placed in every home.

"The Brownies have often heard the people of France sing their grand national hymn, the 'Marseillaise':

" 'To arms, to arms, ye brave,
The avenging sword unsheath,
March on, march on,
All hearts resolved on victory or death.'

"We Brownies would like to teach them a new 'Marseillaise':

" 'To prayer, to work, awake,
And join our temperance band.
Pray on, work on,
With trust in God to save our native land.'"

"You know, perhaps," Brownie Louis le Blanc continued, "that Brownies never fight, but they can see that out of the present war good has come to the temperance cause in France. The French government has prohibited absinthe altogether during the war, and the supreme court has ordered the generals to forbid any strong alcoholic drinks in and behind the French lines. But, alas, the soldiers are still given a ration of wine, and that has some alcohol in it, you know." "Yes," we replied, "and we are not at all pleased to have our 'Sammies' given wine when no alcoholic drinks whatever are allowed in the United States Army."

"Only the other day," the Brownie replied, "we heard General Pershing, commander of the American forces in France, say, 'There was a time when it was a natural part of a soldier's existence to drink and carouse. That day is past with the soldier sworn to defend his country's flag and representing the power and dignity of the nation.'"

"We have been told that the president of the French Republic is a temperance man. Is that true?" we asked Brownie le Blanc. "Yes," he replied, "Raymond Poincare, president of the French Republic, on May 29, made the following statement to the National Anti-Alcoholic League:

" 'You ask the president of the republic to follow the example of other heads of states and take an engagement to abstain from all spirituous liquors during the war. That is an engagement that the president takes willingly and without difficulty, not only for the duration of the war, but even afterward. He never drinks alcoholic drinks.'"

"All among the stars, sailing round the moon," that's the way we go in an aeroplane, and the speed is almost as swift as thought. A short while ago we were in France, and now we are sailing over Germany, and presently we will be landing in the beautiful Rose Garden of Berlin, one of the choicest spots in all Germany. Yes, here we are, and Wilhelm Klipp Housen, the Prince of the German Brownies, is making his way through the rose bushes to meet us, beating a merry welcome on his little drum. In answer to our question, "Are there any Brownie drunkards in Germany?" he replied, "Not one; they are all total abstainers." "You cannot say the same for the men and women of Germany, can you?" we asked. "Oh, no," he replied, "at the railroad stations beer is the principal refreshment, the whole floor of the depot being covered with chairs and tables, where people sit and drink while waiting for trains. In every grocery store beer is sold as commonly as sugar, and it is generally found on the family table. In the villages where the people live, for there are no separate farm homes, there is always a beer center, where the people assemble and drink beer. In fields where people are working beer bottles are near at hand, and sometimes there are kegs and even barrels of beer. In the cities you will see laborers eating their dinner in the streets with sausages in their hands and beer bottles between their knees. Coachmen may be seen standing by their cabs drinking glasses of beer. In the markets you will see fruit women, butchers and vegetable vendors with glasses of beer within reach, from which they frequently drink. If you go into a store to buy cloth, the clerk will likely have a glass of beer at his side, and you will find professors and lawyers with beer on their desks. Beer is everywhere and stronger drinks as well. I could show you many large shop windows filled with casks and fancy bottles containing one of the strongest of liquors, called 'Lachrima de Christo' (the tears of Christ). Alas, it is made by an order of monks!"

"But, Herr Brownie, we have been told there is a company of people in Germany called 'water fanatics.' Are there many of them?" we asked. "Oh, yes," he replied, "and sometimes they are called 'Good Templars' and 'Social Democrats.' There may be as many as 100,000 of them, or there were before the war. They have certainly done a great work for temperance in Germany." "We have been told in the United States that your Emperor once advised the cadets in a naval school to have nothing to do with alcoholic liquor if they would win in battle. Is this true, Herr Brownie?"

"Yes, he did say so," was the reply.

"But, Herr Brownie, there can be no doubt that a great deal of hard drinking has been done by German soldiers and that cruel deeds have been done by them when they were intoxicated."

"That is true, too true," he replied, "and the Brownies will make no excuse for them."

"We are not proposing to visit Austria. Can you tell us how temperance prospers there during these war times?"

"We have been told by Austrian Brownies that when the first troops were departing whole train loads of the soldiers were intoxicated. They were so disorderly that the Emperor forbade the sale or gift of alcoholic drinks to troops on trains and for five hours before entraining. Since then there have been few drunken orgies."

"But there must be a lot of liquor in Austria?"

"Well, yes; 605,000,000 tons of barley were used in one year in making beer and 839,000,000 tons of potatoes were used for making spirits. In addition, enormous quantities of grapes, fruits and berries were made into alcoholic drinks. But not a drop of beer or spirits is taken by the Brownies. They are little, but they are wise."

The Fight is On in New Mexico, 8,000 Feet Above the Sea

MAUDE LORENE GREENE

We have, of course, the finest state in the Union—at least it will be after November 6. The fight for prohibition is on and it is a fight to the finish! Of course we shall win, for never were there such women as the white ribboners of New Mexico, never more earnest, valiant men.

For nine years the writer has been at work among Catholics and Protestants alike, Americans, Spanish-Americans, and Mexicans gladly opening their schools, churches and homes. Five months have been spent in the field in the interest of the campaign, often away from the railroads, forty or fifty miles out into the country, among the ranchmen of Union county and others. Everywhere automobiles or mountain wagons have been at the disposal of the speaker who many times has held three services in a day, traveling fifty and even sixty miles for the purpose. Ministers kindly offered their cars or carriages and their pulpits.

Hospitality is unlimited and unstinted. Amistad was the radiating point for work in Union county and a delightful three weeks were spent there, the worker going nightly by auto to school houses, country churches, and small towns. At Des Moines the usual hospitality and courtesies were extended.

On a recent evening the writer dined on the mountain—a dainty surprise planned by the women. The banquet was spread on a great flat rock. We built our campfire on the cliff. Below spread the beautiful valley, trees, green grass, vines and blooming flowers, pretty homes, commodious churches, substantial business blocks, and beyond the rock-ribbed, verdure-covered mountains where white-faced cattle contentedly browsed. This is Raton!

The Raton union is small. It had a recent disappointment in arranging for a National speaker, but the women, undaunted, engaged the leading theater of the city, war films and all, and advertised the writer on the screen continually every day for a week as a "movie special attraction." They sold tickets far and wide. It is needless to say that when the evening arrived the "attraction" was greeted by an overflowing house; boxes, galleries and lobbies were filled with interested, enthusiastic listeners. Many, many in that audience would never have heard a temperance lecture if delivered in a church or hall.

And so the good work goes on! Meetings in five mining camps of the St. Louis and Rocky Mountain Mining company were arranged on the same plan by our indefatigable women. Wonderful meetings they were. The night rides through the canyons were weird and often dangerous. Sometimes they led one along the sheer edge of a cliff with perhaps only six inches of slippery rock as a foothold; sometimes through arroyos at whose bottom dark pools washed the wheels; again around sharp curves to suddenly face two glaring eyes of flame. Grinding on "low," to gain a place of safety, suddenly the twinkle of myriad lights and the red glow of furnaces. Then would come a sharp climb to the school house—there is no church—where had gathered an audience of every nationality under the sun. Italians, Scandinavians, Poles, Spanish-Americans, Mexicans and Germans crowded every corner. Merrily they chattered, laughed, gestured and grimaced until the speaker was presented and then they became intensely attentive. The manager told us that those who have a vote will, almost to a man, cast it for prohibition. The company saloon is the most brilliantly lighted and the most densely crowded of any of the buildings in the camp, but when prohibition comes, next November, the company will convert these places into amusement halls where wholesome plays, concerts, etc., will be given.

A climb of another thousand feet by mountain wagon brought the writer to Johnson's mesa. The ponies pulled steadily over the precipitous road and the stout wheels rattled over the rocks. Wonderful vistas opened above and below. Spicy pines and cedars filled the air with fragrance, and one could see below the valley bright and green. As the ponies paused, the brave pioneer minister of this field in "God's country" reverently removed his hat and said, "I always have prayer when we reach this point," and there, under God's sky, we lifted our hearts and voices for His blessing on our work. He will answer.

Another climb, a sharp curve, and the Rocky Rim was crossed and a great plateau spread out ahead. Gardens, orchards, waving fields of golden grain, 8,000 feet above the sea! Seven miles it was to the big rock church, but we were soon there. The people came from every direction—wholesome, happy people who will swell the ballot for state-wide prohibition and later on for nation-wide prohibition.

The result of these months of auto travel can never be fully estimated. Hundreds of talks were given, five unions were organized and many friends gained for our cause. Comrades, this is New Mexico! The finest climate, the most hospitable people, the grandest mountains, fertile valleys, grass covered plains, cozy, clean cities,—what more can we ask or want except state-wide prohibition? And we'll get that. Then watch New Mexico grow!

NO-LICENSE GAINS IN CONNECTICUT

MARY B. WILSON

It has frequently happened that Connecticut women have cast envious eyes on their sisters from other states, because of temperance or suffrage victories, and have whispered among themselves, "How long must it be before we, too, can sing 'Victory'." Therefore, when the October election returns showed that 97 towns, or townships, as the unit is called in some states, out of the 168 in the state, are in the no-license column, we did sing a song of thanks, and resolved, with fresh courage, to continue our fight to win the remaining 71. When a leading Hartford paper devotes more than three news columns to "Red Hot License Fights," and states editorially that "The no-license people have cause for satisfaction as a result of yesterday's struggle," one realizes that a great wave of interest in prohibition is passing over this dear state.

Connecticut has started the Buell Children's Fund as a means of raising money for state work. Five dollars makes a child either a life or a memorial member of the state W. C. T. U. Mothers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers are placing the names of their beloved little ones on the list, thus uniting the children more closely to the W. C. T. U., and at the same time providing funds for larger activities. Full particulars may be obtained from the state treasurer, Mrs. Nellie Rule Arnold, Meriden, Conn.

A large majority of our women are working strenuously for our soldiers and sailors and for the country. They are giving money, time, strength and prayers. Funds for two hospital fans, and $148 for the Ambulance Fund have been raised. Some unions have been so fortunate as to be able to buy liberty bonds. The fatherless children across the sea have not been forgotten, and some of them have been adopted by Connecticut women who have raised the $36.50 necessary to prolong their lives another year.

As we cut or sew, knit or cook, we send loving thoughts to "some mother's boy" who will use the article, and breathe a prayer for his safe keeping.

ASK DRY ZONE TO AID WAR INDUSTRIES

Liquor drinking on the part of employes is said to be causing serious delays in the plants which are making munitions for the government. Charles L. Huston, vice-president of the Lukens Steel company, employing several thousand men at its works in Coatesville, Pa., is reported to have petitioned the war department for the establishment of a dry zone which will close saloons in nearby sections of Chester and Lancaster counties which attract the workmen. Coatesville has no saloons, but the saloons in adjacent towns are so near that the workmen have no difficulty in securing liquor. Not only the Lukens Steel company, but other mills in Coatesville and vicinity are doing government work, and the operations of all these industries are handicapped because of drunkenness among the employes, says Mr. Huston. Many of the workmen have no dependents, and are likely to be at work one day and drunk the next, thus seriously crippling the output of the plants. Mr. Huston will ask the war department to take the same action at Coatesville as at Allentown, Eddystone and Gettysburg, where the sale of booze has been stopped within a radius of several miles of munition plants or army corps.

Prof. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

The Millennium

What, When and Where?

This all-important subject is ably discussed by America's Great Prophetic Expositor

PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D. D.

Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago

In an additional series of articles in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

"THE Mountain Peaks of Prophecy," Prof. Gray's first series of articles, which has just ended in the Christian Herald, has brought forth such a number of inquiries from students and Bible readers all over the country, that an additional series has become a necessity.

They will be contributions of the most valuable character to the prophetic literature of the times in which we are now living—a period which, in the opinion of all of the best Bible expositors, is one of prophetic fulfilment.

The new series by Dr. Gray will be closely linked in relation with "The Mountain Peaks" series just concluded, and will bear the following titles:

What Does the Bible Teach About Russia

What Does the Bible Teach About the Restoration of Babylon

The Millennium: What, When and Where?

The Present War and Coming Events

It will be seen at once by all who have the slightest acquaintance with prophecy, that these four topics are of the most vital interest to the generation now living. They should be read in conjunction with and as a continuation of the series just closed, but more especially of the last three articles in that series, namely. The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption; The Antichrist, Who He is and When He Will Arise; "The Day of the Lord," When it Comes and What it Means.

The three articles named above, together with the four additional new articles, will constitute a list of seven contributions in which the Bible searchlight is turned on the great prophetic mysteries and the spiritual interpretation applied by one of the greatest living expositors.

Unfailing Recipe for Increasing Union Signal Subscription List

VIDA IRENE THOMPSON, Circulation Manager

How many prizes is your state expecting to win this year? You have little time left before the National Convention. Your union can send in additional subscriptions. You can send in at least one or two more. "How?" do you ask. You know the value of THE UNION SIGNAL, and that it is poor economy to go without anything so helpful! Give others the benefit of your experience. That ought to bring results in the way of subscriptions.

Here is a recipe for gaining new subscribers: Take the loan of your own UNION SIGNAL, repeated as necessary; combine with requests for its return ("as you need it," "as you keep a file," "you use it for scrap-books," etc.); sprinkle in plenty of enthusiasm; use thyme (time) according to individual need—difficult to use too much; add a little curiosity and a judicious amount of tact. Stir these ingredients well together, and do not allow to stand too long. If carefully followed, this recipe cannot fail. Often some of the ingredients are omitted, though enthusiasm, tact and time are always needed.

One worker gives us the following reasons for her success: "Mrs. W. motored up yesterday to talk over organizing our respective counties in the Hoover food conservation campaign, as she and I are the county chairmen, and when I told her about the 'coffin nails' being sent to China, and locating the $7,000,000 waste'; at the same time showing her THE UNION SIGNAL, she said, 'I'd like to take this paper,' whereupon I clinched its value by citing the Washington letter and a few other features, and she handed me a dollar, which I gladly enclose, feeling that she will be helped most wonderfully by reading our official organ."

Oklahoma W. C. T. U. Faces the New Year with Faith and Optimism

CORA D. HAMMETT, State Corresponding Secretary

The tenth annual convention of the Oklahoma W. C. T. U., held in El Reno, September 19-21, reached a "high water mark" in every respect. There were present one hundred voting delegates, full of enthusiasm and an earnest desire to get as much as possible out of the meetings.

The president's annual address showed that the year had been one of great activity. It was an able document, comprehensive in scope and detail, covering a vast array of facts concerning the progress of the cause of prohibition and the indications of victory in the near future. The chief executive of the state had responded to many calls from National W. C. T. U. officers and superintendents, held institutes, attended county conventions, in addition to accomplishing considerable field work.

The report of the state corresponding secretary indicated that she had had her finger on the pulse of every local union in the state, having kept constantly in touch with them, stressing, particularly, throughout the year, increase in membership. Her summary of the work accomplished was more satisfactory than for any previous year.

The state treasurer's report was gratifying. The Oklahoma W. C. T. U. has this year measured up very favorably with other states in its contributions to National interests—the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund, the Lillian Stevens Campaign Fund and the Ambulance Fund. She reported all bills paid, a neat balance in the treasury and an increase in membership of more than two hundred.

County presidents and state superintendents filled important and interesting places on the program. Their reports were most encouraging and their outlook for the coming year is evidently promising.

The convention, falling heroically into line, adopted such measures as would place the W. C. T. U. in hearty co-operation with all emergency plans incident to the awful conflict in which our country is engaged, at the same time holding, as a unit, the work of our own organization. The resolutions adopted by the convention took high ground, exalting the standards of the state union to a very worthy degree.

The El Reno union "did itself proud" in entertaining the convention. It cannot be too highly praised for the manner in which every detail, not forgetting the automobile ride provided by the chamber of commerce, was handled. The local features of the program, including welcome addresses, special music and the L. T. L. demonstrations were far above the ordinary.

While the war clouds hang heavy around us and hearts are sad, still we face the future with hope and optimism, believing that "God is in his heavens keeping watch of his own."

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 69, Washington, D.C.

District Prohibition Bill Declared Constitutional

The constitutionality of the prohibition law for the District of Columbia, which went into effect November 1, was upheld October 24 by a decision of Justice Gould of the District supreme court. The liquor dealers applied to the court for an injunction to prevent the enforcement of the law, questioning its constitutionality on the ground that the law is a revenue bill, which should have originated in the House of Representatives, but which, in fact, originated in the Senate. The court swept aside this contention and all others presented by the liquor dealers, including that alleging injury to their property rights, and declared that the sale of intoxicants is a menace to public health, morals and safety.

Secretary Daniels Denounces Double Standard of Morals

Secretary Daniels, in an address in Chicago before the Clinical Congress of Surgeons of North America, on October 23, appealed to the medical profession to "end the false double standard that decreases military effectiveness."

"There is not an army in the field whose effectiveness is not reduced by reason of immoral disease," said Secretary Daniels. "The navy suffers likewise, and business halts because venereal diseases destroy the manhood of workmen and fighters. During the last statistical year men of the American navy lost 141,378 days' sickness from a small group of absolutely preventable diseases, or rather diseases contracted by sin.

"This means that every day throughout the year there were 456 men disabled by this disgraceful malady. Add to that number those required to care for the disabled and we have enough men on the non-effective list each day to man a modern battleship. And this does not count those who, though diseased, were not disabled or the evil of the loathing danger of contagion to the clean members of the crew.

"The remedy? There is but one—continence. It must be preached in the home, in the school, in the marts of trade, in the pulpit and in military camps and among shipmates afloat. The eradication of the evil effects must be thorough, but the teacher who will be heard and heeded when the teachings of all others will fall on deaf ears is the word of authority from the medical profession.

"Young men expect ministers of the gospel to call them to clean living. The preacher seeks to save their souls, and too many youths hardly realize they have a soul. But they know they have bodies, and the doctor is the man to whom they trust the treatment of their bodies. When he preaches continence as the only rule of life to young men and points out the dire penalty for lapses, his words have a weight no other admonition possesses.

"You, gentlemen of the medical profession, deal with life and death. You bring the bodies into the world, and you close the eyes of the dead. Yours is the ministering function, the intimate touch, and out of such relation you can enjoy an amazing power of suggestion.

Calls on Doctors to Help

"It is this power that America calls upon you to use. Tell our youths the truth. It is a duty laid upon you, not by the moral law alone, but by the law of self-preservation that operates in nations as well as individuals. That duty is imperative upon you now as never before. If you perform it, and our young soldiers and sailors heed your wise counsel—and many of them will follow your teaching with lasting gratitude—you will contribute more to the winning of the war than manufacturers of shells.

"Continence is no longer a matter of morals only, though it must be enforced as the cardinal doctrine of morals. It has come to be seen as having its base in the great law of nature. New truths must take the place of ancient lies. We know now by the testimony of science that there is no foundation for a double standard for the sexes. To preach it is to preach immorality and a lowering of manhood. The lie that has lived so long must be driven out by the truth.

"Only God will ever know the toll in blood and tears that this lie has taken from the heart of the world—the price that the health of the race has been made to pay for its submission to a historic falsehood, young lives ruined, futures cheated of promise, children called upon to suffer for the sins of the fathers, innocent women robbed of the right to happy motherhood, and the virility of a nation sapped at its foundations.

"Today, as never before, American manhood must be clean. We must have fitness! America stands in need of every ounce of strength. We must cut out the cancer if we would live."

A Dream That Came True!

CAROLINE L. LOFTUS

Prohibition went into effect in the District of Columbia November 1, 1917.

Some said it was only an idle dream,
From which we'd awake, full soon,
That the Capital City could never exist,
Without the licensed saloon.

Personal liberty came to the front,
With arguments all forlorn.
Did liberty ever follow the wake
Of the traitor—John Barleycorn?

King Alcohol's allies were out in full force
And mobilized up on the Hill,
Loudly protesting the lawmakers' right
To a vote on the Sheppard bill.

Old Major Revenue led in command,
His cohorts took up the old cry,
"Property rights to the boneyard would go,
Should the District ever go dry."

The battle waged fierce, word-bullets flew fast,
It was wrong arrayed against right,
When the Sixty-fourth Congress fired the gun,
That made our dear capital "white."

With state after state now falling in line
And rapidly blazing the way,
We'll make the map white and drive out the trade,
From the glorious U. S. A.

We'll never surrender, nor give up the fight,
While yet there is work to be done,
But honor and praise to the brave-hearted men
Who voted a "Dry Washington."

A dream, did you say? Oh, blessed the thought,
That the W. C. T. U.
Scattered the seed with unfaltering faith,
Knowing their dream would come true.

"Suffrage Basic Question" Says President Wilson

"I believe that just because we are quickened by the questions of this war we ought to be quickened to give this question of woman suffrage our immediate consideration," said President Wilson in addressing a delegation of 100 leaders of the New York state woman suffrage party who called at the White House to obtain an expression from him in support of the campaign in their state.

"The whole world now is witnessing a struggle between two ideals of government," continued the President. "It is a struggle which goes deeper and touches more of the foundations of the organized life of man than any struggle that has ever taken place before, and no settlement of the questions that lie on the surface can satisfy a situation which requires that the questions which lie underneath and at the foundation should also be settled, and settled right.

"I am free to say that I think the question of woman suffrage is one of those questions which lie at the foundation.

"I think the whole country has appreciated the way in which the women have risen to this great occasion. They not only have done what they have been asked to do, and done it with ardor and efficiency, but they have shown a power to organize for doing things on their own initiative, which is quite a different thing and a very much more difficult thing, and I think the whole country has admired the spirit and the capacity and the vision of the women of the United States.

"It is almost absurd to say that the country depends upon the women for a large part of the inspiration of its life. That is too obvious to say; but it is now depending upon the women also for suggestions of service which have been rendered in abundance and with the distinction of originality. I therefore am very glad to add my voice to those which are urging the people of the state of New York to set a great example by voting for woman suffrage."

Space Vacated by Saloons in Washington, D. C., Badly Needed

Because of overcrowded conditions in the national capital, due to the war, the buildings vacated by saloons, November 1, will be snapped up quickly, as the extra space is badly needed. Arthur W. Crawford, special Washington correspondent to the Chicago Herald, commenting on the new District of Columbia dry law, says:

"Washington climbs on the front seat of the water wagon Thursday, Nov. 1. On that date the act passed last year by Congress making the District of Columbia dry territory becomes effective.

"The saloon-keepers know that they are going out of business permanently, as there never will be a chance for the residents of the District to vote them back. Only a repeal of the law by Congress will turn the trick. With Senators and Representatives guided by sentiment in their home states there does not seem a chance of such action.

"The barrooms will not be vacant long. Because of the overcrowded condition due to the war the buildings will at once be occupied. In many instances restaurants and drug stores will be opened.

"Most of the saloon-keepers and bartenders are quitting the business for good. Positions are so numerous in war industries and other lines of employment that no one is likely to be idle long."

Prominent Patriots Will Address National W. C. T. U. Convention

The dominant note of the National W. C. T. U. Convention to be held next month in the nation's capital will be patriotism. Addresses, discourses, sermons, discussions, symposiums, music and prayers will have as their theme loyalty and devotion to America in the hour of her supreme opportunity and need. Several of the nation's most distinguished patriots will appear on the program and many others who have their official residences in Washington will be honored guests of the convention.

United States Senator Morris Sheppard and Congressman Edwin Y. Webb, authors and promoters of the Sheppard-Webb bill for National Constitutional Prohibition, will speak. Hon. William Jennings Bryan will give an address at the Sunday afternoon mass meeting. Captain Richmond P. Hobson, hero of the "Merrimac," and author of the famous Federal prohibition amendment resolution, will participate in the meetings. Mr. Herbert Hoover, Federal food administrator, and Dr. Harvey W. Wiley have been invited and are expected to speak. Hon. Jeannette Rankin, the only woman member of Congress, and Miss Julia C. Lathrop, head of the Federal Child Bureau, are to address the convention. On one evening our leading women patriots, heads of the big organizations of women in America, will give brief talks. Among them will be Dr. Anna Howard Shaw and Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, representing the National Woman Suffrage Association; Mrs. Philip North Moore, president of the National Council of Women; Mrs. George I. Guernsey, president of the Daughters of the American Revolution; Mrs. Josiah Evans Cowles, president of the Federation of Woman's Clubs; Mrs. Frederic Schoff, president of the Mothers' Congress, and Mrs. Robert E. Speer, president of the Young Woman's Christian Association.

President Wilson may not find it possible to attend the convention, but we expect he will be represented by his daughter, Miss Margaret Wilson, who will give a message in song. The annual sermon will be preached by one of Washington's most eloquent clergymen, Rev. Harry D. Mitchell, pastor of the Metropolitan M. E. Church.

Washington today is the center not only of national but of international interests of large import and to visit the capital city at this time will be an experience to be remembered for a life time. Do not delay in sending in your hotel reservations.

Want Saloons Closed as Aid to Coal Output

Prohibition as an aid in the solution of the coal shortage difficulties is being advocated by the Clearfield county, Pennsylvania committee of public safety. In a resolution passed by the committee it not only urged the closing of the saloons and wholesale liquor houses of Clearfield county during the war, but directed that the matter of the sale of liquor in adjoining counties where coal is produced be taken up with the state committee of public safety, it in turn to reach the judges of the counties under consideration. The coal operators are saying that liquor is responsible for the decrease in the output of fuel, and operators express the opinion that the elimination of intoxicating liquors would speed up production.

Secretary of Presbyterian Board of Temperance Addresses St. Louis Liquor Men

Rev. Dr. William M. Woodfin, secretary of the General Board of Temperance of the Presbyterian church, on the invitation of President John P. Pensa, was a speaker at a meeting of the St. Louis Retail Liquor Dealers' Association recently. The invitation of the liquor men was extended to Bishop William A. Quayle in response to his statement that he had never been invited to pray at a saloonkeepers' convention. Bishop Quayle, on account of an engagement in Illinois, was unable to accept and Dr. Woodfin spoke in his stead. He is reported to have given the assembled liquor men a straight talk on prohibition, in which he predicted that in ten years they would doubtless be grateful that prohibition had put them into some other line of business, "with more pleasure, more happiness and as much money."

"You confess you are making nothing now," said Dr. Woodfin, "because of the high tax that has been put upon you. Your president has stated that you are 'the goats of this war.' There is a good business open to every one of you. Ten years from now, nobody will be happier over prohibition than you men who are now engaged in the business." In conclusion, Dr. Woodfin appealed to each man's sense of personal responsibility for his fellow-man in the spirit of brotherhood and his judgment before the bar of God.

Many Saloons in the Vicinity of Camp Zachary Taylor Closed

The black and white map of Kentucky has undergone considerable change within the past few weeks, due to the fact that all saloons within a radius of five miles of Camp Zachary Taylor have been ordered closed. Forty-eight saloons, or all the saloons in Jefferson county outside of Louisville, with the exception of two, have been closed by this order. A dozen or more saloons of Louisville have had their licenses canceled because of violation of the law forbidding sale to soldiers. This action on the part of the government has had a wholesome effect on other liquor dealers because of the fact that a cancellation of the license, without rebate, means a loss of the license money, $500 a year, as the license cannot be sold or given to another. The segregated district of Louisville, which has been steadily diminishing due to government regulations, has been ordered entirely eliminated.

Evansville Brewing Company Becomes Canning Factory

One of the largest brewing companies in Evansville, Ind., the Evansville Brewing company, has become a canning factory, it is reported, in anticipation of the going into effect of the prohibition law in Indiana, April 2, 1918. A new bottling plant, completed last year at an expense of $50,000, will be used for the bottling of cider.

Oregon Soldiers in California Make "No Liquor" Record

The Third Oregon regiment, en route to Camp Greene, was given a surprise inspection on entraining after a stay at Bakersfield, Calif., to determine whether the men were obeying the "no liquor" rule of the United States Army, and living up to Oregon home standards. Blanket rolls, grips, knapsacks and other bundles were duly inspected, and a thorough search for tainted breaths was conducted. The results were gratifying beyond belief.

"It's great to be able to say, and at the same time tell the truth, that not a bottle of the forbidden stuff was found in the baggage and that not a breath bore evidence of the breather having 'h'isted' a few in between times," says a first-hand observer in an article published in the Portland Oregonian.

Olympia Beer Wagon Now Carrying Prunes

One of the last evidences of beer days in Washington has been removed from the city of Olympia. The well-known beer wagon, the property of the Olympia Brewing company, which conveyed from place to place the now outlawed beverage of former saloon days, is making itself useful in another field of service. The vehicle has been purchased by the chairman of the state public service commission and shipped to his ranch and vineyard at Grandview, where with its brewery signs still intact it will remind all who come that way that there are other places of usefulness for even the conveyances which formerly belonged to the liquor interests. The former beer wagon will devote the rest of its days to hauling to market such inoffensive loads as the lowly prune, the far-famed apple, the grape in its natural state and foodstuffs and hay.

"If Our Soldiers Can't Drink, We Won't," Declare Brooklyn Masons

"If our soldiers can't drink, we won't!" These were the words used by the potentate of Kismet Temple in Brooklyn in declaring his decision that no intoxicants should be served at its banquets or be allowed within the building. The sentiment among the Masons concerning intoxicating liquors is discussed in the current issue of the Masonic Standard as follows:

"The meeting was somewhat dramatic in character; for the ten members of the Mosque committee saw the point at once, and with enthusiastic endorsement of the idea, then and there unanimously voted that no liquor should be served at any banquet given in the Mosque by any organization. This means that lodges and other bodies holding festivities there hereafter must confine their beverages to non-alcoholic drinks.

"As this large banquet hall is used frequently, the effect of the committee's decision will extend far beyond the meetings of the Shrine.

"Similar action has been taken by the forty officers of the Aurora Grata Scottish Rite bodies; for they, too, have voted not to have anything but lacteal and caffein liquids at their affairs hereafter.

"'If our soldiers can't drink, we won't!' is a slogan that bids fair to have a potent effect. Uncle Sam frowns upon liquor. The war has put him into the position of being, if he wishes to, the absolute czar of every man, woman and child in the United States. This means that he expects the country to back him up in whatever he deems to be the need of the day.

"These are serious times, and people that think are beginning to see it. We have meatless days already. If the war goes beyond this winter, we shall have all kinds of 'sans' days, wherein we must, in the national need, give up all sorts of things that we have complacently looked upon as necessities. Congress, upon the recommendation of the President, forbade the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of distilled spirits, for the same grains can be used to make bread and soup and other things that in time of need support soldiers. Europe needs bread and soup, and we, too, may need it more than we do now. Therefore, conserve it. The less the diversion of cereals into intoxicants, the greater the diversion of these same cereals into things that sustain the soldiers on the field and the citizens at home.

"The question of permanent prohibition or abstention has nothing to do with the situation now. That will be decided by the American people in their own way and at the time they deem proper; but Kismet and Aurora Grata have taken a stand quite in harmony with the national and international need of the hour, and the effect, as has been said, will undoubtedly be far-reaching."

What Prohibition Has Meant to North Dakota

WALTER L. STOCKWELL, Grand Secretary for North Dakota of the Grand Lodge A. F. and A. M.

State-wide prohibition in North Dakota has meant—

1. The elimination of the saloon with all its pernicious influences, social, economic and political.
2. It has taken away respectability from the drink traffic.
3. It has promoted sobriety and temperance.
4. It has permitted our boys and girls to grow up in an atmosphere unpolluted by beer and whisky.
5. It has made the state one of the richest in per capita wealth in the central West.
6. It has helped to place the state in the forefront of educational progress.
7. Its influence has been wholly good.

Judges of New Mexico Condemn Liquor

"Prohibition is the state's best insurance against poverty, disease and crime," is the verdict of Merritt C. Mechem, judge of the Seventh judicial district court of New Mexico. Other district judges of the state concur in this opinion.

"I am very much in favor of state-wide prohibition and shall support the amendment looking to that end on November 6," writes Granville A. Richardson, judge of the Fifth judicial district of New Mexico.

Former United States attorney, now judge of the Fourth judicial district of New Mexico, David J. Leahy, of Las Vegas, expresses his views in a letter to dry headquarters in these words: "I shall vote for the prohibition amendment at the coming election solely because I believe that the adoption of such an amendment will better conditions in New Mexico."

Judge Edward L. Medler, of Las Cruces, judge of the Third judicial district, comprising the counties of Dona Ana, Otero, Lincoln and Torrance, sets forth his views on the amendment proposition at some length. In a letter to the dry headquarters, made public recently, Judge Medler says:

"In my opinion, if state-wide prohibition carries and is made effective, the criminal business in the courts of the state will decrease fifty per cent, and the expenses of conducting the courts of New Mexico will result in a saving to the taxpayers of hundreds of thousands of dollars per year. I make this statement and my opinion is based upon a close observation of the class and character of business before me on the criminal side of the courts during the course of the past six years. At least one-half of the criminal business originates, directly or indirectly, through the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. It is my firm conviction that the cost of conducting the courts, other than salaries of officials, will be decreased, if prohibition carries, at least sixty per cent."

Leading Virginia Jurist Strong for Prohibition

In response to a query concerning his opinion of the effect of the prohibition law, Judge Martin Williams of Giles county, Virginia, for years a member of the legislature and Democratic floor leader in the house of delegates, writes:

"I live in a rural community, but am surrounded by large manufacturing establishments, thus combining a native rural population and a foreign population, composed of people, many of whom are here because they are afraid to be at other places. As attorney for these corporations I have been brought directly in contact with this condition for about twenty years, and I say to you there is absolutely no comparison between the present conditions and the conditions prevailing before Virginia went dry.

"I do not know of a single lawsuit, either criminal or civil, that has been caused by the use of liquor in this county since the state went dry; before that they were at least of weekly and often daily occurrence.

"But the most marked observation that has presented itself to me was at our county fair a few weeks ago. Here in an isolated community, we had a county fair which was attended during the three days by at least 4,000 people of all classes, ages and conditions; yet there was not a single accident, not a single disturbance, and of course not a single arrest; in short, a condition unheard of until the state went dry."

Prohibition a Question of Humanity, Says New Mexico Journal

The Albuquerque (N. M.) Journal enumerates the following logical reasons why New Mexico must go dry:

"The nation-wide war on the practice of drinking alcoholic liquors is not a Puritanical agitation, and is not necessarily a moral issue. It is not a demand for 'sumptuary legislation,' nor the symptom of a desire to meddle with other people's affairs or practices.

"On the contrary, it is the outcropping of the instinct of race preservation, based on the wider knowledge of the effect of alcohol on progeny.

"Social welfare studies have shown that thirty-seven per cent of the inmates of poorhouses and infirmaries are there because of alcohol. Twenty-five per cent of insanity has its origin in alcoholism. Fifty per cent of crime has its inception in the drink habit or the associations of the saloon.

"Of cases of cruelty to children brought to the attention of the courts or to the police, forty-six per cent are directly traceable to alcohol. Twenty-five per cent of the poverty of the United States is due to strong drink.

"These are terrible facts, and they do not come from the professional reformers, but from compilations of court records, police reports and the findings of sociological investigators.

"Outside of moral considerations, these are questions of race preservation and advancement.

"A whole countryside turns out to fight a fire. A drug that causes poverty, leads to insanity and crime, deteriorates unborn children, and causes the greatest economic waste known in the world today, has to be fought like fire is fought.

"It is not a question of party, or of property, or of the desire of this man or that, or of friendships. It is a question of humanity."

WOMEN AND CHILDREN FIRST

MARGARET WINTRINGER

A startling proportion of children abroad have not the bright eyes, sound teeth, and beautiful hair, nor the glow of health that rightly belong to childhood.

As a boy, Lord Shaftesbury walked through the streets of London and seeing the boys and girls said, "When I am a man, I will put that right." The Factory Act was the dividend that accrued from the investment of his life for this high purpose. But while it proved a blessing to thousands, its chief virtue is that its enforcement disclosed the primal cause. Centuries of alcoholic inheritance are responsible for the type of child one sees in Europe. The Children's bill followed, which turned every child in the United Kingdom out of the public house, which was still open to the fathers and mothers.

Great Britain learns her lesson slowly, but she has stern tutors who belabor her with the rod of knowledge. One of these is the eminent biologist and child's specialist, Sir Alfred Pearce Gould. A few days before I secured an interview with this great scientist, a well known educator said to me, "An hour with Sir Alfred Pearce Gould is worth a year in the average class room," and so I found it.

Alcohol the Modern Herod

We had been talking of that modern Herod—alcohol—and its slaughter of the innocents, and among the many worth while sayings of this noted investigator, I recall these:

"It is a mistake to think that every new born babe comes straight from the hands of the Almighty; it comes into this world with a human inheritance."

"From the time it acts as a poison to protoplasm, interfering with the particular function of cell multiplication, the effect of alcohol upon the growth of a child is always to hinder it."

"You mourn the many thousands of young men slain in Flanders, but have you ever presented to your own mind the multitudes of the unborn? Fifty-five per cent of the children of alcoholic mothers are still-born."

"With the great loss of men on the battlefield and through war, the child has become immensely more important; every child is wanted to live, to grow up strong and healthy."

Sugar Necessary to Healthy Childhood

It is because of its effect upon childhood, that what is known as the "Sugar Scandal" is rocking the British nation. Shortly after I arrived in England, the government created the Royal Commission or Sugar Supply, and took over the nation's supply of sugar. The sugar commissioners immediately begged the public to be very economical not only in the consumption of sugar, but to "reduce their consumption of jams, biscuits, sweetmeats, chocolates and all goods of which sugar is an important constituent." (Though British brewers use nearly five million cwts. of sugar annually, there was an ominous silence concerning beer.)

In the words of some verses now popular in England:

"Women and children first! This is the law of the sea;
But why not make it the rule wherever a man may be?
Let it become the law where roysterers quench their thirst;
Emblazon it over the bar—The women and children first."

The deprivation of sugar may not seem a serious or unreasonable demand in war time. I confess that in my ignorance, for a brief period the agitation over the reduction seemed unpatriotic. But that most patriotic of all Englishwomen, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, protested in the London Times in the name of the children, and Dr. C. W. Saleeby issued a scientific appeal against "sacrificing the children." It became plain that the conservation of sugar for the brewers was only another assault by an enemy trade upon the British nation, where the suffering was to fall upon "women and children, first." By a singular coincidence, just when the nation's sugar supply was being sacrificed to a pro-German trade, Professor Sherrington, one of England's most noted scientists, was demonstrating at the Royal Institution, the supreme value of sugar in lessening and overcoming the bodily fatigue of munition workers, the great majority of whom are women—women who at that time were described by Sir George Newman, as "leaving home at four and five in the morning and getting back at ten or eleven at night."

Lack of Sugar Leads to Drinking Among Women War Workers

Those conversant with the situation, hold the scarcity of sugar for food purposes in a large measure responsible for the alarming increase of drinking among women war workers, which the British nation may have to pay for at a high cost to the imperial race in the future. During one hour of a Saturday evening when I was in London, of the customers entering four public houses in North Paddington, 122 were soldiers or sailors, 1,361 were male civilians and 1,946 were women. From recent investigations of my own, I am led to believe that it would enlighten students of the temperance problem in the United States to visit the saloons adjacent to some factories in our large cities before seven a. m. and after five and six p. m. to discover the number of factory girls before the bar.

As early as 1861 in one of the greatest books on education ever written, Herbert Spencer showed the importance of sugar in a child's dietary. Every molecule of sugar given a child energizes brain and muscle, warms the small body and wings the little feet. No single chemical unit of sugar ever leaves the healthy body.

But drink has not only robbed the women and children of the warring countries of Europe of one of the most vitally important foods—in all the literature of the trade which I read abroad, reduction of all expenditures for food, dress and other comforts of life was urged. In face of an expenditure of over £400,000,000 for drink since the war began, the Brewer's Gazette would have women "take pride in wearing old dresses," and even urges prohibition of the wearing of veils, hair nets and evening gloves!

The price the nations must pay for the continuation of the liquor traffic in war times is the sacrifice of all the lovely things that move the heart of women, and stir the minds of children. In every country in Europe it has meant the closing of museums, art galleries and infant schools and the shortening of the entire course of education.

Ship Space Allowed for "Necessaries" of the Trade

In countries like Great Britain the demands of drink upon tonnage force the prohibition of those imports that fall most heavily upon women and children. On a memorable morning a year ago last March, "in order to provide room on ships for necessaries," a far-reaching order in council appeared in all the London papers. It barred the importation of fruits, soap, yarn and even paper for children's school books, but the trade had secured space as "necessaries" for the sugar, foreign barley and dozens of other things which are used for the manufacture of intoxicants!

More autocratic than the spirit trade is the beer industry, which in a year of threatened famine, with London a beleaguered city, demands and obtains the privilege of transforming precious food stuffs into 10,000,000 barrels of beer, during 1917.

"The Foe I Fear Most"

"The foe that I fear most," said Arthur Mee, author of "Defeat or Victory," at a recent meeting in Queen's Hall, London, "is the man who is destroying the food I shall want for little Marjorie Mee when famine comes." And an outraged audience cheered to the echo Mr. Mee's indictment of "a trade which from the first day of the war till now, has never strained a nerve to help this land; has hindered it, hampered it, kept back ships and guns, caused the loss of thousands of our soldier's lives, and has all the time been the greatest pro-German force outside the Germany army."

Vancouver to Save $10,000 a Year as First Fruits of Prohibition

The city jail of Vancouver, British Columbia, is empty; its popularity as a place of residence has departed with the going into effect of prohibition. For the first twelve days of September there were eighty-six convictions for drunkenness, while for the corresponding period of the next month, with prohibition in effect, the convictions were only seven. This means "a net saving to the ratepayers of Vancouver of $10.000 a year," one of the newspapers explains editorially. "Prohibition's results, as exhibited in the reduction of the number of lawbreakers, are better even than we hoped," the editor adds.

1917 A BANNER YEAR IN PENNSYLVANIA

Special Correspondence

A most inspiring occasion was the forty-third annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pennsylvania, held in Greensburg, October 5-9. A warm welcome was extended by the local white ribboners and the delegates were royally entertained. The report of the corresponding secretary showed a gain in membership of 1,391, making a total state membership of 44,442, and the organization of 83 new unions, 36 new Y. P. B.'s and 64 new L. T. L.'s. The standard of excellence set this year by the state for county and local unions created much interest and resulted in better work being done throughout the state. Seventy-five local unions claimed the $5 prize offered by the state, and four counties won in points of excellence. There were 109 less liquor licenses issued in the state than last year and the new map prepared by the corresponding secretary shows that eleven states are blacker than Pennsylvania, according to the number of licenses granted for a certain population.

It was the aim of the state to have every county visited by one or more speakers. Unions for colored people exist in ten counties. The membership in Venango county is eight times as large as it was last year. Seventy-three pictures of Frances Willard have been presented to the schools. Miss M. Louise Heiner, state superintendent of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, reported 4,000 comfort bags, 2,000 Testaments and 5,000 bandages supplied by the state, and nearly every county has done Red Cross work.

One of the principal convention speakers was Dr. O. Edward Janney of Baltimore, Md. He told of the effort made by the authorities to safeguard the morals of the soldiers and sailors, and gave much praise to the officials in charge of the work.

Dr. Prugh extended greetings from the Pennsylvania Prohibition party, and urged the women to work for the Federal amendment. Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, National Franchise superintendent, also spoke, declaring the Federal suffrage amendment route the only way the women east of the Ohio river can ever get the vote. "When people do not know, they are always conservative," said Mrs. Livingston. "When they do know, they are positive, either for or against. When the Federal amendment is submitted the women must try to influence each member of the legislature." Her evening address on "The Abolition of the Liquor Traffic from State, Nation and World, and the Emancipation of Women" was greatly appreciated.

Five young ladies and one young man participated in the diamond medal contest, the medal being awarded to Miss Ruth Du Maurs. "The Life of Frances E. Willard" was presented to the other contestants.

The evangelistic services during the convention were a great spiritual blessing, and the Bible readings of Madam Layyah Barakat led our women to a fuller consecration of their lives to God.

"The temperance movement really had its first beginning in Pennsylvania," said Mrs. Ella M. George, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., in her annual address, "for did not Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, as early as 1785, give us those splendid essays on 'The Effect of Ardent Spirits on the Human Mind and Body,' which was the starting point of the temperance reform. . . . Our duty does not end with the work of our own state, but we must measure up to the responsibilities in the nation of which we are a part. We must not leave one stone unturned to have the bill for National Constitutional Prohibition submitted to the legislature of the state. We must not expect to live on past achievements. New opportunities come to us, bringing new responsibilities. Let us nobly press on, keeping step with our Captain, the Lord Jesus Christ."

A few gleanings from reports of superintendents follow: A new set of lantern slides has been ordered for the state. One county put 20,000 W. C. T. U. anticigaret blotters in the schools. There have been held in the state 179 silver, 32 gold, 5 grand gold and 4 diamond medal contests. One contestant recited her selection, "The Home vs. the Saloon," before 7,000 sailor boys. The Humane Education banner, which came to our state from the National W. C. T. U., was awarded for the sixth consecutive year to Armstrong county. There are ninety Young People's Branches in Pennsylvania. The motto of the social department of the Y. P. B. is "A good time with a purpose." The L. T. L. has a membership of 6,017 in 208 legions. "Begin now with a literature campaign and sow the state." "Mothers, if you want your boys to be true, do not merely preach Christ, but live Christ every day in word and deed." "The motherly letter to soldiers should be written by a mature woman who understands a boy from a mother's standpoint." "Do not entertain but instruct at an institute." "Buy literature leaflets to put in pay envelopes of railroad employes."

The state officers were re-elected with the exception of Mrs. Sylvia B. Norrish, who has served the state faithfully and acceptably as corresponding secretary for the past ten years. "I have often grown tired in the work, but never of the work," Mrs. Norrish said in explanation of her plea for a much needed rest. In recognition of her untiring efforts and of her work for the cause, she was presented with a beautiful pin, from the state field workers, organizers and lecturers. Miss Ella Broomell was elected to succeed Mrs. Norrish. Mrs. George was also presented with a handsome pin, a token of esteem and appreciation of one who has been our splendid leader for ten years.

ARMY WELFARE ACTIVITIES OCCUPY KANSAS WHITE RIBBONERS

Special Correspondence

The state convention of Kansas, held in Topeka, the capital city of tbe state, was the largest in the history of the organization, the number of ex-officio members and accredited delegates being 302. This was the first state convention since districts were abolished and county presidents became members of the official board. Only the presidents of those counties most remote from Topeka were absent, and those in attendance were eager to obtain all the information possible which will better equip them to direct the work.

At the very outset of the convention the president, Mrs. Lillian Mitchner, stated in unmistakable terms that the fight of the Kansas Woman's Christian Temperance Union against the cigaret and tobacco in every form would in no wise be abated, in spite of the attempt of the tobacco trust to play upon the sympathy of the people by issuing a very tender appeal for contributions of money to provide tobacco for the comfort of the soldier boys. The pastor of the entertaining church, tbe state secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and the superintendent of the Topeka schools emphatically announced their endorsement of the position of the W. C. T. U. on the tobacco question and their purpose to vigorously support in every way possible, all efforts to exterminate the evil.

The record of the year's work was excellent and, in spite of appeals to work with other organizations, a substantial gain in membership was reported.

Naturally, the department arousing great enthusiasm at this time is Work Among Soldiers and Sailors. The white ribboners of the state bave responded so nobly to the call of Rev. Mary Sibbitt, of Wichita, state superintendent, that her home will no longer afford room for the 2,000 comfort bags costing more than $2,000, and the state W. C. T. U. made an appropriation for renting a room and employing help in Wichita to care for this important department. In addition to this, $50 was sent to the Y. W. C. A. at Camp Funston to furnish a W. C. T. U. room in a rest house to be known as "The House by the Side of the Road," and $50 to the Y. W. C. A. at Junction City. The women have also undertaken to make and give 100 comforts, 400 sheets, 200 pillow cases, together with 100 pillows, for the purpose of equipping 100 cots supplied by the Y. W. C. A. at Army City, just outside Camp Funston, where mothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts may be able to secure sleeping accommodations when they go to visit the soldier boys, there being no adequate provision at this time in that direction.

The members of the convention, for themselves or their unions, in a very few minutes subscribed $90 to sustain a temperance evangelist in Africa for a second year, under the direction of Rev. Pliny Keys of Iola, Kansas, a Methodist missionary in Africa, a splendid report of last year's work having been read.

Another very interesting feature of the convention was the awarding of the state prizes by Mrs. Agnes Rogers of Winfield, state superintendent of Scientific Temperance Instruction in the public schools, for the best essays on the effects of alcohol and tobacco. The first prize, a ten-dollar gold piece, was given to Olin Buck, a sophomore in the Topeka high school; the second prize, a five-dollar gold piece, was given to George Carey, an eighth-grade student of Lawrence. One thousand four hundred and ninety-five essays were written in Cowley county alone, of which number the Winfield schools furnished 995.

Mrs. Vesta Shreves of Winfield, state superintendent of the Gift Day department, roused the convention to a high pitch of enthusiasm as she told of the splendid programs given in the Winfield schools on Frances Willard Day in accordance with the law of the state, and of the offering for W. C. T. U. work of more than $80 collected on that day by the school children.

The convention voted to subscribe for liberty bonds in the sum of $500, thus helping in this time of national crisis, and to adopt two French orphans.

A delightful reception was given by Governor and Mrs. Capper at their beautiful home, which was greatly enjoyed by about 500 white ribboners and their friends. The chief feature of the evening program was an address by the governor who is a great friend of the cause of prohibition and whom Kansas white ribboners delight to honor.

All the officers were re-elected. Mrs. Mitchner, president, and Mrs. Grover, vice-president, each received from the convention as a love token, a sterling silver W. C. T. U. pin set with pearls, and Miss Mary Dobbs, the faithful corresponding secretary, was given a beautiful wrist watch in appreciation of her splendid work for so many years.

WORLD TEMPERANCE TOUR AMONG THE BROWNIES

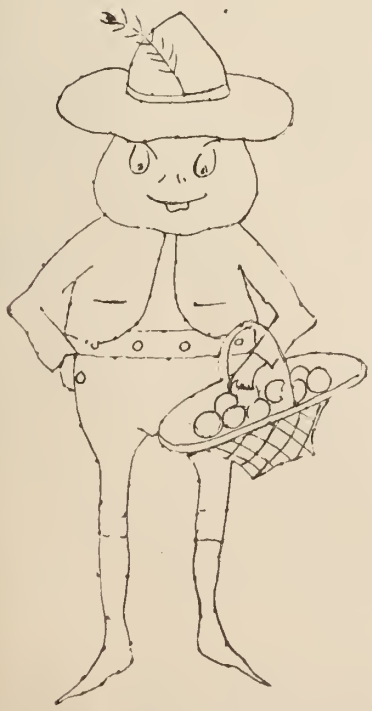
MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, World's W. C. T. U. Superintendent Sunday School Work

As quick as the turn of a hand we ascended and were headed for Italy. Having been told that Milan (or Milano, as the Italians call it) is a city of great conviviality, we decided to stop there and made our landing place on the plaza in front of the renowned old fortress of Forza (Castella Sforzesco, as it is called in Italian.) A diminutive little creature was on the watch for us, having received word by wireless from Herr Brownie. Of course, he had a basket of oranges in his hand. He stepped quickly toward us and introduced himself as Brownie Luigi Bravagna. He courteously offered each of us an orange which we were glad to take. "Why do the people in Italy drink so much wine?" we asked. "Well," he said, "it is as cheap as milk and easier to get." "And the Brownies, do they take their share?" we asked. "The Brownies do not claim a share, they want none of it. They hear the all-night howling of drunken wine drinkers in the beautiful Cathedral Square, and they see the drunkards reeling home when the day is beginning to dawn. Travelers from other lands have said there was little chance for sleep in the hotels." Then we spoke of the great World Anti-Alcohol Congress which met in Milan in 1913 and asked him if things had not been better since then.

"Oh, yes," he said, "we Brownies were present at that Congress, but nobody saw us because we were hiding in the carved ceilings and window frames, and over the grand doorways of the palace where they met, but we heard all that was said by wise temperance leaders from every part of the world. Would you believe that on August 22, 1915, two years after that congress, the authorities of Milan withdrew 1,800 licenses to sell alcoholic drinks, thus beginning a campaign against alcoholism." "Do you think Italy will ever be a prohibition land?" we inquired. "Well," he answered, "new laws have been made in Italy against alcoholism since the great Anti-Alcohol Congress in 1913, and some of the temperance people are trying to enforce the laws. There are now lessons taught the children in the schools about the dangers of alcoholic drinks." He waved "addio" to us as he saw us entering our aeroplane.



"The Children of Italy are Taught in the Schools the Dangers of Alcoholic Drinks," Said Brownie Luigi Bravagna

"King Alfonso of Spain Drinks Only Water"

We are bound for Spain, and are proposing to make our landing at the Alhambra which is the ancient citadel of Spain. It was built long before Columbus discovered America. It has suffered by time and war, and by kings who have robbed its walls of stones. Others have desecrated it and explosions have shattered its towers. A recent traveler has said: "From its Tower of Vision, the view over mountain and plain is one of the most inspiring scenes God has given to uplift man to the heavens."

You see there is a wireless between the Brownies in all parts of the world, and we had no sooner alighted than a Brownie, Enrique Y'Otero, as he called himself, came forward to meet us, saying that Luigi Bravagna had sent him word we were on our way to Spain.

"We know that Spain is one of the greatest wine-making countries in the world," we said to him, "but we have read in newspapers that there are very few drunkards in Spain. Let us hear the truth about this." "Well," he said, "Brownies never drink wines and so there never was such a thing as a drunken Brownie. I wish I could say the same for the men and women of Spain. Not many of them get staggering drunk, but some of the greatest physicians say that the alcohol in the wine weakens them and produces disease and insanity. Lawyers and judges say that seventy-three out of every 100 criminals are immoderate drinkers. What makes things worse is that an alcohol trust has been formed in Spain, 'La Sociedas Union Espanola.' It is mostly made up of men who belong to the National Sugar Company, which brings into the trust its manufactories, its molasses, and dregs. Those who manufacture wine from alcohol produce vinic alcohol. They have not joined the trust in large numbers, although they are being urged to do so.

"How about King Alfonso?" was our next question. "We are told that he does not drink wine, nor alcohol in any form." "That is true," said Brownie Y'Otero. "He drinks water, enormous quantities of it. Even at banquets where others are drinking wine he sticks to plain water." "Good for him! That is the right sort of a king!" we agreed. "Yes, and his young sons, the princes, are following their father's good example," the Brownie assured us.

It is something over twelve hundred miles from Spain to Holland, but what is that distance to birds or to people in an aeroplane. We had heard so much about the Peace Palace at the Hague (which was largely built by Mr. Andrew Carnegie with many donations of works of art by some of the greatest nations of the world, most of which are now engaged in war) that we said to each other: "World prohibition would be a great help toward establishing peace in the world. Let us drop down at the Peace Palace." The great iron entry gates given by Germany were tightly closed. The wonderful front doors given by Belgium were just ajar. The clock high up in the tower, given by Switzerland, was ticking busily. Just beneath that tower we decided to make our landing. In less than a wink, a sturdy little Brownie came forward to welcome us, introducing himself as Jonk heer van Nispen. He noticed that we were smiling at the little brown jug which he held in his hand, and he hastened to say, "A Brownie's jug never contains anything but water!" "Can the same be said of all the brown jugs in Holland?" we asked. "Oh, no," he replied, "most of them are for quite a different purpose for they usually contain gin or rum or schnapps." "You do not mean to tell us that everybody in Holland drinks that sort of thing, do you? We know they make a lot of it and send it over to the United States." Just then we heard music and saw coming toward us a procession of school children who were celebrating Temperance day, and there were also hundreds of grown-ups, the parents and teachers of the children, for temperance is taught in the public schools of Holland.

"Is there a National Temperance Society in Holland?" we asked. "Oh, yes," he replied. "Only recently you might have attended one of their meetings in Arnheim where an audience of several thousand filled the great cathedral and was addressed by the Minister of Agriculture. We Brownies were there but nobody saw us because we were hidden away among the rafters. We heard everything that was said, and rejoiced."

"How about your queen?" we asked. "We have heard she is a total abstainer."

"Queen Wilhelmina and Her Mother, Queen Emma, are Both Total Abstainers, as are the Brownies of Holland"

"GET OUT THE DRY VOTE"

An Iowa editor explains the close vote in his state in four brief words: "Asleep at the switch." The president of the Iowa W. C. T. U., in her telegraphic report of election returns, urged: "Tell Ohio and New Mexico not to fail to get out the dry vote." That, after all, is the secret of success in every prohibition campaign. The vote which may bring an overwhelming triumph for righteousness in Ohio and in New Mexico next Tuesday is to be found in those states. Nobody doubts it; least of all the liquorites. Because they realize it, they have been trying their worst to chloroform the intellects and consciences of the men who represent the dry vote by circulating stories to the effect that the drink traffic has given up and concedes defeat. The vote that may bring victory is right at hand, but the thing that needs to be done is to arouse it, set it in motion, start it on its way to the polls, and persuade it to express itself at the ballot box. A large part of it may be found in the churches, or at least in the church-going communities, and needs to be aroused through the pulpits. Sunday school superintendents and teachers and even the children of the primary and junior grades. Sunday, November 4, World's Temperance Sunday in Ohio and New Mexico, ought to be—and we doubt not will be—a day of "rousements" on the prohibition question. Every man and woman ought to go out from the services prepared to deal personally with each individual "rocking chair" patriot of his acquaintance, and not leave him until he has persuaded him to "quit his ease" and speed away to do his duty at the election booth. "Don't fail to get out the dry vote."

The National Convention Committee on Rooms, Mrs. N. M. Pollock, 13 R St., N. E., Washington, chairman, has secured rooms for five hundred in private families, for $1.25 for breakfast and lodging. Delegates will be given the preference in assigning these rooms.

WHY IS YOUR COAL BIN EMPTY?

The possibility of a coal famine looms big among the numerous H. C. L. problems with which the heads of households are grappling just now. Apparently there is a wide choice of individuals and interests upon which to place the blame for the present "sans coal" situation. The man who as winter approaches views with dismay his empty coal bin may vent his righteous indignation on Federal Fuel Administrator Garfield or the administration back of him, the owners of the various coal mining properties, the operators, or the labor agitators in these fields. It may, however, not occur to him to lay any of the blame upon the drink interests. Yet, if he studies closely into the situation, he will discover that that is precisely where men who are in the best position to know are placing it. At a meeting of more than 1,000 coal operators held under the auspices of the National Coal Association at Pittsburgh, Pa., October 23, it was suggested that at least a partial solution of the coal shortage problem would be the creation, by Presidential decree, of a five-mile dry zone around every coal mine; in short, that the elimination of alcoholic liquors would facilitate the speedy mining of the coal through increased efficiency of the workmen. This expression of opinion from the "inside men" of the coal industry is in harmony with statements published in this and other temperance papers from states in which are located large anthracite and bituminous coal fields, all going to show that the prohibition of liquor has had a tendency to speed up production.

By all means, let us urge the President and Congress to "dry zone" every coal mine and thus expedite the mining of the coal and the warming of the homes of the nation. But in the "dry zoning" process, why stop at military camps and cantonments, naval stations, universities, munition plants and coal mines; why not demonstrate to the whole world the virtue and the value of a "dry zone" nation-wide in extent?

ALAS FOR WASHINGTON'S HOTELS!

Is the city of Washington destined to become a deserted village after November 1? If the readers of a certain anti-prohibition newspaper published in the national Capital are to believe its editorial predictions, they will arrive at that doleful conclusion. According to its utterances, as a result of the prohibitory law which goes into effect November 1 the Capital will become one of the cities of which it is said that its visitors "arrive rarely and leave early." The writer, of course, gives no facts upon which to base his prophecy—it rests alone upon his assertion. He does not claim, for instance, that after the dreadful calamity of prohibition befell Colorado, the hotels of the city of Denver went into bankruptcy. Indeed, he does not quote a single hotel keeper in prohibition territory whose experience would support the editorial claim. There is, however, abundant evidence to prove that hotels that have voluntarily or in obedience to the law abandoned their bars have continued to prosper. Mr. Irvin B. Allen, manager of the Shirley hotel, Denver, after a year's trial under prohibition, says: "I have run a bar in the Shirley hotel for many years. It used to turn us in a net annual profit of around $5,000. Our business since prohibition went into effect January 1, 1916, has more than made up for the loss." If the truth could be known many hotel men welcome prohibition as an agent that relieves them of a troublesome phase of their business, and some even are voluntarily giving up the bar because of its unpleasant accompaniments. During the past year a New York man, Frank Case, for fourteen years proprietor of the Algonquin hotel, closed a bar that was paying good profits, and in explanation told a newspaper man: 'All the troubles we have ever had in this house could be traced right to that bar. If a man has got behind in his accounts it was because he was taking too many drinks standing up. If there has been a quarrel to patch up, the trouble began in the bar. If we have had sickness upstairs, a bar victim has been the patient. I am through with it.'"

ARMENIAN-SYRIAN RELIEF DAYS, NOVEMBER 10-11

Thousands of our fellow men, women and children are starving today in Armenia and Syria. As winter approaches an increasing number will die unless help from American friends is sent to them without delay. These sad facts are brought to our attention through Miss Ellen M. Stone, National W. C. T. U. evangelist and lecturer. So extreme and urgent is the need that President Wilson has prepared and signed an appeal to the American people, which, however, by his request and because of the Liberty Loan campaign could not be given to the public until the close of that special campaign. The days designated for an aggressive campaign for relief funds for these afflicted people are set at November 10-11, and the co-operation of all white ribboners and their friends is urged. Since the days when Frances E. Willard and Lillian M. N. Stevens interested themselves especially in the Armenians, they have had an especially warm place in the hearts of W. C. T. U. workers and we feel sure the plea made at this time will meet a generous response.

MOTHER OF NATIONAL TREASURER PROMOTED

Like unto a sheaf of golden grain fully ripe for the harvest was the life of Sarah Spence Cairns, beloved and honored mother of Margaret C. Munns, treasurer of the National W. C. T. U., and widow of the Rev. James Cairns. In the early dawn of Wednesday, October 24, the heavenly reaper reached forth and gathered to one of the "many mansions" this aged saint. For ninety-four years Mrs. Cairns had walked in heavenly ways and served her God richly in self-sacrifice for humanity. She was the mother of ten children, four of whom are left to honor the memory of one whose life was as sweet incense to all who came within its influence. Those in attendance upon the Seattle convention in 1915 will recall that "Mother Cairns" was presented to the convention, together with the immediate members of her family there present. When asked by her daughter, Mrs. Munns, if she desired her to accept the office of National W. C. T. U. treasurer, as that would necessitate leaving Seattle, Mrs. Cairns replied with characteristic sweetness and serenity of spirit: "You must go where the Lord calls you to do his work. I shall be here but a little time at most and must not detain you from a broader field of service. You have always my blessing and my prayers." At the close of a perfect day, with the setting sun making radiant the mountain tops, surrounded by family and friends, the earthly form of this sainted woman was laid to rest beside her husband. The loving sympathy and tender prayers of hosts of friends and comrades surround our National treasurer in this her latest bereavement.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PRESIDENT HOPEFUL AS TO RESULT OF ELECTION IN NEW MEXICO

There is only one subject more popular in New Mexico than state-wide prohibition and that is patriotism, and in the minds of most of the citizens they are synonymous. This is the conclusion arrived at by Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, who has recently returned from a month of campaign work in the state. If New Mexico goes dry next month, Miss Gordon believes it can be accounted for by the intelligent love of its residents for their beautiful commonwealth. "Well may they sing, as they look out upon her fertile valleys, wonderful canyons and beautiful hills, her thriving cities and her mineral wealth,

"'O fair New Mexico, we love, we love you so; the grandest state to know, New Mexico!'" said Miss Gordon. "I verily believe New Mexicans are going to prove their affection for their state by bringing to it the greatest gift within the power of citizenship to bestow—prohibition."

In reply to inquiries concerning her trip, the National president told of her visit to Santa Fe, where she was a guest at the executive mansion of Mrs. Lindsey, first lady of the state, who is vice-president of the state W. C. T. U.; of her attendance at the state meeting of the Federation of Woman's Clubs at the bustling city of Gallup, well named, as it is the largest distributing point between Kansas City and California, and her stop for some days during Patriotic Week at Albuquerque. Perhaps none of the many occasions afforded her for meeting and speaking to the people, gave her more pleasure than the opportunity of addressing in the Y. M. C. A. hut, at Camp Funston, near Albuquerque, a most responsive and enthusiastic audience of soldiers.

When questioned as to the definite reasons for her confidence that New Mexico citizens would vote right on election day, Miss Gordon remarked that one of the most emphatic was to be found at Camp Funston. "The people have had a practical demonstration at close range of what it means to the young men in camp to be protected by a dry zone by Federal law, and I believe they will not forget it when they come to cast their ballots. I myself heard Colonel Abbott, in charge of the regiment of New Mexico infantry at Camp Funston, denounce in the strongest possible terms any man who would sell liquor to a soldier. The colonel was formerly a judge and from his court experience knows much of the effect of alcoholic drinks. In speaking at the state W. C. T. U. convention, he declared: 'Any man who persists in violating the Federal law against selling liquor to our men in uniform should be treated as other traitors to their country are treated—shot, and shot dead.'

"But don't imagine the protection of the soldiers is the sole and only ground on which we base our hopes," continued Miss Gordon. "I would not attempt to enumerate all. One prominent man told me the decisive factor would be the women and I did not feel inclined to disagree with him. The interest of the women of all classes virtually makes the result certain. Not every campaign state has the good fortune to have as one of its leaders the wife of its governor. Mrs. Lindsey is not only the vice-president of the New Mexico W. C. T. U., but she is the chairman of the women's division of the Council of National Defense, president of the Suffrage League of the state, and prominent in the Federation of Woman's Clubs, as well as in church work. The state federation of Woman's Clubs was unanimous in its enthusiasm for state-wide prohibition. The resolution passed by this body speaks for itself:

"'Whereas, the war department is making every effort to protect our boys in the cantonments, and we, as a state, should abolish the liquor traffic; therefore be it resolved, that the Federation endorse state-wide prohibition, and that we pledge ourselves, individually and collectively, to take an active part in this campaign, to the end of a sure victory for prohibition at the coming election, November 6.'"

The president of the state federation, Miss Gordon went on to explain, urged the delegates to concentrate their energies on work for prohibition, making even knitting, canning or drying secondary until after election; that in New Mexico until November 6, patriotism should be spelled p-r-o-h-i-b-i-t-i-o-n. Equally interested, apparently, are the Spanish-American women, represented on the Dry Federation by Mrs. Secundino Romero. "A prominent editor of the state told me," said Miss Gordon, "that if the state went dry the triumph could be credited largely to the influence of Spanish-American women, who everywhere appear to be in favor of prohibition. This is especially true in villages where the saloon has dominated the business and social interests and the wives and daughters have been the sufferers from the generous patronage by their fathers and husbands of these places for the sale of liquor."

"I have never, in any state-wide campaign, seen the officials of the state so unified for prohibition," remarked Miss Gordon. "Governor Lindsey is devoting all his leisure to speaking and writing articles for the press in favor of the much-desired law. The secretary of state, Hon. Antonio Lucero, is chairman of the Dry Federation, and other officials of the state, judges of the Supreme court and United States Senators are diligently using their influence to make votes for state-wide prohibition."

In the executive committee of the Dry Federation the Anti-Saloon League, the W. C. T. U., state federation of clubs and the Spanish-American women are ably represented. State Superintendent Farley of the Anti-Saloon League is in charge of the Federation headquarters and has been untiring in his efforts from the beginning of the campaign.

During the course of the interview, Miss Gordon frequently gave expression to her pleasure and satisfaction at having had the opportunity to meet so many of the women of the state, at the W. C. T. U. convention, the state Federation of Woman's Clubs, the meetings of the women's committee of the Council of National Defense, the meetings of Patriotic week, which took the place of the usual state fair, and in various social affairs. As a guest of the governor's wife, Miss Gordon attended the federation convention and participated in the activities of Patriotic week, which was featured by daily meetings under the general supervision of Mrs. Lindsey. On the last named occasion the W. C. T. U. had a booth near the center of the exhibit, where ice water was dispensed, comfort bags displayed, and prohibition literature distributed. At Santa Fe and Albuquerque, Miss Gordon was asked to address local clubs, and was given a reception by Mrs. Lindsey at the executive mansion. She also spoke upon request before the state conference of Methodist ministers.

The National president's visit to New Mexico was a gift of the National W. C. T. U. to the state-wide campaign, "Mother National" also sending large supplies of literature. Seventy per cent of the population of the state is Spanish-American, so special attention was given to Spanish literature, Mrs. Katherine B. Patterson, a former National superintendent, giving most generously of her time and money for that purpose. For years this tireless white ribboner has, at her own expense, been circulating throughout the state copies in Spanish of Captain Hobson's "Great Destroyer."

"Any survey of the situation would be incomplete without mentioning the thorough organization of the state, which will enable the campaign leaders to know before election how practically every voter stands, and also the magnificent work the general press of the state is doing," said Miss Gordon in conclusion. "All the daily papers are on the dry side, and the prominent ones are devoting much space to the issue and through well-written, logical editorials are appealing to the people to support the amendment for economic, social, moral and patriotic reasons. No one who knows the spirit of the people of the 'Sunshine' state of the Southwest can feel otherwise than hopeful that their response will be a majority on the right side on November 6."

AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What event of national importance occurred on November 1?
2. How have the efforts of the liquor men to prevent the going into effect of the District of Columbia prohibition bill been defeated?
3. In what way has President Wilson given impetus to the woman suffrage movement?
4. Why may the children of Great Britain justly feel that the liquor trade is their enemy?
5. Give six reasons, as enumerated by a prominent citizen of North Dakota, why he considers prohibition the state's most valuable law.
6. From the viewpoint of a lawyer and judge, how has Virginia's dry law changed conditions in the state?
7. How would you answer the prediction of the anti-prohibitionists that the dry law will ruin the hotel business of the District of Columbia?
8. What is the attitude of prominent New Mexico jurists toward the state-wide prohibition amendment to be voted upon November 6?
9. How are the liquor interests preventing the prompt solution of the coal shortage problem?
10. The heads of what European nations are total abstainers?

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION TRANSPORTATION NOTES

Already many inquiries in reference to special trains for our great National Convention at Washington, D. C., December 2-7, are being received. Members of the Official Board and Executive Committee will need to be in Washington by noon, Friday, November 30. Delegates may prefer not to arrive in Washington until some time Saturday, December 1. As the government has prohibited the running of special excursion trains during the war we are designating certain trains on which reservations may be made and to which additional cars may be attached. The Pennsylvania Railroad has been selected as the official road from Chicago and from New York.

We recommend that members of the Official Board and Executive Committee take the Manhattan Limited, leaving Chicago at 10:30 a. m., Thursday, November 29. This train is due to arrive in Washington at 8:26 Friday morning. We recommend that delegates and visitors who do not care to arrive so early take the same train on Friday morning, November 30.

Applications for sleeping car reservations should be made to C. L. Kimball, 175 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Illinois, accompanied by money order or draft. The rates are: Lower berth, Chicago to Washington, $4.50; upper berth, $3.60; drawing room, $16. Be sure to indicate plainly the date on which you wish your reservation.

Round trip tickets may be purchased from Chicago to Washington and from all points in the Central Traffic and Trunk Lines Association. These tickets must be stamped at Washington.

From New York members of the Executive Committee will take the train leaving the Pennsylvania Station at eight a. m., November 30, and delegates and visitors the eleven a. m. train from the same station on Saturday, December 1. Parlor car reservations may be made on application to Mrs. L. M. De Silva, New York state W. C. T. U. headquarters, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City. That sufficient coach accommodations may be provided for all who desire to take these trains, notification of such intention with the date of the train should be sent in advance.

There is every indication that the convention in Washington will be very large. Early planning will add to the comfort of all who go.

ELLA A. BOOLE,
Chairman Transportation.

Mrs. Boole Chief Speaker at Mississippi Convention

Special Correspondence

At the thirty-fourth annual convention of the Mississippi W. C. T. U., entertained at Columbus, October 15-17, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, vice-president-at-large of the National W. C. T. U., was the principal speaker. She enumerated various forms of patriotic service and demonstrated one of them by her constant knitting. While she advocated helping the Allies by way of meatless days, wheatless days and sugarless days, she suggested that we hint to the men that they observe drinkless days and smokeless days.

A convention feature which was greatly enjoyed was the gold medal contest held at the Industrial Institute and College (where more than 750 girls are enrolled) and participated in by six boys from the Agricultural and Mechanical College.

There was a vein of sadness running through convention days, due to the absence of the president, Mrs. S. E. Stanley, who was not able to be present, and the news of the promotion of our beloved Mrs. Mary B. Curlee, who so long served as president of the Mississippi W. C. T. U.

Literature and flower mission work have been especially emphasized by Mississippi unions during the year. While new members were gained, death also claimed many, so the state goal was not reached. Newton carried off the prize banner for numerical gain, Canton for the greatest per cent gain, and West Point for the largest amount of department work accomplished. Newton was awarded a five-dollar prize for securing the largest number of subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL, and Brooksville the five-dollar gold piece offered for the best L. T. L. work.

Bible in the Public Schools

JEAN B. WYLIE, National Superintendent

I hope you are all busy, dear comrades, completing the year's work of our department. I am not forgetful that this "cruel war" has its distracting influence, and that many new demands on our time and strength have arisen. But we must not forsake our first love. The world situation is such that possibly the work of our Woman's Christian Temperance Union has a stronger claim on us just now than ever before. Peculiar times bring special duties, and I believe the Master is calling loudly and clearly to us to be more active in the work than we have heretofore been. We must keep abreast of the times and must do our part by inculcating in our public schools principles of loyalty to the nation founded on the word of God.

As our National W. C. T. U. Convention meets this year the first week of December, the time for receiving reports is extended. Those of you who have not been supplied with blanks will please send for them immediately, that I may receive your reports at as early a date as possible. Though you may not have heard from all your county and local superintendents, please send your reports to me that I may know just where you stand in your efforts. Please forward the blanks in time to have them reach me not later than Monday, Nov. 26.

Among Our Workers

The forty-fifth annual convention of the Clinton county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. met at Ellenburgh Depot with nearly all the county officers and county superintendents in their places. The treasurer's report showed total expenditures for the year of $440.34 and a total membership of 461. Mrs. Linnie Carl, a National field secretary for the Young People's Branch, was the convention speaker. Her address at the evening meeting, "A Call to the Colors," enumerated the duties of the Christian patriot in these trying days of warfare.

A delegation of 200 women, headed by Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace, National W. C. T. U. organizer, appeared before the city commissioners of Kansas City, Kansas, recently, with a request that the motion picture houses and pool halls be closed on Sunday. A petition bearing the names of several thousand men and women was presented. The need of a welfare officer was also urged by the women. Mrs. Wallace's five weeks' tour through southeastern Kansas seems to have been well appreciated. The McCune local paper, in commenting on her work, said: "Mrs. Wallace is not afraid to stand up and tell what she knows. She gave four lectures all of which were excellent. She is a great teacher." In dealing with the waste in the homes of America, in an address before an assembly of farmers and their wives, she made a great hit by aptly applying the slogan, "Don't stuff your husband; husband the stuff." She cited figures showing the great need of food conservation and declared that "no more patriotic or loyal army is gathered on the field of battle than can be found right in the kitchens of the land."

National W. C. T. U. membership day was observed by the Ennis (Tex.) W. C. T. U., Mrs. Fred Lawson president, with a house-to-house canvass for new members. The workers rode in an automobile decorated in white with the words, "W. C. T. U. Membership Campaign" on the back and a large white bow in front. Literature and pledge cards were left at each home. The work of the first day resulted in a gain of 52 members, and as the whole town had not been reached, the next day was given to the same effort, the two days' campaign resulting in 81 new members. As a rally contest was in progress at that time it was decided to extend the membership campaign until the close of the contest, and in one month 150 new members were gained, among them the best and most prominent women of the town. The Ennis union which has increased its enrollment from 60 to 210, is now the banner union of the state.

In the thirty-one years' history of the Salem county (N. J.) W. C. T. U. no other speaker has been called so many times into the county as has Mrs. Ella A. Boole, president of the New York state W. C. T. U. and vice-president-at-large of the National W. C. T. U., who delivered the evening address to a most attentive audience at the convention at Daretown. As she sat on the platform her knitting needles glistened in and out without her keeping her eyes on the work, just as our grandmothers used to do, in the finishing of a sock. Sixty-two voting delegates were present and of the twenty-three departments of work reported, those of Flower Mission and Literature were never so fine. While THE UNION SIGNAL subscription list has not reached the one-in-four mark it shows steady improvement. With a county membership of 618 THE UNION SIGNAL list now numbers more than 100. Between $90 and $100 has been contributed by the county to the Ambulance Fund.

The Ithaca (N. Y.) union, the largest local union in the world, is at present in a campaign to raise $10,000 to equip and permanently maintain its new headquarters building. The committee in charge of securing this money, Mrs. Mary B. Wood, chairman, has issued an explanatory statement of the purposes of the building. The fact is emphasized that, while the building is to be conducted under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., it is not to be confined solely to that body, but will be available for all women of the city. It is proposed to have rooms to accommodate about fifteen women and girls. Gymnasium and recreation rooms are being added, and music and entertainment are to be supplied. Within a few days of the inauguration of this effort $2,500 had been raised and Ithacans are showing considerable interest in the project, as there is need of a place where women and girls travelling alone may find suitable accommodations.

The thirty-sixth annual convention of the Allegan county (Mich.) W. C. T. U. was held at Chicora, October 3-4. Reports of superintendents and local presidents showed a large amount of work done during the year and encouraging gains in membership. In the afternoon of the first day, at the close of school, Rev. Etta Sadler Shaw, National W. C. T. U. evangelist, spoke to the children. In the evening she addressed a large audience, and the fact that she is the mother of three boys in uniform, added earnestness to her plea for true patriotism and helped to hold the interest of her hearers. Miss Margaret Bilz, National W. C. T. U. organizer, and Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, former National W. C. T. U. superintendent, were present and added inspiration and enthusiasm to the convention proceedings.

Essex county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. convention, held in Keene Center, September 28, was a very enthusiastic and well attended gathering. Reports showed much activity. Mrs. Nellie Moses was the winner in the matrons' gold medal contest. Seventeen subscriptions for the state and National papers were taken. Mrs. Emma D. Wood was re-elected county president.

Miss A. Elizabeth Brown, for many years identified with the W. C. T. U. of Jerusalem, Palestine, is now in this country. She writes that because of the war, conditions in that historic city are most awful. Many are dying of disease and starvation and prayers and means are needed for those who still survive. For over a year the W. C. T. U., using the sum of $200 in its treasury, gave out 200 loaves of bread per week. Miss Brown is endeavoring to raise money for the destitute sufferers in Jerusalem and can be addressed in care of Mrs. S. P. Harbison, 1101 Davis Ave., N. S. Pittsburgh, Pa.

Seventeen members of the Palmyra (Wis.) L. T. L. attended the state W. C. T. U. convention at Milwaukee. Under the care of two white ribboners they visited the museum and library, and through the kindness of a local auto dealer the children were taken to the park and for a drive along the lake shore. Following the ride, the legioners gave a fifteen minute program at the state convention and were presented with a star, the second the Palmyra L. T. L. has won.

HIS PROMISE

M. L. GUTHAPFEL

The chief character in "His Promise" is Marcus Polito, who will be remembered by the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL as the little new American who figured in the story, "His Flag And The Country For Which It Stands," as attacking an Irish washerwoman because she was using as a scrub rag his loved American flag.

"But, Magistrate Cannon, what is a referendum?"

"A 'referendum,' Marcus, is the big fellow giving the little fellow a chance to use his own property, the vote."

"Yes, sir, but I don't understand. If the little fellows haven't a right to use the vote without asking the big fellows, what good is the vote?"

"Use enough, Marcus—when the little fellows awaken and remember the power contained in the number of votes they own and can give."

Marcus pondered this. It was the fourth day after "Daddy" had been put to rest in a calm, peaceful place, there to await the call to "arise and rejoice for the King of Glory has come." Magistrate Cannon had paid for everything and held Marcus' other hand when Miss West led him to the grave. It was the magistrate who carried him in the auto to his own home, and had kept him with him all day at the court these last three days, helping thus to quiet his natural grief for the "one and only daddy he ever had."

Today at dinner the magistrate's son had talked of the referendum coming up in the legislature at Albany next month. Marcus had timidly asked what it was, and Jack Cannon laughingly told "Dad's patriot," as he called Marcus, that the referendum was a "poor lame duck," with only a "fighting chance to get through by a majority of one if at all."

Marcus understood about "majorities" and a little about "fighting chances," though he didn't fight any more. But "lame ducks getting through," and what they got through—that was the puzzle. When he expressed his bewilderment, Jack further enlightened him.

"You see, little chap, the referendum is a lame duck because the legislators in this state are half of them elected by the money of the liquor people, and"—

"But I thought folks were elected by votes," said Marcus, "and why don't good people elect the legislators themselves? Ain't there 'nough of them, too, that's got some money?"

"Oh, yes, kiddie, but the laws of America forbid anyone to buy or sell his vote and good people keep the law, while the liquor interests do not—that's the difference."

"But," persisted Marcus, "if the good people all tried, couldn't they get enough people without money to vote for legislators who hated booze?"

"Oh, yes, if they all tried, but, laddie, if you live long enough in America you'll learn that one of the best helpers King Rum has is the good citizen who is too busy to go to the primaries to vote for a decent man. Most of them will go to vote for a president or governor or on the wet and dry question, but the trouble is, the small offices are filled up with men put in by the forces who care for their own selfish interests and who know the full value of every individual vote, a fact 'good' people have not yet learned."

"But, Mr. Jack, I don't see how that helps King Rum."

Jack Cannon's laugh rang out, not merrily, but sarcastically—he had just been defeated at the primaries for the office of councilman, and his new legal life looked dark to him.

"Well, sonnie, you're just like most of the good people, then, excepting that you can't yet vote. Listen once again. If the good people don't go to the polls and put into the small positions men who are likewise 'good,' they can't get the good men into the bigger places, because the small position men are later the men who are put up for the big positions,—they all start small. So King Rum scores one right there, and I tell you again, boy, the devil is the main watcher at the polls in the primary elections of this country."

And now they were going back to the settlement after a "good long ride" through the outskirts of the city. Marcus had asked his kind friend concerning the "referendum" and received the reply that opens our chapter.

"Please, Magistrate Cannon, tell me how best to fight 'booze,' when I'm too little to vote."

"Why, my boy, your best chance is to talk against it, pray against it, and get all the votes you can against it. You are now one of the 'small' people, but your time is coming, and, please God, you will be able some day to keep your promise to God and your father to 'fight booze and tell people how to get elected for heaven.' But here we are. Sorry to give you up, my lad, but with no wife and mother at our house I guess this is the best place for my little 'patriot.'"

A warm hug and a kiss and Marcus' ideal man was whisked away. The boy slowly entered the building, wishing very much that Miss West would be there to greet him. He felt pretty lonesome after all. Daddy hadn't been much of a father, but then, he was his, and when a fellow had no one all his own he felt kind of funny. A big tear stole down his cheek—he shook himself and marched in with a swagger when the front door was opened by Mrs. Brown. She greeted him hastily, and explained in answer to his questions that Miss West was in the committee room, where there was a meeting of the ladies' auxiliary.

"You're just in time, Marcus," she added. "Sit here outside the door, for in fifteen minutes we will serve tea, and I'll need a few of you to help. Jed Hogan will help and—yes, I think I'll let Junior Schillings help, too. Now don't make a noise until I need you."

Marcus joined Jed Hogan in a window seat just outside the committee room. Soon Junior Schillings and Teddy Black softly crept to them and a low-toned conversation went busily on.

"How'd you like it at Cannon's, Flag?"—this was the nickname of our hero ever since his entrance into settlement life.

"Oh, it was all so very good—today we went one big ride, and every day I go to the court with the magistrate, and every day he talks with me—also his big boy, Mr. Jack,—and I learned many things called 'referendums,' 'lame ducks,' 'small fellows' and 'big fellows,' and a new kind of Americans called 'legislators.'" When Marcus was in earnest his speech became quite quaint, and partook still of the style of old Greece.

"Ho! ho! ho!" laughed Jed, "legislators are not new Americans. They have always been here in this country."

"That may be," said Marcus, placidly, "but I have but today made their acquaintance."

"Tee, hee!" This from Teddy Black. "Flag talks like he was talking out of a book."

Junior Schillings said nothing. His face was grave, and his thoughts seemed far away.

The boys chattered on not noticing. Marcus told of his father and his promise to him, and when he had finished, each boy solemnly promised to fight booze with him.

"Why," said Teddy, "Mrs. Brown told some of us the other day that if it wasn't for booze, there would be none of us here, nor no settlement,—said we had all come here along of booze. She's right, too! My mother's in the Correction again for the tenth time, and my father must have died when he was drunk. Gee, I'll let the stuff alone, I'll tell you, when I'm a man!"

"So'll I," echoed Jed, "all my family's dead, died of the T. B., but doctor says if they all had let the booze alone they might a got over it. No booze for mine."

"And none for me," said Junior suddenly,—"my mother,—well, you know, fellers, dad didn't mean to hurt her. He was just crazy drunk. His boss left and the whole shop gave him a farewell and dad had a chance at too much of it, and then—and then—he came home and did it, because mother wouldn't give him the little bit of money she had. Why, dad was good to me and her when he was sober, and I just was awful fond of dad. I saw him yesterday. He told me they were going to send him away where he'd like it better than Sing Sing, but I couldn't come to see him there for a long time,—years maybe, but then I could. And he cried, dad did,—and it's awful tough, it is. I couldn't sleep, somehow, all night, cause dad said he would start at daylight, and I was to pray for him, and I did, but I want dad more than ever today. 'Twas all the booze, too."

The boys' eyes were moist, as Marcus wound up the indictment against booze. "All but the little Greta are here because of booze. She alone is here because of the typhoid fever that her people took. Let's fight it till we get to the heaven and our fathers and mothers again."

Just then the door of the committee room was opened for ventilation and the boys kept still, wishing heartily that the tea-trays would appear and be done with it. "If there is one mean thing in the place," said Jed, "it's takin' tea to the ladies! They say, 'Dear little fellow, too bad,' 'I hope you are a good boy,' 'What's your name?', 'How old are you?', 'How long have you been here?'—oh, I hate it!"

He voiced the sentiment of all four as they waited and fidgeted while the meeting was going on in the other room. Shortly, however, it drew to a close, and with a sigh of relief the boys watched for Mrs. Brown and the tea things. They came and tea was served. Ladies asked questions of the long-suffering boys, and were answered between set teeth. By and by all were served, and the boys were gathering up the last of the things. Three committee ladies alone remained, waiting for an address which Miss West was writing down for one of them. Junior Schillings was just behind them and Marcus just before,—both boys working busily.

"Oh, by the way," said one thoughtless member of the group, "I've just had nerves since noon. My husband and son discussed that Schillings' murder and told all about the electrocution of the man at daybreak this morning. I really felt sorry for him, he was so willing to pay the penalty of his crime, and asked only that young men might be warned of his fate, which he attributed entirely to strong drink. By the way, my son says that his only child was put into some institution, and thought it might be here, but I hadn't heard of it. I shall ask Miss West. Poor lad! I hope he is here, for he will get good care, and"—

"Hush, please hush," said her neighbor, "the children are clearing up. I cannot bear that they should hear of such things. What did you say the name was?"

"Schillings, I believe. His boy's name was Junior. He died very easily, they said."

"Marcus—Miss West—make her stop it—make her say it's a lie. She says—she says—God—she says—my father—my father—oh, it's not true. He went away where he'd be happier, he wasn't killed—it's a lie—say it's a lie—oh—"

WORLD TEMPERANCE TOUR AMONG THE BROWNIES

"Oh, yes," he replied, "and when wines are served at royal dinners, neither Queen Wilhelmina nor her mother, Queen Emma, permit it to be poured into their glasses." "But, Herr Brownie, you must not allow yourself to think that all is going well in Holland because your queen is strong for temperance," we told our Brownie friend. "The fact is that there are 562 breweries in Holland making beer at the rate of 1,508,400 barrels a year, and added to this, 2,000,000 gallons of wine and 9,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits are consumed in Holland every year. Prohibition has not yet dawned upon Holland, for up to this time only 2,287 votes have been cast for prohibition, while there are 600,000 men and women who have signed for local option, which, of course, means nothing more than limitations on the sale of liquor." "You are talking about things too big for Brownies," Brownie van Nispen answered, knocking his wooden shoes on the stones, and with a swing of his jug he bade us goodby.

"Our next stop will be Russia," said the captain of our expedition, "but on the way over we may get a wireless from Norway and another from Sweden. Yes, here is a flash from Christiania, Norway. It reads, 'At the beginning of the war King Haakon issued a proclamation closing all breweries and distilleries by prohibiting the conversion of any grain or potatoes into spirits or beer during the war.' The stocks of grain owned by the breweries were bought for food."

Another flash, this time from Stockholm, Sweden. "From the King," flashed the wireless. "The temperance movement is one of the greatest of our time, a movement by which the people will gain self-reliance and self-control."

One of our aeroplane party had been in Stockholm during the great labor strike in 1909. He explained to us that at the beginning of the strike the king ordered all the liquor shops closed and they were kept closed for one month. The results were so unexpectedly beneficial to the working men and their families that a strong desire for permanent prohibition of liquor selling was manifested. This has not yet been done, though it is a good omen that in the second chamber (the House of Commons) 128 members out of the entire membership, 230, belong to a temperance society.

Well, here we are in Russia at last, the greatest temperance nation in the world, although it has been so for only about three years. Before that time Russia was one of the most drunken of nations. We will drop down in Petrograd, which for many centuries before the war had borne the name of St. Petersburg. A Brownie friend, all dressed in fur, is waiting to greet us and he tells us that his name is Alexis Skobiloff. He is ready to tell us all we would like to know about how Russia became a temperance nation. "How much vodka is made in Russia," we inquired. "No vodka has been made in Russia for three years," he replied. "How is that?" "You have heard, have you not, about the czar signing the proclamation on September 16, 1914, prohibiting the sale of vodka and all spirits until the end of the war? And about a month later, on October 11, 1914, the czar declared 'I have decided to prohibit forever in Russia the government sale of vodka.'" "Yes, we have heard about prohibition in Russia," we assured Brownie Alexis, "but it seemed too good to be true."

"You should see what a difference it has made in every part of Russia," he continued. "Everybody is happy now that vodka is gone, and beer and wine as well. The peasants have become prosperous. About 20,000 banks have been established for taking care of the money saved by the peasants since they have no chance to spend it for drink. 'The bear who walks like a man,' now really walks like a man and not like a sot. There are no more beggars and drunkards on the streets. In the night asylums there are but few patients and there are so few in the hospitals for sick drunkards that the buildings are now being used to care for sick and wounded soldiers."

"Well, Brownie, we must say that the United States might learn something from Russia about hurrying up prohibition. Why in 1876, forty-one years ago, there was a movement in the United States Congress to secure national prohibition, and it has not yet been accomplished, although Congress keeps working at it. We may get it a few years hence, and that will round out fifty years." Brownie's eyes opened wide. "You don't mean to say that it may take the United States fifty years to do what Russia did in one month?" he inquired in astonishment. "Well, that's about it, but we do not like to acknowledge it."

It must be told that this comparison hastened somewhat our departure from Russia.

All our party were of the opinion that we would better hurry back to the United States to do our bit in helping our nation to become as temperate as Russia.

My, what the Red Indian Brownie could tell us about the United States, how it's going dry even in Washington, the Capital city. May all cities in this land follow its good example!

Nebraska W. C. T. U. Holds First Convention in Dry State

Special Correspondence

The adjournment of the forty-third annual convention of the Nebraska Woman's Christian Temperance Union witnessed the closing of the greatest convention ever held in this state. Over three hundred delegates were present, enthusiasm and inspiration ran high, and a great amount of work was accomplished in a shorter time than usual. The time-saving experiment of having a very short executive meeting, as many of the same things have to be gone over in open convention, was tried with apparent success. The "mile of dimes" plan was adopted as one of the means of replenishing the treasury.

Much effort has been given to work for the soldiers and sailors and for the Red Cross, while in the main the other essentials our union stands for have not been lost sight of. An expected decrease in membership, due to the feeling that there is less for us to do after securing prohibition, was the one thing that marred the enthusiastic days of the convention.

Reports from every section of the state, almost without exception, told of able law enforcement efforts. The governor and his assistants have proven that a prohibition law can be made to prohibit. The mayor of our largest city, who formerly was staunch for "personal liberty," says times are far better under prohibition.

Hon. William J. Bryan brought greetings to the convention. Mrs. Bryan was unable to be present, being in New York City at this time. All officers were re-elected.

Prohibition Boosts Collections 20 Per Cent

That the percentage of collections has been at least 20 per cent greater than before the Nebraska prohibition law went into effect May 1, is the verdict of Omaha merchants who do business on the installment plan. "Men and women, who buy merchandise on the installment plan, often pay $2 and $3 a week when their contracts require only a weekly payment of $1. Our collections have increased more than 20 per cent," said Elmer Beddeo, vice-president and general manager of Beddeo credit clothiers.

Something You Need?

Every W. C. T. U. office, both state and local, and every woman in business, needs a Dalton Adding Machine because it soon pays for itself and saves big money every month in the year after that!

Mrs. Munns, the National W. C. T. U. Treasurer at Evanston, was heard to remark recently that her office uses the Dalton for many different things every day—that she couldn't at all do without it, as it saves time, annoyance and money.

The Dalton not only adds, but subtracts, multiplies, divides, calculates and lists. In fact, it is human—almost. You can learn how to operate it in a very few minutes, and it is absolutely accurate. It has only 10 keys (not almost 100 as in other machines) and is speedy and simple to operate. When you once own one, it becomes indispensable—just like the telephone.

Send us word and we'll see that you see the Dalton perform in your own office, no matter where you may live, without cost and without obligation. You will never regret it if you write us at once!

THE EMPIRE STATE OUT FOR VICTORY

LORA S. LA MANCE, National Organizer

This is a record of only eight days in southern and western New York, but they were eight days crowded to the brim.

New York is very much alive nowadays. First came the work in Tunesassa and Salamanca, in the Seneca Indian reservation. The first named is an Indian settlement. The other is an American town built on ground leased from the tribe. There are several Indian W. C. T. U.'s. The one we visited is the home union of Mrs. Lydia Pierce, the state superintendent of Work among Indians. It was a real pleasure to see with what parliamentary exactness these dignified Indian matrons conducted their meetings and how wide-awake they were along all W. C. T. U. lines.

Some of these people are lineal descendants of Chief Cornplanter, by whose treaty with the white people the Senecas were given a strip of land twenty miles wide along the Alleghany river to be theirs forever. It was on this very reservation that the newly converted chiefs, more than two hundred years ago, established temperance societies among their followers. They realized, even then, that the white man's firewater meant doom to the Indian. This was the first temperance society anywhere or any place in modern times. Seven generations old, it has never lapsed. The Indians allow no saloons in their settlements. But Salamanca, although on land leased from the Indians, is full of saloons. Cornplanter had a clause in his treaty stipulating that no liquor was to be furnished to his people. Sharp lawyers have managed to pick flaws in the instrument, and thus evade the prohibition provision of this treaty, older than the United States itself. Salamanca will probably vote out the saloons in April, and thus pass the joke up to the lawyers!

The Steuben county convention, held at Corning, was the next stop. Steuben county has more white ribboners than all of Nevada, New Mexico, Alaska and Arizona combined. The meetings were ablaze with enthusiasm. Hornell and Corning, the last wet places in the county, intend to go dry next April. The white ribboners are working like beavers. A tidy sum has been raised for the campaign, and Mrs. Mary Harris Armor and others are to assist.

At Ithaca, which boasts one of the largest unions in the United States, and which is the home of Cornell University, we had wonderful meetings. The temperance men and women of this college town have burned their bridges behind them. No more compromise. No more saloons or places of vice. If work will do it (and it will) Ithaca will go dry as a bone in April. War on liquor is in the very air.

Next on the speaker's itinerary was Rochester, the flower city, where Monroe county convention was to be held. The women who belong to the W. C. T. U.—14,000 and more—are an army of experts. New York has trained its white ribboners along efficiency lines, and finer presiding officers are nowhere to be found.

Waverly and Tioga county conventions were next. Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, long the National superintendent of the department of Purity and White Ribbon Recruits, was the guest of honor, and one of the chief speakers. Her eighty-one years have not dimmed her ardor. Mrs. Sylvia B. Norrish, state corresponding secretary of Pennsylvania, and her sister, a former missionary to Porto Rico, were other special guests.

New York is anxious to gain from the legislature the right to vote on state-wide prohibition. At first it merely wanted the privilege of expressing itself, deeming the battle too hard for victory. But New York has changed its mind on that. It believes that prohibition can be won if a stiff battle is put up. If the chance to vote on prohibition is ever secured I prophesy that New York will put up the most all-comprehensive, thorough, systematic battle ever waged in America. It will pour out money like water on literature, speakers, pageants, posters, moving pictures and mass meetings. New York is in dead earnest. The Empire State is out for victory.

NATIONAL WORKERS ATTEND COOK COUNTY (ILL.) CONVENTION

On account of the greatly increased volume of work done by the unions of Cook county, Illinois, the past year it was decided to hold an ante-convention county executive meeting one week previous to the annual convention. At this meeting all reports of superintendents and county officers were given and the names of superintendents for the coming year considered. The first day of the county convention was devoted largely to local union reports, which were exceedingly encouraging, large increase in membership being reported by many unions. Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, National W. C. T. U. treasurer, and Mrs. Margaret B. Platt and Miss Elizabeth Gordon, National lecturers, were introduced to the convention and spoke briefly. Miss Helen L. Hood, president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., told of the work that is being done for the soldiers. Seven hundred comfort bags have been made and $500 raised to purchase contents. Mrs. Dr. Rachelle Yarros spoke on social hygiene, telling of the alarming increase in social diseases. Miss Mary McDowell, chairman of the department of work among foreign-born women in the Council of National Defense, said the second line of defense in this war consisted in keeping up the social standard of the laboring classes at home, especially of the foreign-born women who will to a large extent fill the places of the men who have been called to the colors. The convention endorsed the campaign that has been started to raise a fund to send candy to our soldiers in France. To the tune, "America," the convention sang the following verse, heard at every religious service in Canada:

"God bless our splendid men,
Bring them safe home again,
God bless our men.
Keep them victorious,
Patient and chivalrous,
They are so dear to us,
God bless our men."

How to Reduce Your Weight

You CAN do it in a dignified, simple way in the privacy of your room and surprise your family and friends.

I KNOW you can, because I've reduced 85,000 women from 20 to 85 lbs., and what I have done for so many I can do for you.

Don't reduce by drugs or diet alone. You'll look old if you do. You should have work adapted to your condition.

No woman need carry one pound of excess fat. It is so simple to weigh what you should, and you enjoy the process. My cheerful letters and your scales keep you enthused.

I build your vitality, strengthen your heart and teach you how to stand, walk and breathe correctly, as I reduce you.

Don't endure fat when it is so easy to reduce.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on trial 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 60, Washington, D.C.

AMMUNITION

VIDA IRENE THOMPSON, Circulation Manager

If the allies are to be successful in this great warfare, one of the prime necessities is plenty of ammunition for the monster guns. Running at full speed both day and night the munition factories can hardly supply this need. Steadily the workmen keep at their tasks, serving their countries in so doing.

These are war times, and we have more than one enemy to fight. You are a soldier in the allied armies against King Alcohol. Where is your ammunition? Are you well supplied? Do you realize that you need a sufficient amount to repel every insidious attack of the foe? You must summon every bit of help to your command now, and where will you find any better ammunition for your guns, large or small, than THE UNION SIGNAL? His Promise

At the first shriek, Miss West sprang forward to the frightened boy, while Marcus dashed to the side of the lady whose untimely remarks had caused the calamity.

"Please, lady," he said, "see—Junior is frightened. Tell him it is not true—quick. It will make him sick to look like that. Quick, lady,—say it is not true."

"Oh, dear me," said the horror-stricken member. "I can't! Oh, how horrible! It must be his boy. Oh, I'm so sorry I spoke. Please, little boy, don't feel so badly. We all love you and we will be good to you—and your father is over all his troubles."

But the boy heard her not. Held fast in Miss West's loving arms he had fainted from fright. "Didn't he know?" asked one of the group. "No," answered Miss West,—"he loved his father too well to be told of it."

All was commotion. The entire household, assisted by the sorrowing committee members, labored hard, but Junior passed from faint to convulsion, and convulsion after convulsion followed. Doctors came and went, loving hands ministered, but fever had come upon the boy and at the doctor's verdict of "Brain fever, with probable loss of reason if he lives," Miss West collapsed. The big, strong mother heart, mother to so many victims of King Alcohol, could stand no more, and soon two nurses watched in adjoining rooms, while thirty-five frightened, nervous, half-sick little ones crept to their beds, there to lie wide-eyed, sobbing softly, the sobs that only worse than orphaned little ones can know.

And Mrs. Brown, passing from bed to bed, soothing, comforting, and quieting, found one bed empty. She knew at once it belonged to Marcus. Softly she searched, and hearing a murmur in the pantry, she crept quietly to the door, and there behind the sugar-barrel, in a nook all his own was a small figure in grey pajamas, hands clasped, but face uplifted.

"Oh, dear God," he was saying, "listen, oh, please listen. Come quick and look after Miss West and Junior. You're da only one can the help give now. It's all cause-a da booze. It ought-a been put off da earth, great long time ago. But God, please listen to me, Marcus Polito, an American, I here the promise make,—IF YOU DON'T GET RID OF BOOZE ON THIS EARTH BEFORE I GROW UP—legislators'n no legislators,—if you don't 'tend to it—I'LL—I'LL DO IT MYSELF, GOD—I MEAN IT. AMEN."

And the angels listening took heart for America, troubled America, land of the free and—the home of Marcus Polito!

MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

CORRESPONDENTS, like poets, are born, not made. Maynard Owen Williams, whose articles appear exclusively in the Christian Herald, has the born correspondent's ability to observe and the capacity to understand something of the genius of the people among whom he is. More than that, he has the sympathetic attitude of a sincere Christian, and a vital Christian love for truth. Having observed and understood, he can so tell it that the rest of us also see and understand.

VITAL HUMAN STORIES FROM RUSSIA is the title of a series of articles by Mr. Williams now appearing in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Do you want to know how the Russian Church, deprived of the protection of autocracy, is meeting the challenge of democracy? Williams will tell you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to see the Great Russian Council, yet to be called, build a people's government on the shattered foundations of a Czar's authority? Williams will show you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to understand the mind and heart of the Slav, feared as a menace by so many generations of western Europeans, now leading them all in his devotion to Liberty and the rights of men? Williams will make it plain in the Christian Herald.

At the time of the Russian Revolution Mr. Williams was in China completing his articles about the Orient for the Christian Herald. He went to Petrograd at once. From Harbin, the far Eastern port, Mr. Williams sent several articles which have helped the readers of the Christian Herald to understand the new Russia.

Mr. Williams' Articles alone, during the coming year, will be worth many times the cost of the Christian Herald.

WHY 300,000 FAMILIES LOVE CHRISTIAN HERALD

The Christian Herald is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in great enterprises. It is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents in the most vital way all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the on-marching church of Christ.

You should be a regular reader of the Christian Herald and enjoy these special features which are now appearing:

WASHINGTON THE BEAUTIFUL

NATIONAL CONVENTION CITY HAS UNIQUE ATTRACTIONS

EARL GODWIN

When the visitor to Washington has seen the city from a taxicab, or a touring car, or any of the excellent sight-seeing automobiles which furnish splendid service and are in the hands of capable young men, he should take a quiet trip to the heights surrounding the city and view the placid and beautiful Capital from those advantageous localities.

When you have seen the broad vision of Washington from Ft. Myer, which is across the Potomac River, you will no doubt agree with the writer that a city set upon a hill has only paltry advantages compared with the fair city which can be viewed from the hills about it. To see the town from the portholes in the tip-top of the Washington Monument is something of an exalted circus performance, although well worth the time; but to tour the four sides of the District of Columbia and to get the sudden broad visions of Washington afforded many times is to provide one's recollection with a series of most wonderful views.

Washington is full of trees. Even in winter there is enough green to give the city character. It seems sometimes like a beautiful dream city rising from a forest, and it is this kind of impression the traveler to the hills about Washington will take away and perhaps retain for a lifetime.

If the city of Washington were in Europe, and if it should have been provided with so beautiful a height as that from which rise the spires of the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, this single view would be the inspiration of the poets of all time. This cathedral will be the national cathedral for the Episcopal church and the quiet toned sandstone spires above the choir and crypt are just now beginning to appear above the grove of ancient oaks which crowns Mt. St. Albans. This is on the western edge of the District of Columbia, and northwest of the Capital—a straight and broad thoroughfare, Massachusetts avenue, pointing directly to the Capitol from the height. On this height is a beautiful school for girls, a beautiful school for boys, and a cluster of church buildings. Also there is a Peace Cross, the gift of veterans of the Spanish war. This is set on a spot from which Washington can be seen as if in a beautiful vision. The writer believes this view is the most wonderful to be seen in any city in America.

From the eastern portion of the District, especially in the afternoon, or just before sunset, there is another wonderful view from a height, although the neighborhood in which the tourist must stand to obtain it is undeveloped and unattractive. But looking away to the western horizon, the eye sweeps across the flat plateau of Capitol Hill, sees the city lying beyond it and sweeping westward on a gradual rise encounters the ridge on which the cathedral is located. To the southwest are the wonderful wireless telegraph towers. These are a thousand feet high, three in number, standing like slender giants, their appearance always implying strength and wizardry. They belong to the government, and the wireless operator at their base can set his clock by the tick of a watch in Paris. To see these fascinating towers from the eastern slopes of the city, especially just at the time of a red sunset, is something never to be forgotten.

WASHINGTON BIDS JOHN BARLEYCORN GOOD-BYE

POLICE BLOTTER SHOWS NO ARRESTS FOR INTOXICATION ON SUNDAY

EMMA S. SHELTON, President District of Columbia W. C. T. U.

Washington, Nov. 4.—Police blotter carried no case of intoxication for the first time in the memory of the oldest policeman in Washington. Today's police blotter clean of arrests for intoxication—mute testimony to the efficiency of the enforcement of the prohibition law.

After a battle royal by our friends in the United States Senate and House of Representatives the prohibition bill (not bone dry) for the District of Columbia, was finally passed by the House on Wednesday, February 28, 1917.

Washington passed from wet to dry today, November 1, with scarcely a ripple save in the minds and hearts of the temperance hosts, and in them was not only a ripple, but a veritable storm of joy which could only find expression in prayer and praise.

Even the men who love liquor, although they drank themselves dry about two hours before schedule time, did so with quietness and decency, and by ten p. m. ninety per cent of the saloons had closed their doors, darkened their windows and workmen were dismantling many of them. Of course much liquor is stored away in private homes.

Many people, among them the writer, visited the downtown section expecting to see rioting and drunkenness, but things were about as usual, except for the great crowds of people on the streets, all of whom seemed in a jolly mood.

The chief of police, Major Pullman, had let it be known that every policeman in the city would be on the job and they were. Washington has gone dry in a very respectable and orderly way.

We are not sure that liquor cannot be shipped here to private individuals, and there will soon be a test case in the courts to ascertain how the law in this respect is to be construed. Neither is there any prohibition as to the personal use of liquor. Because the District of Columbia is not a state nor a territory and was not especially mentioned in the law prohibiting the shipment of liquor to dry territory the liquor men will claim that it does not apply to us. That this is contemplated we have full evidence as the Schlitz Brewing Company of Baltimore is sending out promiscuously order blanks for beer. Many of these came to our own women. This point also must be settled by the courts. Of course we claim that the law does apply to us and feel that this was the intention of Congress.

The bill, however, is fairly strong. It closes the saloons, the wholesale liquor establishments, bars in all hotels, and allows no liquors to be sold in groceries or drug stores and prohibits the keeping or serving of alcoholic liquors in clubs. Even the pastors of such churches as desire wine for sacramental purposes must, in order to obtain it, first register before the District Commissioners, declaring the use to which it will be put.

We are fortunate in having in our chief of police, Major Pullman, a Christian gentleman in thorough sympathy with prohibition and all moral movements. If any one can enforce the law he can and will. The order of closing night attests this. On that occasion the papers state Major Pullman had 2,000 automobiles "on the job" and every policeman on the force was on duty, while plain clothes men mingled with the crowds. Between them almost every inch of ground in the city was patrolled. Major Pullman advised that the soldiers be kept in their cantonments which was done. Citizens were forewarned that no excessive hilarity would be permitted even by Hallowe'en rollickers. These precautions were largely because of war conditions, but they bore fruit in a quiet, orderly change from old to new conditions. Major Pullman seemed to be everywhere at once.

Senator Morris Sheppard came all the way from his Texas home to be present on the eventful evening when his bill should go into effect. One of the newspapers furnished this writeup:

"In his big house on upper Massachusetts avenue, Senator Morris Sheppard of Texas, the originator of the bill that so greatly affected the National Capital, is sitting before an open fire with a smile of satisfaction on his strong face.

"Twelve o'clock draws near—the hour when at a single tick of the clock all saloons and wholesale liquor establishments in Washington will cease to exist. He stretches. The clock strikes twelve.

"The phone bell rings and Mr. Sheppard says, 'Hello.' And while a guard of policemen are dutifully patrolling in front, in back and on both sides of the house, he answers many rapid-fire questions hurled at him by a reporter on the other end of the wire.

"'Yes, I think it is the greatest thing that ever happened to the District of Columbia,' he says to the reporter. He bangs down the receiver and goes upstairs to bed."

Judge Mullowny has issued the warning that hereafter there will be no leniency shown what have been claimed to be "accidental drunks." Drink will hereafter be too far off to be secured "accidentally." To guard against the practice of going over to Baltimore for liquor and returning intoxicated, Major Pullman has given notice that no mercy will be shown drinking chauffeurs. So with promise of such rigid and wholesale enforcement of the laws we have, we are happy in the hope of an almost if not quite bone dry

SECRETARY LANE ENDORSES WOMAN SUFFRAGE

Following the example of President Wilson and other members of the cabinet, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, has issued an endorsement of woman suffrage to aid the campaign in New York state.

"As a matter of political philosophy suffrage cannot be put aside, and as a matter of wise policy it is not to be denied," he said. Members of the cabinet who have previously endorsed the franchise extension include Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy; Daniel F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture; William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, and William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce.

Washington. As a speaker said, "John Barleycorn has been a guest of this city for one hundred and nine years. We are now speeding the parting guest."

With the passing of the liquor traffic there will be no further work for the excise board which has been in existence since 1913. Its headquarters closed at 4:30 p. m. on October 31, but with no crepe on the door or any other indication of mourning.

On November 1 the W. C. T. U. called a "Special Day of Prayer and Praise for the Washington Dry Victory." This was held in the First Congregational Church, but two blocks from the spot where J. Wilkes Booth took his last drink before assassinating President Lincoln.

The meetings were well attended, nearly every denomination being represented by a minister. The Christian Endeavor, Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, International Reform Bureau, business men and the Anti-Saloon League were also represented. Each speaker paid tribute to the faithful work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union during these long years. Most of the speakers emphasized the necessity for continued watchfulness lest the enemy send in little foxes to destroy the vine.

Every District officer was present and our long time president, loved Mrs. Sarah D. La Fetra, was about as full of happiness as she could be, for she bore the heat and burden of the unpopular day of temperance work.

There were earnest speeches, inspiring songs and enthusiastic discussions in which the W. C. T. U. No. 2 took part and the closing hours found all soul-refreshed, and after all scarcely realizing that our prayers of many years are answered and our hopes realized.

A walk through the business section does more than anything else to assure us that our beloved Capital, referred to by more than one speaker as the "Capital of the World," is really dry.

Passing what once were open saloons, in some cases placarded with the announcement that the building will be opened for other business, makes one begin to realize what a dry District means.

I cannot close this letter without giving another reason why our hearts are praising God: There seemed every reason to believe that in the great pressure for room to house the hundreds of new clerks required because of the exigency of increased work, the government would be forced to convert into offices the W. C. T. U. Soldiers' and Sailors' Recreation Rooms and those adjacent to them.

Monday morning we received notice to vacate and officials at the Treasury Department seemed almost as grieved as we at the necessity. Monday afternoon all plans were changed and we are to keep our rooms and to continue our blessed work. Surely God's promises are true—"Prayer availeth much."

TEXT OF PROPOSED FEDERAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT AS ADOPTED BY THE UNITED STATES SENATE

The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into or the exportation thereof from the United States, and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by the Congress.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

OFFICIAL RE-COUNT IN IOWA GIVES SMALL MAJORITY AGAINST AMENDMENT

The official re-count of votes at the special election on October 15 showed a majority of 1,060 against constitutional prohibition. Iowa still has statutory prohibition and expects to keep it, although it is reported that the liquor interests are agitating the repeal of the law by the next legislature. As stated last week by the president of the Iowa W. C. T. U., the deferred victory for the amendment can be explained by the fact that voters who really favored the amendment failed to go to the polls. Over-confidence on the part of the good people gave the liquor politicians the opportunity to accomplish their ends.

SECRETARY McADOO BELIEVES WOMEN SHOULD HAVE THE BALLOT

Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo has declared in favor of votes for women. In a statement recently authorized, entitled "The Duty of the Nation to Its Women," Secretary McAdoo points to the able work done by the women of the United States in upholding the government since the outbreak of the war as a reason for conferring upon them the ballot. He says:

"The time has come when suffrage should be given to the women of America. It should be given promptly; it should be given ungrudgingly; it should be given gladly. The women of the United States have in every way, especially since this war broke out, shown themselves qualified for the right of suffrage.

"When America emerges from this war, as she will, with enhanced prestige and responsibilities to the whole world, women and men alike must, upon a perfect equality so far as their civil status is concerned, work out the momentous problems of the future as equal partners.

"It is my earnest hope that the great state of New York will take the lead among the states of the East in doing justice to its women. The constitutional amendment to be voted upon on November 6 should be adopted. If New York sets an example to the country of just and progressive action, it will not be long before women realize the benefits of full citizenship in every state of the Union."

ATTORNEY GENERAL GREGORY TO DECIDE IMPORTATION QUESTION

Government Issues Order and Recalls It

Instructions to all customs collectors throughout the country to admit to entry distilled spirits produced abroad prior to October 3 last, "either for beverage purposes or for other than beverage purposes," were made public and recalled by the Treasury Department within the space of a few hours.

The issuance of instructions which were sent out by Assistant Secretary Rowe was based upon an interpretation of the food and revenue laws given by Lawrence Becker, solicitor of the Treasury Department, an official of the Department of Justice. Mr. Becker ruled that the revenue law approved October 3 repealed the provisions of the previously enacted food control law, which flatly prohibited the importation of any distilled spirits.

Now the question has been placed before the Attorney General for a decision, and in the meantime the food law prohibition remains in effect.

That section of the food law, passed August 10, after prohibiting the manufacture of distilled beverages in this country, says:

"Nor shall there be imported into the United States any distilled spirits."

Section 301 of the revenue law, passed nearly two months later, provides:

"That no distilled spirits produced after the passage of this act shall be imported into the United States from any foreign country or from the West Indian Islands recently acquired from Denmark, or from Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands."

Instructions Recalled

Mr. Becker held that the words: "Produced after the passage of this act" in the revenue law, in effect, permitted the admission to entry of spirits distilled prior to the enactment of the act. Instructions consequently were addressed to all collectors advising them to permit the importation of distilled spirits produced abroad prior to October 3.

Later these instructions were recalled, high officials of the department taking the stand that the question was one of such magnitude that Attorney General Gregory should pass upon it.

WHITE RIBBON HOME AT AYER CANTONMENT A CENTER OF INTEREST AT ANNUAL GATHERING OF OLD BAY STATE

Special Correspondence

The Massachusetts W. C. T. U. has just closed one of the most interesting and helpful conventions of its forty-four years of organized life. This was the unanimous verdict of the more than 300 white ribboners who flocked to the city from all over the state, to say nothing of the many from Brockton and the immediate vicinity. Twenty-five years ago, October 17-19, 1892, Brockton entertained the nineteenth annual convention and it was a special inspiration to find that many of the white ribboners of that time are still engaged as whole-heartedly as ever in the great work. Quite an ovation was extended to Mrs. Lon G. Weston, the county and local president of that period, while Mrs. Mary B. Lane, the first secretary of the Brockton union, now president of Concord Junction, gave a most interesting glimpse of the small beginnings of those early days. The union is now under the very efficient leadership of Mrs. Lettie Kingsley Barden, a woman still young, who nevertheless has had wide experience in public work of various kinds, and who brings a trained mind and great executive ability to her task. The membership has increased greatly during the two years in which she has been at the head until it now stands among the larger unions of the state, with a membership of 173. Massachusetts, by the way, boasts of twenty-four unions with a membership ranging from one hundred to two hundred, while its largest unions are: Lawrence, 500; Holyoke, 415; Leominster, 364; Melrose, 313; Roxbury, 305, and Worcester, 210.

All state and National W. C. T. U. conventions have certain features which ally them to all others, past, present and future, yet each one has its own distinctive characteristic. The outstanding feature of the Brockton convention was its patriotism, and the emphasis, from the first hour until the last, was placed on war welfare work. The Stars and Stripes occupied a conspicuous place upon the program, as well as in the decorations, and the salute was given at frequent intervals during the busy days. The slogan adopted for the year also appeared upon the program: "Patriotism and Prohibition; Now and Forever; One and Inseparable." The superintendents whose lines of work are not directly connected with the present crisis generously gave their time to those "of whom much is required." No formal reports were given, but two minutes were accorded to each superintendent to tell "How My Department is a Help to True Patriotism." After singing the superintendents' song, written for the occasion, an hour and a half was given to the departments most vitally affected at the present time. First among them was the department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, Mrs. Arabella Wood Wilson, state superintendent, to whose inspiring report the inadequate period of fifteen minutes had been assigned. One never wants quite so much to have Joshua's power to make the sun stand still as when the minutes are flying in a convention. Mrs. Wilson could have used many times fifteen minutes and still not told half the story of what her department has done this year. Here is the rude skeleton which she made a living, breathing thing: 1,924 comfort bags; 70 comfort kits; 31 first aid and 20 sewing bags; 361 pairs of socks; 190 sweaters; 120 mufflers; 322 pairs of wristlets; 62 helmets; 14 pair of mittens; 35 trench caps, and 8,750 miscellaneous articles sent to the Red Cross and other relief agencies. If the entire record of articles sent directly to the Red Cross, Navy League and other agencies were available we should find the total much greater.

But the great work around which the enthusiasm of the convention gathered was the White Ribbon Home at Ayer, which will very soon be ready for occupancy. This is a sixteen-room house which has been purchased by the state W. C. T. U. and placed in the hands of a special committee to be made ready as a center of mother love and helpfulness for the men from the six New England states and from the northern part of the state of New York, who are being assembled in this great cantonment. The house is in the village of Ayer, very near the railroad station and only a little more than a mile from the camp. It is being fitted up as practically as possible to be a help to the men. The Melrose union is to furnish the parlor and it will be known as the Mary A. Livermore room. Concord union is furnishing the library, Lawrence the game room, and other rooms are to be furnished by unions and individuals. Maine, Connecticut and Vermont unions have promised to render substantial help, as the boys from their own borders will be at Ayer, and it is hoped that the other states interested may hail this as a great opportunity. More than $2,000 has already been paid and between $3,000 and $4,000 was subscribed at Brockton. In addition, on the last day of the convention, nearly $500 worth of furnishings, towels, pillow cases, sheets, pillows, napkins, etc., were pledged in a manner the pastor of the

INDIANA LOOKING FORWARD TO DRY LAW GOING INTO EFFECT

Special Correspondence

White ribboners of Indiana held their forty-fourth annual convention in the beautiful city of Anderson, October 19-22. The 662 delegates in attendance represented all parts of the state and were full of enthusiasm and devotion to the cause. There was great rejoicing over the fact that Indiana will take its place among the dry states on the second day of next April.

The beautiful and commodious First Methodist church, where the convention was held, was artistically decorated with growing plants, cut flowers and W. C. T. U. banners, posters and pennants, with the national colors greatly in evidence.

The feature of Friday's program was the annual address of the president, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, which was a statesmanlike review of the present situation with reference to war prohibition and woman suffrage. In speaking of war prohibition she said, "By one stroke of his pen the President could give us the thing for which Christian men and women have been working and praying for years. He could destroy the greatest enemy to efficiency, the greatest enemy to happiness, the greatest enemy to law and order, the greatest enemy to the kingdom of Jesus Christ. He has called the boys from our homes, the money from our coffers, and the women into untried fields of labor, that we may take the life of German autocracy, and yet he holds the weapon which would destroy an enemy more to be feared by the American people than the Kaiser of Germany, and why does he stay his hand? For fear this enemy, petted and protected in time of peace, fattened at the expense of the masses, will in this time of the nation's peril turn and rend the government that has given it protection, if it is compelled to fall into line with the national program for winning the war? Men are arrested, tried and cast into prison for refusing to be drafted into service in this emergency. Shall this notorious slacker not share the same fate? Can the President expect a hearty response to his entreaties for food, money and blood if he permits this enemy to despoil our people while he has the power to prevent it? The noon hour of opportunity has struck for our beloved President—pray that he may not fail us in this crisis."

The corresponding secretary gave a comprehensive review of the onward march of the year, showing that the unions all over the state have been unusually active along all lines of our work. Forty-two new local unions and three county unions have been organized. In answer to the call of the government and the Red Cross, the local unions have been especially active along patriotic lines. Thousands of hospital garments, knitted articles, comfort bags and many tailed bandages have been prepared and $335 was sent to the Ambulance Fund. When the superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors gave her report a call was made for the mothers who have sons in the army to stand, and sixty arose, many of them weeping. A hush came over the convention as prayer was voiced for these mothers and their sons. The superintendent herself has given a son.

A diamond medal contest of unusual merit was held on Saturday night under the management of Mrs. Julia Overman, state superintendent.

Two monster mass meetings were held on Sunday afternoon, each addressed by Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, National superintendent of Franchise, and Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, president of the Kentucky W. C. T. U. Both struck telling blows for prohibition and woman suffrage. The pulpits of the city were occupied by W. C. T. U. speakers both morning and evening.

Much was made of the question of franchise. Mrs. Stella Stimson spoke on the "Status of Suffrage in Indiana" and in connection with her talk gave a demonstration of the primary law. On Monday night a suffrage rally was held, at which Mrs. Richard Edwards extended the greetings of the Franchise League, of which she is president. Mrs. Luella McWhirter, president of the Legislative Council of Indiana Women, extended greetings from that organization. Mrs. Livingston also delivered a strong address on suffrage.

The election on Saturday resulted in returning to office all the former officers.

Since the close of the convention the Supreme court has handed down its decision sustaining Marion county court in its decision that the partial suffrage law passed by our last legislature is unconstitutional. Thus once more the women of Indiana will be thrown back into the class of idiots, insane and criminals. It is a great disappointment, for the women of the state had been active in preparing themselves for intelligent participation in the affairs of government. They had registered where it was necessary to do so and taken the poll, and were expecting to participate in the city elections on November 6. In this decision we plainly see the cloven hoof of the liquor traffic and it only increases our determination to fight on, pray on, until King Alcohol is driven from the land.

AN ALCOHOL-LESS, THEREFORE AN ALMOST BLOODLESS REVOLUTION

M. M. Bartholomew, a graduate of Yale university, who has recently returned from Russia, where he has been acting in the capacity of Y. M. C. A. secretary, gives interesting testimony through the columns of the Butte (Mont.) Miner to the value of the prohibition law:

"One of the most remarkable arguments for nation-wide prohibition is the result of the prohibition measure passed early in the war in Russia. At that time Russia was the most drink-burdened nation in the world. Drunkenness was the rule throughout the nation among both the aristocratic and poorer classes. A large percentage of the government revenue depended upon the profit from vodka, which was a government monopoly. But drunkenness was breaking up the efficiency and discipline of the army and so by order of the czar was abolished for the duration of the war as a military measure. The rule was rigidly enforced. During my two years in Russia and Siberia, much of which time was spent in cities and towns, I recall seeing only four drunken men and one of these was a foreigner.

"The results of prohibition were astonishing and showed themselves in most unexpected ways. A prominent American insurance company, which had for years done business in Russia, issued more insurance and at a better rate of interest for the year following the prohibition bill than at any time during its career; this in spite of the fact that the nation was at war and the death rate both among the soldiers at the front and the people at home was high. Even war does not kill and destroy in the wholesale manner that drink accomplishes its work. So the remarkable thing happened that the general condition of a large number of peasant families improved during the war in spite of the terrible drain on the national resources.

"But the supreme test and the supreme victory of prohibition came with the revolution in Petrograd. In those days of disorder when jails were opened and hundreds of former hooligans and criminals walked the streets unrestrained, when only the patriotic spirit of the times was present to save the situation, there was no drunkenness. When the large Astoria hotel was charged and captured by the rebels because the police and some of the military officers stationed there attempted to defend it with machine guns and rifles, I was standing in the doorway of an adjoining building. Within an hour I saw emerge from the hotel wine cellar three men with bottles of wine in their arms, which they attempted to carry away with them as booty. In every case these men were stopped by soldiers or citizens before they had reached the end of the street and compelled to smash their bottles on the ground. It was an alcoholless and, therefore, a bloodless revolution, or as nearly bloodless as was possible when armed resistance had to be overcome. Of wanton brutality or slaughter there was none whatever. And what was true in Petrograd was true of the remotest villages of the empire. A deep sense of responsibility for the good name of their newly-won liberty, a burning wish that nothing should happen to sully the record of their achievement possessed the hearts of all.

"Old King Alcohol will never again dominate in Russia. What was first brought about by imperial edict for a military measure has become the wish of the people. They have had a chance to see their land with and without alcohol and the great majority of serious-minded citizens who control the destinies of the new republic are determined that prohibition shall continue. It is hard for us to realize that this black mire of tyranny and violence which was the old Russia, has been nurturing a lily. In the midst of war it has burst into bloom. Its coming is a message of hope."

THE WINNING OF THE WAR

MARGARET WINTRINGER

Since Sir Thomas Dewar, the great distiller, has said, "In my opinion, all the restrictions on drink brought about by the war, in munition areas, will, if they work successfully, be the basis for drink legislation in peace time," this series of articles would not be complete without a brief consideration of the system of regulation adopted by Great Britain.

When the brewers' proposal for the nationalization of the liquor traffic served its purpose of blocking war time prohibition, it found some adherents; but such a storm of protest was raised that when Mr. Lloyd George brought forward the government scheme of regulation, he stated in most emphatic terms that it was not to be nationalization. The dominant purpose of the Defense of the Realm Act, enacted by Parliament in May, 1915, was, as stated, "for the successful prosecution of the war."

When the Central Control Board of the Liquor Traffic was created, in asking power for the government to sell liquor and take over liquor premises, Mr. Lloyd George again gave a pledge to the House that that power should be used as little as possible. Much discussion followed, but the board was given power to control the sale of liquor; to prohibit the sale except by itself; to prohibit treating; to establish refreshment rooms; to acquire premises, voluntarily or arbitrarily; to acquire businesses; to grant excise licenses, and other powers during the war and for twelve months thereafter. The Central Control Board only has jurisdiction over munition areas or areas where war work is done.

In March, 1916, Lord D'Abernon, chairman of the board, told me that, as chairman, he had control of areas in Great Britain, with a population of 19,000,000. The areas have since been enlarged to cover the greater part of England, Scotland and Wales. Ireland is excepted.

Very early, the hours of sale were cut down from nineteen to five, and five and one-half hours, but, unfortunately, while beer and spirit delivery is restricted as to hours, sale for "off the premises" consumption is permitted. Treating and credit were prohibited, and a dilution of spirits with ten per cent of water, with a raise in price of the watered stuff, was allowed.

During the first six months no wet canteens were established by the board, though permitted as clubs in munition factories, with the sale of liquor to members. Then beer was sold in some Central Control Board's canteens; and later a beer said to contain only two per cent of alcohol was sold in all these canteens without restriction. When the government acquired munition areas on the Scotch border, the Central Control Board took over the entire liquor trade of the districts.

When I was in London, I found Lord D'Abernon interested in, though uninformed concerning our dry states. Mr. Guy Hayler, secretary of the International Order of Good Templars, in an interview with him, had urged the establishment of three prohibition areas, and for a time the chairman seemed to think favorably of the experiment. But with a Midland brewer and several owners of brewery stock serving as members of the board, and only two total abstainers and one prohibitionist, it is perhaps not strange that the dry areas never materialized.

A decrease of thirty per cent or more in the number of arrests for drunkenness which followed the establishment of the board was welcomed by the public, until it was discovered that word had gone out that soldiers' wives and war workers were not to be arrested for drinking, and some statistician figured that if to the 6,000,000 thus exempt were added the 3,000,000 soldiers at the front, the decrease in arrests failed to show any great improvement.

The results achieved have been gratifying only as the effort has been prohibitive. The regulations have fallen far short of the nation's real needs. They have been a palliative, not a cure. It has been shown conclusively that mere regulation of hours does not answer the purpose, but, as Mr. Lloyd George has been forced to admit, "very often defeats the purpose."

After more than two years of government regulation, Great Britain feels the disastrous effect of drink even more heavily than before. Mr. Arthur Mee and the Rev. J. Stuart Holden have proved conclusively that the trade still weakens and bleeds the proudest of nations and bars the way to victory. Millions of money have been squandered and thousands of tons of valuable foodstuffs have been wasted which might have been used to help the nations in their hour of need.

Two years ago, Mr. David Lloyd George warned the British nation that though "it could perhaps afford a drink bill of 160,000,000 pounds before the war, what we could afford before the war, we certainly cannot afford after the war." The force of this warning is beginning to be felt throughout the United Kingdom and doggedly John Bull is determined to fight to the finish not only the foreign but the home foe.

"Men and munitions are not enough," said Professor Simpson, when I visited him in Edinburgh. "In such a struggle as this morality is a necessary national asset." Then slowly he added, "A nation not willing to sacrifice desire and appetite, and financial gain for the public good, need not look to God for the success of its arms. Prohibition is an inevitable concomitant of success."

The flying of the Stars and Stripes and Union Jack at the same time on the same pole in Victoria Town House of Lords, has fired the imagination of the British people as nothing else has done. The United States and Great Britain have not only become allies in the great struggle for democracy, but allies for the conservation of food, and allies in the drive for National Prohibition.

Under the rebellious flood of public opinion the drink traffic must go down. Will those in power be opportunists enough to realize that neither the beer autocracy or whisky oligarchy can stay the prohibition tide that is sweeping Great Britain and the United States—a flood tide which will help bring victory and make the world safe for democracy.

American Professor Attributes German Brutality to Beer Drinking

Professor Daly of Harvard University is reported in Munsey's Magazine as saying: "I venture the hypothesis that lifelong drinking of mild beer has been one of the most potent causes for the amazing brutalities of official Germany. These crimes have been ordered by men who for decades have been poisoned by beer. In times of peace and quiet, the poison causes derangement of brain tissue, often expressed merely in some form of sentimentality, plain or maudlin. If, however, the victim is put under stress, his nervous disorder is likely to lead to bad temper and bad judgment, with endless possibilities in the way of loss of dignity, poise—and the sense of human fellowship."

SAVE AND SERVE

MARY FRANCES WILLARD ANDERSON

During the past days—at railroad stations, on cars, emblazoned on banners floating from high buildings or flashing from electric signs—we have been reading this injunction: "SAVE AND SERVE! Buy a Liberty Bond!"

The citizens of our great country have been asked to share in raising the necessary funds for carrying on our nation's part in this great war, and these striking words have appealed to hundreds of thousands of men and women. We trust our Young People's Branch members have responded to the call.

As Y. P. B. members we should realize that the purpose of our organization is to SAVE AND SERVE,—to save health, save character, save life, and to serve humanity, our country and our God. Surely at such a time as this we are all taking time for serious thought and are thanking God that we are permitted to have a part in freeing our land from the bondage of the liquor power.

Let us save the young men and women of our own community and thus serve the cause of prohibition.

We are nearing a new year of endeavor. Let us "put on the whole armor of God" that we may in His name go forth to SAVE AND SERVE.

"We take with solemn thankfulness
Our burdens up, nor ask it less,
And count it joy that even we
May suffer, serve, or wait for Thee,
Whose will be done!

"If, for the age to come, this hour
Of trial hath vicarious power,
And, blest by Thee, our present pain
Be liberty's eternal gain,
Thy will be done!"

Stein No Longer in Favor at Harvard

No beer will flow at social functions the coming year at Harvard university. In announcing the news the Boston Globe says:

"Weather conditions may continue unchanged when 'good fellows get together,' but the stein will no longer be on the table at Harvard.

"Time was when the Harvard boys held rallies and open forums in defense of beer. The champion undergraduate orators would orate on 'Two beers or not two beers—that is the question.' and they used to drag other authorities besides Shakespeare into the argument. Usually the pro-beer faction won out, and for a reward they had flowing amber at the class smokers. Occasionally the anti-beer students would register a triumph and the resultant smokers were as dry as ginger ale could make them.

"This year the collegiate prohibitionists are having peace without victory. The pro-beer squad is still enrolled in college, but it isn't hollering or even whispering for a beer diet at smokers. The sentiment that has invaded clubs all over the country prevails at Harvard.

"Another subtle indication of Harvard's indifference to beer is the total absence of hop advertisements in the college papers. The Lampoon, which used to carry display notices for everything from champagne to red ink, is dry this year, even in its humor, and the Crimson, which sometimes ran half-page beer ads, next to rabid prohibition editorials, is this year booming nothing more intoxicating than price quotations for old clothes. Verily times have changed, and the old college steins are now getting mouldy instead of musty."

Suggestive Programs for Y. P. B. Meetings in November

FIRST MEETING

Social Meeting—Local Y. P. B. Talent.

Soldiers and Sailors Department Young People's Branch

The National superintendent of the department of Soldiers and Sailors has asked that our Y. P. B. girls knit sweaters and send them direct to her. Let us make our fingers fly! Send to Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, 1627 Massachusetts Ave., N. W., Washington, D. C.

Invite the soldiers and sailors to your Y. P. B. meetings. Have a rousing program, good singing, distribute temperance and anti-cigaret leaflets, and endeavor to win the young men to sign the total abstinence pledge.

Why not subscribe for the Y. P. B. Edition of THE UNION SIGNAL for the camps or for individual soldiers and sailors?

Gift of Piano

Coming as a pleasant surprise, the announcement was made that a piano would be presented to the new county W. C. T. U. headquarters by the recently organized Y. P. B. of Wilmington, Delaware. While less than a month old, this Y. P. B. has undertaken to raise about $400 for the gift to the W. C. T. U.

Young People's Branch Notes

The University Y. P. B. of North Dakota aims to enroll 200 members the coming year.

The Y. P. B. president of Ohio is in training at Chillicothe, the state Y. P. B. vice-president is "somewhere in France" and a long list of Ohio's best are answering the call to the colors. In Wade Park, Cleveland, every young man in the local Branch has gone into service.

One of the most enjoyable features of the Kansas W. C. T. U. annual convention was a Y. P. B. banquet. Miss Zoe Atchison acted as toastmistress, which fact assured a happy time.

Mrs. Linnie Carl recently spent two weeks afield in Rhode Island, and our "Little Rhody" Y. P. B.'s have been greatly encouraged by her addresses.

There was a splendid Y. P. B. representation at the Delaware W. C. T. U. convention—a company of which the National secretary was proud.

Let us have more publicity! Let us advertise more! Then have helpful programs, properly conducted business meetings, rousing singing. You will win and HOLD your members in this way.

The Y. P. B. of Ohio, under the leadership of the general secretary, Mrs. Fannie Drummond, is doing a great work to make "Ohio dry." Nearly every county has a "flying squadron" who are touring the county, putting up posters, distributing literature, speaking, singing, giving the Carlyle-Pierpont debate, holding medal contests, giving temperance playlets and in every way possible creating prohibition sentiment. Success to our Ohio Y. P. B.'s.

SIDELIGHTS FROM SHAKESPEARE ON THE ALCOHOL PROBLEM

CHRISTINE I. TINLING

The feast is spread. Macbeth, by the murder of Duncan, has realized his ambition and become king of Scotland. At a state banquet he and his queen entertain the chief lords of the realm. Lady Macbeth pronounces a cordial welcome, while her husband mingles with the guests and takes a seat at the table. "Be large in mirth," he says, "anon, we'll drink a measure the table round. Now good digestion wait on appetite and health on both." Then, as in some quarters now, it was commonly supposed that wine is a valuable addition to the social meal because it helps digestion. That idea has, however, been completely exploded and we are told on high authority that if we wish good digestion to wait on appetite and health on both, we must leave strong drink alone. However, it is not for any such practical purpose that wine is served at any banquet, but only for the pleasure it imparts and the atmosphere of good fellowship that accompanies it. Macbeth a few moments later speaks again: "Give me some wine, fill full; I drink to the general joy of the whole table."

But though the word "joy" is on his lips, there is no joy for him tonight. Instead, there is horror in his heart as he encounters the accusing ghost of Banquo, whom he has just murdered. Though from first to last he never realizes it, this same sparkling wine, associated in his mind with the thought of joy, is one of the prime factors in the tragedy that even now has begun to overwhelm his life.

Shakespeare took the material for this play from Holinshed's Chronicles. The name of the actual murderer, as there given, was Donwald, and the story runs thus:

Lady Macbeth and Her Motives

"That which hath made them drunk hath made me bold."

"At length, having talked with them a long time, he got him into his privie chamber, onelie with two of his chamberlains, who having brought him to bed, came forth againe, and then fell to banketting with Donwald and his wife, who had prepared diverse delicate dishes, and sundrie sorts of drinks for their supper, whereat they sate up so long, till they had charged their stomachs with such full gorges, that their heads were no sooner got to the pillow, but asleepe they were so fast that a man might have remooved the chamber over them, sooner than to have awaked them out of their droonken sleepe."

The poet brings out very clearly that the use of drink was an integral part of the plot to murder the king.

Macbeth has almost resolved to abandon his purpose. He reflects that even in this world retribution may overtake him. He has not the faintest shadow of excuse for this murder, for Duncan has borne his faculties so meek and been so clear in his great office, and his virtues will testify like angels trumpet-tongued against the crime.

Besides being his kinsman and his king, Duncan is bound to Macbeth by the sacred ties of hospitality and is for the time being under his protection. Influenced by these weighty considerations, the thane, notwithstanding his ambition, says to his lady, "We will proceed no further in this business."

But she holds him to the purpose for she is resolved that, cost what it may, he shall sit upon the throne of Scotland. With calm determination she plans the murder as being the only possible means to this end, and she lashes her husband with her tongue for his hesitation. He weakens. His next objection is based merely on the fear that they may fail in the attempt, so she lays her plans before him in detail.

"When Duncan is asleep,
Whereto the rather shall his hard day's journey
Soundly invite him, his two chamberlains
Will I with wine and wassail so convince
That memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume, and the receipt of reason
A limbeck only; when in swinish sleep
Their drenched natures lie, as in a death,
What cannot you and I perform upon
The unguarded Duncan? What not put upon
His spongy officers, who shall bear the guilt
Of our great quell?"

The old anatomists thought that the brain consisted of three ventricles or chambers; and the mind had three principal faculties, understanding, imagination and memory. The imagination lodged in the front cell, the understanding or reason in the middle, and the memory in the hindermost. Memory was supposed to act as a guard or warder to protect the other faculties. Lady Macbeth says that strong drink will convert memory into a mere fume of vapor. It will then rise into the next cell and confuse the reason. The latter will be like an alchemist's limbeck or alembic, which is the part of a

National W. C. T. U. Convention,
Washington, D. C.,
December 2-7, 1917

Before we go to press the outcome of the prohibition and suffrage elections in states that voted November 6 will probably be known. We hope to give on the cover page brief telegraphic reports of the results.

"Smile, Smile, Smile"

The sentiment of the song so popular overseas, "Pack up your troubles in your own kit bag, and smile, smile, smile," may well be a slogan for patriots the world over. It is even possible that its spirit may be needed at our coming National W. C. T. U. Convention by both hostesses and delegates. The unusual conditions which our nation is facing have brought unprecedented crowds to the city of Washington, as aids in special war-time work for the government. The capacity of boarding houses and hotels has been taxed to the utmost to accommodate these new residents, and in consequence delegates and visitors to the National W. C. T. U. Convention may find that in every instance they cannot secure as desirable accommodations as they are accustomed to on such occasions. But white ribboners are first, last and always patriots and Christian patriots, and mindful of the discomforts that the men of their families are cheerfully enduring in training camps and the war zone, will accept the situation with perfect serenity and cheerfulness, and indeed consider it a privilege, if need be, to sacrifice their own comfort to facilitate the work of the government at this time.

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES VOTES ON FEDERAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT NEXT MONTH

Have You Communicated with Your Congressman in Regard to the Question? If Not, Why Not?

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty and likewise of prohibition. The liquor interests have not forgotten that, by virtue of agreement at the last session of Congress, one of the first pieces of business to be acted upon by the House of Representatives in December is the resolution for submission to the state legislatures of a Federal prohibition amendment. Indeed, they are so awake to the situation that the International Union of United Brewery Workers, for instance, is circularizing labor unions all over the country, from Cape Cod to the Golden Gate; from the Canadian to the Mexican border, with the warning that if this resolution shall pass Congress, "It will carry with it internal strife and war, dividing the people in the attempt to curtail their rights and liberty." They blatantly claim that "Many Senators and Members of Congress are terrorized by the prohibition lobbies and their followers at home"; they urge peremptorily that "the workers of this country must demand of their Congressmen in Washington that they vote AGAINST CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION, claiming that Russian despotism never attempted what is contemplated to be "put across" in this country by this measure. They make all these appeals and threats in the name of the "interests of labor and for the preservation of workingmen's rights."

They are definite in their instructions —which will go to every labor center in the country—that every man write to his Congressman; also pay special attention to the make-up of the next state legislature, and that they all "ACT NOW. DO NOT DELAY. THIS IS URGENT, AS OUR ENEMIES WORK NIGHT AND DAY."

In these last words we find our challenge. The need of action on the part of friends of the amendment is urgent. In less than four weeks Congress will convene. Every Member of Congress, and especially those concerning whom there is any doubt, should be communicated with by their constituents, by telegram or letter. Better still, get your influential citizens to see your Congressman before he leaves for Washington and if he is wavering between two opinions, convict him of his responsibility. Mobilize the good forces of your community and let your Member of Congress feel the impact of their united influence. Prove to the liquor men that not only a few of the enemies of their trade work night and day, but that all of them will henceforth tirelessly labor that the best and loftiest and most patriotic sentiment of the state may be represented by the vote of the Member of Congress from their district on this all-important question.

Another thing that will help—get every organization holding a meeting in the next few weeks to pass a strong resolution in favor of National Constitutional Prohibition.

The General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. suggest that Sunday, November 25, be observed by all local unions as a Day of Prayer for National Constitutional Prohibition; that on that occasion meetings be held in the churches, and the pastors at the regular services be asked to preach and pray for the success of the Federal amendment, and that at each meeting the resolution given below be adopted. Not all friends of the nation-wide movement can attend the convention in Washington; not all can by their personal presence and influence in Washington give their assistance, but every one can help in this national campaign of prayer and effort for a dry nation. "ACT NOW. DO NOT DELAY."

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES, MISSIONARY SOCIETIES, YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES, CLUBS AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS, AND BY PUBLIC MEETINGS GENERALLY. W. C. T. U. SPEAKERS ARE URGENTLY REQUESTED TO SECURE FROM ALL MEETINGS WHICH THEY ADDRESS THE ADOPTION OF THIS RESOLUTION

RESOLVED, That we are in hearty favor of National Constitutional Prohibition and will do all within our power to secure favorable action by the United States Congress on the joint resolution for a referendum to the states of the amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation and importation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

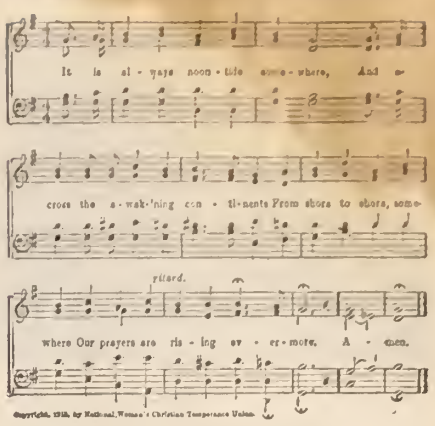
The Board of Superintendents will hold its first meeting in one of the parlors of the same church on Friday at 1:30 p. m.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

SUPERINTENDENTS

MEDICAL TEMPERANCE

MARTHA M. ALLEN, Forest Hills, Long Island, N. Y.

Because the National Convention is so late this year I have been sending to state superintendents the free leaflets of 1918 at this time. Two new leaflets, the resolutions against alcohol passed last June by the American Medical Association, and "Some Nostrums: What's in Them?" have been sent in sufficient quantity to supply all unions that have local superintendents of this department. Printing costs too much now to send to unions that report no work or interest. No printed Plan of Work has been sent, so please cut this out and keep carefully. State superintendents are requested to publish the program and suggestions in state papers. Any person wishing a Plan of Work, other than that given here, can have it by application to me.

Program for Department Meeting

Devotional Exercises: Prayer especially for the breaking down of old prejudices in favor of liquor as medicine, and the opening of blind eyes to the truth about the harmfulness of alcohol as medicine.

Paper: "The Great Medical Temperance Victories of the Last Two Years." (These are the dropping of whisky and brandy from the list of medicines in the United States Pharmacopœia, the standard book of medicines; the resolutions against alcohol passed by the American Medical Association; and the promise of the authors of Red Cross First Aid books to cut out all mention of alcoholic liquors as remedies in future editions of these books. All of these were asked for by this department).

Reading: The resolutions of the American Medical Association, read in concert by all the members, the rest of the leaflet to be read by the leader. The leaflet tells that the Medical Temperance department of the W. C. T. U. secured these resolutions, a fact that our women should know.

Reading: "Some Nostrums: What's in Them?" Have copies passed around, each member reading a paragraph.

Reading: "Don't Drink Coca Cola."

Suggestions for Work

State Superintendents: Try to get medical societies to endorse the A. M. A. resolutions against alcohol; publish the endorsement through the associated press. Send leaflets named in program and "Some Things Women Should Know About Alcoholic Medicines" to every member of the state legislature. It is time to educate the law-givers as to the non-necessity of exemptions for the medicinal sale of liquor, and they need the facts about patent medicines so as to be willing to pass legislation curbing the traffic in such.

County Superintendents: See that every local union has a superintendent of this most important department—most important at present as a help towards really "bone-dry" prohibition. Urge that each local superintendent be supplied at least with the 30 cent sample package of leaflets, and that each union hold a meeting, using the suggested program. (Send for sample package to National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Ill.)

Local Superintendents: See that every physician, druggist, nurse, teacher, editor and minister in your locality has copies of the following leaflets, in addition to those mentioned in program: "New Evidence Against Alcohol," and "Some Things Women Should Know About Alcoholic Medicines." Don't neglect this duty and opportunity for war work or anything else. Distribute in Sunday schools, "Don't Drink Coca Cola." Distribute to boys in grammar and high schools, "Alcohol, the Young Man's Greatest Enemy," and the "A. M. A. Resolutions."

Special Work for the Y. P. B.

Give the leaflets mentioned in the foregoing to medical students. Seek to get the A. M. A. resolutions endorsed by county medical societies and publish the endorsement in all the county papers possible.

The liquor traffic is doing its utmost to break down the effect of the resolutions passed by the American Medical Association. They are circulating widely among physicians an article written first for the New York Times by old Dr. Abraham Jacobi, in which he defends whisky and attacks the American Medical Association for its stand against alcohol. This reprint may do much harm to the unthinking who do not know that Dr. Jacobi is nearly ninety years old. He has always been a moderate drinker and a defender of whisky as medicine. Naturally he feels that these resolutions from the younger men of his profession are like a slap in the face to him, as they go contrary to all the teachings and habits of his lifetime. He does not enjoy being told that his teachings have been erroneous all these years. To overcome the influence of his article, it is wise to send to physicians, druggists and nurses the leaflets I have mentioned. Please do it.

There are only a very few copies left of the department book, "Alcohol a Dangerous and Unnecessary Medicine." These are at National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, at Evanston, Ill., so do not send to me for any more books. Do not send to me, either, when you want only small quantities of leaflets. Send to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House.

All the leaflets mentioned in this communication are 40 cents per 100, except the A. M. A. Resolutions, which are 25 cents per 100.

UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. What notable event occurred November 1? Tell how it was celebrated.
2. What comments are being made by Lord Northcliffe and the English press on the way the United States deals with the liquor problem?
3. How did the absence of vodka in Russia affect the revolution?
4. To what extent and in what way has Great Britain been handicapped by the drink traffic?
5. Give comments of a Harvard professor on the effect on Germans of the beer-drinking habit.
6. Relate what a prominent Boston newspaper says as to change in drinking customs at Harvard University.
7. What popular tragedy of Shakespeare strikingly illustrates the truth that alcohol criminalizes all who indulge in it?
8. How can one account for the decrease at this time in the number of saloons in the large cities?
9. What three notable medical temperance triumphs have occurred in recent years?
10. Explain the significance of the resolution passed by the American Medical Association at its annual meeting this year.

We record here the name of a comrade and friend who has recently passed to the higher life:

MRS. W. L. STRATFORD, the third president of the Alabama W. C. T. U. The death of Mrs. Stratford came as the result of a fall which occurred as she was entering the church where the state convention was being held preparatory to conducting the memorial service. Mrs. Stratford was a loyal, enthusiastic W. C. T. U. worker.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, National W. C. T. U. superintendent of Franchise, expects soon to move from Bangor, Maine, to Providence, R. I., her former residence. Mr. Livingston has accepted a call to become the secretary of the Rhode Island Baptist Association, with headquarters at Providence.

Miss Anna A. Gordon, the literary executor of Frances E. Willard, has given permission to Mrs. Martha Foote Crowe to prepare a brief biography of Miss Willard for the use of young people from sixteen years on. Emphasis will be placed upon the wonderful experiences of her girlhood and the effort will be made to gather together every note of inspiration in her life that will make the girls of our country realize more vividly her perfect womanhood.

CHRISTIANIZING PATRIOTISM KEYNOTE OF TENNESSEE'S STATE W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

Special Correspondence

Tennessee is a state of "sweetness long drawn out," geographically speaking. By using Bristol, where the state convention was recently held, as a pivot, and swinging Tennessee around to the north, Memphis would come well into Canada. Mrs. Ella A. Boole came as a visiting speaker from New York. The writer was a delegate from her home town within the state, and yet each of us traveled the same distance to be present. Such is Tennessee.

Because the beautiful little city of Bristol was more or less inaccessible on account of the distance, the convention was not numerically so large as usual, but it was characterized by breadth of purpose, depth of spirituality and great strength of conviction.

The keynote of the convention was "Christianizing Patriotism," and the delegates present were more firmly convinced than ever that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the most patriotic organization in the world—patriotic in times of peace, patriotic in times of war, sacrificingly patriotic always. Its entire effort is for the moral, mental and physical freedom of the individual and of the nation.

The making of comfort bags and bandages has won the W. C. T. U. new friends and new members all over the state. The convention voted to contribute its share toward the purchase of a stereomotorgraph for Camp Gordon, where Tennessee's drafted army is in training.

New officers elected were: Mrs. Minnie Allison Welch, president, and Mrs. Grace Williams Robins, vice-president. The other officers were re-elected.

Mrs. Mary Bang, the retiring president, for half a century or more has been an untiring, self-sacrificing, efficient advocate of temperance. She has, perhaps, accomplished more for the cause in Tennessee than any woman living. In appreciation of her loving and successful efforts many honors were shown her. She was unanimously made honorary president for life of the Tennessee W. C. T. U. A silver loving cup from the convention, and numerous floral tributes attested the warm place she occupies in the hearts of the women.

For the second time Mrs. Ella A. Boole made a place for herself in the hearts and lives of the Tennessee women. In addition to her masterful discourses, the convention was addressed by Dr. Harry Clark of the state university, and Dr. R. L. Backman of Jonesboro.

Mrs. Mary Baker, the "venerable young editor" of the Open Door, Tennessee's splendid state paper, was present, and proved a benediction to the convention. In point of years and service she was decidedly the oldest delegate present, but her bright smile and cheering words evidenced a heart overflowing with perpetual youth and the love of God and humanity.

The convention was brought very near the spiritual world when Mrs. Mamie Gilreath made her devotional talks. Altogether it was good to have been at our annual meeting.

SOUTH CAROLINA'S "BONE DRY" LAW A CAUSE OF REJOICING

Special Correspondence

The best convention, in many respects, which the South Carolina W. C. T. U. has ever held, adjourned on Sunday evening, October 21, at Aiken. The sessions were held in the Baptist church and the pastor, Dr. P. J. McLean, son of a Crusade mother, conducted several devotional services and in every way extended his hospitality and sympathy to the cause.

All the state officers and most of the superintendents were present at the opening session on Friday morning. With eighty-five delegates present this was the largest convention in the history of the state W. C. T. U., with the exception of one, held in the capital city. Lunches were served at the church on the first day and at the rest room of the Suffrage League of Aiken the second day. An automobile drive about the beautiful roads of the city was provided through the thoughtfulness of its citizens.

Two notable resolutions were passed, one a protest sent to the ministerial union of Columbia, to be presented to the city council, against Sunday moving picture shows, and another endorsing woman suffrage. The Suffrage League in its annual convention in the capital city endorsed the amendment for national constitutional prohibition, and the state president, Mrs. Harriett P. Lynch, was present and addressed the delegates.

Mrs. W. C. Bell, a former Ohioan, who conducted the devotional exercises on one evening, gave reminiscences of "Mother" Stewart and Frances Willard, both of whom, in her girlhood days, she had known. On Saturday evening two medal contests were held.

The chief feature of the convention was the address of Mrs. Ella A. Boole, vice-president of the National W. C. T. U., who spoke to a large audience Sunday morning, and a still larger one Sunday evening. The convention voted to purchase a $50 Liberty Bond and a collection of $14 was taken for the "Door of Hope" in Columbia. At a mass meeting in the theater on Sunday afternoon, Hon. Charlton Du Rant, who led the fight for the "bone dry" law in the senate, addressed a large audience, taking as his text the Anti-Prohibition Manual, the inconsistencies of which he treated unsparingly. Hon. G. L. Toole of Aiken, a candidate for Congress, also addressed the meeting, the presiding officer of which was Hon. Claude Sawyer, another of Aiken's leading prohibitionists.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: President, Mrs. Joseph Sprott; vice-president, Mrs. J. L. Mims; corresponding secretary, Miss Cleo Attaway; recording secretary, Mrs. T. R. Denny; treasurer, Mrs. Charles P. Robinson. Y. P. B. secretary, Miss Antoinette Denny; L. T. L. secretary, Miss Leila Attaway; editor Palmetto White Ribbon, Mrs. J. L. Mims.

WHITE RIBBON HOME AT AYER CANTONMENT CENTER OF INTEREST AT ANNUAL GATHERING OF OLD BAY STATE

convention church truly described as "hilarious giving." Mrs. Sydna Eldridge of Vineyard Haven has been appointed house mother, and one need only look into her face to know that the home-sick, lonely soldier laddie from any part of the nation will find in her a friend and a mother. The house, No. 5 East Main St., Ayer, will be formally opened early in November, and if there are any daughters of Massachusetts or of New England who would like to have a part in the work of the old home state from which they may now be far removed, any gift of useful or fancy articles, pictures, money or anything else will be most gratefully received. We hope that in particular the white ribboners who have sons at Ayer will let us know their names and the names of their companies, that special invitations to social gatherings may be sent them. There is a large barn upon the grounds which we hope by spring to have fitted up for a great recreation hall with rooms above for the mothers, wives and sisters of the men.

While this work must of necessity come to the front in the present world crisis, other lines of white ribbon activity will by no means be neglected. The state president stated clearly in her annual address that "we can do no more patriotic service to our country at this time than to go steadily forward with all the lines of service in local, county, state and National unions." The work of Americanization will be pushed with new vigor, while Scientific Temperance Instruction, Moral Education, Health, Medical Temperance, Franchise and other allied departments will be kept constantly to the fore. Special efforts will also be made for the organization of Young People's Branches and Loyal Temperance Legions. The membership of the state at the present time is 12,508 and the aim is to increase it to at lease 15,000.

The speakers for the evening meetings were Dr. W. G. Puddefoot and Miss Flora E. Strout, who delighted all who heard her, while the last evening was given up to the Young People's Branch and the Social Service department. Most interesting word pictures and object lessons of the many activities of the Good Will Home in Springfield, the W. C. T. U. Settlement in Worcester, the Frances E. Willard Settlement and Llewsac Lodge were given. We doubt if there is any state in the nation which has attempted so many worth-while things in its Social Service department as has Massachusetts. The Frances E. Willard Settlement is a marvel of efficiency and the smaller activities already mentioned are following closely in its wake.

Our own dear Mary Frances Willard Anderson was present and gave one of her inimitable addresses for a few minutes during the Y. P. B. program, followed by a pageant, or allegory,—or what you will—"The Triumph of Freedom," arranged by Miss Mabel Hazelton, state Y. P. B. secretary, and by the state W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Katharine Lent Stevenson. It called forth enthusiastic praise and the Post-Executive committee asked that it might be published. It was also voted that at least one thousand extra copies of the president's address be published and given the widest possible circulation.

All the former officers were re-elected, with the exception of the recording secretary. Mrs. Helen G. Rice, who has been recording secretary since that office was created, received the nomination on the first ballot, but declined to serve for another year. Mrs. Helen H. Foster was accordingly promoted from assistant to recording secretary, and Mrs. Myrtle L. Spooner of North Easton was made assistant. A feeling of deep sadness pervaded the convention when Mrs. Rice refused longer to serve. It will seem strange indeed to see anyone in her place. However, she is not lost to the work and can never be, for few people have put such generous, self-sacrificing service into the W. C. T. U., local, county, state and National, as has she. She is still on the staff of National lecturers and is also state L. T. L. secretary for the ensuing year. A full delegation was elected for the National convention and it is probable that there will be many guests as well, as Washington is a very popular meeting place.

The convention adopted this rally cry for the year:

"New unions, Y. P. B.'s and L. T. L.'s in each county.
New members in each union,
New methods in our work,
New subscribers to our papers,
New faith in God and new consecration to our cause.
'Behold, I make all things new.'"

LADY MACBETH AND HER MOTIVES

still into which the fumes ascend. The description may seem far-fetched to us, but alchemy was very popular in those days, and though the terms be unfamiliar, we can get the main idea, that the mind, including memory and reason, is rendered utterly useless by alcohol. The word "quell" in the last line is essentially the same as "kill" and Lady Macbeth means that the attendants, saturated with liquor, shall bear the responsibility of the murder.

When Macbeth considers this plan and is convinced that he can do the deed with impunity, he declares that his mind is made up to it, and he will "bend up each corporal agent to this terrible feat." She drugs the possets; she places the daggers; he strikes the blow; the deed is done.

Some are inclined to look on Lady Macbeth as a fiend incarnate, her husband's evil genius, utterly devoid of any natural feelings. But she says herself that they must screw their courage to the sticking-place and this implies an effort made in resistance to an opposite feeling. She is afraid she may weaken and so she invokes evil spirits to unsex her, and stop up the passage to remorse, that no natural compunctions may shake her fell purpose. That there are stirrings of human feeling in her breast we see from this reference to the old man: "Had he not resembled my father as he slept, I had done it." Because she is not a fiend, but a woman, there is, she knows, some danger lest her ambitious purpose should fail of accomplishment, hindered by thoughts of pity or considerations of right and wrong. It is because she is afraid of her own better nature that she calls these spirits to her aid.

Neither to these alone does she appeal; she seeks assistance from spirits of another kind. She takes a draught of that same drink she gave the grooms, to strengthen herself for her part in the crime that is to make her husband king and herself queen of Scotland. "That which hath made them drunk hath made me bold," she says, "that which hath quenched them hath given me fire."

This is a very suggestive statement, and leads one to inquire why the same drug should quench, as it were, one person, and give fire to another. Apparently it acts in small doses as a stimulant, and in large ones as a narcotic, but a little thought will convince us that the effect is essentially the same in both cases.

The brain, as we now understand, consists of the cerebrum, the seat of conscious action, including all the higher functions, the cerebellum, which is concerned with the co-ordination of the muscles, and the medulla, or bulb, wherein are found nervous centres governing heart and lungs. The effect of poisoning by alcohol is first seen in the cerebrum, where it is manifested by loss of self-control and confusion of thought. The cerebellum is next affected and the subject cannot regulate his movements; lastly when the medulla is narcotized the heart and lung centres stop functioning and death results. In the case of the grooms, when death and nature do contend about them whether they live or die, it is because the narcotic effect has been deep enough to involve the medulla.

Lady Macbeth takes no such draught; a small quantity suffices to deaden the higher centres of her brain and paralyze the feelings of compunction that might have hindered her. She takes it for that very purpose.

The reason why alcohol makes a person bold to do what otherwise he would never do is thus expressed by one of our American medical authorities: "The effect is to attack the protoplasm of the most highly specialized cells. The sense of shame, the sense of decency, the sense of right and wrong, the equipoise, that part of our complex organism which has differentiated civilized man from the savage, and savages from animals, these disappear under its influence."

An amateur climbing in the Alps took a drink of whisky before he attempted a very dangerous crevasse, and boasted that after so doing, he jumped it like a bird. "Like a fool, rather," was his friend's comment. The effect of the whisky was simply to make him regardless of consequences, because the higher centres concerned with judgment were paralyzed. The same thing holds good in regard to crime. Lady Macbeth is bold because she has for the moment laid to sleep her reason and judgment and the better feelings that otherwise might give her pause.

Macbeth wanted the throne but was probably "too full of the milk of human kindness to catch the nearest way." He was not without strong ambition but would hardly have murdered to attain his desire. He would have drawn back, as we have seen, but for his wife's influence, and her contempt for him when he hesitated. And as he would not have done the deed without her, so perhaps she would not have done it without the wine. Since she felt the need of it to make her bold, it would seem that she was not quite bold enough without it. So this crime might never have been attempted but for alcohol.

Be that as it may, we may safely assume that though attempted, it would have failed. Like every other royal personage Duncan had his bodyguard whose duty it was to defend him with their very lives. Instead of so doing, at the moment of danger, they are in a deep sleep and "mock their charge with snores." And why? Because they have partaken of the lethal cup. Thus twice over we find alcohol an important factor in the plot.

God only knows in how many tragedies the wide world over it has been a factor. The Scottish heath of a bygone age, the American home of the twentieth century, together with a vast variety of human habitations, unnumbered and unknown, have been the scenes of plots essentially similar. There is some fault that holds the possibilities of tragedy, ambition in one case, weakness in another, jealousy in a third. These may lead to nothing worse than an ordinary degree of unhappiness. But alcohol is added and becomes a determining factor. Then ambition plus alcohol, or weakness plus alcohol or jealousy plus alcohol spells murder.

The connection between strong drink and crime was fully recognized in Shakespeare's time though of course it was not understood as it is today. An act was passed in 1607 for repressing drunkenness which contains these words:

"The loathsome and odyous Synne of Drunkennes is of late growen into comon use within this Realme being the root and foundacion of many other enormious Synnes, as Bloodshed, Stabbings, Murder, Swearings, Fornicacion Adulterye and such like, to the great dishonour of God and of our Nacion, the overthrowe of many good Artes and Manuell Trades the disablinge of dyvers Workmen and the genrell ympovrishing of many good Subjects."

Since the nature of alcohol has not changed in the three hundred years since these words were written and since it has not yet been prohibited by national law in the old country or the new, its effects remain today just the same as ever.

As, however, we understand them so much better than did our forefathers, and as scientific investigation has demonstrated to us the close connection between alcohol and crime, and the reasons for the same, we are far more to blame for allowing it to exist in our midst than were those who lived in the seventeenth century.

Physiologists, psychologists, alienists and criminologists speak with the authority of expert knowledge against the use of alcohol. Their testimony is supported by a vast amount of practical experience. Colonel Maus, recently retired as surgeon-general of the Eastern Department of the United States Army after forty-one years of service, says: "Practically all the crime committed in the army directly or indirectly can be traced to the effect of alcohol."

Here is a letter from an English captain written from the front: "We sincerely hope the English and French governments will unite to enforce a complete prohibition. On looking over my orderly room cases for the last few months I note that with few exceptions all the offenses are attributable to drink and the exceptions are trifling affairs. The only cure and the one sincerely hoped for by those of us who view with apprehension our steadily increasing use of alcohol is its total effective prohibition both in England and France."

Very different from these offenses and not to be mentioned in the same breath with them are the unspeakable crimes of the Huns in Belgium. Testimony given in the Bryce report and gathered from the letters of Teuton soldiers, shows that in many cases these atrocities which have shocked the civilized world were committed under the influence of liquor. Even Germans would hardly have treated helpless little children as they have done had they not been more or less drugged.

We have in Macbeth weird suggestions of supernatural powers affecting human destiny, witches, with their charm wound up, withered and wild in appearance, making their baneful influence felt from the outset; their cauldron a compote of all gruesome things, suggestive of horror. The fillet of a fenny snake, eye of newt and toe of frog, wool of bat and tongue of dog, and the other ingredients of the enchanted pot may sound sufficiently repulsive, but for "a charm of powerful trouble" there is nothing to compare with that apparently harmless wine-cup whose contents will just stupefy the moral nature enough to enable the user, though a woman of refinement, to become a criminal.

As Lady Macbeth goes, after the deed, to replace the daggers beside the grooms, a loud knocking is heard without. It continues some time as the porter is slow in responding. "Knock, knock, knock," he says, "Who's there, in the name of Beelzebub?" and he pictures himself as the keeper of hell-gate, letting the sinners in.

His soliloquy is not the mere chatter of a loquacious old servitor. It suggests that this is indeed the gate of hell in a very real sense. This beautiful home, where "heaven's breath smells wooingly and where amid music of the birds and the perfume of the flowers loyal hearts might live happily and entertain for a season a good and gracious friend,—this place is transformed into a hell on earth. It becomes the scene of murder, and its inmates have brought upon themselves a punishment which will ever increase in the intensity of its horror, and compared with which any corporal suffering seems unworthy to be mentioned. Remorse is hell. This is what Lady Macbeth has brought upon herself and her husband, and the means by which she has compassed that deed, fatal to Duncan's life, but far more awfully fatal to their own two souls—is drink.

When the human spirit maintains its ascendency over the lower nature and is itself guided and illumined and possessed by the Divine, how happy and harmonious life becomes! But when, through alcohol's delusive influence, the higher nature is deadened and dethroned, then the storms of passion sweep unhindered destroying both character and happiness, and life may be described in Macbeth's own words, as "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

From such rueful wreck and ruin, good Lord, deliver us.

TEACHING JIMMY SELF-CONTROL

MILFORD W. FOSHAY

Little Jimmy Ward was turning out to be a cry-baby. Big Jim was a good deal concerned about it. He had noticed that from the time his boy began to walk, whenever he tumbled down, tears and noise were in evidence. The same kind of cry came when he was denied his own way. It was not a lusty cry of protest or anger, but a cry of dejection, sort of a heart-broken wail. He was hurt and his spirit was gone.

Jimmy's father looked back to the time when he was the same sort of chap, and he had lost out by it. Half his life had been ruined because he had no resisting power. Thus, when he was invited to have a drink with the boys and prove that he was a man, he did it without a thought of the possibility of refusal. It took just about six months for John Barleycorn to become his master, and had it not been for an unusual experience he never would have come out from under the tyranny. What could he do to save his boy from the sure results of the same kind of weakness?

Jimmy had started his first term in school, and every afternoon he came home crying. He had fallen down, and some one had called him a cry-baby. He did his best to merit the name. The next day a boy shoved him, and he resorted to tears. The following day, a girl pinched him, and his eyes overflowed. And so it went on for a few weeks.

One Saturday afternoon when Mr. Ward was having his half-holiday from business he took Jimmy off by himself and started a series of experiments. First, he told his son to strike his hand against the edge of the table until it hurt.

"What d'yeh want me to do that for?" he asked in alarm, almost beginning to cry. "I don't like to be hurt!"

"I know that, but you do get hurt nearly every day. Everybody gets hurt some, all through their lives, and I want to teach you how to make it hurt less. Now, then, hit your hand there on the table."

Thus encouraged, Jimmy struck his hand until he caught it in the other one with an "Ouch!"

"It hurt, didn't it?" his father asked quickly and sympathetically. "It's enough to make any little boy cry."

Half a minute of this kind of talk, and Jimmy was blubbering, and rubbing the hurt place. Then Mr. Ward turned the little fellow's mind to something else, and when the effect was passed, said:

"Now, I want you to strike your other hand on the table harder than you did before. I want to show you something."

The boy began very gently, increasing the force on the smooth surface. Suddenly his father tipped the table, his hand came against the sharp edge, and a howl of pain went up. Instantly Mr. Ward showed him a toy box he had wanted for a long time, saying sharply, "Here, Jimmy, look at this."

The crying ceased, a look of delight spread over the child's features and he thought no more of the hurt. After a few minutes his father asked about the hand.

"Why, I forgot all about it!" Jimmy answered, in astonishment. "And it hurt like everything, too."

"Jimmy," his father went on, gravely, "this is what I wanted to show you. If you learn to turn your attention to something else when you are hurt you will not have to cry and have the boys and girls calling you a cry-baby."

Quite a long time he talked. Then he suggested that they make a game of it. Jimmy readily promised to try to think of something else every time he was hurt, and the bargain was struck.

An immediate improvement was seen, and it continued right along, for Mr. Ward saw to it that Jimmy did not forget that he was playing a game. This was all very well for a while, but it did not go deep enough. It was simply good preparation for getting ready to meet the more important things. As time went by and Jimmy grew older, his father explained that forgetfulness of an injury was not the highest kind of self-control. Circumstances would arise which could not be put aside, but must be met. He illustrated these talks by his failures in examinations, told him how much more manly it was to resolve to do better next time than to be depressed, and had the satisfaction of seeing him grow stronger in his attitude toward unpleasant occurrences.

So it went on until Jimmy reached the age when he went out nights with other young fellows. His father trembled, yet was hopeful. In an intimate talk he had set the manliness of Christ before him, showing especially the self-control of Jesus in refusing to be made a king, in order that He might become a Savior. He saw that Jimmy was much impressed with the idea that to have a right purpose and, for the sake of accomplishing it, subordinate the inclination to ease and pleasure, was the glory of self-control and yielded the greatest degree of happiness. After this, Mr. Ward waited anxiously for a testing time, which, in the nature of things, he knew was bound to come.

One night Jimmy did not come in at ten o'clock, which was the limit set. Mr. Ward did not sleep. Jimmy came in at two in the morning.

"Hello, Jimmy, a little late, aren't you?" his father called out.

"Say, dad, I wish you'd come in my room a minute," was the low response.

Slipping out of bed, his father went in. Jimmy was sitting on the edge of a chair nursing his knee and staring at the wall. After a moment he spoke, with his eyes still on the wall.

"I guess I see now what you've been trying to do for a good while with me. This business of self-control's got a whole lot to it, and all your teaching was hammered in to stick. This evening Jack Farley took us to the hotel, and I'm ashamed to say I took a drink with the rest. Didn't feel like resisting the way some fools do, you know," and he turned his eyes on his father, while the last words came out sarcastically to the delight of Mr. Ward.

"Well," Jimmy went on as his father nodded understandingly, "we kept it up a little while, and then Burt Hinson began to act silly. The stuff went to his head, and I saw the best-standing senior in school acting like an idiot. Whatever self-control he had naturally, was taken away from him. Like a flash, I saw things. Your teaching was driven home, I tell you! I saw that a man has need of all the self-control he can acquire to meet what's coming in life, and that he's the biggest kind of fool to take something that'll leave him wide open to anything that happens along. None of the stuff, thank you, for me. You've done it, dad; you've done it!"

This was ten years ago, and Mr. Ward has not yet had cause for worriment about Jimmy.

Maryland White Ribboners Celebrate 1,000 Membership Gain

Special Correspondence

Delegates from every section of Maryland, 157 in number and representing a membership of 5,016, attended the state convention in Towson. The residents of the city opened their doors and cared for the visitors in a most hospitable manner, a large part of the entertaining of delegates being done by those who are not members of the local union.

The features of the opening day were the addresses of welcome by Judge Frank I. Duncan, Senator N. D. R. Allen, and the local president, Mrs. C. Rebecca Bowen, and the response on behalf of the convention by Mrs. Mary G. Bailey of Prince George's county.

The grand gold medal contest was one of the best ever held in the state. The judges had great difficulty in deciding on the winner, but the medal was finally awarded to Miss Lillian Gore, the presentation speech being made by Miss Flora E. Strout, World's W. C. T. U. representative to Burma.

On Wednesday morning the convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. Mary R. Haslup, and from first to last there was "something doing" every minute. The review of the year's work by the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Annie D. Starr, showed a gain of approximately 1,000 members. The treasurer's report showed receipts of $8,485.95, and expenditures of $7,512.26. The annual address of Mrs. Mary R. Haslup, for twenty-three years the able president of the Maryland W. C. T. U., was a message of great power and inspiration. Miss Flora E. Strout, World's W. C. T. U. representative gave an interesting account of her work in the mission fields of Japan and Burma.

The Towson L. T. L. presented a clever and most entertaining playlet, "The Coming Victory." Children represented the dry states, Alaska being impersonated by a tiny tot in a fur costume. Another tot carried a huge roll marked "Webb-Kenyon Law." Maryland, a little maid in white, wearing a pennant marked "Prohibition," in a most pleasing manner welcomed the dry states. Miss Carrie A. Greene, state L. T. L. secretary, gave a glowing report of the year's work, a total of twenty-one new legions having been organized.

Comfort bags and the many-tailed bandages have been made by the hundreds, and the women in every local union are eager to do "their bit" for the comfort and safety of the boys who have responded to the call to arms.

The speaker of the last evening of the convention was Rev. John Royal Harris, head of the Pennsylvania Dry Federation, who gave his address on "Sinning Against the Multitude," a stirring and lively discourse.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Mary R. Haslup; vice-president, Mrs. Pauline W. Holme; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Annie D. Starr; recording secretary, Miss Rebecca T. Miller; treasurer, Mrs. K. A. Lips.

Among Our Workers

Mrs. Lora S. La Mance, National W. C. T. U. organizer, was the speaker at the Ontario (Canada) provincial W. C. T. U. convention, held in Cornwall, September 25-28. Much enthusiasm prevailed. All of the former officers were re-elected. The citizens of Cornwall, in hospitable Canadian fashion, gave a banquet and took the delegates for a long drive along the beautiful St. Lawrence river. Ontario white ribbon women are pushing relief work and providing comforts for the boys in the trenches. One delegate at the convention had six sons in the service, and several others had three, showing that Canadian women are both brave and patriotic. They expect their sons to go to the defense of their country and pride themselves on setting an example of fortitude.

Mrs. Eliza E. Peterson, National superintendent of Work Among Colored People, recently spent over four weeks in Georgia, organizing seven permanent unions and gaining many new members among those of her own race. One of the officers of the Georgia W. C. T. U., in writing of her work, says: "I am delighted with Mrs. Peterson's work. She is as wonderful in her way as was Booker T. Washington in his." Those who know her best realize that she is displaying wonderful powers of leadership and endearing herself to her own people by her great patience and tenderness.

Mrs. Linnie Carl, National Y. P. B. field secretary, closed an engagement in Essex county, New York, with a rousing meeting at Keeseville, Sunday evening, September 16. "She is a fine speaker and held the attention of her audience," writes our correspondent.

Those versed in Oriental languages will be interested in the fact that the practical system of stenography adapted to their use by Mrs. Julia A. Barrett, a white ribboner, has received official recognition from the highest educational authorities of China. Four somewhat different systems were submitted for approval, among them the one originated by Mrs. Barrett, and entered in the competition by her former pupil, T. F. Lam.

Scotch Ship-Building Town Gives Big Majority for Prohibition

It is frequently said that the shipbuilders of Scotland are opposed to wartime prohibition. To ascertain the truth of this statement, a citizen's committee in Clydebank, a ship-building town a few miles from Glasgow, arranged for a comprehensive plebiscite. Ballots to be signed by every inhabitant of the town over sixteen years of age were distributed to the householders. The counting of the votes took place in the municipal buildings, the mayor acting as returning officer. The count showed 8,207 in favor of prohibition and only 1,861 against, or a majority for prohibition of 6,346 out of 10,000 votes cast.

McLennan County, Texas, Joins the Dry Ranks

McLennan county, Texas, voted dry at a recent election. This action on the part of the voters seems to have been inspired by a desire to safeguard the soldiers at Camp MacArthur from the influences that impair efficiency. Seventy saloons and five wholesale houses are affected.

Died of Treating!

Among drinking people treating the boys who are going into the training camps is one of the approved forms of expressing good will, and numerous drinks are considered a necessary preliminary to wishing the prospective soldier luck and health and joy and safety, and whatever else may seem to the wishers desirable. This means of so-called good fellowship, however, leads in a direction entirely away from the prizes coveted for the boys. Camp Grant, at Rockford, Ill., has recently witnessed the tragic effect of this manner of expressing good wishes. Private Just Anderson, of the ambulance train, is dead at thirty-one years of age, as a result of delirium tremens. His number was drawn among the early ones and he announced that he was "going to war." His friends began to buy him drinks. He was an ice man and every saloonkeeper on his route "bought" every time he appeared.

When he was called before his division board he was so hilariously intoxicated he was told to come again a few days later. On his second visit he was accepted.

That called for "parties" from his friends. They continued until he was ordered to Camp Grant. Then all limits were exceeded. Finally he was put on the train with a big bottle for company. He was helped from the train when it reached there—merrily, noisily drunk.

And now he is dead, dead at thirty-one, through the influence of friends who thought to honor him for his patriotism in giving himself in the hour of his country's need.

Louisiana to Lose 1,500 Saloons

Approximately 1,500 Louisiana saloons, 500 of them in New Orleans, will be compelled to close their doors as a result of the check put upon the manufacture of whisky by the federal government, says a southern correspondent to the Christian Science Monitor.

War Tax Puts More Than 500 Chicago Bars Out of Business

Chicago saloonkeepers are feeling the pinch of the war tax on beer and whisky, and as a result the past week has witnessed the closing of many of the long-established saloons of the city, the number being variously estimated at anywhere from 500 to 1,000. This is the period for the renewal of the semi-annual licenses, and while the records will not be complete for a few days the indications are that many of the saloons which have had a large trade in ten-cent whisky will be unable to remain in operation.

"The approach of the water wagon as the national vehicle, the bar on hard liquor manufacture, war taxes, increased prices for old King Alcohol in barrel or bottle and decreased consumption—these things tied the crepe on many a dramshop door," said the Chicago Herald in explanation. "Fearing a hard winter, the owners did not renew their licenses. The estimate of experts at the city hall is that about one saloon in every eleven in Chicago put up its shutters forever."

Campaigning for Total Abstinence in the Philippines

The victory for prohibition in the island of Porto Rico is giving impetus to the movement in other island dependencies and in the Latin countries of South America. The subject of prohibition is a live one in the Philippines, and a campaign with headquarters in Manila is in progress. Miss Vera Adamson, a Christian missionary from the United States, has gladly consented to distribute temperance literature, of which the National W. C. T. U. has sent her a supply, and to give temperance teaching along with her regular missionary activities.

"There is surely great need of temperance teaching in the Philippines," writes Miss Adamson, "for the people know almost nothing about scientific temperance and almost all the people, men, women and children, smoke. Cigarets are used in Manila but in the North it is cigars—a home made variety about ten inches long which do for the whole family and last a good part of a week. It is strange to see two people stop on the street, many times total strangers, and get a light, one from the other, women from men and men from women—it makes no difference just so they can go on their way with a smoke.

"Here in Vigan I am able to do temperance work with my regular duties through our Bible woman, who is an earnest temperance worker. She has written articles on temperance for the papers, and is able to distribute anti-liquor literature as she goes from house to house in her Bible work. Work is also being done in the Sunday schools. In Vigan we have a temperance superintendent and observe Temperance Sundays by special talks and distribution of literature. Much of the literature sent by the National W. C. T. U. can be used among the high school boys in our Christian dormitory. The boys in the school are not allowed to smoke, although I fear many of them do when they are away from the dormitory.

"There is considerable work already being done among the women of Manila. Tagalog, the language spoken in Manila, is different from that spoken in other parts of the islands. It seems advisable, however, to have literature translated into that language for distribution among that tribe. At Laoag, farther north, mothers' meetings have been started, and they may be a nucleus for temperance work. Certainly some of the literature sent will be helpful to them. At present a larger number of young women are being educated and prepared for leadership. In them is our hope for the future."

FRANK G. CARPENTER

IN every Chautauqua Association and in nearly every town and village of the United States, Frank G. Carpenter is known as the man who can come back from some place and then tell about it so that you think you have been there. After going into all the odd corners of the world, Mr. Carpenter has now turned his steps toward the farms and factories of his native land. Already he has told stories in the Christian Herald of steel and cotton, of sugar and of sulphur, of oil and lumber, and he has only just made a beginning. This exceedingly interesting series of articles, under the title of the

GREATER UNITED STATES

appears regularly in the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Mr. Carpenter is making studies of our farms, factories, and mines from the standpoint of efficiency and industrial preparedness, and will make careful investigations of the wealth and resources of the United States, telling in the Christian Herald how they may be mobilized in times of need.

The aim of these travels is to learn just what we have in resources and industry, and how they may be protected, developed, and made most efficient for the American people.

Mr. Carpenter is making extensive travels throughout the United States, covering the great agricultural and industrial centers. He is taking up the great industries and is showing the new things that are taking place in them, especially drugs, dyes, etc. These articles deal with New England, with the newest South with its iron and sulphur, cotton and chemicals, and with the bread and meat lands of the Mississippi Valley. He will show what is going on in and about the Great Lakes, including the vast iron mines on which our manufacturing industry is founded.

Mr. Carpenter will visit and tell about the fast-growing Southwest including the oil and gasoline centers of Texas and Oklahoma, the new states of Arizona and New Mexico, and also the Northwest and the Pacific Slope.

The Rockies with their gold and silver, and the mountains of copper now being mined with steam shovels, will give interesting stories, as will also Uncle Sam's work in exploiting our National Parks, and in reclaiming the desert and in draining the swamps.

Preferred Prohibition to Presidency

At the convention of the Southern Appalachian Good Roads association, held recently in Nashville, Tenn., prohibition found an ardent champion in the person of Mr. A. D. Williams, a resident of West Virginia. The convention had indicated that it did not propose to endorse the Federal amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition. Nominated as president of the society, Mr. Williams declined the honor, saying: "For the good of the Good Roads association, myself and my family, I feel compelled to decline. Because of the self-respect which I hold I refuse to accept the presidency of an organization with purposes so narrow as to refuse endorsement of better and cleaner government, as well as good roads." In vain did his friends who were opposed to the endorsement of the measure try to persuade him that no "personal prejudice" should influence him. Mr. Williams remained steadfast. After much discussion, the convention decided to endorse the Federal amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition. Mr. Williams was immediately made president of the association and graciously accepted amid enthusiastic applause.

Commendatory Words of English Press on American Anti-Liquor Methods

In the course of two articles by Lord Northcliffe, entitled "The Americans at War," appearing simultaneously in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, The Times, and The Daily Mail of London, he says: "America has a prompt and unexpected way of doing things in this country which is pleasingly refreshing. One morning I read that all saloons within five miles of Yaphank had been closed. Nothing more was said about it. No discussion preceded the matter. There were no abstruse calculations as to compensation. The United States is at war; saloons are not good for war, close them. That's all there was to it."

The Daily Mail in its leading article, "No Beating About the Bush," remarks: "Americans are just as devoted as we are to the liberty of the individual, but no nation is so energetic in putting individual liberty in its proper place when it threatens to hinder the public good. Their common sense, for instance, tells them that the sale of liquor in the neighborhood of camps is a bad thing. They do not, as we do, look out at once for some method by which the question can be 'compromised.' Instead they close the saloons within a given radius, and there is no dodging of the issue, no agitation over 'vested interests,' no talk of 'compensation.' The saloons are simply closed."

Chicago Cabaret Claims New Victim of Drink

Another item has been added to the long list of tragedies which have grown out of the cabaret night life of Chicago, in the disappearance of a girl of seventeen, Miss Cecile Franke, who made a round of the cabarets of the city in company with another girl and two men.

"The cabarets are the best arguments of prohibitionists today," Chief of Police Schuettler is reported as saying. "Unless the cabarets are closed Chicago will be dry—dry as a bone—in six years. They are bad, all bad."

Boston Liquor Man Sentenced to Jail for Selling to Sailor

Judge M. J. Creed of the Boston Municipal Criminal court recently sentenced Daniel J. Bresnahan to serve six months in the house of correction for selling intoxicating liquor to a sailor. "Any man who sells liquor to sailors or soldiers in our country's present condition," declared the court, "deserves a substantial sentence, and should be imprisoned and not let off with a fine."

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 99, Washington, D.C.

NEW YORK VOTES FOR SUFFRAGE BY 95,000 MAJORITY

TWO MILLION WOMEN IN EMPIRE STATE ENFRANCHISED

New York, the strategic state in the woman suffrage movement, has surrendered and given to its women full franchise rights. By a majority of over 95,000 the suffrage amendment was voted into the constitution of the state on November 6. As a result of this election nearly 2,000,000 women will be enfranchised.

"Over the top at last," was the comment of Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, when the result was reported to her. "Now all we have to do is roll down the other side to complete victory for the women of the United States."

Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, honorary president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, declared: "The New York election will have a decided influence upon the British House of Lords in granting the extension of woman suffrage to the women of Great Britain. It will also influence the French parliament to take similar action."

This victory followed one of the most thorough campaigns ever conducted. Moving pictures, signboards, newspaper advertisements, street parades, out-door rallies and innumerable indoor meetings were some of the agencies used to bring the suffrage message to the voters.

That this notable landslide for "votes for women" in New York will influence Congress to adopt a resolution submitting a federal suffrage amendment to the state legislatures cannot be doubted. National constitutional suffrage for women in the near future is inevitable.

The text of the suffrage amendment which won November 6 follows:

> Every citizen of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a citizen for ninety days, and an inhabitant of this state one year next preceding an election, and for the last four months a resident of the election district in which he or she may offer his or her vote, shall be entitled to vote at such an election in the election district of which he or she shall at the time be a resident, and not elsewhere, for all officers that now are or hereafter may be elective by the people, and upon all questions which may be submitted to the vote of the people;
> Provided, however, that a citizen by marriage shall have been an inhabitant of the United States for five years; and provided that in time of war no elector in the actual military service of the state or of the United States, in army or navy thereof, shall be deprived of his or her vote by reason of his or her absence from such election district; and the legislature shall have power to provide the manner in which and the time and the place at which such absent electors may vote, and for the return and canvass of their votes in the election districts in which they respectively reside.

The former law uses the word "male" in the first line, and the words "or she" and "or her" are not used.

Suffrage Situation in Indiana and Ohio

The Indiana suffrage law, passed by the last legislature, has been held to be unconstitutional by the Indiana supreme court as to all except presidential suffrage.

On November 6, Ohio voted on a referendum on the Reynolds suffrage law, repealing it by a majority of approximately 100,000. This law, conferring upon women the right to vote for Presidential candidates, was passed by the last legislature. The referendum was promoted by the liquor interests. There was in the possession of the Ohio Suffrage Association ample evidence to convict of fraud and forgery, the men back of the petition, but the courts and secretary of state did not grant the association a general hearing nor give them an opportunity to throw out the petitions on these grounds. According to the Woman Citizen, 581 of these petitions were circulated by saloonkeepers and barkeepers; 246 petitions were circulated by employes of the brewers or personal liberty leagues, and by men most closely allied with the liquor interests, and everything connected with the referendum movement plainly showed that it was the work of the political liquor ring of Ohio.

San José Votes Out Saloons

San José's seventy-eight saloons must close their doors January 1, 1918. Such was the verdict at the polls November 6, when by a majority of 1,547 the citizens voted to rid the city of all dramshops.

On November 20, Los Angeles will vote on a measure that will do away with certain vicious developments of café night life and will outlaw the saloons, and on November 27, San Diego will vote on an ordinance to make the city bone dry.

Nebraska Brewery Becomes Cereal Mill

The plant of the Gehling brewery at Falls City, Neb., is reported to have been converted into a cereal mill. The concern will be known as the Western Cereal company. The mills will soon be in active operation.

New Jersey Elects Legislature Favorable to Local Option

Election returns in New Jersey indicate that the new legislature will favor the passage of a local option bill.

Attorney General Rules Against Importation of Distilled Liquors

A plan to import large quantities of distilled spirits into the United States by taking advantage of a technical loophole produced by the wording of the war emergency revenue bill has been defeated by the decision of Attorney General Gregory. This decision is to the effect that the war emergency revenue bill does not repeal the provisions of the Food Conservation Act governing the importation of distilled spirits. This act provides that after September 9 no distilled spirits shall be imported into the United States.

Election Shows Prohibition Sentiment Strong in Kentucky

Dry majorities in most of the counties of Kentucky on November 6 virtually insure the election of a legislature favorable to the passage of a measure submitting a constitutional amendment.

NEW MEXICO PROVES PATRIOTISM BY TWO TO ONE VOTE AGAINST LIQUOR TRAFFIC

New Mexico is on the map—the prohibition map—the twenty-seventh state. By a majority, estimated at over 20,000 votes, New Mexico voted out the liquor traffic, root and branch, on November 6. Every county and every city turned in a fine majority against John Barleycorn. Albuquerque, Santa Fe, Las Vegas, Gallup, Roswell and other cities put themselves on record for sobriety and righteousness.

The campaign was unique in one respect; the amendment had the support of all officialdom. Governor and Mrs. Lindsey were among its most eloquent and indefatigable champions. The secretary of state, Hon. Antonio Lucero, was chairman of the Dry Federation, and other prominent state officers, members of the supreme court and the United States Senators worked for it. As was anticipated, the Spanish-Americans, who form a large part of the population of the state, gave their support to the amendment.

The liquor interests attempted to deceive the people into believing they had given up hope at the outset and would make no organized opposition; but for months they had been carrying on a vigorous "pussyfoot" campaign and using liquor money freely in the circulation of anti-prohibition falsehoods and in appeals especially to the Spanish element. During the last weeks before election some of the liquor concerns openly attempted to circularize the state with an assortment of stale, hackneyed fabrications termed by them "arguments against prohibition." The falsity and weakness of these mis-statements were so palpable that they hardly merited a refutation and, judging from the election returns, few if any citizens were misled by them.

The victory in New Mexico will give a decided impetus to the dry movement in Texas, its neighbor to the east, which is now four-fifths dry and expects to vote on state-wide prohibition next year. Its influence will be felt tremendously in the campaign for National Constitutional Prohibition, as it gives assurance of one more state legislature ready to ratify the Federal amendment when it is submitted to the states by Congress, and it will strengthen the morale of every state that is to vote in 1918 and every legislature contemplating the passage of a prohibition measure during the coming winter.

FATE OF OHIO IN THE BALANCE

DRYS BELIEVE FAIR COUNT WILL GIVE PROHIBITION MAJORITY

Whatever shall be the final returns on the official re-count in the Ohio election, the outcome must be conceded to be a great triumph for prohibition. On November. 6, the state voted for the third time on the wet and dry question. In 1914, the wet majority was 84,152; in 1915, it was reduced to 55,408.

A special delivery message received as we go to press from Mrs. Lucy E. Van Kirk, editor of the Ohio state W. C. T. U. paper, says: "The result of the Ohio election at this writing is still undecided. We believe that prohibition has won by a substantial majority, but the liquor element is using the most desperate means to secure an adverse decision. They claim a mistake in the city of Cincinnati of 10,000 votes in one place and nearly 2,000 votes in another.

"The very name Cincinnati arouses our suspicions, and the governor of Ohio is now sending representatives to the city to investigate. The people want the truth and will not be satisfied with anything less. To show that we are not biassed in our opinion I quote from an editorial which appeared in the Ohio State Journal. The editor of this paper is in touch with Ohio politics and we think understands the situation.

"'Cincinnati's reputation in such matters is so bad that suspicion that the wet ring there is trying to steal the prohibition election is natural and inevitable,' says the Journal. 'Cincinnati is a corrupt and decadent town and persons who know anything of Ohio political history find it hard to believe that these discoveries of errors in favor of the wets are honest. They may be, but we find few, regardless of their convictions on the prohibition issue, who think so. If Cincinnati is honest this time, she is paying the penalty for her many crooked tricks of the past in the widespread feeling that she is not.

"'The whole decent Ohio public demands a fair count in Cincinnati. If it appears that the state has gone wet by reason of the eleventh-hour changes in Cincinnati's vote, no doubt some one will bring action to test the correctness of the count. Until then, as we understand it, the state administration can go no farther than to give its moral support to the effort to get at the truth. If suit is brought and there is complaint of the Hamilton county authorities' conduct of the prosecution, the state may step in and, through the attorney general or other counsel designated by the governor, direct the inquiry itself. When the time comes, we trust the state authorities will take hold of the matter with a firm hand. There is not much faith in Hamilton county justice and the people will hold the state administration responsible for finding out the truth and acting accordingly.'"

Only One Wet Spot in Delaware

As a result of the November 6 election, the state of Delaware is dry with the sole exception of the city of Wilmington. Rural New Castle county and the city of Wilmington voted as separate units, the county voting dry by 724 majority, and Wilmington voting wet by a majority of 2,371. The other two counties of the state, Kent and Sussex, have been dry since 1907.

The liquorites were given a hard fight in Wilmington and it is reported that they could not have carried the city by legal methods, but resorted to colonization and fraudulent registration.

Liquor Not Sold at Army Canteens in France, General Pershing Asserts

That everything possible is being done to encourage temperance, morality and wholesome living among the United States soldiers in France is affirmed by Adjutant General McCain of the War Department, in an interesting letter to Congressman John G. Cooper of Youngstown, Ohio, published recently in the Columbus Dispatch.

Mr. Cooper, some time ago, referred to the War Department reports he had received through high officials of the Presbyterian church, indicating that the American troops were allowed to purchase intoxicating liquor at their company canteens and that this condition encouraged intemperance and immorality.

General McCain cabled General Pershing and received a complete official report from the commander-in-chief of the American expeditionary forces.

Soft Drinks Sold

"General Pershing, to whom this matter was referred for investigation," says McCain's letter, "states that no canteens of the kind referred to by you are maintained with the American forces in France, and none such are contemplated.

"Exchanges similar to post exchanges, and at which only soft drinks are sold, are maintained by the Y. M. C. A. for the soldiers. In addition, some organizations maintain similar exchanges of their own."

General Pershing states that every proper effort has been made and will be made to insure temperance among officers and men of his command and that no one has so great an interest in the matter as those officers who are charged with the duty and responsibility of the command of our troops in France.

Copies of Army Orders

Accompanying his letter to Congressman Cooper, Adjutant General McCain enclosed copies of General Pershing's general orders to commanding officers, urging the maintenance of high moral standards among their men. "It is incumbent upon all officers, soldiers and civilians attached to the American expeditionary forces," one of these orders reads, "to co-operate in every way possible in the efforts to insure temperance and to prevent the ravages of diseases with their disabling consequences."

Another order directs that in all barracks and camps there shall be provided amusements, reading rooms, entertainments and athletic sports.

Officers Held Responsible

"While the chief responsibility for supplying opportunities for social recreation, physical and mental occupation and the giving of advice directed against intemperance and licentious living rests with the company officers," reads the order, "frequent lectures will also be given by medical officers. The dangers of disease will be clearly presented and preventive measures discussed."

Chicago Liquor Men Stop Free Drinks to Thirsty Cops

Chicago breweries and saloons for thirty years or more have been on intimate terms with the "cop on the beat," and he has received many a free drink of bourbon in the friendly back room of the saloon, while at the brewery the amount of beer to which he might help himself was limited only by his capacity. The Federal war tax on whisky and beer, however, has changed all that. Beginning November 1, it is said, all free drinks were discontinued. One brewery has posted the sign, "Policemen, Keep Out," and saloonkeepers claim that every free drink of whisky means eight cents out of the cash register.

Brief Against the Liquor Traffic

THE LAW SAYS:	That the LIQUOR TRAFFIC has "no inherent right" to exist.
THE COURTS:	That DRINK is largely the cause of CRIME and PAUPERISM.
PHYSICIANS:	That DRINK is the chief cause of DISEASE.
BUSINESS:	That DRINK produces INCOMPETENCY and INEFFICIENCY.
THE HOME:	That DRINK destroys HAPPINESS and PROSPERITY.
THE SCHOOL:	That DRINK is the greatest enemy of EDUCATION.
THE CHURCH:	That DRINK is the chief foe to RELIGION.
MOTHERHOOD:	That DRINK poisons the very FOUNTAINS of Life.
ECONOMY:	That DRINK WASTES food and ROBS labor.
CONSERVATION:	That DRINK is always DESTRUCTIVE, never CONSTRUCTIVE.
PATRIOTISM:	That DRINK has disqualified a large percentage of the young men called to the colors, and as General Leonard Wood says, "is the soldier's worst enemy."

Prohibition in Utah Takes Little Time for Adjustment

The "sobering up" process in Utah is being accomplished with much less discomfort than had been expected. Everybody, drinking men and drunkards, seems to be taking kindly to the new order of things. There seems to be little disposition on the part of any one to seek out the bootlegger or blind tiger. The Ogden (Utah) Standard tells of a father who for the first time brought his three children into the store for clothing. "This is the first time I have seen you here with your little ones," remarked the merchant, who was on intimate terms with the customer and ventured the comment as an indirect word of encouragement.

"Yes," said the father, "my money has been going for drink. This is the first time in years that any part of my wages has been spent in this way. I regret the past, but rejoice in this awakening, which has brought me to a sense of responsibility, and above all has cleared my befogged brain."

Florida Brewery to Become Sugar Refinery

The Florida Brewing Company, which has been in operation twenty years, has decided to convert its plant into a sugar refinery, the first in the state, it is said. Florida is particularly adapted to the cultivation of cane sugar, and the brewery is trying to introduce the co-operative plan which has been in successful operation in Cuba for many years. The meager number of license counties in Florida and the almost certain dry victory at the election in 1918 has made it imperative for this brewery to decide on some other line of industry.

Club Women Pledge Support to Dry Chicago Campaign

Mrs. Mary C. C. Bradford, president of the National Education Association, delivered a stirring address to 500 Chicago club women at a Dry Chicago breakfast recently, at which she enumerated some of the benefits of prohibition to Denver and the state of Colorado. She said, in part:

"Since prohibition went into effect in Colorado the number of tourists has doubled. The deposits in the savings banks have more than doubled. The bank clearings have increased 30 per cent. Business men report a 30 per cent increase in collections and a 10 per cent increase in sales. Building operations in Denver have increased during prohibition more than in many other cities. The population has increased. There are fewer vacant houses and stores. The county judges have reported a marvelous decrease in divorces and family troubles. Warden Tynan has closed one wing of the state penitentiary. Crimes of violence have almost ceased. All penal institutions throughout the state show a large decrease in population. There is also a considerable decrease in the number of inmates in the asylums. The homes of Denver have been wonderfully helped. Prohibition has caused a 10 per cent increase in public school attendance, 8 per cent of which is in the high schools. There has also been a 30 per cent increase in Sunday school attendance, and 10 per cent increase in church attendance."

Through resolutions declaring the liquor interests guilty of ruthless and frightful disregard of the morals and well-being of the youth of Chicago, and condemning liquor for the debauchery and crime growing out of the cabarets and dance halls of the city, the women pledged their support to all legitimate plans for bringing to a successful issue the Dry Chicago campaign.

Hemlock and Hardwood Manufacturers Commend Prohibition

Prohibition as an aid to efficiency was a subject that received considerable attention at a recent meeting in Milwaukee of the hemlock and hardwood manufacturers. No class of men have suffered more at the hands of the liquor traffic than have the lumbermen in our great forests, and one of the most beneficent aspects of prohibition has been its effect upon these men. This was the testimony of Mr. John Strange of Menasha. Liquor never helped any business, he declared, adding the further word that few people appreciate the appalling loss to business through this channel.

"It destroys individual happiness and business success," continued Mr. Strange. "As business men we have been too indifferent in setting a bad example to our employes in this regard. No question is of more importance to lumbermen than the abolition of this evil. From the standpoint of efficiency it is most important and vital to the welfare of the human family."

Hon. W. T. Evjue approached the question from a dollars and cents standpoint. When people realize that prohibition is an economic question they become more interested, he said. The biggest job on our hands now, next to the war, is the elimination of liquor, and production and labor, so necessary to the success of the war, are vitally affected by the liquor traffic. Other speakers were equally emphatic in their denunciation of the liquor traffic, and their appreciation of the benefits of prohibition.

UNUSUAL MUSICAL ATTRACTIONS AT THE NATIONAL CONVENTION

Washington's most gifted musicians will appear on the Convention program. The services of the Washington Ladies' Orchestra (Minnie Hoch Smith, director); the Nordica Mandolin and Guitar Club (Walter T. Holt, director), and the Boy Scout Band have been secured.

The National Quartet (Elizabeth S. Maxwell, soprano; Lillian Chenoweth, contralto; William E. Braithwaite, tenor; Harry Forker, basso, and Ethel Garrett Johnston, pianist), and the Schubert Song Trio (Christine Church, soprano; Marion Larner, mezzo soprano; Marion McCoy, contralto, and Edith B. Athey, accompanist) will give messages in song on certain evenings.

Among the soloists will be Mrs. Bessie Birch Haycock, Mrs. Wayne B. Wheeler, Viola R. Schippert and Herbert F. Aldridge.

Belva Hoch will render a soprano solo, with trombone obligato, and Miss Janet Lindsay, daughter of Mrs. Caroline P. Lindsay, National superintendent of Fairs and Open Air Meetings, a violin solo.

ANTE-CONVENTION MEETINGS

All delegates to the National W. C. T. U. Convention should plan to arrive in Washington in time to attend the evangelistic, Y. P. B. and L. T. L. conferences to be held on Saturday afternoon, December 1, at the First Congregational Church, corner 10th and G. Streets. The Board of Superintendents will hold its first meeting in one of the parlors of the same church on Friday at 1:30 p. m.

Total Abstinence by Courtesy

A correspondent to The Outlook sends that periodical the following interesting account of how a group of clubmen are doing their bit to help win the war in rather a unique fashion:

"The aristocratic club of a flourishing city in central New York had long been famous for the number of young bloods who assembled every afternoon just before dinner for their cocktails and every evening for their highballs. The club was the drinking place for the well-to-do men of the city, and no attempt was made to disguise it. Recently the federal government established a military depot in this city for a specialized arm of the service. The city club, with laudable patriotism, immediately threw open its doors to all the commissioned officers of the service. The lounge-room, the dining-room, the library, the pool-rooms, are filled every day with men in khaki. But Uncle Sam has issued an order that no liquor shall be served to a man in uniform, and the club obeyed the rule to the letter. Not an officer, even in his private room, could obtain a drink. Much sympathy was felt by the civilian club members because of the enforced abstinence of their soldier guests; the sympathy soon took on a tinge of shame, and finally blossomed into a rare chivalry. The members of the club said among themselves: 'It is bad form for us to be taking our drinks in the presence of these men who are deprived of theirs. Let us cut it out.' So the members of the club voluntarily pledged themselves not to drink in the presence of the officers. It may be called total abstinence by courtesy. For many weeks now practically no liquor of any kind has been served to any one in the club, although the wine cellars and the bar are well stocked. The two bartenders, with their legitimate occupations gone, have been turned to food waiters, and do not seem to resent the change. The club is just as popular as ever, and its members have a glow of virtue in the feeling that they are doing voluntarily what Uncle Sam compels their brothers-in-arms to do under penalty."

"I Ain't No Anti"

In Texas the air is electric with prohibition sentiment. Recent victories in Dallas, McLennan, and Robertson counties have put heart into the prohibition forces and a corresponding depression is felt among the liquor men. Great mass meetings have been held and many workers are speaking and organizing for the W. C. T. U. A correspondent writes, "Our people are aroused as never before. In every righteous movement the W. C. T. U. takes the lead. Some papers that never gave us space before are now publishing all we provide."

As illustrative of the fact that "prohibition is in the very air we breathe," the following incident is related by a Texas woman: "An aged negro woman was accosted by a gentleman who said kindly, 'Good morning, auntie.' The negress flew into a rage and exclaimed, 'I ain't no anti. I'se been a prohibitionist forty years!'"

A mass meeting lasting all day was recently held in Fort Worth, at which time resolutions were drafted relating to prohibition and the suppression of vice, and thousands of names were received to be sent to Congress in December, petitioning for prohibition.

What the Liquor Interests Are Saying About National Constitutional Prohibition

THE LIQUOR INTERESTS SAY that national prohibition would deprive the government of millions of dollars of revenue and necessitate the imposition of direct taxes upon the American business interests to take its place.

This argument was ably answered in the United States Senate a few weeks ago when the question of war prohibition was under discussion. Senator Gore of Oklahoma said that the men opposing prohibition because of the loss of revenue are proceeding on the theory that the liquor dealers are really bearing the burden of the tax. "To be sure the dealer pays the tax in the first instance, but who pays it in the last analysis? It is the man who consumes the liquor. All that can be said in favor of a tax on liquor as a revenue measure is that it is a convenient method, a convenient agency for the collection of a large amount of revenue. But this same amount can be brought into the treasury in the form of revenue, and by a much juster tax than licensing spirits to go out on their mission of destruction."

THE LIQUOR INTERESTS SAY that national prohibition would destroy state and municipal revenues amounting at the present time to $100,000,000, and that half the municipalities of the country would be financially embarrassed through the loss of license revenue, and that the taxpayers would rise in protest over such a calamity.

In making this statement the liquor interests evidently deliberately overlook the fact that thousands of municipalities which have not had the revenue from licenses for years are absolutely sound financially, while morally and materially they are much better off; that numerous states which have voted to relinquish all liquor revenue have prospered far more than have those states still burdened with the crime, poverty and lawlessness which result from the liquor traffic.

THE LIQUOR INTERESTS SAY that national prohibition would cause the total and immediate destruction of business enterprises capitalized at more than a million dollars.

The statement is absurd in the face of the fact that in twenty odd states the distilleries and breweries upon the advent of prohibition have adjusted themselves to the new situation, have adapted their plants for use in such legitimate lines as ice houses, packing plants, dairy factories, etc. From these transformed alcohol factories almost invariably comes the report, as given frequently in THE UNION SIGNAL, that more men are employed and higher wages paid, and in the end the new enterprise has proven more profitable.

THE LIQUOR INTERESTS SAY that national prohibition would cause the sudden throwing upon the market of store rooms now profitably rented and bring immense losses to real estate investors in the way of decreased rentals and lowered property values.

This assertion would be interesting if true, but as a matter of fact the saloons left vacant by the outlawing of the liquor traffic are a myth that exists only in the imaginations of the liquor men. The enthusiastic evidence of the real estate dealers of such large prohibition cities as Seattle, Denver, and Portland, Oregon, is sufficient proof that in their estimation the elimination of the traffic in liquor adds rather than detracts from the value of property.

Big Business and Lesser Business Approve Utah Dry Law

GEORGE E. DAVIES, Pastor First Presbyterian Church, Salt Lake City

I am glad to express my views concerning the operation of our prohibition law in Utah after two months' trial.

When accepting the office of first vice-president of the state Prohibition League many friends said we would be following a forlorn hope. But they guessed wrong.

When politicians heard from the people they were less "Spry" in their previously announced program to ignore prohibition and to force questions of finance and "big business" to the fore. The parties vied with one another in a strenuous race for the no-saloon goal. The happy results secured notwithstanding the efforts of the liquor interests to queer the legislation after our bills were introduced are well known.

The prophets of evil have been sadly disappointed in their predictions concerning the failure of enforcement. After conference with the judiciary, "big business" and lesser business, I am happy to be able to say their testimony has been found to be without exception a grateful acknowledgment of the benefits of prohibition. One member of the Supreme court said that if the question to invite the return of the saloon were now introduced not twenty per cent of our people would vote to do so.

But I have the private, grateful acknowledgment from mothers and children that the going of the saloon meant the return of happiness to their firesides. In fact, I should say that the universal benefits of a moral and social character observed elsewhere in the passing of the saloon have been enjoyed by our community.

In my judgment, the law is being well enforced by both municipal and state authorities, drunkenness has practically disappeared from our streets, our jail has reduced its population more than half, merchants are prosperous and happiness has been restored to many blighted homes.

Pasadena Elks Bar Liquor from Clubhouse

The Elks' clubhouse in Pasadena, Cal., has gone dry. No more liquors will be served at social gatherings, and the thirsty Elk will find the clubhouse liberally supplied with water. This dryness is the result of a recent vote by the 1,000 members of the Elks' lodge to adopt the suggestion of Billy Sunday that the Elks set an example against the use of liquor. The Elks is the first of the large lodges in Southern California to take this step, it is reported, and the prohibition is not only for the duration of the war, but for all time.

300 New Jersey Saloons Closed to Protect Troops

Two hundred Hoboken (N. J.) saloons, out of a total of 338, and 100 in the neighboring town of Weehawken have been closed for the duration of the war by orders from Washington to United States District Attorney Lynch, it is reported. This action stops liquor selling in and about the military piers and is expected to end a long fight by the saloon men to keep the saloons open.

Conservation and Patriotic Service Slogan of West Virginia W. C. T. U.

Special Correspondence

The West Virginia W. C. T. U. has just closed a very successful state convention at which all the general officers were present, as were the state organizer and the state institute instructor.

Mrs. Lenna Lowe Yost has been president of West Virginia ever since the National W. C. T. U. "borrowed" Mrs. Frances P. Parks, our former president, for its corresponding secretary, and a large majority of the white ribboners attending our state conventions in recent years have known no other president, and a larger majority hope to know no other for many years to come.

After the first night, which was very rainy, the weather man rose to the occasion and did his bit by giving us ideal weather. The Chamber of Commerce, through some of its members, provided cars for a sight-seeing tour of the city, whose wide streets and level distances proved very attractive to many of the visitors coming from the more mountainous sections of the "Mountain State."

As is true of almost all gatherings being held at this time, the keynote of the convention was "Conservation and Patriotic Service." This thought was emphasized in a talk by the recording secretary, Mrs. Olive C. Barnes, who called attention to the fact that for the past forty-three years the W. C. T. U. has been engaged in the highest possible patriotic service and will continue such efforts until the end. The subject was presented under ten different departments of work, as prescribed by the National W. C. T. U., and more faithful efforts were urged upon the women. The idea of patriotic service was carried out in a demonstration given by Mrs. R. C. Sweet, who exhibited the two different kinds of comfort bags, the contents and the manner of making them. She told the prices of the various articles and the total cost of both bags, those suitable for the men in the camps in this country and those better adapted to the needs of the men at the front. Many of the white ribboners present have sons or brothers or husbands in the service and had already become familiar with the making of comfort kits and the knitting of scarfs and sweaters, the two last named articles being also included in Mrs. Sweet's demonstration.

The West Virginia W. C. T. U. to date has supplied more than 1,200 comfort bags and there are more in the process of making.

Welcome night was a particularly gratifying occasion, each of the eight representatives of local interests being present with a helpful message and a cordial greeting. Miss Flora E. Strout, World's W. C. T. U. representative to Burma, was in attendance throughout the convention and her helpful talks and sweet personality endeared her to the West Virginia women.

Hon. Wayne B. Wheeler was to have addressed the popular meeting Wednesday evening, but rather than call him out of the Ohio campaign in this, its most critical stage, the officers substituted Miss Strout, who made a powerful address, inspiring her hearers to greater efforts in spreading the gospel of Christ and temperance. The audience, instead of being disappointed, quickly realized that they were not to be the losers by the substitution. Miss Strout expects to leave for foreign fields in March and West Virginia heartily recommends her to other states and unions as a most inspiring speaker.

Many of the women attending the West Virginia convention are planning to go to Washington for the National Convention.

Officers were elected for the ensuing year as follows: President, Mrs. Lenna Lowe Yost; vice-president, Mrs. Olive C. Barnes; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Blanche M. Pickering; recording secretary, Mrs. Robert C. Sweet; treasurer, Mrs. Leni McWhorter Jenkins.

The invitation of Wheeling for the 1918 convention was accepted.

Illinois White Ribboners Out for State-wide Prohibition and Constitutional Convention

Special Correspondence

The forty-fourth annual convention of the Illinois Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in Peoria, October 16-19, in one of the most beautiful churches in the state. Everything conducive to the comfort of the delegates had been planned by the local committees and every one was delightfully entertained. A large and thoughtful delegation greeted our state president, Miss Helen L. Hood, when she arose on the first morning to deliver her splendid annual address. Illinois women always look for a feast of good things at this time and as usual were not disappointed.

Reports showed that a vast amount of work had been accomplished during the past year. At the round table—"What My Department Can Do to Help in This War Crisis"—conducted by Mrs. H. D. Hall, state superintendent of Americanization and Miners, it was evident that each superintendent felt confident she could convince the people that her department was the most essential to our cause in time of war as well as peace.

In a model conference the county presidents gave helpful plans for work during the year. Mrs. Nancy Shekelton, president of Sangamon county, leader of the conference, was a prime mover in placing Springfield, the state capital, in the dry list.

The first of the evening meetings was welcome night, with a dinner in place of the usual banquet. The greetings given by Mrs. W. O. Burner, representing the missionary societies, Mrs. Brown, former president, the State Suffrage Association, and Mrs. Anna R. Green, the W. C. T. U., were especially enjoyable. The responses by Miss Ingram Mace, former state treasurer, Mrs. Ida Frint, and Mrs. Rode Mayo, were delightfully given. Mrs. Etta B. Hite, state superintendent of the Medal Contest department, conducted a grand diamond contest with contestants from various parts of the state.

Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, president of the Kentucky W. C. T. U., as the speaker of the convention, inspired her audience to preserve the principles which our organization has upheld for so many years and to press forward with a greater determination to win the fight against the liquor traffic.

The white ribbon chorus, organized by the vice-president, Mrs. Etta R. Edwards, added enthusiasm throughout the convention.

A most interesting hour was the patriotic service with Mrs. Frances P. Parks, National corresponding secretary, as principal speaker. Her address on "The Americanization of the Foreign Woman," was filled with valuable information which furnished material for the note book to be used by the local unions during the months to come.

Mrs. W. A. Rawlings presented the department of Moral Education. Mrs. Minnie B. Coventry, superintendent of Relief Work, created a stirring sentiment for the French orphans by reporting that two unions had each adopted a child. Enough money was raised to adopt nine of these children, making eleven in all. The officers were re-elected. Mrs. Margaret Platt, former president of the West Washington W. C. T. U., who came as a delegate from the Evanston union, gave helpful suggestions.

The following resolution was ordered sent to President Wilson:

"That we, the loyal women of the Illinois Woman's Christian Temperance Union, declare ourselves ready to support all conservation measures as recommended by the national chairman of our food commission and respectfully call upon you to prohibit the enormous waste of foodstuffs used in the manufacture of alcoholic liquors for beverages. We further petition you to use your great influence with our allies to prevent the waste of foodstuffs shipped from America in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages."

Rhode Island W.C.T.U. Forces Rally to Call of the Nation

Special Correspondence

The forty-third annual convention of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U. was held in the capital city of Providence, October 1-3. The W. C. T. U. forces came together in the old historic First Baptist Meeting House erected in 1775. The architecture of this church has been changed but very little since it was builded many years ago.

The decorations were comparatively simple, being largely confined to the Stars and Stripes and local and departmental banners, the state decorator realizing that the church was too beautiful of itself to be hidden. In the address of welcome reference was made to the many illustrious persons who had spoken in the auditorium, and to the fact that twenty-three years ago white ribboners were privileged there to listen to Frances Willard and Lady Henry Somerset.

Former state W. C. T. U. president Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, and Mrs. Linnie Carl, National Y. P. B. field secretary, were present throughout the convention and gave addresses at two of the evening meetings. Greetings were received from Miss Anna A. Gordon, National president; Mrs. Katharine Lent Stevenson, president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., and Emeline Burlingame Cheney of Hillsdale, Mich., honorary president of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U., expressing their best wishes for the success of the convention.

Resolutions were sent to the Rhode Island Congressmen, urging them to vote for the submission of the prohibition amendment at the next regular session of Congress, and for the striking out of the six-year limit for ratification by state legislatures.

On the third evening addresses were made by Rev. Edwin Simpson, state superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, who spoke on "Get Together and Get Next," and by Hon. Wayne B. Wheeler, on "Patriotism's Call to the Colors, or the Third Line of Defense to Win the War."

The officers of the past year, with Mrs. Jennie L. W. Rooke as president, were all re-elected.

Spirit of Loyalty Pervades Northern Idaho Gathering

The annual gathering of the white ribboners of Northern Idaho at Lewiston, October 24-26, endorsed the National W. C. T. U. plans for patriotic service and pledged cordial support to the food conservation campaign of the United States government. At one of the evening meetings two medal contests, a silver and a gold, were held, with Mrs. R. D. Snyder as the winner of the silver medal and Mrs. Ruhl of the gold medal.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: President, Mrs. Mabel McCrea; vice-president, Mrs. Mattie Johnson; recording secretary, Mrs. Ella M. Farmin; treasurer, Mrs. Emma Wood.

National W. C. T. U. Convention, Washington, D. C., December 2-7, 1917

NATIONAL PRESIDENT SPENDS ELECTION DAY IN OHIO

It was fitting that the National W. C. T. U. should have a representative at Columbus, the capital of Ohio, on November 6, when the state voted on prohibition. A lineal descendant in a spiritual sense of the Crusaders of the seventies, Miss Anna A. Gordon, our National president, found special satisfaction in being in Ohio on the day the ballots were cast that were to decide whether the state was to be free from its life-long enemy. On the eve of election day, with Mrs. Florence D. Richard, president of the Ohio W. C. T. U., she participated in some of the closing meetings of the campaign, and remained over to visit the polling booths on the following day. On Friday of last week she spoke at the Missouri state W. C. T. U. convention.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

It is important that all who are planning to attend the National W. C. T. U. Convention at Washington send their names immediately either to Mrs. E. S. Henry, 1320 Columbia Road, chairman of committee on Hotels, or to Mrs. N. M. Pollock, 13 R St., N. E., chairman of committee on Private Homes. Because of the crowded conditions in the city of Washington, it is absolutely necessary to make all arrangements in regard to entertainment some time before the arrival of delegates or visitors. Do not delay an hour in writing to the chairmen of the committees above named in regard to your place of entertainment. No delegate should think of coming to the Convention without having secured accommodations in advance.

THE CREST OF THE WAVE AND NOVEMBER 6

"The prohibition wave has reached its crest!" This was the prophecy of Mida's Criterion a few days before the election. Unfortunately for the Criterion's reputation as a prophet New Mexico, blissfully oblivious of its duty in fulfilling prophecy, went to the polls November 6 and added height, depth and breadth to the already mighty prohibition wave that in a few years will sweep from the nation the trade the Criterion represents. Ohio, too, failing to realize that it was fighting against fate, went its heroic way and piled up a vote for prohibition so far exceeding that of the two former elections that nothing but the dishonest methods of the liquor politicians can overturn it.

If there is anything in the prohibition landscape to justify the prediction of the liquor journal, we fail to see it. In addition to the volume of sentiment represented in the vote in Ohio and New Mexico, little Delaware voted her third and last county dry, with the exception of the city of Wilmington. Wilmington voted as a separate unit and was kept in the wet column through colonization of negro voters and other illegal methods. By the election of judges of dry convictions three more Pennsylvania counties will be free from saloon domination and the submission of a state-wide referendum by the next legislature is now almost a certainty. Elections in Kentucky virtually assure the submission to the people by the next legislature of a constitutional prohibition amendment. The passage of a local option bill by the New Jersey legislature is practically made sure by the election of an assembly and senate pledged to such a measure. Partial returns from New York cities, which voted in large numbers, show great gains in dry territory.

The federal prohibition amendment will undoubtedly come up for consideration in the House of Representatives early in December. In view of the result of recent elections every Congressman will have his ear to the ground, eager to hear what his constituents desire of him. Do not leave him in doubt. It is certain that the liquor interests of his district are doing their worst to persuade him to follow the dictates of the drink trade.

Every member of Congress, and especially those who have not definitely advocated national prohibition, should be communicated with by telegram or letter. Better still, get influential citizens personally to see the Members of Congress before they leave for Washington and convict and convert them to the right point of view on the liquor question. See that every organization holding a meeting in the next two weeks passes a strong resolution in favor of National Constitutional Prohibition similar to that suggested on the opposite page.

The General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. suggest that Sunday, November 25, be observed by all local unions as a Day of Prayer for National Constitutional Prohibition; that on that occasion meetings be held in the churches, and the pastors at the regular services be asked to preach and pray for the success of the federal amendment, and that at each meeting the resolution given on the opposite page be adopted. Every one can help in this national campaign of prayer and effort for a dry nation. ACT NOW. DO NOT DELAY.

EMANCIPATION OF NEW YORK

The inevitable has happened. The conservative East has felt the impact of the mighty wave of suffrage sentiment and has surrendered. It satisfies one's sense of historic justice that the deadlock of the East should be broken in a state in which was held the first equal suffrage convention, and before whose legislature Susan B. Anthony made her first plea for woman's rights and later was fined $100 for voting, but refused to pay the fine.

It's a long, long way from the time when press, pulpit and people met the advocacy of woman suffrage with ridicule and insisted that the "weaker sex" be limited in their activities to the "kids, kitchen and the kirk," to the present day when the President of the United States and members of his Cabinet go out of their way in the busiest days of their existence to issue a strong declaration in favor of the movement.

One by one the arguments urged by the opposition have been found utterly lacking in reason and common sense. That old standby of the antis, "Woman's place is in the home," came to be a choice bit of humor in the light of the fact that thousands of women have been forced into the industrial market. "Woman does not want and will not use the ballot if it is given to her" lost all its force when the women voters of over half a dozen states went to the polls and cast their votes against the liquor traffic.

There was needed only the demonstration of women's patriotism called forth by the war to convince the citizens of the great state of New York that it was a simple act of justice to give their sisters the ballot. Indeed, in the light of the great conflagration overseas all society is coming to see that "since we are embarked upon the great experiment of democracy, the enfranchisement of women is an essential step in our task."

The temporary setback of suffrage in Ohio and Indiana is quite overshadowed by the victory in New York. With New York, the chief strategic point in the suffrage movement, won, success for the federal suffrage amendment seems assured. Commonwealths which have permitted their prejudices or their politicians to prevent the giving of suffrage to their women must bear the ignominy of being forced to grant this privilege by mandate of the federal government.

PATRIOTS—PERHAPS

The brewers are loud in their declaration that they are patriots, and attempt to prove it by calling attention to the millions of dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds for which they have subscribed. Their self-laudatory assertions might be accepted at face value if one could forget that at this time of scarcity of some kinds of food and the consequent high price of others, these liquor men are appropriating immense quantities of grain for the manufacture of beer, and used only a portion of the profits therefrom to purchase the Liberty Bonds of which they boast. If the brewers are using not more than one per cent of the grain supply, they are thereby taking the bread supply of one per cent of our population, or the bread of 1,000,000 people, enough to feed our entire first Army and Navy. If that is patriotism, it is of an entirely different brand from that displayed by the young defenders of our nation who are willing to risk health, wealth and even life itself for their country.

RESOLUTION

SUGGESTED FOR ADOPTION BY CHURCHES, MISSIONARY SOCIETIES, YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES, CLUBS AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS, AND BY PUBLIC MEETINGS GENERALLY. W. C. T. U. SPEAKERS ARE URGENTLY REQUESTED TO SECURE FROM ALL MEETINGS WHICH THEY ADDRESS THE ADOPTION OF THIS RESOLUTION

RESOLVED, That we are in hearty favor of National Constitutional Prohibition and will do all within our power to secure favorable action by the United States Congress on the joint resolution for a referendum to the states of the amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation and importation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION

NATIONAL CONVENTION TRANSPORTATION NOTES

ELLA A. BOOLE, Chairman Transportation

Let me emphasize the fact that the Central, Trunk Lines and New England Associations have granted reduced rates for the National W. C. T. U. Convention. Round trip tickets from points in this territory may be purchased on November 29, 30 and December 1, good for return reaching final destination before midnight of December 12. These tickets must be stamped by the ticket agent in Washington. Inquire of your local ticket agent several days before purchasing your tickets in order that he may be sure to have them on hand.

On each railroad ticket or mileage there is a war tax of eight per cent and on each Pullman ticket a tax of ten per cent.

Delegates and visitors in Western and Southeastern Associations territory will do well to purchase tickets to St. Louis or the nearest point in the above mentioned territory and then re-purchase tickets to Washington. Delegates and visitors in Southern territory will do well to use mileage. Your own state president will advise you as to the best point at which delegates may meet when a special car has been arranged for. Travel is heavy and reservations should be made early.

We call attention again to the fact that the train leaving Chicago at 10:30 on Friday morning, November 30, has been designated as the official train for delegates and visitors. Requests for reservations for this train should be sent to Mr. C. L. Kimball, A. G. P. A., Pennsylvania Lines, 175 West Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Illinois. Send remittance by postoffice money order or draft. Members of the Executive Committee should take the 10:30 train on Thursday morning, November 29. In making your reservations be very careful to state which day you will leave Chicago. Of course either train may be used by delegates and visitors.

Two trains have also been designated from New York. The one for delegates and visitors will leave the Pennsylvania station, New York City, at 11:00 a. m., Saturday, December 1. For Pullman reservations write headquarters of the New York state W. C. T. U., Room 503, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or Mr. Frank E. Binns, Pennsylvania Railroad Office, Broadway and 29th Street, New York City. Inasmuch as many will travel from New York to Washington in regular coaches, in order that there may be accommodations for all it is requested that all expecting to take this train notify us at either of the above addresses. Another train on which members of the Executive Committee will travel will leave the Pennsylvania Station on Friday morning, November 30, at 8:00 a. m. Observe the same directions in regard to reservations as for the train on Saturday and please let us know how many will take this train.

Further information may be obtained of your local agents or by writing to the addresses given above.

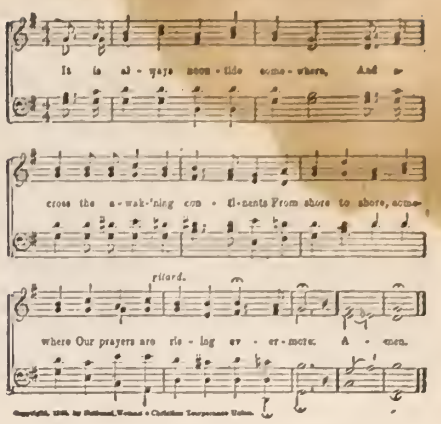
MRS. McADOO THANKS WHITE RIBBONERS FOR CO-OPERATION IN LIBERTY LOAN CAMPAIGN

Mrs. W. G. McAdoo, chairman of the Woman's Liberty Loan Committee, extends congratulations to the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for their patriotic work in the purchase and sale of Liberty Bonds, and expresses thanks and appreciation for their co-operation in the work of this Committee.

CHRISTMAS CANDY FOR THE SOLDIERS

Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, writes that all candy intended for the American soldiers in France should be sent IMMEDIATELY to Mrs. G. S. Mulliner of the British War Relief Association, 542 Fifth Avenue, New York. The candy must be carefully wrapped, and enclosed in a strong wooden box, well nailed, with all charges prepaid.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

DUTY A PATH WHICH ALL MAY TREAD

"Duty is a path which all may tread.
And if the soul of life and thought be this,—
How best to speed the mighty scheme, which still Fares onward day by day—the Life of the World,
Which is the sum of petty lives,—how then shall each
Of that great multitude of faithful souls,
Who walk not on the heights, fulfill himself
But by the duteous life which looks not forth
Beyond its narrow sphere, and finds its work,
And works it out?—content, this done, to fall
And perish, if Fate will,—so that the great scheme Goes forward!"

HABIT

What is a habit? 'Tis a fett'ring chain
That binds the struggling spirit to the earth;
A hampering weight that clogs aspiring worth
And makes its brightest visions all in vain;

A blighting pall whose midnight depths detain
And quench each glowing fervor at its birth;
A serpent coil within whose monstrous girth
Is crushed each noblest impulse of the brain.

What is a habit? 'Tis a silver thread
That links the soul to possibility;
A magic stone that turns the baser lead
Of evil bent to golden tendency;
A precious stepping-stone from low to high;
A Jacob's ladder stretching to the sky.

PRIZE BANNERS FOR WASHINGTON CONVENTION

All prize banners, either national or departmental, should be sent direct to the W. C. T. U. Recreation Rooms, 1418 Pennsylvania Ave., N. W. Washington, D. C., care of the chairman of the Convention committee on Banners, Mrs. L. F. Pickering. All express charges should be prepaid and notification sent to Mrs. Pickering, at her home address, 1002 Douglas St., N. E. Washington, when the banner is started. Please be certain that in addition to the address on the tag a card is fastened to the banner or nailed to the box telling where the banner came from and whose property it is.

The presentation of the white star spangled membership banner is always a delightful feature of the program on Jubilee Night. This banner was the last gift of Frances E. Willard to the National W. C. T. U., and in the interest of membership gain is awarded each year to the state making the largest per cent gain in membership. Last year the banner went to the Indiana W. C. T. U. Which state will have the honor of carrying the banner home from Washington?

WAR TAX ON RAILROAD AND SLEEPING CAR TICKETS

All Pullman and railroad train tickets are subject to a war tax, and this additional expense must be taken into account in estimating the cost of transportation to Washington.

Utah W. C. T. U. Convention Ranks High in Interest and Enthusiasm

LEOTA S. KENNEDY, Corresponding Secretary Utah W. C. T. U.

The annual convention of the Utah W. C. T. U. was held at Tremonton. And for the reason that most of the members of this small town union live in the surrounding country the holding of the convention there seemed a doubtful policy. The state officers and all other delegates, however, were surprised at the business-like manner in which arrangements for the convention and the entertainment of delegates had been made. This town and the surrounding country are settled by people from the eastern and middle-western states who have become prosperous in this rich and fertile valley. Farm houses with electric lights, telephones and other modern conveniences are an eye-opener to those who think of farm life as lonely and full of inconveniences.

Nearly all the delegates were entertained at such country homes and were whisked back and forth morning and evening in autos. Noon lunch was served the delegates at the beautiful home of Mrs. George Craig, a former member of the Ogden W. C. T. U.

The meetings of the convention were held in the Methodist church. The Baptists were holding revival services, but adjourned in order that their members might attend our convention, a courtesy which was much appreciated. The two revivalists, as well as the local Methodist minister, attended the meetings.

Music and addresses by local people comprised the program the first evening. The editor of the town paper, A. D. McGuire, gave the address of welcome, and children took a prominent part, a flag drill being one of the features. The musicians for this occasion were Mildred Stone, Fay Stone, Laura Brinkman and June Iverson.

The second evening Rev. Christian Garver, the pastor of the Methodist church at Ogden, a staunch prohibitionist and a good friend of the W. C. T. U., gave an able address. On both evenings a male quintet, composed of A. E. Samuelson, Geo. Christenson, O. Christensen, Mr. Watkins and Mr. Baker, furnished music.

Some of the most interesting discussions were on the subjects, "Is the Work of the W. C. T. U. Finished with the Advent of Prohibition?" "Best Plans for Increasing Membership," and "Some Good Plans for Raising Money."

Thirteen white ribbon recruits were dedicated to the cause in a very impressive ceremony conducted by Mrs. C. A. Walker, the state W. C. T. U. president.

Ringing resolutions were adopted, one being a protest against the immense sums raised by public subscription for tobacco and cigarets for our boys in France, many of whom were not smokers when they left home.

Plans for patriotic service received much attention. Department reports were better than usual this year. The convention sang those fetching verses, "Report," to the tune, "Auld Lang Syne."

Mrs. Walker presided with much tact.

Much credit is due the efficient president of the Tremonton union, Mrs. D. W. Jenkins, and her able assistants, for the success of this very profitable and pleasant convention.

The general officers were re-elected: President, Mrs. C. A. Walker; vice-president, Mrs. Fred Jensen; second vice-president, Mrs. W. S. Flewelling; corresponding secretary, Miss Leota Kennedy; recording secretary, Mrs. H. W. Pratt; treasurer, Mrs. Agnes Clancy Smith. Miss Tenie Orr was elected Y. P. B. secretary for the coming year, and Mrs. William Greenwood, L. T. L. secretary.

Prohibition a Foremost Patriotic Principle, Affirms Vermont Annual Gathering

CLARA EASTMAN SMITH, Editor Vermont Home Guards

Although Orleans, the place of meeting of the forty-third annual convention of the Vermont W. C. T. U., was not centrally located, though the weather was unfavorable and traveling conditions were bad, W. C. T. U. women came in autos across the mountains from the farther side of the state, and from every county, except two, to attend the annual convention.

Our members have been busy with war activities, but they have not allowed their enthusiasm for the temperance cause to abate. Indeed, they consider that every patriot should be working for prohibition. We think it high time that public opinion came to the rescue with a demand for prohibition so pronounced and imperative as to be heeded.

The first evening of the convention was occupied with a reception, words of welcome, and a medal contest. The speakers upon the latter occasion were teachers who came at much personal inconvenience and whose work did them credit. The prize was awarded to Miss Nan Glover of East Barnet.

The reports of the corresponding secretary and of the treasurer were encouraging and the president's address was a strong plea for renewed efforts along W. C. T. U. lines. The superintendents' symposium was most helpful. The suffrage hour, in charge of Mrs. Taplin, was conducted after a plan suggested by the National superintendent of that department and the several papers read by the women upon different aspects of the question were illuminating and enthusing.

One evening delegates and visitors were privileged to listen to a fine rendering by Mrs. Z. E. Hanson of a selection from "Black Rock." All through the meetings we were favored with music of a high order and great variety.

The superintendent of St. Johnsbury district, Rev. William Shaw, gave us a strong, convincing, logical speech. He prefaced his remarks with the announcement that while coercion could not make a man benevolent it could compel him to pay his taxes to support benevolent institutions. The temperance advocate is not trying to convince the individual that total abstinence is best for his interests. That is settled, but he is striving to arouse public sentiment to demand prohibition as a patriotic measure.

Friday afternoon the school children marched in and gave us a pleasing demonstration of the effective work of the teachers and listened to an interesting talk by our superintendent of L. T. L. work, Mrs. A. F. Smith, who, though approaching the four-score mark, is called our "youngest" member, for her zeal and energy are unflagging.

Mrs. C. E. Smith, editor of the state organ, presented a paper upon "The Appeal of the Child," a particularly pertinent and pathetic subject in this time of stress and food shortage.

Rev. R. A. Hamilton, in his address upon "Some Social Trends in Wartime," encouraged us to believe that the clock of progress still moves on in spite of the war. Some of us remember the day when the ministry were not so openly committed to temperance reform as we are glad to find it today.

The convention closed with an address by Mrs. Emma Howland, National organizer, on "Visions and Victory." We were made to see that only as the vision materialized in work was the victory assured and that a sense of personal responsibility is the need of the hour.

Orleans W. C. T. U. has an enterprising publicity agent, Miss Clara Dwinell, who obtained permission to use one of the shop windows during the convention for an exhibit of the groceries the money spent for one drink a day would purchase. This is the third time within ten years that Orleans county has entertained the state convention and we did not feel that we had yet worn out our welcome. It was the only county in the state to give a majority for the referendum the year of our campaign for a prohibition amendment. It has raised more than any other for war relief and excels in whatever it undertakes.

Altogether the Vermont convention was a good place at which to gain courage and a determination to press on to success.

The officers were re-elected without a dissenting voice: President, Mrs. M. L. Pearson; corresponding secretary, Miss Elsie Pease; recording secretary, Mrs. E. M. Turner; treasurer, Miss L. Grace Prior.

Army Welfare Work Holds Interest of Oregon White Ribboners

Special Correspondence

The Oregon state W. C. T. U. convention was one of the best ever held. The intense interest and enthusiasm manifested throughout was good to witness. Perfect harmony prevailed from first to last. A large delegation greeted the state president, Mrs. Jennie M. Kemp, as she opened this, the thirty-fourth annual convention, October 2, at Albany, the home city of Mrs. Henrietta Brown, one of the former presidents of the state organization. On two previous occasions, in 1884 and again in 1897, Albany had entertained the state convention, and at this meeting four white ribboners who attended the 1884 meeting and seven who attended the later one were cordially welcomed. Mrs. Kemp delivered a most interesting and able annual address. It was with keen regret that the women heard from her lips, at the close of her message, of a call that had come to her to serve her country through her appointment by Federal Food Administrator W. B. Ayer as a member of his staff with field service throughout the state as her special branch of the conservation work in Oregon.

Reports showed that good work had been done in many departments, that of the Patriotic Relief division standing at the top because of the large amount of work accomplished for the soldiers and sailors. This new division was created to meet the special need at this time and great plans are being outlined for the coming year. The story of the "Headquarters Hive" and how the women all over the state are rallying to the call to work for the soldier boys was told by Mrs. Mary Mallett. "Bringing in the Sheaves" resulted in a bountiful supply of good things for the boys in khaki. Representatives from every section of the state piled high with good things the table and the floor around it.

The amount of work done in other departments was far above expectations. The appointed committees were most efficient and prompt. The splendid resolutions drawn up were adopted without a change. The future plan of work committee worked out some decidedly "workable" things.

Fourteen counties were represented in the county presidents' hour, and the accounts in story, song and reading, of the work done were most encouraging.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. M. Frances Swope; vice-president, Mrs. Jennie M. Kemp; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Madge J. Mears; recording secretary, Mrs. Mary G. Tutthill; Y. P. B. secretary, Mrs. Scruggs; L. T. L. secretary, Mrs. J. M. Donaldson.

Her First Trip Alone

She climbed up the steep steps into the Northwestern train with a proud consciousness. She was going to Chicago, alone, for the first time, going to match some embroidery silk for her mother.

It was a very important errand as you will readily see when I tell you that it lacked but four days to Christmas.

The baby was ill. He had a sore throat and temperature. His mother never left him when he had temperature.

Gladys told her mother that she could go in just as well as not; that she knew lots of girls who go in every Saturday for music lessons.

For a while her mother refused to listen to Gladys' suggestion. She said she would send for the silk, but the mails are slow and clerks are not always careful in matching colors. Of course it was safe enough to let Gladys go alone. She had been with her mother hundreds of times and she knew every step of the way; just where to find the bus to Marshall Field's; just which floor embroidery silks are to be found on; just which door to leave the building to get an Indiana avenue car. She was to remain on the car until it turned on Twenty-second street and to tell the conductor to put her off at Michigan avenue. It was only half a block then to her aunt's house where she was to stay over night.

All of this the child had done repeatedly, but never before alone.

It was a plump, rosy, fourteen-year-old girl who entered the Northwestern train that December day. Her blue serge dress barely came to her shoe tops. Long smooth braids of hair were folded about her head and tied with big bows of black taffeta ribbon. A soft black velvet cap caught up on one side with a blue knot crushed the waves of hair on her brow. Clear, sweet eyes looked out at the world with girlish confidence in its good will and trustworthiness. She found a seat by herself and rode by several stations before any one came to sit with her, but it was a fast express train which filled up quickly and Gladys sighed with relief when a lovely lady entered, looked about and seeing her alone, came directly to her and asked to share her seat.

"Isn't this Miss Green?" she asked. Gladys, flattered at being taken for Miss anybody, spoke her own name.

The lovely lady paused. Gladys' last name reminded her that she once had a schoolmate who had married a man of that name.

"What was your mother's maiden name, my dear?"

"Forsythe."

"That's the very girl! Did you never hear her speak of Marjorie Evans? How strange! I am sure I spoke of your mother to my daughter many, many times. Just about your age she was when I lost her."

The lovely lady touched her eyes with her heavily scented handkerchief.

Gladys was deeply touched. The lady was very lovely indeed. She wore a violet velveteen suit with grey furs. On her hat were long violet plumes. Her hair was golden and her cheeks a rosy pink. It was a privilege to be seen with so lovely a lady. Gladys thought of her own mother with a faint tinge of disloyalty. Why couldn't all mothers be lovely ladies?

As they chatted Gladys' sense of personal importance grew. The lady called her Girlie and Dear Heart and with each mile she seemed more charming. It would all be so grand to tell her mother.

"Now tell me, Dear Heart," said the lady as they pulled into the station, "what are your plans for the day? Bus to Field's? Indeed you'll not. My private car is to meet me and you are to come with me. I'm going to Field's to luncheon and you must be my guest. I'll tell your mother just how I stole you. She was a beautiful girl and you are her very image."

They left the car together and the lady led Gladys down the stairs to the place where, under cover, motor cars wait for their owners. Sure enough a great pumpkin colored car stood waiting for the lady. A chauffeur in livery held the door of it and slammed it after them.

"Field's," the lady said. The car slowly twisted about and picked its way cautiously among the vehicles. If you had asked Gladys what kind of a time she was having, she would have said, "Perfectly grand!"

So they lunched at Field's. Gladys had both ice cream and French pastry for dessert. With her mother she must choose, but the lovely lady simply insisted on both.

"Now, Dear Heart, I want to take you for a quiet drive about town in my auto. Lincoln Park and Jackson Park and the boulevards between."

Gladys' eyes grew round with pleasure. Then they drooped, her aunt expected her.

"Telephone the aunt." A maid brought a receiver and made the connections and Gladys called up her aunt and told her as the lovely lady bade her, that she was going to pass the night with a friend of her mother's. And the aunt hung up her receiver and went on mixing Christmas cake. So they went for the ride and stayed out until Gladys began to feel sleepy. She thought with compunction of the embroidery silk, but she could get that in the morning.

It was nearly dark when the big pumpkin colored car turned into a narrow, shabby street and stopped before a large old-fashioned stone house that stood by itself.

"Here we are, my dear," the lady announced.

The child was not sorry to stretch her stiffened limbs. It had been a lovely ride but it was long enough. It was queer the lady did not live on an avenue or a boulevard. They ascended the steps and were admitted by a huge negro manservant. Gladys thought she had never seen so big a negro in her life. The lady led her directly upstairs to the second floor. If the street was shabby the house was gorgeous enough. There was a gay sound of chattering and laughter; some one was playing on a piano. The lady showed Gladys into a small back room. When the light was on it proved to be a pretty room with white furniture and white muslin curtains.

"I hope you will be quite happy here," the lady said, as she kissed the child. Then she left the room, closing the door after her and turning the key in the lock.

A chill of apprehension shot through the girl. She called the lovely lady by name. She rapped on the door and shook it on its lock, but nobody came.

"I won't be a goose!" Gladys said bravely, "Perhaps it's a way people have in Chicago."

She took off her hat and coat and bathed her face. She arranged the black bows on her hair and wished her skirts were longer. Then she glanced sharply at the door. Some one was turning the key softly. The big negro pushed the door open with his foot and entered the room. In one hand he held by the handle a big, flat, tray-like basket. It contained dishes and a dinner. He set it upon a stand in the room and turned to go.

"Wait!" Gladys commanded. "Please tell Mrs. —— that I am perfectly well. I am quite rested and prefer to come down to dinner with her. I don't mean to make her trouble like this."

The negro stood with one hand on the open door. "Oh, I guess you know where you are by now, little missie; if you don't do what's wanted I'll have to come in and give you a lesson."

He went through the door and closed it.

Gladys was thoroughly frightened. Her heart thumped in her throat and she trembled as though she were having a chill. "I don't understand!" she said. She tried the windows, but they were fastened down. A wave of terror and of homesickness swept over her. She threw herself sobbing on the bed and at last she sobbed herself to sleep. It must have been hours after when she was awakened by a semi-conscious apprehension of danger. She sat up, dazed and blinking in the electric light. A man stood looking down at her. She knew him. He was a man from home whom she had often seen on the streets. He recognized her, too.

"Oh, Mr. Y.," she cried, seizing his hand. "You have come to save me, haven't you? How did you know where to find me? Oh, I am so glad you've come."

"How did you come to be here?" he asked.

Gladys told him.

"Yes, I'll save you—on one condition, that you tell no one who it was that saved you."

"Not father?"

"No one."

Gladys promised.

"Put on your hat and coat," he said. They opened the door softly and passed quietly down the stairs. At the front door the big negro sat, his head on his breast, fast asleep.

Once outside of the house the man took Gladys' hand and they ran around the corner and down the block where a be-

Patriotism and Suffrage Live Topics at Delaware Convention

The annual convention of the Delaware W. C. T. U. met in the Methodist Episcopal church at Seaford, October 10-12, a large number of delegates from all over the state being present to represent the paid state membership of 2,621.

The convention program was a continual round of good things. The address of the president gave the prohibition news of the day and was an educational message of great power. Mrs. Lillie V. Atkins, state Y. P. B. secretary, led in a demonstration of the work of the Young People's Branch, in which Uncle Sam and the Goddess of Liberty were the principal characters. In his message of welcome to the delegates, Hon. Joseph H. Cox, mayor of Seaford, declared himself in favor of woman suffrage, and Mrs. Victor Du Pont and Mrs. M. S. Cranston delivered most excellent suffrage addresses. Prof. Arthur Spaid, state commissioner of education, spoke most emphatically concerning the importance of scientific temperance instruction in the public schools. The memorial service for the twenty-nine active and honorary members who have passed over during the year was led by the vice-president of the state W. C. T. U., Mrs. Emma E. Caulk.

The evening meetings were inspiring occasions. Miss Lillian Cade, president of the Sussex county W. C. T. U., presided the first evening. The address was delivered by Mr. Deets Pickett, who took as his subject, "German Beer More Destructive than German Bullets." On another evening Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, who has visited every fort in the United States and been on most of the battleships, told what can be done for the soldiers in camp and fort and for the sailors on the battleships. Delaware W. C. T. U. has the distinction of having for fifteen years conducted in Delaware City a rest and recreation home for the soldiers from Fort du Pont and Fort Delaware. "The Challenge of Patriotism," by Daniel A. Poling, was universally declared to be the finest address ever given on that subject.

Officers for the new year were elected as follows: President, Mrs. Lena Messick; vice-president, Mrs. Emma Caulk; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Lizzie Raughley; recording secretary, Miss Lavinia Lynch; treasurer, Mrs. Clara Marshall.

The Kent county W. C. T. U. has subscribed the required amount of money to board a French orphan for one year. The Delaware W. C. T. U. now has a superintendent of Work among Colored People, who is doing commendable work in educating the people of her race in regard to the evils attendant on the use of alcohol. Mrs. Sadie Waters, the new superintendent, gave much time and energy to the campaign in New Castle county in an effort to convince colored citizens that it was their duty to vote to protect the homes and interests of the state. Mrs. Waters is thoroughly alive to the work, and her tact, education and refinement will count for big things in the future. She recently addressed the students of the Colored College at Dover, and a Y. P. B., with a membership of forty, was organized. Mrs. Emma E. Caulk, vice-president of the Delaware W. C. T. U., and other prominent workers were in attendance.

Mrs. Mame Register, who has been elected L. T. L. secretary for Kent and Sussex counties, has spent almost her entire life in this branch of work and the two lower counties are to be congratulated on having such an efficient worker at the head of this important branch of the W. C. T. U. An L. T. L., with a membership of seventy children, has recently been organized in the town of Harrington. The Harrington Y. P. B. has also taken on new life and is preparing to do big things. The Felton L. T. L. has recently elected officers and plans are under way to hold regular meetings during the coming year. The Delaware W. C. T. U. is endeavoring to educate its young people to high standards of morality and usefulness.

Activities of South Idaho White Ribboners Many and Varied

Special Correspondence

The annual convention of the South Idaho W. C. T. U. was held in the western part of the state, at Caldwell. This meant that our delegates were largely western women. On account of the very busy season many were kept away who otherwise would have been present.

It had been thought that since there were no great campaign issues this year there would be a large falling off of interest in the state, but the fears, happily, were not realized. Being the first year after the victory for constitutional prohibition, there was a lessening of interest and a "sitting-down-to-rest" on the part of some, and the condition which exists all over the country of great zeal in war work was bound to be felt. Hence, we had cause for congratulation, when reports came in, that in spite of all these things and of the resignation of the earnest, loyal president in the middle of the year, no greater loss in membership was reported.

Another difficulty in these western states, with which the middle and eastern states do not have to contend, is the instability of the membership from frequent removals. It is like working with a procession at times and rebuilding the rank and file is a yearly occurrence and necessity.

An earnest and enthusiastic delegation reported and the convention was full of interest from start to finish, under the leadership of the very efficient vice-president, Mrs. Alice Thompson, who was obliged to take up the responsibility of the work when Mrs. Chipp resigned on account of ill health.

Our convention covered two days and every hour was full of interest, the women of the state and the local ministers filling the entire time.

Reports from superintendents showed great zeal and earnestness and much accomplished. Several hundred comfort bags were made and filled for soldiers and sailors, the entire expense being borne by many of the unions, while the state aided in filling 170 more. Thirty-five dollars was given for the stereomotorgraph; $15 toward the Ambulance Fund; $26 for an electric fan; while the women of the unions have been in the front ranks in Red Cross work. The sum of $36.50 was contributed by the unions for the support of a French orphan.

Our slogan for the coming year is: "Harder Work Than Ever," our aim, a new union in every available place and every member win one, and a strong fight for a better anti-cigaret law.

The corresponding secretary and treasurer were re-elected and Mrs. Alice Thompson was made recording secretary, Mrs. Mollie L. Vance, vice-president, and Dr. Emma F. A. Drake, president.

[Sugar from Grapes

DORCAS J. SPENCER

Something over twenty years ago, a group of white ribboners in a rural community, experimented with their own grapes, in their own kitchens, and produced sugar. The recipe for making it was published in a cook book prepared by Mrs. Margaret Beatty Willis, for the local Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Sacramento, California.

The recipe follows: Strain the grape juice in an ordinary fruit press into a large pan or kettle, and boil until it has the consistency of molasses or honey. It will serve the same purposes. If sugar is desired, boil it longer until it "sugars." Samples of this sugar were exhibited at the state fair, but not being entered for a premium, received only a special notice.

A delicious jam or apple butter may be made by thickening the syrup with stewed apples; boil together slightly. It will keep in jars without sealing.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on trial 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 60, Washington, D.C.

Great Enthusiasm Marks Convention of South Australia W. C. T. U.

Special Correspondence

The twenty-ninth annual convention of the South Australia W. C. T. U. which convened September 4, in Willard Hall, Adelaide, in point of numbers and enthusiasm was extremely gratifying. Delegates were present from every part of the state.

The report of the secretary, Miss Lockwood, gave evidence that time and money are being given by the women of Australia to Red Cross and other work for the brave lads at the front. Reference was also made to the missionary tour of Mrs. Helen Barton of Glasgow, Scotland, of fifteen weeks' duration in South Australia, as having been successful in creating a strong determination throughout the community to bring about total prohibition of the liquor traffic. Sixteen women justices of the peace, among them five members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, have been appointed. Additions have also been made to the list of policewomen and another important position, that of inspector of schools, has been given to a woman.

The W. C. T. U. has assisted the army department Y. M. C. A. by a gift of £100. In response to the appeal of the white ribboners who have kept constantly before the state and Federal authorities matters which demand attention, the Federal Minister closed all liquor bars on military service referendum day with the result that good order prevailed.

Lady Holder, president of the Australasian W.C.T.U., and state superintendent of Evangelistic work, conducted a praise and prayer service. She spoke to the large audience regarding the tarrying of the disciples at Jerusalem, in obedience to the Divine command in order that power and strength might be given for the furtherance of the great work committed to their care, and urged that we, in like manner, wait patiently and prayerfully upon God for equipment for his service. Pastor Paternoster followed with an address in which he declared that no Christian, no church, should have aught to do with the liquor traffic. Mrs. Barton referred to the increased membership of 3,000 and urged us on to further victories. The addresses delivered by Mrs. Barton during the convention were most able and inspiring. Mrs. E. W. Nicholls, state W. C. T. U. president, as a token of Australia's appreciation of all she had done for the temperance cause presented to Mrs. Barton an inscribed diamond set gold brooch representing the map of Australia.

In her annual address, Mrs. Nichols enumerated the many evils arising from the liquor traffic and made the claim that the W. C. T. U. is the most patriotic and humanitarian organization in existence, mother love crystallized into aggressive power. "For over forty years this grand society has proclaimed that drink is the foundation of all other evils and that in its downfall it will carry with it the white slave traffic, the red plague of venereal disease, the white plague of tuberculosis, the gambling evil and vice and crime of every kind."

A most successful gold medal contest was held, Mrs. A. C. Hill being awarded the medal. Mrs. Radford, the superintendent of this department, is most enthusiastic and spares no pains to make her work successful. The officers were re-elected as follows: Mrs. E. W. Nicholls, president; Mrs. Pengelly, vice-president; Miss Lockwood, state secretary; Mrs. G. W. Cooper, recording secretary; Mrs. R. Edwards, treasurer.

Her First Trip Alone

lated street car slowed down and took them on.

"That's luck," said the man. Gladys dared not look out of the window. The two big lights of a motor car frightened her. She was sure it must be the pumpkin colored car. By and by they transferred to another car and presently the friendly Northwestern station welcomed them into light, warmth and safety.

The man consulted a timetable. "Luck again!" he said, "there's a train in two minutes. It will be daylight when you get home. Now, little girl, if you tell who saved you, I'll tell the big nigger where you live. Understand? There's much you don't understand, though. I don't believe you even know where you've been tonight."

And she didn't. But you do—don't you? —D. Knapp, in Purity Crusader.

Among Our Workers

A correspondent writes: "As a state organizer and myself were soliciting members a lady said, 'I always put in my oar for prohibition whenever I have an opportunity,' but she did not become a member of the union. Certainly wearing the little white bow is a definite way to promote prohibition and many other civic reforms."

Friday, October 26, was observed in the schools of Oregon as Frances E. Willard day. A large number of pictures of Miss Willard were presented to the schools by the various unions.

On the eve of the ushering in of prohibition in the District of Columbia, Mrs. La Fetra, for a number of years president of the District W. C. T. U., and Dr. La Fetra celebrated their golden wedding. They were the recipients of congratulations and felicitations from a host of friends.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTS NEW OFFICERS

Among the speakers at the Mississippi state W. C. T. U. convention was Miss Christine I. Tinling, National Y. P. B. college secretary, who spoke twice at the convention, twice at the Mississippi Industrial Institute and College in Columbus, and once at the high school. So well pleased with Miss Tinling were the Mississippi women that she has arranged to come to them for two weeks of organization work. A beautiful silver loving cup was presented to Mrs. S. E. Stanley, for several years president of the Mississippi W. C. T. U., who is compelled on account of ill health to give up this office.

Officers were elected for the new year as follows: President, Miss Madge L. Montgomery; vice-president, Mrs. Clara C. Cox; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Walter W. Scales, Jr.; recording secretary, Miss Juliet Featherstun; editor of The Mississippi White Ribbon, Mrs. O. S. Hopkins.

The forty-first annual convention of the Third District (Mich.) W. C. T. U., held at Hastings, October 25 26, was one of the most helpful gatherings in the history of the district organization. "The Thing that Interests My Union Most" was discussed by the local president, while the topic for the superintendents' hour was "How My Department Can Help America in the Present Crisis." Many helpful plans of work were presented. A free clinic by the presidents of the five counties considered "Diseases that Attack the W. C. T. U.," under the heads, anemia, heart failure, hardening of the arteries, intermittent fever and paralysis. Rev. Etta Sadler Shaw was present throughout the convention and helped in many ways, while her busy fingers were constantly occupied with knitting. "Her address, 'America's Danger and the Price of Victory,' is a masterpiece," says our correspondent, "and no union will make a mistake to engage her for this lecture."

The fortieth annual convention of the Oswego county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. was held at Fulton, October 24-25, with all the county officers present and every union represented. The reports of superintendents showed good work along all lines. Mrs. Helen J. Andruss, corresponding secretary of the New York state W. C. T. U., was present and gave inspiration by her helpful suggestions and a fine address at an evening meeting. The county president, Mrs. E. S. Spencer, declining re-election, Mrs. Lillian B. Wright was elected to succeed her. The other officers were re-elected.

We record here the names of comrades and friends who have recently passed to the higher life:

Mrs. Susan D. Whitney, a charter member of the Northern California W. C. T. U. organized in 1879 and the first superintendent of Fairs and Open Air Meetings.

Mrs. Mary Smith, for five years superintendent of Medical Temperance for the Northern California W. C. T. U.

I will tell you

HOW TO REDUCE

OR TO PUT ON FLESH

How often have you said, "If I could only put on 25 pounds!" or, "My! How I'd like to be rid of this Fat!" Do you realize that you can weigh just exactly what you should by following my easy, scientific directions in the privacy of your room? And you will be stronger and look younger as you change your figure.

The medical magazines advertise my work. Physicians' wives and daughters are my pupils.

No Drugs—No Medicine

I have devoted fifteen years to this work. Over 80,000 refined, intelligent women have not only regained health, vitality and perfect figures and carriage, but they have learned how to keep both.

Scores of my pupils have been relieved of all sorts of chronic ailments that probably now afflict you.

Drop me a line and I will explain, without expense, the method by which you can improve your figure; build up your vitality; strengthen your nerves; secure perfect self-control; and flood your entire life with the joy of perfect health.

If you tell me your problems I'll write you frankly what you can expect.

My services are personal to you. Your case will be individually handled. I am at my desk from 8 to 5 daily, studying my pupils' cases. May I help you?

Send for illustrated Booklet showing you how to stand correctly; or, better still, write me a letter describing your particular case—I will respect your confidence.

A Series of Striking Pictures of Bible Scenes

Beautifully Colored

With a Collection of Applicable Bible Verses, Carefully Selected

By fitting the appropriate verses to pictures the reader actually takes a unique and fascinating journey to Bible Land.

This is the Christian Herald plan in which $9,128.00 in cash has been awarded to encourage more general Bible reading.

Do you want to go into the beloved land of Bible days?

Do you want to travel to some of the scenes the Bible tells us of so beautifully?

Go with us, and as our guests. As you go you will be carried back to the Bible period; you will meet for a brief time some of the characters of the eternal story.

And as you go the story will be brought home to you perhaps as never before, for you will be comparing the scenes with the Bible verses that tell of them—you will actually be seeking out and fitting together the Bible verses that best apply to the pictures.

Thus while feasting your eyes and diverting your mind you will be learning more and more of the Bible, seeing more and more the significance of the Bible story.

Yet so delightful will the journey be that you may not awaken until later to the good it has done you. While learning much you will be enjoying much; because of the interest in your journey you will be acquiring, almost unconsciously, a better understanding of the Bible.

Interest Some Member of the Family

Send for "A Picture Journey Into Bible Story Land," for yourself or some member of your family. Young and old alike will enjoy the quest. It will bring good cheer and happy interest into the family circle, and it will be followed by interested discussion, a comparing of Bible knowledge, perhaps by a realization of too great ignorance of the real meaning of many a Bible verse.

Will Surprise and Delight You, Too

Send in the free Request Coupon, and let us present you, as an outright gift, postpaid by us, the inspiring and beautiful "Picture Journey." We know it will delight you, and surprise you, too. Send for it—right now, while you are thinking of it. You put off too many things—do not procrastinate in this. Cut out the Request Coupon and send it in—NOW! There is positively no obligation.

North Dakota Boys Make Fine Record at Camp Greene

A prohibition state is a fine place to raise boys and girls and the young people from such a locality rarely fail to show the effects of having lived in a community free from the liquor traffic and of having been taught the value of total abstinence. An instance of this is the manly conduct of the boys from prohibition North Dakota who are in training at Camp Greene, Charlotte, N. C. Although the residents of North Carolina viewed with some dismay the advent among them of thousands of young men from the "wild and woolly West" the boys are winning their unqualified approval by most exemplary conduct. A prominent resident of Charlotte expresses highest commendation of the boys from North Dakota in a letter to Rev. James Anderson, husband of our National recording secretary, Mrs. Elizabeth P. Anderson, whose son Cuyler is a member of Company G, 164th U. S. Infantry, now stationed at Camp Greene. This product of a white ribbon home is one of a quartet of young soldiers who are responding to calls to sing at church services and at entertainments in Charlotte in their leisure hours. The letter above referred to said:

"On last Saturday evening I am sure there were approximately 10,000 people in our town, and although the streets, restaurants and stores were thronged, there was not the slightest act of disorder, nor even any loud talking or boisterous conduct. In fact, it may seem a rather exaggerated statement that during the four weeks that we have had these young fellows with us there has not been a single act of disorder on their part while within our city.

"Another thing that has surprised us pleasantly is the very large number of young men who attend our churches. At each of our leading churches fifty per cent or more of our congregations are now made up of the soldier boys.

"The same night that our own church was having a social for these young people several others of the large city churches had the same character of entertainment and the soldiers were invited to meet the young people of the city and have some light refreshments. Hundreds, and perhaps thousands of them responded, and everywhere there seemed to be pleasure and gaiety of an innocent and helpful variety.

"Our city is bestirring itself in its efforts to make the life of your boys as enjoyable as possible. We have a splendid Y. M. C. A. in the city, with shower baths and swimming pool, and on last Saturday a thousand boys from the camp availed themselves of the bath privileges. The Y. W. C. A. has also thrown open its doors and the young men have access there, under proper regulations. Each of the leading churches of the city has a writing and rest room for the soldier boys, where writing material and reading matter are available for use at all times of the day and in the evenings. The public libraries are also available for reading matter."

"Not So Very Mere"

The small boy sometimes sees straight and sees far. He reads the signs of the times unabashed. John, at a co-educational school in England, cuts a good figure at the examination, but fails to get the highest marks awarded in his mixed class. His father is duly astonished, duly incensed. John beaten by a girl. "John, I am surprised to find that you have allowed yourself to be defeated by a mere girl." "Yes, father," says John unblushingly, "I have, but I can tell you something. Girls are not so very mere after all."—Christian Science Monitor.

"Don't know."

"What in the United States?"

"Don't know."

"What war time work has the W. C. T. U. taken up as an organization?"

"Don't know."

"Is it doing anything at all?"

"I suppose so, but I am not certain."

"Where could you get helps for your next local meeting?"

"Don't know."

"What are you doing to help your union and nation, anyway?"

"Don't know—that is,—well, you see—"

Canada Stops Waste of Foodstuffs in Manufacture of Distilled Liquors

The use of all foodstuffs in the manufacture of distilled liquors has been prohibited by the Canadian government. The order reads:

"No grain of any kind and no substance that can be used for food shall be used in Canada after November 30 for the distillation of potable liquors." An order-in-council to this effect has been passed upon the recommendation of the Food Controller. It will remain in force "until the Governor-General-in-Council has by order declared that the present abnormal conditions have ceased."

The penalty for violation of the regulation is a fine of up to $5,000, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or both fine and imprisonment.

Hundred Towns in New York State Give Dry Majorities

The November 6 elections in New York state resulted in large dry majorities in approximately one hundred towns. The four dry counties, Yates, Tioga, Delaware and Schuyler, were held, and Schoharie county added to the list. St. Lawrence county is also dry, with the exception of the city of Ogdensburg. Increased dry majorities show the trend of public sentiment. Most of the cities of New York state will vote on prohibition at the April, 1918, elections, and the fact that women will participate in these elections is expected to swell the dry vote materially.

Dry Gains in Delaware, Kentucky, New Jersey and Pennsylvania

The November 6 elections left Delaware high and dry with the exception of the city of Wilmington. The liquor majority in that city was reduced greatly since the last election and rural Newcastle county gave a dry majority of about 1,000.

The submission by the Kentucky legislature of a prohibition constitutional amendment is assured by the returns in that state. The election of a number of judges of dry convictions in Pennsylvania will result in an increase in its dry territory. New Jersey elected a legislature pledged to pass a local option measure. One of California's big cities, San Jose, rolled up a fine majority against the saloons.

Florida Has New Dry County

The last Tuesday in October witnessed a notable victory for prohibition in Florida which augurs well for the success of the state-wide prohibition election to be held in 1918. Palm Beach county, one of the seven remaining counties of the state where saloons are licensed, voted on that day by an almost two to one vote for county-wide prohibition. An encouraging feature of the victory was the heavy prohibition vote polled by a precinct where the registration of negroes is particularly heavy. Only one precinct in the entire county gave a substantial wet majority, the city of West Palm Beach, as a whole, giving a majority of forty votes for prohibition. Some months ago there was as little as four per cent of the entire territory of the state of Florida where saloons are permitted, and this new victory will make the percentage of wet territory proportionately smaller, and reduce the number of saloons almost to the point where they can be counted in numbers of only two figures.

TEXT OF PROPOSED FEDERAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT AS ADOPTED BY THE UNITED STATES SENATE

The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by Congress.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Episcopal Church Favors Prohibition During War

The Protestant Episcopal Church has gone on record in favor of national prohibition during the war. A resolution to that effect was passed at the diocesan convention recently held in New York city. At a previous session it had seemingly declined to support the enactment of such a law by Congress but, declaring that the press had misconstrued its action, proceeded to make it clear to the public that it gave "unqualified approval and support to such measures as the government shall see fit to take to secure the establishment of national prohibition during the period of the war."

Secretary McAdoo Tendered Wineless Banquets in Tour of United States

The recent tour of Secretary McAdoo through the United States is an excellent illustration of the changing attitude of the people of this nation toward the liquor traffic. Secretary McAdoo visited prohibition states and license states, states where they manufacture beer in large quantities, states in which the distillation of whisky was formerly a profitable source of income, and those which believe that their economic future is dependent upon the wine industry. In all these states he was banqueted and feasted, and on only one occasion was liquor served, and then only a light domestic wine. Admiral Gravson, the personal representative of President Wilson, is said by the Georgia Wesleyan Christian Advocate to have called attention to this feature of Mr. McAdoo's itinerary at a banquet in Atlanta, at which he and Mr. McAdoo were guests.

In Bone Dry Georgia

MRS. AUGUST BURGHARD, Macon, Ga.

The jail in Pelham, a town of 2,000 inhabitants, is advertised for rent.

The grand jury of Laurens county completed all of its work and adjourned on November 6, after the shortest session in its history, due to lack of criminal business.

A Y. M. C. A. secretary who has been at Camp Gordon since the establishment of the cantonment, says he has never seen one of the soldiers intoxicated at the camp or on the streets of Atlanta, nor even smelled liquor on any soldier's breath.

During the ten days of the state fair in Macon from 15,000 to 35,000 people attended daily, thousands of them soldiers from Camp Wheeler. The crowds were orderly and genial. No arrests were made for drinking and scarcely any for any cause whatever. There was not the least odor or sign of liquor the entire ten days, but numberless gallons of ice water were dispensed from the two large coolers in the W. C. T. U. booth.

The bank clearings for Atlanta on Monday, October 22, passed all former records for one day, going beyond $9,000,000.

The Industrial Index, published in Columbus, reports a steadily increasing number of new buildings, homes, public buildings and manufacturing plants, and the establishment of numerous industrial and commercial concerns.

The segregated districts have been removed from our three largest cities, Atlanta, Macon and Augusta, and also from a number of smaller towns. Anti-vice crusades are being waged in other cities.

NEW MEXICO BECOMES TWENTY-SEVENTH PROHIBITION STATE BY 20,000 MAJORITY VOTE

LAST WEEKS OF THE CAMPAIGN

Mrs. W. E. LINDSEY, Vice-President of the New Mexico W. C. T. U.

Nearly all the state officials and party leaders lined up for prohibition in the recent New Mexico campaign. Letters in the interest of prohibition from the governor, United States Senators, judges and other men prominent politically were printed in the newspapers of the state.

The press of New Mexico was unanimous in its endorsement of the amendment and gave liberal space to its advocacy of prohibition. Where space was not contributed, paid advertisements were inserted. Governor Lindsey, Hon. Antonio Lucero, secretary of state, Chief Justice Hanna, Judge Roberts of the supreme court, Hon. Jose Sena, clerk of the supreme court, and several other officials spent the last two weeks before election touring the state and speaking for the amendment daily to large audiences. Miss Anna A. Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U., and ex-Governor Hanly of Indiana assisted greatly in the successful outcome of the campaign.

The week previous to election much money was brought into the state, but detectives were set to watch carefully the saloons to guard against expenditures for unlawful purposes, and Governor Lindsey publicly announced that if any coercion or unlawful use of money was reported to him the lawbreakers would be sent to the penitentiary. Special officers and challengers were placed in the precincts of every county. On election day every possible precaution for securing a fair expression of the will of the people at the polls was provided.

Parades were held in most of the towns on election day. Lunches were served at the polls by women of the Council of National Defense auxiliary, the W. C. T. U., the suffrage forces, and the women's clubs. In fact, all the women participated enthusiastically at the polls, serving lunches, driving automobiles and lending their enthusiasm to the cause.

Every state official, including the governor, went to his home city to cast his ballot. About noon word was passed that all was going well. This trebled the energy and courage of the workers, who faithfully stood by their posts until six o'clock in the evening. The only time the women left the polling places was when they went in their automobiles for voters. The tension was great, but victory was in the air. About nine o'clock in the evening word was flashed over the wires that we had won at least three to one in the cities and towns, and we knew then that we had won "forever and a day." We slept the sleep of sweet victory, having, in reality, in proportion to our population, piled up a larger prohibition vote than any of the other prohibition states.

Explaining New Mexico's Victory

MRS. MINNIE H. BYRD

Governor Lindsey and Chief Justice Hanna are two of our officials who have been in the prohibition ranks since the "good, old, territorial days." Governor Lindsey was a member of New Mexico's constitutional convention, and with a few other devoted men used every effort to have suffrage and prohibition written into our constitution. On the closing day of the convention, when it was publicly stated, "The constitution cannot be changed in ninety-nine years unless a new one is written," bitterness was in the hearts of the prohibition and suffrage advocates, and a determined fight was made on the constitution, which resulted in the adoption of the Flood Amendment at the first state election. This amendment makes it possible to amend the constitution of New Mexico by a majority vote of the electorate, (with the exception of the suffrage and educational articles). So, with the way cleared for eventually making New Mexico a dry state, the prohibitionists, though seemingly a small minority, went blithely to work sowing the seed in season and out of season, through scientific temperance instruction in the public schools; through a continual stream of anti-liquor literature, sent into the remote districts; through speakers when we could get them—and we have had some of the best; through the press, and some of our best papers have always been favorable; through constantly presenting and pressing our cause at every convention, legislature or political meeting; through observing Temperance Sundays in churches and Sunday schools, and by getting and presenting petitions, letters and telegrams, whenever the issue was up—in other words, by making and keeping this question a living, burning one, impossible to be ignored.

It goes without saying that the W. C. T. U. of New Mexico, since away back in 1883 when Frances E. Willard and Anna A. Gordon toured the state, have been loyally and faithfully keeping the fires burning, meeting when meetings seemed to do no good, but hoping and praying and hanging on, ready to put in a "lick" when an opening came.

Today prohibition is popular, it is becoming dangerous to be on the opposite side with the saloon and dive-keepers, the gamblers and bums and law-breakers. The day is arriving when the eyes and ears and hearts of the people are open to wisdom.

New Mexico Resounds With Hallelujahs

MRS. ANNA W. STRUMQUIST, Recording Secretary New Mexico W. C. T. U.

Hallelujahs are being shouted by women all over New Mexico, all on account of the prohibition victory. The sweeping vote in favor of the cause exceeded the wildest hopes of the promoters of the movement. In most of the towns and cities the women played a big part in the campaign and in the activity election day. Those who had automobiles devoted themselves all day to taking dry voters to the polls. Hundreds of others who were intensely interested in the outcome, stayed at home and kept the telephone lines humming with electioneering by wire. One woman marshalled fifty votes by calling at the homes and sending members after sick voters. Miss Harriet L. Henderson, for three years state president of the W. C. T. U., was chief mailing clerk, and directed the mailing of prohibition literature that filled crates and crates before unpacking. It is said several tons of literature were sent out. By working quietly but potently the white ribboners and club women emulated Mr. Jack Frost in his silent methods, and like this irresistible fellow, these workers froze the "wet" places over and created of dangerous bogs, stable, safe land on which to live and move and have their being. To Mrs. Katherine B. Patterson and Mrs. Minnie Byrd is due the lion's share of vote-winning among the natives. For years Mrs. Patterson has been educating the Spanish people for this fight. The home of these women has been the storehouse of tons of prohibition literature, the editorial room for scores of newspaper articles and the meeting place of all prohibition leaders in the state. To Mrs. W. E. Lindsey, wife of the governor, is due the credit for popularizing the movement in society circles, and making urgent this work for all club women.

Sidelights on the Campaign

Sixty-five per cent of the population of the state is Spanish-American, so they should be given full credit for their share in making New Mexico dry. They have been called indifferent, but when it comes to questions affecting them personally they are found to be amazingly alive.

Mexican women worked enthusiastically at the polls. "No one need tell me the Mexican women are not ready for suffrage," a white ribboner writes. "When a liquor Mexican approached, the women working at the polls took him in tow, and went for him in a most surprising way. I could not tell what they were saying but they reduced him to submission in short order."

Mrs. W. E. Lindsey, vice-president-at-large of the New Mexico W. C. T. U., is also chairman of the state auxiliary of the Woman's Committee of the Council for National Defense. In a letter sent to all county chairmen of the auxiliary she made a forceful appeal for their aid in the fight against liquor. She said in part:

DISCOURAGING OUTLOOK FOR LIQUOR INTERESTS IN OHIO

CLOSE VOTE SHOWS LARGE DRY GAIN SINCE LAST ELECTION

While the official returns show that prohibition has lost in Ohio by approximately 1,700 votes, the result of the election is far from discouraging. As stated last week, the wet majority in 1914 was 84,152, and in 1915, 55,408, so that there has been a gain of almost 53,000 votes for the prohibition cause in the last two years. Not only did seventy-six counties give dry majorities but the liquor majorities in the big cities were materially reduced from the 1915 returns.

A campaign has already been inaugurated for the submission of a prohibition amendment to the voters in November, 1918, to become effective February 1, 1919, the same date prohibition would have gone into effect had it carried at the recent election.

So general are the suspicions throughout the state, however, that there was fraud in the returns that Governor Cox, for the sake of the honor of the state, is said to have ordered Secretary of State Fulton to have the wet and dry forces lay before him all charges of irregularities in the conduct of the election.

OHIO'S MASTERLY CAMPAIGN

LUCY E. VAN KIRK, Editor Ohio Messenger

In the beginning of our campaign at a get-together meeting a federation composed of representatives of all dry organizations planned the work with care. Mr. James A. White of Columbus was made campaign manager for the men, and our own Mrs. Florence D. Richard, state president, was appointed to supervise the activities of the women.

Our leaders used business methods and planned wisely every move. Perhaps nothing helped more to educate the masses and hold their attention than did the street car advertisements displayed all over the state. Those short pithy statements of fact stayed with the reader. A systematic educational campaign was kept up throughout the campaign. Our W. C. T. U. workers did valiant service for the cause. They lost no time organizing and were well equipped to start the ball rolling at once. While others were preparing, the trained workers of the W. C. T. U. were already on the firing line and ready to advance on the enemy. It was a steady forward movement. All who believe in a dry Ohio, joined the ranks, and there were no traitors in the camp. Each vied with the other in doing his or her bit patiently and loyally. We are glad that our heavenly Father keeps the records of the doings of the faithful and will give the deserving due credit. The mother organization, the National W. C. T. U., is rich in talented workers and some of these co-laborers heard the Macedonian call and came at once to the rescue. In the last days of the campaign Mrs. Ella A. Boole, our National vice-president-at-large, Mrs. Frances W. Graham and Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, all of New York state, added inspiration by their logical speeches and charming personalities. As the wisdom of their utterances was revealed to our women they took up the message and passed it on. Miss Anna A. Gordon, National president, was with us and spoke on the day preceding the election.

Mrs. Mary Harris Armor of Georgia, the cyclonic speaker and whirlwind campaigner, attracted the voters. She accomplished much for a dry Ohio. Mrs. E. L. Calkins, president of the Michigan W. C. T. U., was another fine campaigner. She won her hearers at once and reasoned with such persuasive force as to convince her audiences of the truth of her statements. Mrs. Eliza E. Peterson, National superintendent of Work among Colored People, helped the cause by the beautiful way in which she presented facts to her people. She is a winsome, courageous campaigner.

We are indebted to our National organization for the splendid literature it sent into the state. It was sowed by liberal hands. The Campaign Edition of THE UNION SIGNAL was rich in valuable vote-making material. The literature was carefully assorted and placed where it would reach the voter.

The state W. C. T. U. officers are all gifted women and loyally stood by the state president, Mrs. Florence Richard, that valiant campaigner for righteousness. What shall we say of our splendid men? We surely appreciate their determined stand for protection of the home. Shall we, the citizens of Ohio, allow the rum-dominated politicians of the state to autocratically decree that we shall be whisky-ruled, when the voter has otherwise decided? An aroused citizenship thunders "No." Ohio shall rank twenty-eighth in the fair galaxy of prohibition states.

SIDELIGHTS ON THE NEW MEXICO CAMPAIGN

"The passage of the amendment for prohibition on November 6, will not only make New Mexico a better, safer place for your children to be reared, but will also help the federal government in its fight to throw off the yoke which military Germany seeks to impose. Individual effort will carry this election; failure to make the individual effort will cause the loss of the issue by default.

"The decision in New Mexico may hinge upon the effort that you make—or fail to make. Work early; work late. Do not neglect anything which in the least would help the great cause. Get together; effect a close-knit organization. Hold meetings to keep in touch with progress; have parades to let the public know that you are busy—and make them good parades."

The children of Santa Fe, one thousand strong, marched in an anti-liquor parade on election day, visiting en route the four polling places of the city. Many banners in Spanish were held aloft by the children, a little girl carrying one bearing the slogan in Spanish and in English: "Las Cantinas Roban A Los Ninos!—The Saloons Rob the Children!" Five hundred Indian children were in line, 200 of them from St. Catherine's Indian school. The 300 pupils of the United States Indian Industrial school, in smart uniforms of blue, carried many interesting banners, one of them reading, "Swat Booze, Buy Shoes," and another, "Give the Last Lick to Liquor."

Boy Scouts, a band, children on horseback, and others in red, white and blue costume with tri-color cocked hats, added variety to the demonstration which won many a doubtful voter.

THE MOURNERS

J. A. MONTAGUE, in Atlanta Georgian

A loan shark sat on his empty safe;
He was down to his utmost dime,
And he gazed across at a vacant cafe
(Let it stand, for we need the rhyme)
And he dropped three tears on his shirt front (which,
For a loan shark, is going some).
And he wailed: "Alas, I was good and rich
In the days of the Demon Rum.

"He used to harry the boys in here,
At the end of each perfect day,
And stood around with a jovial leer
While I garnered their weekly pay.
But they've canceled the good old gin-mill's lease,
And emptied its shining shelves,
And all of the lads that I used to fleece
Are spending their coin themselves."

A jailer stood in his empty jug
And puffed at a cheap cigar
As he gazed at a hungry croton bug
That crawled up an iron bar.
"Dear me," he said, with a choking sob,
"This business is on the bum;
I shudder for fear I shall lose my job
Since they whip-sawed the Demon Rum.

"He used to serve as my puller-in,
And, my, how the business grew!
He would stand around with a kindly grin
While the cell-house doors clanged to.
But since he was canned in Washington
My trade is so nearly dead
That they're going to pull the building down
And put up a school, instead!"

A state official, as he joined a group waiting for a parade of children to pass, remarked to a bystander, "Well, I am wet, and I am going to vote wet, and no one need think they can influence my ballot. While the children were passing he stood in silence, then turned to the acquaintance he had previously addressed and declared, "Well, I've changed my mind. I shall vote dry."

At least a dozen similar incidents of men who have always stood for the saloon remarking, "I can't stand that parade of the children; I'm going to vote dry," came to the notice of white ribboners.

The last day before election the women of one union had worked all day at the church preparing the banners. As they started home at dusk they discovered that the liquorites were just finishing the distribution throughout the town of a couple of leaflets full of untruths. Weary and depressed the women stopped in at the office of the chairman of the county dry organization. There they discovered a supply of leaflets, printed in Spanish on one side and English on the other, which completely answered the false statements sent broadcast by the liquor men. The white ribboners appropriated the leaflets, raided the skating rink in search of Boy Scouts, and with the aid of the Scouts thus marshalled, the leaflets were that evening carried to every home in every ward.

A group of children in a street parade at Albuquerque ran into a prominent liquor dealer in his automobile and almost reduced him to hysterics by their dry yells. He tried to disperse the company with his machine but they nimbly circled round and round him, their distasteful prohibition yells continually assailing his unwilling ears.

FOOD STUFFS WASTED IN BEER WOULD FEED SOLDIERS FOR A PERIOD OF THREE YEARS

In this present crisis of food shortage, when Tuesday of every week is meatless day and Wednesday is wheatless day, when fats are scarce and high in price, and the government is narrowing down the amount of food that hotels and restaurants may serve, the food stuffs wasted in beer represent a terrific drain on the supplies that should furnish strength of brain and muscle for the winning of the war and the upbuilding of our people.

A report of the United States department of Agriculture, based on figures secured from the office of the Internal Revenue, shows the amount of material used in the manufacture of fermented liquors in the United States during the year ending June 30, 1916:

Malt	57,683,970 bus.
Hops	37,451,610 lbs.
Rice	141,249,292 lbs.
Corn or Cerealine	650,745,703 lbs.
Grape Sugar or Maltose	54,934,621 lbs.
Glucose or Syrup	2,742,854 gals.
Grits	109,371,482 lbs.
Other Materials	72,355 bus.
Other Materials	19,112 gals.
Other Materials	24,756,974 lbs.

—Northwestern Christian Advocate

This makes an estimated total of 3,004,754,590 pounds of food stuffs or a fuel value sufficient to supply the energy requirements of 3,000,000 men for a year. The fuel value of this material wasted in one year in the beer supply alone of the United States is sufficient to supply for a period of three years the energy requirements of the men in the khaki and blue uniforms of our nation who are now in training and those already at the front.

German and Austrian Demoralization Due to Beer, Masonic Observer Asserts

There has arisen a new prophet crying out against the inconsistencies and discriminations practiced in our food conservation campaign toward the product of the brewery and protesting against making Huns of the population of the United States by the beer process. In a plea which covers almost the entire front page of a recent issue, The Masonic Observer urges its readers as individuals and organizations to demand the suppression of such industries as are standing in the way of full and complete victory for the armies of the United States. The appeal reads as follows:

"OUR INCONSISTENT GOVERNMENT; WHAT IT ASKS—WHAT IT DOES

"This country has grown the largest crop of potatoes ever known in its history, but freezing will ruin much of it unless cars are made available to ship them.

"A tremendous car shortage exists for use in moving valuable food products urgently needed, but thousands of refrigerator cars are regularly assigned to breweries and in daily use on the railroads of the United States, loaded to full capacity, carrying beer for saloons and blind pigs.

"Millions of bushels of wheat wanted for food, but millions of bushels of barley wasted for beer, when an order from the government closing the breweries could save it.

"It is right that we should save to serve.

"It is wrong for the government to permit waste in enormous quantities of the same foods they ask us to painstakingly substitute and use here with rigid economy that others better adapted for use abroad on the fighting front may be made available there in abundance.

"How much longer must this waste continue?

"Is it more important that beer be hauled regularly and supplied to debauch our people, soldiers and sailors included, that barley shall be turned into worse than waste to furnish fat profits for an unprincipled, unscrupulous few, than it is to 'Save Food and Win the War?'

"Make it plain to those in authority, in no uncertain language, that you emphatically condemn this glaring inconsistency between the savings urged by the government and the waste permitted by the government; that for the period of the war Americans demand nothing less than the fullest use of all means at hand for the conduct of the war and prompt suppression of every industry, thing or individual that even in the least degree tends to impair or interfere with its successful prosecution.

"Take action as individuals and organizations; write or telegraph your personal messages and your united resolutions of protest. Do it now."

On another page of the same paper the question of beer, its influence on those nations which for generations have been its devotees, and the necessity for the immediate and entire prohibition of its manufacture in this country, is considered. The case against beer is stated in the following terms:

"There was a time when we listened with some degree of respect to the man who said, 'I never use whisky or any other strong liquors; I confine my drinking entirely to beer in moderate quantities,' a time when the 'German Beer Garden,' with its attractive homey surroundings looked to be, on its face, at least, reasonably respectable and decent, but that time is not now.

"The German and Austrian boast has been that they were sober nations, daily drinkers of beer, but in moderation, and not given to the use of strong drinks.

"These two nations are demonstrating, as no one ever expected to see it demonstrated, the truth of scientific claims that beer drinking is slower to show its damaging results than distilled liquors in both the individual and the nation, but that in the long run it is even more debasing, demoralizing and brutalizing to its users.

"Shall we continue the breweries and the sale of beer?

"Shall we make 'Huns' of Americans by the beer process, for the private profit of brewery stockholders and the blood money derived from the business by our government in the form of taxes. No enemy across the water is more of a menace to our country in peace or war than the combined liquor interests of the United States. We have stopped the distillers from distilling, but have allowed the sale of liquor already distilled. We still permit the breweries to run.

"Demand a clean-up and a clean-out of the entire business. Demand it now. Stop the whole booze business and the savings of sober workers invested in bonds will roll into the treasury of our government like a mighty flood to help win the war."

BOOZE OR BONDS? WHICH?

During the recent Liberty Loan drive in Texas some interesting incidents occurred. According to a Texas paper, a man whose face showed evidences of many an encounter with alcohol, approached the Liberty Loan counter, laid down $2 and asked to subscribe for a $100 bond, remarking, "I had intended to use this $2 in buying booze tonight, but I have at last realized that a man who wastes his money on strong drink in this great crisis is a low-down creature. I am going to cut out beer and whisky, and put my $2 each Saturday into buying this $100 bond. I hope by the time I have paid my last installment, or in fifty-one weeks, I will have so overcome my craving for alcoholic stimulants that I can continue investing $2 a week in government bonds. If I had started sixteen years ago when I began drinking and had used the money I wasted in buying booze for the purpose of accumulating a savings fund I would have had several thousand dollars by this time, instead of having nothing except my weekly wage and a weakened constitution."

Mexican General in Anti-Drink Speech

The famous Mexican general, Alvaro Obregon, financial representative of the Mexican government, at a dinner tendered him by the citizens of Springfield, Ill., recently, told of the changing attitude of his country toward the drink problem, and of the radical measures adopted by the Mexican government to stamp out this evil. He said, in part:

"Mexico is improving. It has found the reason for the revolutions. It is going to reform the new generations of Mexico. It is going to open a school where there was a saloon before. We see the advantages now of education. There have been too many drunks in Mexico. The governors of the various states are now stopping with radical measures the saloon. Men who are going to save Mexico are those who are going to close the saloon. The United States needs the same cure. I speak plainly. The Mexican government did not wait to raise the taxes before it took steps to close down the saloons. We are going to fight ignorance and vice."

PROHIBITION SAVES MEN FROM FELON'S CELL

JOHN GARLAND POLLARD, Attorney General of Virginia

Prohibition in Virginia has been a great success. The law went into effect November 1, 1916, and its good effects were immediately felt.

The superintendent of the state penitentiary informs me that the number committed to the state prison for the first nine months of 1916 when we had the licensed saloon was 608, while the corresponding nine months of 1917, under prohibition, the number fell to 307;—301 saved from a felon's cell in nine months!

The jail statistics for the first nine months of this year are not yet available, but the reports at the office of the state board of charity and correction, show that there were 2,041 less prisoners committed to the jails in the first six months of 1917 than there were in the first six months of 1916 under the open saloon;—more than 2,000 saved from the disgrace of jail in six short months!

It is often contended that while prohibition is a success in the rural districts it cannot be rendered effective in large cities. This has not proven the case in the city of Richmond, having a population of about 160,000. The commonwealth's attorney informs me that since prohibition went into effect there has been a most marked falling off in the number of felony indictments in his court; and I heard the jailer make a public statement to the effect that there had been a marked reduction in the number of prisoners committed to the city jail.

The opponents of prohibition, especially in the city of Richmond, argued that real estate values would be much depreciated if the saloons were closed and that rents would fall as soon as the hundreds of stores occupied by the saloons were closed. The result has been just the contrary. On our principal business street, known as Broad street, there were a large number of saloons. Since the closing of these saloons the fee simple and rental value of the property on this street has increased notwithstanding the fact that the real estate market is, in general, depressed.

The editor of one of the largest daily papers in the state, a paper which bitterly fought prohibition, stated to me that hereafter if the question ever arises in Virginia, he will fight more vigorously for prohibition than he ever fought against it.

REDUCTION IN CRIMINAL COURT CONVICTIONS EVIDENCE OF SUCCESS OF PROHIBITION, SAYS VIRGINIA GOVERNOR

"The best single evidence of the value of prohibition in Virginia is to be found in the great reduction in crime as indicated by the large falling off of convictions in our criminal courts," says Hon. H. C. Stuart, governor of Virginia. "I am suggesting this because it comes more directly under my notice than any other phase of the situation.

"I am confident that public sentiment is strongly behind the prohibition law and can be relied upon for a vigorous and effective enforcement of it through the courts. If prohibition in Virginia continues to prohibit even approximately, the benefits arising from it will increase from year to year, not only by reforming addicts, but by protecting the rising generation from the formation of an evil habit."

Dry Richmond Oversubscribes Liberty Loan Allotment $5,000,000

A prohibition city is always a prosperous city, exceedingly more prosperous than its sister cities of similar size which are the prey of the licensed saloon. Richmond, Virginia, has added another item to the long list of credits on the prohibition ledger. With prohibition in effect but twelve months, Richmond has the proud distinction of being the first federal reserve city to subscribe its allotment of the second Liberty Loan, and it oversubscribed its first Liberty Loan some $5,000,000.

The Richmond Virginian, in a recent editorial, explains in some detail what prohibition has done for the city and state. It says:

"What of the day? What do Virginians think of the operations of the law? Have men been made better or worse? Are women happier or less happy? Are the jails and other similar institutions more populous or less populous? Has the sum of human suffering been increased or decreased? Are accidents in our industrial plants more or less frequent? Are the families of that great class, which once so liberally contributed to the prosperity of the liquor dealers, better off or worse off?

"These are practical questions. The tree is known by its fruits, the wisdom or unwisdom of a particular law by its results. Whom shall we have to answer these questions? Shall we go out in the highways and hedges to find the drunkard and the poverty-stricken to reply? Surely not—for the man who once was a barroom loafer is no longer liquor sodden, but a respectable member of the community, supporting his family, well-dressed, well-fed, well-housed. Shall we go to those good people who never let the demon rum rest until he was routed and driven across our state line? Perhaps, but not altogether. It might be said by some that they see only what they desire to see.

"Then, that there might be no question as to the verdict of Virginia and of Virginians from all sections of the state, from every walk of life in the state, official Virginians, unofficial Virginians, Virginians who voted dry and Virginians who voted wet, we have received column after column of communications replying to the questions asked in the opening paragraph of this article. Man after man, from the governor, who voted wet, all the way down the line, we find the verdict unanimous that prohibition has been a success in Virginia. Men who fought it earnestly and conscientiously for years now declare that the licensed sale of liquor in the good old state of Virginia shall never again be permitted.

"They declare that, come what may, they are with us to combat the monster should it ever again attempt to rear its head in our fair state. And there comes from hundreds of thousands of homes the echoing cry—'Amen.'

"And what are the actual results of prohibition? Fact, not theory, is desired by those of our neighboring commonwealths who must decide this question for themselves. They must ascertain whether or not the dire prophecies of the wets came true—that grass would grow in our business streets, that our workmen would be without work, that our industries would languish, that our state and municipal treasuries would go bankrupt should we not increase our state and municipal taxation to such an extent that we would bankrupt our citizens.

"Well, good people, just come to old Virginia and take a look. We will show you a state treasury which, without increasing the taxes at all, collected more money the first dry year than was ever collected in any year of the wet régime. We will show you a state prosperous as no state ever was. We will show you a city, not one dollar of whose municipal or industrial or commercial revenue comes from the liquor traffic, which was the first federal reserve city in America to subscribe its allotment of the second Liberty Loan, and which will oversubscribe its maximum allotment probably $5,000,000. It was ashes in 1865—and on the first Liberty Loan we oversubscribed our allotment some $5,000,000, pledging an amount equal to our entire banking resources of a half century ago. Prohibition evidently hasn't bankrupted Richmond.

"And with a year's experience behind us the men of Virginia who have forever separated the saloon evil from their state call upon the great commonwealths which are now in the midst of the fray to decide this question in the only way that will prove a permanent settlement of it. We who have for one year breathed the air of freedom from saloon partnership, who can feel that our state and cities are no longer tainted by financial contributions from the liquor traffic, urge our brethren in other states to continue the fight to glorious victory.

"In Virginia we grew strong on defeat. And our oft-beaten leaders, in God's good time, will be among those whose high privilege and everlasting honor it will be to help lead the American Israel out of the Egyptian bondage of the liquor traffic. For there will come no cessation of this war on the liquor traffic so long as one foot of land, over which proudly waves the Stars and Stripes, is blackened and marred and desolated and desecrated by the unhallowed presence of the licensed saloon."

PROHIBITION THE LIGHT AND JOY OF THOUSANDS OF OKLAHOMA HOMES

Attorney General Freeling of Oklahoma, when asked for an expression of opinion on the real value of prohibition to his state, said:

"Prohibition has greatly reduced crime, and consequently the expense of courts.

"It has conserved the wages of the workman, and increased the business of the merchant.

"It has brought light and joy to thousands of homes where darkness and sorrow reigned before.

"Oklahoma, recalling her experience with liquor, would cast a larger vote for prohibition today than ever."

Homes Happier and Souls Saved as a Result of Prohibition

Hon. SIMON BAMBERGER, Governor of Utah

State-wide prohibition has benefited Utah very much.

How many homes are happier, how many broken hearts are healed, how many souls are saved we shall never know! I have only an inkling of the great moral effect of the banishment of liquor in the scores of letters from wives and mothers that come to my desk, thanking heaven for the blessings of prohibition. The happiness reflected by these grateful missives is full compensation for the efforts made by the prohibitionists to secure the law.

On August 1, 1917, I should say that 75 per cent of the people of Utah were firm believers in prohibition. I venture to say that today 98 per cent are ardent prohibitionists. Could we wish for a stronger endorsement?

Prohibition Ushers in Busy Time for Hammer and Paint Brush in Utah

It's been "paint up" and "clean up" time in Salt Lake City, since the advent of prohibition. Old buildings are being remodeled and the refreshing touch of the paint brush is everywhere visible.

"I have frequently been struck with the renovating being done both in the business and residential sections since August 1," declares Mr. George J. Martin of the Bettilyon Home Builders company. "Prohibition has certainly resulted in a marked improvement in the appearance of entire business blocks and residence after residence.

"Naturally, in order to convert former saloons into quarters suitable for other lines of business, considerable change must be made in the interior. But the improvement has not stopped there. Exteriors have been repainted, new windows and new front doors installed and even whole entrances modified.

"Combined with prohibition as a cause for beautifying residences is the high cost of building materials. Many houses which under normal conditions would be either torn down and disposed of or sold to be rented at lower figures, are being extensively remodeled because it is too costly to build a new home.

"Gratifying results have been obtained, especially with some of the fine old homes on the east side, which are really solidly constructed, but which have not been properly kept up. New porches, additions and a new coat of paint are working wonders with some of them.

"In these instances, of course, prohibition is probably playing no part at all. But in the numerous efforts to make the small homes more presentable and more habitable, can easily be traced the result of having a little surplus money on hand that formerly went into drink.

"The effects of prohibition can also be plainly seen in the fact that small homes, both for purchase and rental, are scarcer than they have been for the past five years."

"There is no question in my mind but that the operation of the prohibition law, which has now been in effect nearly two months, has been of distinct benefit in many ways to the state," says W. W. Armstrong, president of the National Copper Bank of Salt Lake City, in a letter to Mrs. C. A. Walker, president of the Utah W. C. T. U. "In my judgment, the benefits will continue to grow and become more apparent, and I venture the statement that if it were put up to the people of the state of Utah at this time, as to whether or not the law should be repealed, they would overwhelmingly vote to keep it on the statute books. It is almost too early to see distinct evidences of the benefits that are going to accrue to our state, but, in my mind, there is no question but that they are with us now and will continue in greater volume as time goes on."

"Since the advent of prohibition in Salt Lake City and Utah there has been little if any diminution in rental values," says Earl Jay Glade, advertising counselor, Salt Lake, Utah, who was also campaign manager for the Prohibition and Betterment League, in a letter to the president of the Utah W. C. T. U. "Old buildings which for years have housed saloons have been renovated and beautified with splendid new fronts.

"In spite of the fact that certain would-be bootleggers stocked up for an extensive illicit trade in liquor, it is everywhere admitted that never was the state as free from drunkenness as it is today. When the present stocks are exhausted Utah will be unquestionably rid of the many evils attendant upon alcoholism.

"What causes me to wonder most is the matter-of-fact manner in which the new order of things is taken by old topers. The worn-out cry that liquor is indispensable in human economy has been given a terrific death blow. Everybody seems completely reconciled.

"The smaller towns which have enjoyed local option for several years are particularly happy. No longer is Salt Lake City the stocking-up place for the illicit traffickers who formerly conducted their business in the smaller towns of the state.

"If my observation is correct, even after two months of prohibition in Utah, there are very, very few of our citizens who would desire to go back to the old régime."

Prohibition the Greatest Blessing That Can Come to a People

"Prohibition could not have been adopted at a better time, so far as the labor question is concerned, as competent male help is very scarce," writes W. O. Carbis, of the Paris Millinery Company, Salt Lake City, "and I believe there are very few, if any persons, who were engaged in the liquor business that are out of employment. That it will take a reasonable time for adjustment, all will agree, but the ultimate benefits will so far overshadow any temporary disarrangements that the financial question, in my mind, need worry no one.

"It is too soon to speak authoritatively on what has occurred from a moral standpoint, but it is not too soon to say with all emphasis what will occur. Crimes of all natures, divorces, broken homes, ruined lives, cruelty to innocent children, have been traced to such an extent to the liquor evil, that there is and can only be one answer, and that is, prohibition is the greatest blessing that can come to the people of any community."

"No Whisky, No Drunks, No Disorder, No Scraps, No Nothing"

That there is less work for some people under prohibition is evident—less work for the policeman, the judge, the jailer, the jail cook, the sheriff and so forth on and on! The Morning Olympian quite recently voiced a plaint from the capital city of "bone-dry" Washington that can no doubt be heard in many another dry city and state: "No whisky, no drunks, no disorder, no scraps, no nothing." What would happen if Chicago, Philadelphia, New York were to "go dry?" Perhaps the tax payers' burden would be lightened and maybe it would be "back to the farm" for some city dwellers whose early days were spent in the more wholesome environment of country life. Hear the Olympian:

"What's the matter with you fellows on the force? Are you all asleep that you never throw any one in these days," asked a restaurant cook of one of the Olympia police force. "The past two months I have not had orders for enough meals at the city jail to remember I had a city contract. In all my years in Olympia I never saw the like, and I've cooked many a meal in my time and made good money. But it's not even pennies for me now from you fellows. You're a bum bunch."

"You know why, don't you?" asked the police officer addressed.

"No, only that it's rotten business. What's the answer?"

"No booze!"

"No! Is that a fact?"

"Take it from me. She went dry some months ago, didn't she—bone dry? Well, where there is no whisky there is less trouble and I've never seen it fall. No drunks, no disorder, no old time 'rolling,' no scraps, no nothing. There is no chance to jug the law abiding Americans of Olympia today."

"Switched if it ever struck me, but that sure is the case. I guess the jail meals business is shot for good."

And later that afternoon Police Judge Crosby reported he hadn't had one case of drunkenness in police court during the entire month just past. "In the old days I used to dread to come down to the office in the morning for they would be there waiting, six to a dozen strong," said the magistrate.

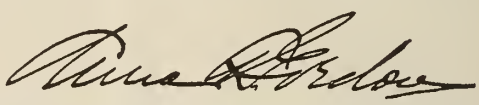
Thanksgiving Day

In reverent worship and in earnest supplication to our God, heroic patriots will observe the Day of Thanksgiving. It will be a sacred day—one of prayerful, grateful thoughts of our men in the Army and Navy; a day of fasting rather than of feasting; a day of renewed consecration to patriotic tasks; a dark and lonely day in hundreds of home circles, except for the glowing heavenly light from the altars of sacrifice.

As temperance patriots let us render whole-hearted thanks to God Almighty, the giver of every good and perfect gift, for mighty victories achieved, and for the marvelous growth in our own and other lands of anti-alcohol and prohibition sentiment. "O Giver on this hallowed day be Thou a beacon on our way."



"ON TO WASHINGTON"

We are living in epoch-making days. During the next few months or years issues of mighty import to the nation and the world are to be decided. All red-blooded men and women long to have a part in the writing of the new chapters in our civilization which will make the world a safer and saner abiding place for the human family. With admiration and gratitude we watch the young men go out from our homes to participate in a gigantic conflict that shall make the world safe for democracy. But to us as well as to those brave defenders in uniform comes the opportunity of the ages to make history for which coming generations will thank us. Upon each of us rests the responsibility to do our "bit" to help free our nation from the giant handicap of the legalized liquor traffic. During the coming session of Congress there will be presented and urged two measures that will have a direct effect upon the future welfare of this and other nations: A bill prohibiting the use of grain in the manufacture of beer, and a resolution providing for the submission to the states of a prohibition federal amendment. The United States Senate has already acted favorably upon the latter, and it is confidently expected that it will come up for early discussion and vote in the House of Representatives. It is imperatively necessary that pressure of the most definite and insistent kind be brought to bear upon all members of Congress who have not given positive expression to their views on the prohibition question. The passage of the resolution would be assured, we feel confident, if every large body meeting in the days intervening before Congress convenes would pass a strong and unequivocal resolution in favor of national constitutional prohibition, and if every Christian citizen would make it his personal business to interview his Congressman before he leaves for Washington, or failing in that, communicate with him by wire or mail, giving him plainly to understand that he is expected to represent in his attitude toward these measures not the liquor interests but the patriotic, right-minded constituents of his district. Members of the W. C. T. U. and readers of THE UNION SIGNAL can help in this work in their respective communities by appealing to prominent citizens to use their influence with their Congressmen. Only a short time remains in which to do this work. Immediate action is the one thing that will insure success.

"TO HELP THE JUST CAUSE"

There are today so many sign posts pointing the way to patriotic service that no man, even though deficient in mentality, may err in taking the right direction. When, therefore, the retail liquor dealers of Illinois, in convention assembled, voiced the desire to "uncomplainingly and willingly submit to any measure within reason to help the just cause in which our country is engaged" they must have done so with full knowledge of what was involved in such an admission.

Viewing the matter from any angle, these men must realize that the one measure that would most definitely help this country in its present emergency is to close up every place for the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages. They do not need to take the word of "prohibition fanatics"; the action of the United States government and Congress during the past few months ought to satisfy them on this point. What other business has been compelled, as a war emergency measure, to submit to such restrictions as has the liquor trade? (No soldier in uniform is permitted to have alcohol sold to him; no enlisted man in uniform is allowed inside of a saloon under penalty of court martial; dry zones surround training camps and naval stations; cantonments or mobilization centers have been placed, when possible, in dry territory, and the distilling of beverage liquors is absolutely stopped). Can any other interpretation be placed on these orders of the government than that the business of selling liquor is considered inimical to the welfare of the country during the war?

Certainly there is nothing in the tactics made use of by the liquorites in the state-wide campaigns or in the proceedings at Washington to indicate that these men are inclined to submit even "unwillingly" to the measures that would most directly help win the war for democracy. On the contrary, there is every evidence to show that they have and are considering their own financial interests before the good of the nation; that above everything else is the ambition and purpose to enrich themselves at the expense of others, without regard to the methods employed, and that they have used their ill-gotten profits and knowledge of the devious ways of corrupt politics to prevent legislation that would aid above everything else in making the Army and Navy and citizens efficient for patriotic service.

If the advocates of "personal liberty" are sincere in their desire to "help the just cause for which this country is battling" the way is open to them, and they have the chance of the centuries to demonstrate their patriotism and show what a nation relieved from the handicap of the liquor traffic can accomplish.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO DELEGATES

The population of the city of Washington at the present time is more than double what it was a few months ago. Hotels are already overcrowded and none are quoting any special rates. To accommodate the white ribbon visitors an appeal has been made to residents of the city to open their homes and the response has been most unexpectedly generous. The committees can place 750 in private homes at the nominal charge of $1.25 a day for lodging and breakfast. Without this co-operation our Convention hostesses would have been seriously embarrassed in caring for delegates and visitors to the National Convention. If you have not already made arrangements for your entertainment during convention week, write at once to Mrs. N. M. Pollock, 13 R St., N. E., and your request will receive immediate attention. Members of the District of Columbia W. C. T. U. will be at all trains to meet delegates and direct them to the hotels or private homes to which they are to go. For list of hotels, see last week's UNION SIGNAL, page 10.

Patriotic Echoes From State Conventions

Enthusiastic Co-operation in National W. C. T. U. Service Plans

Patriotism of the proved and practical type has characterized the members of the W. C. T. U. since the war began. The reports given at the state conventions all evidence that white ribboners of every commonwealth have established their right to be called the second line of defense in this great war for democracy and righteousness. So varied and numerous are these activities that an exhaustive review of them is manifestly impossible. We note in the survey of this month only a few of the more unique as indicative of the enthusiastic coöperation of the state organizations with the National W. C. T. U. in carrying out its service plans.

On November 22-24, the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. dedicated to the service of God and Home and our soldier boys the W. C. T. U. Home at Ayer near Camp Devens. This commodious house of sixteen rooms, set in three-quarters of an acre of ground, will be a real home, presided over by a house mother well fitted for the position.

New Jersey voted in executive session that the state W. C. T. U. would stand back of the Burlington county organization, of which Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher is honorary president, in opening a rest room at Camp Dix.

Delaware rejoices that for fifteen years it has conducted at Delaware City a rest and recreation home for the soldiers from Fort Dupont and Fort Delaware.

Louisiana is planning to open a home in Alexandria for the soldiers at Camp Beauregard, and at the coming Christmas season to assist the Y. M. C. A. by giving a real mother touch to the entertainment features.

"Patriotism and prohibition go hand in hand," declares the New York W. C. T. U. and reports abundant activities to prove that it has been "diligent in all good work," contributing generously to the ambulance and stereomotorgraph funds, adopting French and Belgian orphans, and in common with other states, making comfort kits and tirelessly knitting, knitting.

"Prohibition is patriotism" was the keynote of Colorado's convention. But the history of the past year shows plainly that while specializing on prohibition and law enforcement, Colorado has found time to do her generous "bit." Some unions have made and collected numerous boxes of children's clothing for the French orphans. Others have furnished dinners and spreads for the boys in training at Camp Baldwin; celebrating Colorado Day by giving a fine box luncheon to the hungry recruits. Boxes of candy from white ribbon mothers and sisters have found their way to the lads at these camps.

The comfort bag shops of the Northern and Southern California W. C. T. U.'s are proving immense successes, and to them have been sent and from them distributed thousands of these useful receptacles. The commandant at the naval training station at Yerba Buena, in San Francisco Bay, in placing his first order for 5,000 bags, specified that the contents be the W. C. T. U. kind, minus cigarets and tobacco.

Kentucky, in addition to generous giving to ambulance and stereomotorgraph funds and conducting other lines of work, has arranged for entertainments for the home-sick boys at Camp Zachary Taylor.

Oregon had a special "Bringing in the Sheaves" number on its convention program, resulting in a bountiful supply of good things for the boys in khaki.

The white ribboners of Pennsylvania and Minnesota have distinguished themselves by the amount of patriotic service performed—bandages, comfort bags, relief work and generous contributions to the ambulance and stereomotorgraph funds.

Illinois is finding great satisfaction in supplying the boys at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station with comfort bags as rapidly as they are sent in from contributing states. Abundant testimony from the recipients brings the assurance that it is very worth-while work.

West Virginia had a comfort bag exhibition at its convention, at which the leader displayed the various kinds of comfort kits, told of the advantages of each, the prices of the articles contained therein, and the needs of the boys they were designed to serve.

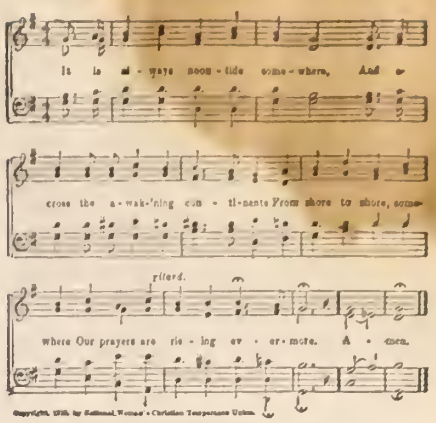
Some of the states, among them South Carolina and West Washington, voted to purchase Liberty Bonds.

Tennessee, in reporting its patriotic activities, says it has been instrumental in interesting and bringing into its membership those not heretofore enrolled.

Southern California has inaugurated a patriotic membership campaign, fixing as its goal the securing of one thousand recruits for the white ribbon army. Details of the plan will be given later. The enlistment pledge reads: "That I may give patriotic service to God and to my country, I hereby enlist in the White Ribbon Army, and solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including wine, beer and cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

White ribboners in all sections of the country are generously remembering the "boys" with all manner of comforts in the way of wearing apparel, candy, jellies, fruits, etc., and altogether are doing everything within their power to satisfy the physical, mental and even spiritual longings of the young defenders of the nation. To the soldier and sailor the very sight of the white ribbon brings a comforting sense of personal interest in his welfare and a desire to measure up to the best that is in him. Many are the words of gratitude everywhere received by local, county, state and national workers from recipients of their mother-hearted ministrations.

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. In how many states was prohibition a direct or an indirect issue on November 6?
2. What was the outcome of the election in those states?
3. Name the chief factors in the winning of victory in New Mexico.
4. Why can the result in Ohio be truly called a triumph for the dry cause?
5. In what way has prohibition in Virginia demonstrated its value according to the testimony of the governor and the attorney general?
6. How does dry Colorado appear to a visitor from license California?
7. Give some of the tributes paid by Utah's citizens to the benefits already experienced from the prohibitory law which went into effect August 1.
8. Point out certain indications that "bone-dryness" will continue to prove popular in Georgia.
9. What is the testimony of Oklahoma's attorney general in regard to the anti-liquor policy prevailing in his state?
10. Give the gist of the two national prohibition measures that are to be urged upon Congress when it convenes in December. How can every citizen help?

National Constitutional Prohibition Chief Topic at Colorado Convention

MRS. BESSIE CARLSON, Correspondent

Keen interest marked the meetings of the thirty-eighth annual convention of the Colorado Woman's Christian Temperance Union held in Boulder, October 24-26.

"Prohibition is Patriotism" is the keynote of the activities of Colorado women, who, while lending aid to every form of war relief work, are bending their energies chiefly toward the hastening of National Constitutional Prohibition as a war measure, deeming that the highest form of patriotic service. A resolution was unanimously adopted to petition Colorado's Representatives in Congress to work and vote for the federal amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition with the six-year clause eliminated.

A number of distinguished guests honored the convention with their presence, chief among whom was His Excellency, Julius C. Gunter, governor of Colorado, who, although the big Liberty Bond drive was on, took time to attend the convention and deliver an address of some length regarding the war activities of Colorado, explaining the work of the Men's War Council and the Woman's Advisory Council. The governor spoke also of the beneficial effects of prohibition in the state and highly commended the state W. C. T. U. president for her efforts in securing the passage of the new prohibition law at the last session of the legislature. Hon. Fred Farrar, who was attorney general during the first year of prohibition, made a stirring address on "National Constitutional Prohibition the Goal." District Attorney Fleming spoke out of the depths of experience regarding the enforcement of the prohibition law. Senator W. O. Peterson, known as the father of the prohibition bill, recounted the blessings that have come to the state since it entered the dry column. He referred to the new law, explaining its improvement over the first one and also its advantages over the proposed so-called "bone dry" bill.

Mrs. Ellen A. D. Blair of California, National organizer, made a plea for teaching children temperance truths, saying that the present workers now bringing to pass the dry regime were almost invariably trained in the old Bands of Hope or Loyal Temperance Legions. Mrs. Blair's chalk talks to L. T. L. workers were a delightful feature. Miss Emily Griffith, principal of the Opportunity school, Denver, gave an inspiring vision of the possibilities in "Americanization" of our foreign population.

Colorado is proud of its assistant attorney general, Miss Clara Ruth Mozzor, and her firm convictions, fearlessly expressed, in regard to prohibition. Representative Frederick Anderson of Denver, Attorney Sweigart and several other notables were present and extended greetings.

Professor William McKeever of the Welfare department of the Kansas University, aroused the interest of the convention and held it at high pitch on the subject, "The Cigaret—How Combat It." Practical, workable suggestions and plans were given in rapid-fire succession. The convention voted to offer prizes of $100 and $50 respectively, for the best and second best thesis or oration on "The Cigaret a Menace to the College Students of the State."

The convention elected Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford president for the fourteenth time, thus voicing appreciation of her services to the state and her untiring devotion to the cause. Her address, "Testing Patriotism," was clear-cut and forceful. Coöperation with the government in the conservation of food was

"Made in Kansas" Comfort Bags

Kansas white ribboners have this year pushed with vigor the department of Work among Soldiers and Sailors. Since June 15 they have made and distributed 5,677 comfort bags, comfort kits and housewives. Every Kansas boy was supplied before he left the state, and in addition 1,200 bags have been shipped to the Great Lakes Naval Training station and another lot of 1,200 are ready to be shipped. The picture above, showing the first 1,200, was taken on the front porch of the home of the wide-awake superintendent of this department, Rev. Mary Sibbitt, who is standing the fifth from the left. Much other relief work has also been done. The women have made and forwarded to the British War Relief Association 7,878 bandages, furnished the rest room in the Y. W. C. A. hostess house at Camp Funston, placing pictures of Miss Willard in this room and in the rest room at Junction City. Sixty-three cots for the dormitory at the Y. W. C. A. hostess house at Army City are being furnished and 27 comforts have been provided for the Y. M. C. A. secretaries at Camp Funston. There has been expended this year $6,533.67.

San Francisco's Comfort Bag Shop

MRS. DORCAS J. SPENCER

"Yes, the Comfort Bag Shop? Take the elevator." The elevator is already taken by the parcel postman and his parcels, but accommodates a few more passengers and appears to stop automatically at the fourth floor. "Turn to the left," says the elevator man, as if the current of footfalls could do otherwise. Passing a row of numbered doors the procession halts at the W. C. T. U. headquarters. Its hospitable door bears the legend, "Walk in," and opens at a touch. Directly opposite sits Mrs. DeYo, the corresponding secretary, at her desk, pen in hand, suspended while she greets each comer, directing all mail, parcels, or people for The White Ribbon Ensign to Miss McLean in the room at her right; all workers and material for soldiers and sailors to Mrs. Gilmore in the room at her left, and accepts for herself the casuals—not a few—who come for literature or information, while she drops her pen for the telephone, and the telephone for a dive into a pigeon hole, a ledger, or a drawer, and somehow satisfies each individual's wants.

The reception room at headquarters was commandeered for the Comfort Bag Shop. Its cosiest corner is occupied by a sewing machine, its big center table serves for cutting and arranging work; boxes, bales, and bundles crowd all available space, and overflow to the other rooms, for volunteer workers come daily, and use these facilities for the comfort of "our boys in blue."

When the work began, the usual staff, with volunteer assistants, tried to handle it, but more and more it grew. Then Mrs. Frances Craise Gilmore was called in as general supervisor.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union decided to specialize on comfort bags for the Navy. There being but four great naval stations, Newport, Norfolk, Great Lakes and San Francisco, it means that our shop must be the central point to receive, supply, and send out the bags from eleven states of the west. Presumably, the heart of every white ribboner burns within her to do her bit for our country and our boys. Bags are accurately cut by prescribed patterns, and sent to local unions or individuals, with printed instructions for making and filling. To save the expense of transportation, and have the advantage of buying in quantities, most of them are returned to be filled, with money to purchase the requisite material. Not one is sent out without making sure that it has the full complement of all it should have.

A few women have the fatal gift of originality, and perhaps unconsciously depart from printed directions in making bags. All such receptacles must be ripped apart and made to conform to patterns. How they do work in that shop! Volunteers come every day, busy and untiring. One sits for hours running strings into hems of bags, another filling little bags with buttons, one sticking pins into small cases, one cutting leaves of flannel for needle-books, and the sewing machine stops not at all. The most experienced and careful woman is detailed to fill the bags, seeing that nothing is omitted.

The commandant of the naval training school at Goat Island, (it is Yerba Buena on the map), made his first requisition for 5,000 bags. That order may not be entirely filled for awhile, but other orders await its completion. The local unions are feeders of this shop, and in

WHEN THE GRAPES WERE RIPE

FELICIA BUTTZ CLARK

"The vines bear well this year," said Grandpa (Nonno Alfredo, every one called him in Sorrento by the sea, near Naples). "We'll have a fine lot of wine this year, and it'll bring a good price over in Naples."

His daughter, Lisa, who sat by the door of the small stone house, stopped knitting and opened her mouth to speak. Then she picked up her work again.

It was a child's sock that she was knitting—a white one, very long. The wool was the finest that she had been able to get in the store of the village.

"Making something for little Gigetto?" asked Grandpa, leaning his olive wood staff against the door and sitting down beside her. Lisa nodded.

"Pity about him, isn't it? Lame as long as he lives, I suppose. I guess Beppo will remember that day he got so drunk and struck his little brother."

"And yet he goes on drinking the red wine that's pressed from these very grapes that you're going to make so much money from. And others go on drinking and ruining themselves and their families. I wish there were no grapes in all the world. Then, maybe, men wouldn't make beasts of themselves."

Nonno Alfredo took his long pipe out of his mouth and stared at her. He was very old, he had had several children, but not one of them had ever talked to him in this way. And about the grapes, too, from which they got their living! It was very strange.

And then he remembered that some one had told him that Lisa and Beppo had intended to be married just before the young man came home one night and in his drunken rage, threw little Gigetto, his brother, from his chair onto the hard brick floor. That was five years ago, and the child had never walked, because his spine had been injured in the fall.

Beppo was very, very sorry for what he had done, for he truly loved Gigetto. He had cried and moaned, but never once had he sworn to give up the sparkling wine that had turned him from a gentleman to a madman.

Lisa had laid aside the garments that she had so beautifully embroidered in her spare moments. She put them into a cedar chest inlaid with colored woods, a work of art in itself. Among the linen she put dried lavender leaves from the garden in front of the house. Occasionally, she opened the chest and took out the white garments and smelled the sweet odors of the herb.

She had declined to marry Beppo, though he had pleaded hard. A handsome young giant, he was, with black hair that lay in tiny curls around his forehead and eyes that were full of laughter. It was hard to refuse him, for she loved him.

But Lisa was firm. "I will never marry a drunkard," she said.

And now the time of the vendemmia was drawing near. It was already September, and the grapes were purple and juicy. All around the cottage, all over the hillside, stretched the vineyards, tier upon tier of them, the earth sustained by stone walls, so that when the heavy rains came, it should not be washed away. In some places, thatched roofs had been built, to protect the fruit. Sorrento wine was famous and very profitable. Gold mines would not have been treasured more carefully than were the vineyards by the peasants.

Below lay the yellow and pink stucco houses, and further down was the blue sea. Across the bay were the white and delicately tinted homes of Naples. Ships were on the water. On the right, Vesuvius sent forth a tiny spiral of smoke, symbol of the fires that blazed within the earth.

Lisa climbed the hill to the house where Beppo and his mother lived with little Gigetto. She had finished the socks and wanted to take them to him, because on the morrow he would be seven years old.

"How art thou today?" she asked him, after greeting his mother.

The boy was lying in a little cart that Beppo had made him. His face was pale but very sweet. In his hands he held a piece of soft clay.

"I am all right," was his cheery reply. Gigetto was always cheerful, sometimes even merry, in spite of his helplessness. "See what I have made, Lisa!"

He held up a small dog that he had moulded out of the clay.

"It is wonderful. Some day thou wilt be a great sculptor and thy name will be famous all over the world."

"Who knows?" answered Gigetto looking very sober. "Come here, Lisa, I want to tell thee something. Beppo is going to stop drinking."

Lisa's heart almost stopped beating. What would this mean for her?

"He told me so last night, when we sat here in the moonlight."

Lisa walked down the hill feeling that the ground under her feet was covered with roses. That night, she took out the linen garments from the cedar chest and shook the lavender leaves from them. Her wedding veil of white tulle was there, also. She would wear it on that happy day when she should walk by Beppo's side to the church with the square bell-tower.

Those were happy weeks, those warm days of September that passed like a dream. Beppo and Lisa were to be married on the fifteenth of October. She was making a wedding gown, of cheap material to be sure, but white and soft.

And all the time, the grapes were ripening on the vines, their purple skins were almost bursting with sweet juice. Everybody prophesied a big vintage. The vats were made ready. The lads and lasses were looking forward with delight to the day when the fruit should be gathered and piled high in baskets. The men would bear these baskets on their shoulders to the vats, and all day the boys would tread upon the grapes until their feet were purple and the juice of the fruit had turned into new wine.

There was feasting and merriment. Only one woman held aloof from the mad revel, and that was Lisa. At the door of her cottage she sat and in spite of the fact that she trusted Beppo, there was a feeling around her heart as if it were made of ice. Beppo had promised faithfully not to drink one drop, but he had been determined to take his share in the frolic. It would be cowardly not to do so, he had protested, when she begged him to work at his carpenter's bench on these days of the vendemmia, and not go among the companions who would tempt him to drink the wine as it flowed, all rosy and sparkling, from the vat.

Grandfather had laughed at her fears. Beppo was no boy; he could take care of himself.

The afternoon waned. Neither Grandpa nor the tall youth with the merry eyes came up the hill. There was no gay whistle to tell her that he was coming around the corner, just below the olive grove.

The sea glimmered like gold, the scents from the orange-blossoms were very sweet. She could hear the shouts from below and bits of song. "Santa Lucia" sang the girls, as their ear-rings twinkled and their cheeks grew scarlet.

How Lisa hated it all! She had loathed the feast of the vendemmia, this species of old Roman Bacchanalia, ever since she was a little girl and had hidden behind rocks from the men who went by, staggering. Perhaps, after all, it was not the grapes that did the harm; God caused them to grow for the refreshment of men and women. It was men who had discovered that from the grapes could be made a drink which would drive men mad and cause great misery. She thought of Gigetto lying helpless in his little cart.

A girl came up the hill. Her hair was in disorder and her eyes were wild. She was no friend of Lisa's.

"Waiting for thy Beppo?" she asked. "Thou wilt wait long. If gossip tells true, thou wilt wait forever for thy bridal day."

Lisa's face grew pale. What did Mariuccia mean? Was Beppo dead? Or was he—

"He's gone off to Naples, drunk," explained Mariuccia.

The sound of her laughter, as she went on up the hill, was like that of one of the satyrs who used to wait on the god Bacchus, in the days of ancient Rome.

It grew dark, but Lisa did not stir. No marble image was more motionless. Beppo—gone—drunk. It was not true. She would not believe it.

The clock on the church tower tolled seven. Lisa got up and took from a jar some corn-meal. Grandfather would be coming soon. She stirred the meal in water on the charcoal fire. People must eat, even though their hearts were breaking.

Then, suddenly, she stood still. A cheerful whistle sounded from the corner by the olive grove. Out of the darkness came a familiar figure, Beppo's, and he walked with his old careless swing.

"Good evening, love," he said. "But what hast thou? Why dost thou cry? Didst fear for me, dear? There was need of fear, ah, yes, God knows there was need, for the devil's in the wine that they are treading out down there. No, no, weep not Lisa. I did not go to the vendemmia at all. I've been working in my shop and have made the doors for a wardrobe to go in our house. I carved a grape-vine on them, bunches of fruit and leaves. Thou shalt see it. It is good to see thee laugh again. Stir the polenta, I smell it burning. Here comes Grandfather."

Grandfather thought deeply as he sat in the garden in the moonlight. Lisa was right. If it were not for the wine, men would not lose their sense and commit crimes. And who was to blame for the making of wine? Those who turned the grapes into profit, who coined gold out of others' misery.

"Come here, children," he called.

Beppo and Lisa came and stood in front of the old man.

"On your wedding day," Nonno said, "I shall give to you the deed for the house and for all this." He waved his hand over the vineyards. "It will be on one condition—that you sell the product of the land, but that not one of the grapes shall be used for the making of wine."

Beppo and Lisa were married on a crisp October day and the neighbors marvelled greatly because almost all of the vineyards were dug up and planted with peaches and apricots and pomegranates.

When they asked Beppo about it, he shrugged his shoulders and replied: "There's a little devil in the grape juice that delights to ruin men. It came near to ruining me, and destroying Lisa's happiness. Please God, no one will have cause to suffer because we want to pile up more gold."

But Mariuccia always laughs loudly as she goes by the house and Lisa clasps her baby close to her heart and thanks God for a husband who knows how to meet temptation and conquer it.

Prohibition, Patriotism and Suffrage Key-Notes of New York Convention

ANNA PRITCHARD GEORGE, Editor Woman's Temperance Work

The forty-fourth annual convention of the New York state W. C. T. U. at Jamestown was not lacking in enthusiasm and inspiration. Delegates to the number of 351 were present. The membership now numbers 45,000, a net increase the past year of 2,302. This entitles the state to ninety delegates to the National Convention, for the first time making it possible for every county in the state to be represented.

The various departments showed good progress and the treasurer, Mrs. Ellen L. Tenney, reported $41,543.90 the receipts for the year, the disbursements, $21,119.93.

The music of the convention was delightful, Mrs. Frances W. Graham's voice being sweeter than ever and the other musical talent also out of the ordinary.

The address of Dr. Frederick W. Roman of Syracuse University on "The Devil of Our Times," was a terrific arraignment of the tobacco habit. "Last year," he said, "25,000,000,000 cigarets were smoked and this year 40,000,000,000. That means a string four times across this continent, smoked daily and being consumed in smoke eight times faster than an express train moving across the continent. In the tobacco industry, directly and indirectly, 500,000 men are employed, making a total of 1,500,000 in the liquor and tobacco business. Last year $1,200,000,000 was spent for tobacco. Of the five hundred occupations in the United States there is only one that has a higher tuberculosis death-rate than the manufacture of tobacco. The increased consumption has gone up by leaps and bounds. The increase in cigarets alone is 450% in ten years; and if we consider the number of cigarets at the date, 1900, we find that the increase is 700%."

The absence of the National president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, whose presence at the convention the women had long anticipated with great pleasure, was deeply regretted by all.

On Friday evening the children were much in evidence in their remarkable demonstration, "The Evolution of the Liquor Traffic."

Reports of great gain and strenuous work were given by the Y. P. B. and L. T. L. general secretaries, Mrs. Maude B. Perkins and Miss Mildred O. Moody.

One of the many features which greatly influenced the public, was the parade in which there were from 1,200 to 1,500 in line of march.

Another event of importance was the grand diamond medal contest. The selections were all taken from "Black Rock" and the medal was won by Mrs. Jane Clark of Ransomville.

Three key-notes marked the convention this year: Prohibition, Patriotism, Woman Suffrage.

"Bone Dry" Prohibition Addresses by Prominent People

The convention was rich in powerful addresses by prominent people, every one of whom declared for "bone-dry" prohibition. Often the mayor of the city is too busy with important business to find time for a W. C. T. U. convention, but the mayor of Jamestown, Hon. Samuel A. Carlson, was with us and said, "It is just as important that we should be on the side of the obliteration of the liquor traffic as it is that we should be patriotically on the side of the great American nation in this war." Each speech on welcome night had the same true ring for prohibition.

On Sabbath day the call for prohibition came from three speakers—Mr. Clinton N. Howard, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger and Mr. Frank Regan. Clinton N. Howard, in his forceful address at the afternoon mass meeting in the Opera House, expressed his views of what the compensation for this great war should be: "If we are to pour out our money and blood we must insist that we shall have a fair return for the price we pay. How can it be done? Only in one way that is big enough to be named in the same breath with Europe's gain—the abolition of the liquor traffic! By nation-wide, bone-dry, rock-ribbed, bomb-proof, never-leak prohibition as the largest possible military preparation and the only adequate compensation for the price we pay. What would be the effect upon the food conservation of the nation if the 110,000,000 bushels of grain made into 2,000,000,000 gallons of beer and 140,000,000 gallons of whisky consumed in this country last year had been ground into flour and baked into bread? It would have given a loaf of bread every day in the year to 150,000,000 families! The Council of National Defense makes the statement, in supporting prohibition for the period of the war, that 6,000,000,000 pounds of food stuffs go into the manufacture of intoxicating liquor every year. Immediate prohibition is a supreme military necessity, and would mean victory against any nation that remains in partnership with rum. I do not tremble for my country, I do not fear the ultimate result, however long drawn out the conflict; but national prohibition would make assurance doubly sure, accelerate the victory, work blessings upon all, hardships upon none, and pay dividends for eternity when peace shall come. National Constitutional Prohibition is our one salvation."

At the close of his address Mr. Howard presented a resolution asking President Wilson to exercise the authority vested in him by Congress, to make this country "bone-dry" during the period of the war. The resolution was unanimously adopted by the audience of 2,000.

In the evening Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, in telling how Indiana went dry, closed her address with these words: "We have prayed loud and long, 'O Lord, in your own good time destroy the liquor traffic.' I believe in the power of God to do things, but this man-made institution must be destroyed by man's methods. The time has come to pray, 'O Lord, put conviction into the hearts of men and women to consecrate themselves to destroy this traffic.' Then will King Alcohol's throne be abdicated and his crown cast down."

Mrs. Ella A. Boole devoted one large section of her president's address to National Constitutional Prohibition and made special recommendations for work in that direction during the coming year and also for state-wide prohibition. Miss Mary B. Ervin, National general secretary of the Loyal Temperance Legion Branch, who was a very welcome guest at the convention, also made a plea for the cause. Throughout the entire week "bone-dry" prohibition was the challenge from every quarter.

Members of W. C. T. U. True Patriots

The members of the W. C. T. U. are patriots in every sense of the word, a fact also demonstrated at the convention. Patriotism and prohibition go hand in hand. Knitting needles were as common as they are at home. When Mrs. Boole asked the mothers whose boys were under the colors to stand, twenty-four women arose. Special prayer was offered for these young men at the front. The treasurer reported $1,203.45 as having been contributed toward the Ambulance Fund and the stereomotorgraph machine, and $176.95 for the care of French orphans. The Y. P. B. and the L. T. L. both re-

Successful Prosecution of Prohibition Campaign Theme of Ohio Convention Program

More than 600 delegates and several hundred visitors gathered for the Ohio state W. C. T. U. convention, held at Springfield, the uppermost thought in the minds of all being the successful prosecution of the state-wide prohibition campaign. Speakers of national importance added to the interest of the program. Mrs. Ella A. Boole, vice-president of the National W. C. T. U., and president of the New York state W. C. T. U., delivered one of the evening addresses, which was a logical statement of the present status of the temperance reform. Mrs. E. L. Calkins, president of the Michigan W. C. T. U., was present throughout convention week and made short addresses that delighted her hearers. Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, eloquent pleader for righteousness from the Southland, made a most spirited appeal for the closing of the saloons of the state. Rev. Sam Small also made a stirring address.

A grand diamond medal contest was held on Wednesday evening, in which the seven contestants acquitted themselves with honor. The medal was awarded to Mr. Tom Stone. While the judges were making their decision, Mrs. Viola D. Romans, state corresponding secretary, gave a delightful talk.

Notwithstanding the heavy demands upon Ohio comrades this year, the treasurer, Mrs. Florence Jaite, announced a gain over all losses of more than $800. Fifty-four counties this year made gains in membership, with Franklin county as the banner county, with an enrollment of 2,400, and Wooster union the banner union, with nearly 400 members. Sixty-one life members have been welcomed during the past year.

It was voted to establish a permanent Ohio Messenger fund, and $700 was pledged at the convention, the money to be placed on interest and kept intact for an emergency.

Seventy-seven new Young People's Branches have been organized in 1917, ten Y. P. B. life members received, and the co-operation of the young people in the campaign for a dry state has been most hearty. The Ohio L. T. L. now numbers 2,621, a gain over last year. The little folks gave an illustrated playlet of Mother Goose characters which was greatly enjoyed.

The annual address of Mrs. Florence D. Richard, state W. C. T. U. president, was an able summing up of the situation in Ohio.

All state officers were re-elected.

ported money raised for the French Orphan Fund. A great many Y. P. B. boys are in the service of our country. Mrs. George F. Pashley, state superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, reported a vast amount of work accomplished. A few of the items are: Comfort kits, 7,516; testaments and gospels, 6,093; bandages, 1,704; Ambulance Fund, $257; French Orphan Fund, $36.50; surgical dressings, $50.

Patriotic Evening six superintendents gave unique demonstrations showing the war relief work of the state W. C. T. U. Mrs. Boole urged further activity along this line and recommendations were adopted for patriotic work during the coming year.

Suffrage a Most Popular Topic

Like the call for prohibition, the call for woman suffrage began on the first night. The men who so warmly welcomed us and declared themselves in favor of prohibition, also strongly advocated votes for women. Mrs. DeSilva who gave the response, was eloquent in her appeal for equal suffrage. On Monday afternoon an hour was devoted to "Franchise," when Dr. Lavinia R. Davis, state superintendent, gave her excellent report. Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, president of the Indiana W. C. T. U., told "How We Campaigned in Indiana." Mrs. Halsey W. Wilson, expert conductor of watchers' schools, and Miss Adella Potter of the New York State Suffrage Association, spoke to the point. During the convention a regular polling booth was installed in the lecture room of the church and all delegates and visitors were given an opportunity to vote at a mock election.

The officers were re-elected with the exception of the state corresponding secretary, Mrs. Helen J. Andruss, who was not up for re-election. Mrs. Andruss and Rev. O. R. Miller of Albany are to be married in November. The official list stands: President, Mrs. Ella A. Boole; vice-president, Mrs. Frances W. Graham; corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. M. DeSilva; recording secretary, Mrs. Mary B. Wood; treasurer, Mrs. Ellen L. Tenney; general secretary Y. P. B., Mrs. Maude B. Perkins, associate, Miss Helen G. H. Estelle; general secretary L. T. L., Miss Mildred O. Moody, associate, Miss Catherine Randall; editor Woman's Temperance Work, Mrs. A. P. George.

The work in New York state is great but it is a matter for gratitude that the workers are both abundant and able.

SAN FRANCISCO COMFORT BAG SHOP

their several localities may be seen a smaller replica of it. Ever the blue of the Navy predominates, but the russet hue of the khaki speaks for the personal love that is following its beloved to strange battlegrounds, and many khaki bags are made for our very own boys, already gone into service, and we like the association of their service with ours.

Mrs. Gilmore's supervision includes all the bags that are sent from ten other western states. With the commandant's first order came the courteous request that no cigarets or tobacco be placed in the bags—a somewhat superfluous favor to ask of the W. C. T. U. Perhaps he did not remember that it was by the efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union that thirty years ago a law was secured that included naval and military schools among those in which the effect of alcohol and other narcotics must be taught.

Over $1,200 has passed through this shop, but there is always need for more, and labor and time could often be saved by ready cash. Each day's receipts go for the next day's demands.

How the Children Helped in New Mexico

LORA S. LA MANCE, National W. C. T. U. Organizer

The state superintendent of schools, Prof. J. H. Wagner, and Secretary of State Lucero joined forces and appointed a state-wide prohibition hour on Friday, November 2, at which time every teacher was to explain the election and what it meant to the home and school. Sufficient sample ballots were sent to every teacher in the state to allow every pupil of eight years old or over to vote on the question. Then the children took the ballots home to their parents and told them about it.

One of the problems was to raise money for the campaign. Where the saloons abounded most of the Mexican people were wretchedly poor, because the saloons took all of their money. I have never seen such destitution, outside of the city slums, as in the Mexican quarters of Los Cerrillos, where there are five saloons for only 600 people. One of the Mexicans there said to me in broken English, as he grasped my hand and shook it, "Your talk so good—so good. Saloon get my money—I vote—vote dry!" But out of their straitened means they gave with surprising liberality. At Springer, a young school boy offered his dollar with smiling face. "I earned it," he proudly told us, "and I feel better because I gave it." At Nara Visa, a small boy who had $24 in the bank almost cried because we would not take $10 of it. He was comforted by our telling him to see his father, and promising that if he gave his consent the $10 would be accepted.

The writer made the rounds of the mining camps. Without exception the operators wanted the camps to go dry. They said so much time is lost through drinking carousals that their coal output would be increased twenty to twenty-five per cent if they could have sober workmen. There is a coal shortage, so that the economic and efficiency consideration cuts a big figure in the affairs of the state.

The National W. C. T. U. sent in more than $600 worth of posters, and Miss Harriet Henderson faithfully sent packages of these into hamlets, byways and far inland places. A better piece of poster advertising was never done in the United States. The posters, many of which were in Spanish, made sentiment for the amendment.

The governor's wife, who is also the vice-president-at-large of the state W. C. T. U., went into doubtful counties and spoke. Oh, New Mexico is proud of its first lady of the state, who leads in suffrage work and in patriotic and home-defense work and is not afraid to use her voice and influence for what she thinks is right.

So, in spite of all obstacles, New Mexico won. To God be the glory!

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 24th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. A dollar bill mailed at our risk will bring you the Pathfinder for a full year, or simply send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. This does not repay us but we are glad to invest in new friends. Pathfinder, Box 60, Washington, D. C.

Prof. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

The Millennium

What, When and Where?

By PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

America's Great Prophetic Expositor

Dean of the Moody Bible Institute.

WHEN the great world-war broke out, Dr. Gray, who had long been a student of prophecy, became impressed with the conviction that the times of fulfilment were at hand. He began work on his famous series of studies, entitled "The Mountain Peaks of Prophecy." Eight of the articles have already appeared in the Christian Herald. These wonderfully enlightening productions, from the pen of one who is not only a profound Bible scholar, but an intensely evangelical, spiritual teacher, have aroused unusual interest.

The Christian Herald has been deluged by inquiries concerning Dr. Gray's articles, and so many applications for copies of the issues containing them were received that the issues soon became exhausted. A flood of correspondence poured in, and the demand for further light from the same source was such that Prof. Gray was urged to continue the series, and to bring it down to the latest point consistent with sound Bible scholarship and reverence for God's Word. Responding to this widespread appeal, Dr. Gray consented to write four new articles. The first article in the New Series appears in the

of the

and will be followed by three others, the titles of the four being:

1.—What Does the Bible Teach About Russia?
2.—What Does the Bible Teach About the Restoration of Babylon?
3.—The Millennium: What, When and Where?
4.—The Present War and Coming Events.

SERIES IN PAMPHLET FORM

As the numerous requests for copies of the Christian Herald containing Dr. Gray's first series of articles have completely exhausted the supply, we have reprinted the first series of eight articles in Pamphlet form. This Booklet contains the following articles:

1.—The Seed of the Woman, or The First Promise of Redemption.
2.—God's Covenant with Abraham, or Why He Chose Israel.
3.—God's Covenant with David, or The Coming Kingdom.
4.—The "Times of the Gentiles" and the impending Judgments.
5.—Israel Restored and Renewed.
6.—The Place of the Church in the Plan of Redemption.
7.—The Antichrist, Who He Is, and When He Will Arise.
8.—The Day of the Lord—When It Comes and What It Means.

Special Offer TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS For 25c we will send at once the Booklet mentioned above, containing the first eight articles of Dr. Gray, and the Christian Herald for ten weeks, beginning with the November 7th issue, containing the first of Dr. Gray's new articles on Prophecy.

Dry Colorado Seen Through the Eyes of a Visitor From License California

Prosperity is in the very air of a prohibition community, and no one is quicker to notice it than the visitor from a license community. A California man, Dr. Milbank Johnson, while visiting in Denver recently, wrote to the San Francisco Examiner concerning the evidences of prohibition prosperity. His letter is as follows:

"One banker who had a large number of saloonkeepers as depositors, and who was thoroughly lined up for the wets at the last election here, told me that he had had a complete change of heart and would today vote for prohibition. He has recently traced over $400,000 in new deposits in his bank directly resulting from the savings of clients who had stopped drinking.

"I was very much pleased yesterday, driving out to Lookout Mountain to pass in the city of Golden a large, beautifully equipped old brewery building, now used for the manufacture of malted milk. It was such a surprise to me that I made inquiry and found that this business was more profitable than the manufacture of beer.

Big Advance in Rents

"Real estate men tell me that rentals have advanced in Denver about fifteen per cent. While it is true that some of the favorite corners heretofore bringing large rents from saloons, are not bringing so much now for ordinary merchandising as heretofore, still they are all rented profitably, and the landlords seem entirely pleased with the change.

"I am stopping at the Brown Palace, and in discussing this matter with the proprietor, he tells me that this year has been the most profitable year in the history of the hotel, and they are entirely satisfied with their conditions. In fact, I am dictating this letter in what was formerly known as 'The Spa,' a celebrated saloon in the Brown Palace. It has now the unique distinction of being a dry bar where soft drinks exclusively are sold. The bartender told me this morning that it is more than paying its way.

"The reports I get from Colorado Springs, which is exclusively supported by tourists and visitors, are the same. All of their hotels are full and have been all summer.

"I believe I am safe in saying that the change in Denver suits the majority of its population, and they attribute much of their freedom from crime and other vices to the fact that they have no saloons.

"I was also informed this morning that one of the great wings of the Colorado state penitentiary, at Canon City, is entirely unoccupied. Two years ago they were discussing the necessity of building a new penitentiary. Now they are abandoning over half of the space. This points its own lesson and could not be due to war prosperity."

NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION CHIEF TOPIC AT COLORADO CONVENTION

urged upon the women of the W. C. T. U., with a protest at the same time against the waste of 68,000,000 bushels of grain and many tons of sugar a year in the manufacture of beer.

An inspiring letter of greeting from Miss Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U., was heard with pleasure. Encouraging messages were sent to our sister states, New Mexico and Wyoming.

An interesting sidelight on the convention was the introduction of the youngest delegate, Loys Luella Tanner, aged five months. Little Miss Tanner was given the white ribbon salute and made a member of the convention. Her voice was frequently heard from the floor. Four zealous women, the oldest delegates in years but the youngest in spirit, were Mrs. E. N. Smith, Mrs. Marian Clark, Mrs. A. C. Croft and Mrs. Martha Brownell of Greeley, whose ages range from seventy-five to eighty-five years. They were given an enthusiastic salute. Mrs. Clark, who was a schoolmate of Frances Willard, was accorded a life membership by the Greeley union.

The convention as a whole did much to give impetus to the forward march of the white ribbon army toward the goal, National Constitutional Prohibition.

Form Your Own Opinion

The following letter came to us after the writer had received and read the October 4 UNION SIGNAL, but, she says, "The UNION SIGNAL of October 4 is no exception." READ THIS ISSUE AND FORM YOUR OWN OPINION.

"DEAR UNION SIGNAL:

"I am moved to write you through reading the appreciation of one of your readers which is timely and well merited. It set me to thinking. Why do we not scatter a few flowers in the pathway of our faithful editors and their co-workers who strive so hard to make our 'Letter from Home' instructive and interesting?

"Do we appreciate the wonderful insight Margaret Dye Ellis gives us into the doings of Congress every week? Another contributor has given us in the October 4 issue such a realistic description of the 'Meeting of the Church Committee'—amusing but true to life. A fine article, 'The Lost Trill' and an encouraging story for tired teachers are in the same number. The editorials and the superintendents' reports are full of information and helpfulness. Note the splendid article on 'Democracy's Foe,' by Margaret Wintringer. The advertisements and notices are well worth a careful reading. You may discover in this paper just what you were looking for; and the SIGNAL of October 4 is not an exception. Every number is packed full of good things improving and uplifting.

"If you are not taking THE UNION SIGNAL—try it for one year and you will become so attached to it that you will never want to give it up. We write from personal knowledge for we have welcomed its weekly coming for more than twenty years! So we say—LONG LIVE THE UNION SIGNAL! L. A. M."

Don't Let Her Sign!

"If you believe that the traffic in Alcohol does more harm than good - help stop it!"

"Strengthen America Campaign"

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

Charles S Macfarland, General Secretary
Gov. Carl E. Milliken, Chairman of Temperance Commission
Charles Stelzle, Manager of "Strengthen America Campaign"

105 East Twenty Second Street, New York City, N.Y.

The "Don't Let Her Sign" poster is a reproduction of a full page advertisement which appeared in all of the Washington city papers during the Senatorial fight for war-prohibition. The poster had a marked effect upon the campaign waged at that time in our Capital City.

No right thinking person wanted "Miss Liberty" to sign this promissory note. She was signing away too much and getting mighty little in return—indeed, the most of what she would get to repay her for indulgence in strong drink would be heartache, anguish, broken homes, crippled men, hungry wives and children, increase in taxes, crowded penitentiaries and insane asylums, and endless woe.

There may be political and economic complications associated with the liquor business, but the entire matter resolves itself into a simple proposal. Here it is: "If you believe that the traffic in alcohol does more harm than good, help stop it."

It is not a question as to whether alcohol does any good. The real question is does it do more harm than good. And everybody can answer that intelligently, instantly.

NOTICE TO READER: When you finish reading this magazine place a 1 cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers and sailors at the front. No wrapping—no address.
—A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General

"It Is Foolish to Close the University and Leave Open the Kindergarten"

HON. WILLIAM J. BRYAN

Congress did not go far enough. There is no reason for separating beer from whisky in the attempt to save food. The brewers use twice as much grain to make beer as the distillers did to make whisky. But the brewers spend more money to corrupt the government and subsidize the press. People don't begin to drink on whisky. They start with beer. Beer is the kindergarten from which the drinker graduates to the whisky university. It is foolish to close the university and leave open the kindergarten.

HAS BEER FOOD VALUE?

The Journal of the American Medical Association for October 13, 1917, contained an editorial article on "Beer as a Source of Protein," which must have given pain to the brewers. The article says:

"The idea long held by a large portion of the public that 'alcohol increases the power of endurance, and gives greater energy and ability to work longer' has given way to a more accurate appreciation of the real rôle of this substance in the body. Despite the fact that alcohol can be burned in the human organism, the most enthusiastic supporters of its use, if there still be such, do not defend it on the basis of superior nutrient virtues. The pharmacologists almost without exception rank alcohol as a depressant rather than a stimulant in the true sense; and the therapeutist who cares to advise the employment of alcohol does so from the standpoint of its pharmacodynamic (power and effects as a drug) performance rather than because of any superior food value in the product.

"Beer, however, has made claim to recognition as a food, in contrast with the distilled liquors that contain essentially only water and alcohol, on the basis of the cereal constituents which are still contained in it. Hence the statement that 'beer is liquid bread.' In addition to alcohol, beer does, in fact, contain sugars and other soluble carbohydrates, along with a small amount of nitrogenous compounds that are frequently expressed as protein. The customary method of arriving at an estimate of this fraction of beer consists in determining the nitrogen content and calculating it as protein, after multiplication with the familiar factor N × 6.25. This procedure is now well recognized by food analyists to be fallacious, so far as it assumes that all compounds containing nitrogen, in food substances, are actually protein in nature. On this basis such substances as amins, ammonium salts, alkaloids, etc., would be counted as protein.

"The uncertainty regarding the real food value, if any, of the nitrogenous compounds of beer is emphasized in a recent report of the Committee of the Royal Society on the Food Supply of the United Kingdom, which has assumed, without any conclusive evidence, that something between 50 and 100 per cent of the nitrogen is in the form of protein or amino-acids which are utilizable in the body. In the Department of Physiology of Glasgow University, Professor Sharpe has recently undertaken to throw further light on the controverted question of the nature of the nitrogenous compounds in beer. He reviews the fate of the proteins of barley during the brewing process wherein, as a result of the malting, part of the protein in the grain is acted on by proteolytic enzymes which break it down into simpler substances. These, along with a little soluble protein, pass into solution during the mashing; but the greater part is left in the brewers' grain. During the processes of boiling, hopping and subsequent cooling of the wort, some of this protein becomes precipitated. The amount of nitrogen thus finally left in solution is termed by the brewer 'permanently soluble nitrogen.' By the action of the yeast during fermentation, a further quantity of soluble nitrogen is removed by these organisms using a certain proportion as food. A further amount of protein is removed after the beer is made, and this process is carried out to insure that the beer may remain 'bright.'

"Beers of various types contain solid matter ranging from less than 4 per cent in the 'light' varieties to over 6 per cent in other kinds. Of this, about one-half is carbohydrate, essentially dextrin in nature. This leaves 2 or 3 per cent of the dissolved substance, some of which is nitrogenous, to be accounted for. That the protein content of the beer or ale will not be appreciable when the beverage reaches the consumer is shown by the failure of most of the protein tests to give a reaction with the product. According to Sharpe's new analyses, the protein content of beer varies from 0.038 to 0.185 per cent. The amino-acid nitrogen of beer varies from 0.014 to 0.040 per cent. There is a varying proportion of nitrogen combined as purin compounds which in some cases exceeds that combined as amino-acid nitrogen. It varies from 0.01 to 0.39 per cent of the beer itself.

"Bearing in mind the limited quantities of beer that can be taken per day with any approach to impunity, it will be seen that the few grams of hypothetic protein thus offered have no significance whatever as a defense for the use of the beverage. One might as well exploit the protein in ginger ale or fruit juices. . . .

"In any event, any claim for its protein contribution to the diet no longer needs serious consideration. The dairy cattle are more fortunate in having the protein concentrate of the brewers' grains available for their ration."

THE BREWERS' "SPECIAL PRIVILEGES"

London Spectator Discourses on Beer

An interesting article in The Spectator of October 13 says: "During the last few days the warnings to the nation about economy have become more urgent than ever. We are evidently being prepared for more drastic regulations all along the line. We have stated over and over again our strong conviction that it is almost hopeless for the government to appeal to the country with an appearance of sincerity when they themselves not only tolerate but encourage a widespread waste of food. For this is what the brewing of beer means. It consumes barley, and it also consumes sugar. It does this at a time when sugar is short in every household in the land, and housewives are being urged to cut down their consumption of bread to the last possible crumb. We do not write as teetotallers. We have no idea of condemning beer as a drink. All we say is that the brewing of beer automatically carries its own condemnation in such times as these on the terms which the government itself has stated. There is no food to waste, yet food is being wasted in the form of beer. It may not be generally known, and we fancy it may not easily be believed by persons who have not ascertained the facts for themselves, that maltsters are among those who are allowed to buy barley at 5s. 3d. a quarter over the standard rate. In practice this means that when a miller goes to market to buy barley he often finds that a maltster is able to outbid him and buy the finest grades of barley for malting. Of course, it will be said that, as maltsters and brewers are allowed to use only fixed quantities of barley, the millers have no grievance, their wants being provided for under a farseeing government scheme. We beg to say, however, that they have a very distinct grievance, for we hear of mills which are either running short of material or shutting down because they cannot obtain the necessary cereals for the purpose of mixing their flour according to the official prescription."

TOLL OF THE BREWER'S BEER

If you have ever thought beer a harmless drink, read the confession of a twenty-year-old boy, Kent Blair, of Alameda, Cal., who shot and killed one woman and seriously injured two others. The police found the boy hiding in some bushes near the house, still clutching the rifle. He was intoxicated and said he did not know why he had done the shooting. Later he made the following admission to the police: "I had been drinking since Thursday night. I must have drunk a barrel of beer, and when I started to work this morning I was told there was 'nothing doing' and I found the gates locked. Then I went out with some friends and drank all the afternoon."

Speaking on the eve of the first anniversary of prohibition in Ontario Premier Sir W. N. Hearst said that the operation of the law had come up to his great expectations, and that increased efficiency in every branch of industry had resulted, while hotel accommodations had improved.

Week-Ends Under Prohibition in Virginia

The Virginia argument for state-wide prohibition is becoming every day more voluminous. Men of every class give unqualified commendation to the anti-liquor law. Judge T. J. Barham, of the corporation court of Newport News, in an open letter, published in the Press of that city, calls attention to the week-end benefits experienced as a result of the closing of the saloons, in the following words:

"Almost immediately after the law became operative, it could be heard on all sides that workingmen, white and black, who usually spent their money and time on Saturday nights in barrooms, could be seen on those nights shopping with their wives and carrying bundles home to their families. The same class of people would go to their rental agents and pay their rent at the week-end instead of squandering their earnings in drink and leaving their wives to 'stand off' the collector on Monday morning.

"The buildings that were used for the sale of liquor before November 1, 1916, were practically all occupied on that day with other lines of business. One of the largest liquor mail-order houses in this section has since been converted by its owners into a splendid up-to-date commercial hotel."

Michigan Brewery Will Make Cheese

The Holland brewery, one of the oldest in the state of Michigan, having been in operation fifty years, says a Grand Haven paper, is to be used after December 1 for the manufacture of cheese.

Grand Jury Asks "Bone Dry" Law to Protect Soldiers

The grand jury of San Diego county, California, in a resolution adopted prior to its adjournment, announced itself as strongly in favor of the campaign to close the saloons in the city of San Diego, and called upon the voters to use their influence and ballots to protect the soldiers in this vicinity from the legalized liquor traffic. "The best interests of this community and of those who are to defend our nation demand the adoption by the people of the city of San Diego of the bone dry ordinance," declares the resolution.

New County Dry Law Cuts Arrests for Drunkenness Eighty Per Cent.

Dallas county, Texas, has been dry less than two months, but it took much less time than that to establish an entirely new record in the matter of arrests for drunkenness in the city of Dallas. For the first ten days that prohibition was in force, or from October 21 to October 31, only twenty-six arrests for drunkenness were made. For the same period in September the arrests for this cause were 138. Apparently the administration means that the county shall be dry and the use of liquor as a beverage entirely discontinued, if the report from a Texas paper that two men charged with drunkenness were fined $5 each in the city court recently, is to be credited.

TEXT OF PROPOSED FEDERAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT AS ADOPTED BY THE UNITED STATES SENATE

The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by Congress.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Episcopal Bishops Almost Unanimous for National Prohibition

Ninety-seven per cent of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America are in favor of prohibition by statute for the period of the war and by constitutional amendment for all time, says Bishop Frederick Courtney, president of the church Temperance society, in a recent issue of The Churchman. In a questionnaire sent by the Bishops to all the clergy of the United States, inquiring as to their attitude toward prohibition, the statement is made that "Three archbishops and thirteen bishops composing the council for social service of the Anglican church in Canada have already unanimously taken action in favor of permanent national prohibition for the Dominion."

Ex-Governor of Texas a Convert to Prohibition

Ex-Governor Sayers of Texas, who until the past few months has been an advocate of the liquor traffic, has been working and speaking in the interests of prohibition in the Travis county campaign. In acknowledging his change of heart on this vital question, ex-Governor Sayers says: "The man who votes with the saloons is an enemy to the United States government and should be classed with the German spies."

Indictments Drop from 225 to 9 Under Prohibition

One of the results of prohibition in Alabama has come to light in the report of the grand jury of Butler county, which, during its recent session, returned but nine indictments, in comparison with 225 found at one sitting during the days of the licensed saloon. In former times it took at least two weeks to clear the docket, but this year three days proved ample. The Butler county jail, under prohibition, has a population of only six.

Every South Dakotan a Prohibitionist

"Meet a South Dakotan, and you meet a prohibitionist," is the way a writer in a Minneapolis paper tells of the satisfaction of the voters of the state with the new prohibition law. He says further, "The law has been in effect four months and it is being enforced to the letter. Little or no part of the state's big income is being spent for liquor. The sentiment behind the law is so strong that no official dares ignore its violation."

The Argus-Leader of Sioux Falls sums up the results of prohibition as follows: "This state is tremendously pleased with the results of real and absolute prohibition. There is no suspicion of illegal selling in Sioux Falls. The law is being as rigidly and as generally enforced as the law against any other crime—better than most other laws. Many economic improvements are noticeable. Bills are more promptly paid, merchants report. There is more money available for books and clothing, groceries and amusements, and this city is a happier and better place in which to live."

CAN ORGANIZED LABOR AFFORD TO STAND WITH THE LIQUOR INTERESTS?

CHARLES STELZLE, Manager of the "Strengthen America" Campaign, Says "No"

Addressing a meeting attended by many delegates to the American Federation of Labor convention, meeting at Buffalo, N. Y., November 18, Charles Stelzle put this question to his audience: "Can the labor movement stand for the liquor traffic?"

"The labor officials who recently presented to Woodrow Wilson a petition alleged to have been signed by more than two million trade unionists asking that the manufacture and sale of booze be continued, were either ignorant of the facts or else they deliberately tried to flimflam the President," declared Mr. Stelzle.

"The number of alleged signers of this petition from but twenty-two states which were enumerated was greater than the total membership of the American Federation of Labor throughout the entire country at the time the petition was framed up. Furthermore, only 445 local labor bodies out of nearly 25,000 labor unions are listed as having signed the petition," continued Mr. Stelzle.

"Hundreds of thousands of trade unionists are strongly opposed to the liquor traffic in all its forms. Among them are some of the most eminent leaders in the labor movement. They have become tired of having the liquor men make a 'goat' of the labor movement.

"Mr. Hoover is telling us that 'Food will win the war.' If this is true, then the liquor men and the labor men who stand for the liquor traffic are assuming serious responsibilities. The liquor men insist that they use only one per cent of the grain produced in the country for the manufacture of booze. One per cent of the grain will feed one per cent of the people. One per cent of the people is 1,000,000 people. We shall send 1,000,000 soldiers to the trenches in France.

"This means that the liquor men are using enough food products to feed every last man who is going to the front 'to make the world safe for democracy.' We do not permit the men in uniform to drink liquor. Some of the men who are staying at home not only expect the men at the front to fight their battles, but they are using for booze the grain which should be sent to feed the soldiers in the trenches.

"The way to find out whether or not organized labor can afford to stand for the liquor traffic is to see what organized labor stands for and then see how the saloon comes up to its standards. Organized labor believes in better jobs for working men, in greater efficiency, in higher wages, in keeping children in the schools, in the dignity and elevation of womankind, and in the preservation of the home.

"The saloon takes away a man's job, makes workingmen less skillful and drives them to lower grades of employment, decreases a man's pay, sends children to the factory, degrades womanhood and destroys the home. The interests of the saloon are always opposed to the interests of the workingman. Therefore, organized labor cannot stand for the saloon in any particular."

NO MORE SALOONS IN LOS ANGELES, DECREE OF NOVEMBER 20 ELECTION

The saloons of Los Angeles are to be closed next spring, according to Associated Press reports, as the result of an election held November 20. The city voted on an ordinance providing for the closing of all saloons, prohibiting absolutely the sale of distilled liquors for drinking purposes, and rigidly restricting the sale of wine and beer to a small zone in the heart of the city. Inside of the prescribed zone, from seven o'clock in the morning to six o'clock in the evening of all days except legal holidays, sales can be made in wholesale houses, in sealed packages only, not to be opened on the premises; and wine and beer may be sold with bona fide meals in public dining rooms from eleven in the morning to nine o'clock at night.

Mrs. Martha W. Law, president of the Los Angeles W. C. T. U. Federation, writing of the measure just before the election, said:

"In the midst of war's alarms, and the absorbing questions, and strenuous activities arising therefrom, Los Angeles has been seriously considering the question of house-cleaning on a large scale, partly in the interest of the boys in khaki who are coming and going through our streets, partly to protect the bluejackets and soldiers who are resident in large numbers in our harbor—San Pedro. Good citizens of our suburb are greatly exercised by the persistence and ingenuity of the local saloonkeepers in helping these young men to break through the restriction imposed upon them by the government. Almost unlimited indulgence has been the rule, with women, girls, and young boys acting as purveyors for the liquor dealers. The results have been scandalous in the extreme, and have made some of us wonder whether Uncle Sam is wise in denying liquor to a certain class of citizens, while all around them others are freely indulging. How much better to have made a clean sweep of the whole business. Many believe that the soldiers resent this discrimination and are the more persistent in seeking that which is permitted to everybody except themselves. However that may be, temperance workers have realized for months that something must be done to help the national government enforce the restriction it has made.

"The W. C. T. U. and the club women were the first to come forward with a petition to the common council to make the city dry as a war measure. But the city fathers argued that, as Los Angeles has three times within the past five years voted itself wet, there was small reason to suppose that the people would accept such an ordinance. In all probability the referendum would at once be invoked, and the question put before the citizens for settlement. The suggestion was made that it would be better for the temperance forces to take the initiative themselves and put the question on the ballot at a special election. The Anti-Saloon League then called a meeting of the forces to discuss the advisability of such a campaign, and decide the nature of the ordinance most likely to carry. After a good deal of discussion at several meetings, in which the churches, clubs and other organizations interested joined, the consensus of opinion seemed to be that a bone-dry ordinance could not be carried, and that the better policy would be to close the saloons and place upon other places where liquor is sold stronger restrictions than now exist.

"The W. C. T. U. fought this plan strongly and contended for a bone dry ordinance, but were outvoted by the churches and other forces and the ordinance above referred to was drawn. It will take effect April 1, 1918, and it is hoped that the council may be induced to at once make San Pedro dry as a war measure. The W. C. T. U. Federation agreed to take no official action but leave individuals and local unions to choose whether or not they would support the ordinance. Most of us concluded that we would better lend assistance, hoping that the passage of the ordinance will help us in our next state-wide campaign in 1918."

Grand Jury Without a Murder Case

Editor of Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle Discusses Practical Side of Prohibition

"Whether or not one is able to agree that prohibition is right 'in principle,' more and more men are coming to agree that it is right 'in policy.' That is to say, whether or not prohibition is something of an invasion of our social 'personal liberties,' it more than makes up for this by what it adds to human happiness and by what it contributes to the welfare of society in general. Here is a striking and convincing proof of this—right from our own local court records." Thus writes the editor of the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle.

"For the first time in the history of Richmond county, perhaps—at least, as far back as local court house officials have been able to search the records—a grand jury has met and adjourned without having to consider a single indictment for murder. That's a fact; not a murder case before the last grand jury, nor any crime of a particularly violent nature.

"What was the result? The criminal branch of the superior court met and finished its business within a few days—a few assault and battery cases, some simple larcenies and not much else. Think of the saving to Richmond county in the matter of court costs alone, if you are disposed to take a dollar and cents view of the proposition. But think, also, of what it meant for society; of the orderliness of the community and the unhappiness that was spared many of its people.

"But why do we insist on connecting whisky with the murder docket of our local courts? For the answer to that question, ask the prosecuting attorneys of both the superior and city courts. They will tell you that in nine murder cases out of ten ever tried by them 'whisky was at the bottom of the crime.' And they will go further and tell you that whisky was at the bottom of nearly every violent crime ever prosecuted by them. And all other court officials will confirm the statement."

SAFEGUARDING THE NEW ARMY

Joseph H. Odell, writing in a recent number of The Outlook, gives a fine word picture of conditions at Camp Hancock, Augusta, Ga., and incidentally pays a tribute to Georgia's well enforced prohibitory law. He says, in part:

"While writing about the old Thirteenth Regiment I may as well make another startling statement. Although at war strength, there has not been a new case of venereal disease discovered in the six weeks they have been at Camp Hancock. The statement seemed incredible, so I went to the divisional surgeon, Colonel W. E. Keller, and verified it with my own eyes on the daily health reports at headquarters. Such a thing is almost beyond belief. The Judge Advocate also told me that in six weeks there had been only four cases of 'drunk and disorderly' in the entire division of 27,000 men. Naturally I wanted to know what lay behind this almost immaculate condition.

"The little city of Augusta is only four miles from the camp, and I determined to make an investigation. A newspaper man, writing for a syndicate of papers in a Northern city, helped me considerably. 'This is a Sunday-school outfit with a vengeance,' he said. 'Where can you get a drink? Why, old man, you will have to go back home for it! I've been here six weeks, and I don't know where you could get a "pony" to save your life. There was a man here last week who had a bottle in his room, but he's gone now. They tell me that if you make friends with exactly the right native, and he's dead sure you're not a plain-clothes man, he might get a bottle of rye for you; but it would cost from six to ten bucks and be mighty poor stuff at that! And women? Why, there isn't a house in town, and I doubt whether there is a professional in the region. The local authorities have co-operated with the Fosdick Commission and cleaned the place up as I never saw a place cleaned up before. I don't mean there's absolutely nothing going on, of course. Soldiers sometimes find what they are looking for, but it is clandestine and occasional. There is no commercialized vice.' Further inquiry about town, interrogations of hackdrivers and likely loafers, and a more careful questioning of the military police confirmed the correspondent's statement. I doubt whether any city near a large military establishment was ever as clean as Augusta. I found similar conditions in Spartanburg, South Carolina, but that is a much smaller place, and therefore more easily handled. I am now convinced that something more than the climate determined the choice of those Southern states as the sites for the majority of our camps and cantonments. When liquor is absolutely banished from a region, the moral problems of the military commanders are reduced almost to the minimum. And I write the following deliberately

Granite State W. C. T. U. at Jubilee Convention Sings "King Alcohol is Vanquished; New Hampshire Voted Dry"

ELLEN R. RICHARDSON, President New Hampshire W. C. T. U.

Delegates from all parts of New Hampshire wended their way by train or auto to the beautiful city of Franklin, located in the center of the state, there to hold the forty-fourth annual convention and celebrate the wonderful victories of the year in state and nation.

The convention opened with hearty greetings and congratulations extended by Mayor A. A. Beaton. Rev. Charles Lewis, Mrs. Alice Durgin and Mrs. Katherine C. Simonds. The state president responded to the welcomes and Rev. J. H. Robbins gave a most interesting address, "How New Hampshire Won Prohibition."

Wednesday morning a praise and promise service was held. The annual report of the treasurer showed a gain of 300 new members. The corresponding secretary reported a very successful lecture trip by Mrs. Ida Van Valkenburgh, and gave an interesting review of the work of the year. War relief and patriotic service, in addition to our regular lines of activity, have made a busy year for New Hampshire women. Many knitted outfits and well filled comfort bags have been furnished for the battleship "New Hampshire."

Encouraging reports were given by the Branch secretaries, several Loyal Temperance Legions in different parts of the state and a flourishing Y. P. B. at our state industrial school having been organized by Mrs. Van Valkenburg.

It was a great pleasure and privilege to have with us for the first time our National Y. P. B. secretary, Miss Mary Frances Willard Anderson, who spoke briefly Wednesday afternoon. A "Food Thrift Exchange," the delegates giving war recipes, created much interest.

Wednesday evening was given to the young people and the children. A very large audience, completely filling the church, enjoyed one of the finest demonstrations ever witnessed in New Hampshire. This was given under the direction of Miss Bessie Rowell, principal of the Nesmith school, by her pupils. Uncle Sam and Columbia headed the procession, followed by young girls representing the prohibition states, the Young Campaigners for Prohibition and the Loyal Temperance Legioners. It was an impressive picture to see such an army of boys and girls marching up the aisle with banners and pennants waving and to hear them singing as they crowded the platform and filled the pews reserved for them. The prohibition program in song and story, which followed, was one of the most attractive features of the convention. "Saloons Must Go! New Hampshire, New Hampshire. She says so!" was the rally cry given with gusto by the little people. In an interesting and convincing manner Miss Anderson, in her address following the demonstration, urged the value and importance of enlisting the young people of New Hampshire in our work for National Constitutional Prohibition.

The state officers and the Branch secretaries were all unanimously re-elected, although there were several changes in state superintendents. Rev. W. A. Loyne and daughter were at the convention on Thursday, and Mr. Loyne spoke briefly. Mrs. Etta Loyne Davis gave a most interesting and comprehensive report of the department of Work among Lumbermen, so ably superintended for the past twenty-six years by her mother. The report of the W. C. T. U. Mercy Home, given by Miss C. R. Wendell, who has been president of the board of trustees for twenty-five years, was full of interest. The trustees, as a slight token of appreciation of her years of consecrated, faithful service, presented Miss Wendell with flowers.

Prof. W. C. O'Kane of New Hampshire college gave a practical talk on "The Food Problem."

A fitting close to this jubilee convention, the last to be held in a town or city with saloons, was the great mass meeting on Thursday evening in the city auditorium. At 7:30 the delegates met in the convention church and, headed by the band of the Men's Prayer League of over eighty members, marched through the city to the auditorium, where the League opened ranks while the speaker, delegates and visitors passed through into the building. A splendid audience greeted the eloquent orator of the evening, Daniel A. Poling, who gave a ringing message, "A Challenge to Patriotism."

Our jubilee song, written for the convention by our musical director, Mrs. K. C. Simonds, was sung by its author, all joining in the chorus. Music was also furnished by a sextette and by the band. Convention closed with the singing of "America."

Rejoice, O dawn of morning,
Rejoice, O evening sky,
Rejoice, O light of noonday,
New Hampshire voted dry.
Her noble sons and daughters:
Her men and women brave:
In triumph o'er the ramparts
A stainless banner wave.

Rejoice, O sunkissed mountain,
Rejoice, O vale and hill,
Rejoice, O laughing waters,
With prohibition thrill.
The danger-path of sorrow
Our feet so long have trod
Henceforth, yea, and forever
Shall upward lead to God.

Rejoice, O heights of glory,
Rejoice, O land and sea,
Rejoice, O earth and Heaven,
New Hampshire now is free.
Glad hallelujahs render
Unto our God on high,
King Alcohol is vanquished:
New Hampshire voted dry.

(Chorus)
New Hampshire voted dry,
New Hampshire voted dry.
King Alcohol is vanquished:
New Hampshire voted dry.

Connecticut Convention Pledges $1000 for Liberty Bonds

Special Correspondence

When nearly three-quarters of the audidence rose to their feet in response to Mrs. Buell's request that all rise who had sons or grandsons either in service or about to be, the keynote of the forty-second annual convention of the Connecticut Woman's Christian Temperance Union was struck. Practically all the department reports were woven around war relief work. The convention voted to invest $1,000 in Liberty Bonds, and in a short time over $300 was pledged from the floor to assist the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. in the maintenance of the White Ribbon Home at Ayer, where Connecticut and Massachusetts soldiers are in training. Money was voted for the comfort bag depot at Providence, and for the National W. C. T. U. stereomotorgraph fund; in fact, money was freely voted for all the activities of the union in any way connected with war needs. The superintendent of the department of Work among Soldiers and Sailors gave minute directions for making articles desired for that department and told of the fine work already accomplished by the unions. One union reported the purchase of a Liberty Bond, and others stated that practically all the members were working, giving, praying and doing everything possible so the boys "over there" might know that this organization of mother-hearted women is standing back of them. Some of the unions reported that members are writing to the men in camp who have no home people to write to them. It was gratifying to learn that during this year of stress and strain more medal contests have been held than during 1916. The superintendent of this department coined a happy phrase. She said, "'Do your bit' does not satisfy me; I say, 'Do your best.'" Most of the unions last winter circulated petitions asking the general assembly for a favorable vote on the bill to give women the ballot on the liquor question, also for a suffrage amendment and a state-wide prohibition amendment. An immense amount of endeavor was put into this petition work with good results, as both amendments were passed by the 1917 session of the general assembly and will now come automatically before the next general assembly in 1919. The children's work was exemplified by a model Loyal Temperance Legion composed of twenty-five of Middletown's boys and girls, under the efficient direction of Mrs. Grace Curtis Platt, state secretary of the L. T. L., who has a happy way of bringing out the best there is in the children. It was a model indeed and appealed to all who were fortunate enough to be present.

While the secretary's report disclosed a loss of membership in a few counties, the general result was a net gain, both in active and honorary membership.

The morning devotional services and the noon-time prayer were tender and helpful, and the instrumental and vocal music was restful and cheering. The welcomes to Middletown were voiced by the president of the local union, the pastor of the entertaining church and the mayor of the city.

Mrs. Katharine Lent Stevenson, president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., was the speaker on the second evening. She gave one of her characteristic stirring addresses. She scored the tobacco trust and asked for enlightened service from the women. She suggested that the members could do no more patriotic work than to keep steadily to the front the ideals, aims and methods of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

The Rev. W. G. Puddefoot of Boston was the speaker at the first evening's meeting. Mrs. Buell's annual address was a comprehensive review of the year's endeavor and achievements and full of good suggestions for the ensuing year. Among the messages received for the convention was a letter from Anna A. Gordon, president of the National W. C. T. U., and one from the dearly beloved former president of the Connecticut W. C. T. U., Cornelia B. Forbes.

The resolutions adopted included among others a protest against liquor advertisements in newspapers throughout the state, a protest to the Army and Navy against liquor being given to our troops in England and France, a petition to the President of the United States, asking him to propose joint war prohibition to the Allies.

The entire convention was very enjoyable and the members of the Middletown union, assisted by the members of the Portland union, left nothing undone which could make for the success of the meeting and the comfort of the delegates.

SAFEGUARDING THE NEW ARMY

about Camp Hancock: That I would rather intrust the moral character of my boy to that camp than to any college or university I know. This does not cast any unusually dark shadow upon the educational institutions of the country, but they have never possessed the absolute power to control their environment that is now held by the War Department. And it does not mean that Camp Hancock is conspicuously better than the other Southern camps. It simply means that I had unusual facilities for discovering everything I wanted to know in and about Camp Hancock, through personal connections all the way down from the divisional headquarters to the enlisted men in the company street."

DR. WASHINGTON GLADDEN ADMITS WAR HAS CHANGED HIS OPINION CONCERNING PROHIBITION

In an address delivered since the election and reported in the Columbus (Ohio) State Journal, Dr. Washington Gladden admits that he has recently experienced a change of mind on the prohibition question. Commenting on the result of the Ohio election, he said:

"I have not been heretofore in favor of putting prohibition legislation into the organic law. The state constitution ought, in my judgment, to be simply a body of definition and general rules, dividing the government of the state into its several departments, defining the functions of each, naming the officers to be elected or appointed and naming their duties and terms and emoluments, and, so far as legislation is concerned, stating the general principles of democracy to which all laws must conform, and leaving the legislature to shape the laws according to its own wisdom.

"I should have been in favor at any time within recent years of a state prohibitory law, but should have doubted the wisdom of putting it into the constitution. But this war has changed the opinions of many of us about a good many things. It has made some things appear practicable which we thought not long ago impossible. Prohibition is one of them. When we see what has been done in Russia, for example, we get new light on this great problem. And when we get all the great nations united in a war to put an end to war, it does not seem visionary to call on them to enlist in the war which shall put an end to the reign of King Alcohol. I am glad to be in that war and to have recorded my vote for the amendment which will, I trust, be the beginning of the end of the liquor business in the state of Ohio.

"For, although the amendment may lack a few votes of having secured a majority of the votes, the demonstration in favor of it is a great achievement, a splendid triumph; it makes the future certain. We can give it the next time a majority of a hundred thousand, and I would rather see such a measure resting on a vast preponderance of public opinion, than on a slim plurality."

Florida Convention Pledges $3,000 for State-Wide Prohibition Campaign

Special Correspondence

The 300 guests assembled at the Welcome Tea of the thirty-fourth annual convention of the Florida W. C. T. U. felt the warmth of sincerity in the greetings of prominent citizens of Lakeland and proved this quality throughout their stay in this charmingly hospitable city of lakes.

Patriotism, Prohibition, Preparedness, Progress, Public Service—these were the general topics for succeeding business sessions. Under these were given reports of department superintendents, ten minute talks concerning present conditions and tried plans for arousing and holding enthusiasm in local unions.

Miss Minnie E. Neal, for the past fourteen years president of the Florida W. C. T. U., has thorough knowledge of temperance conditions in every section of the state, an active interest in each individual union, and a remarkable ability in influencing men and women to enlist for our righteous battle.

Her annual address placed definitely before the delegates the victories gained in the 1917 session of the state legislature.

Following the passing of the resolution to submit state-wide prohibition to the voters of the state there came in quick succession the anti-club, the anti-shipping, the anti-advertising, and the Davis Package laws. An act to make the nineteenth amendment effective when it becomes a law, January 1, 1919, passed with practically no opposition.

In Florida there are fifty-four counties, of which only six are wet. In September of the present year Flagler voted dry, and in October, St. Johns and Palm Beach counties. These were signal victories following vigorous campaigns. Only nine cities still have open saloons.

Miss Neal's recital of things accomplished and the broad outlook for the nation and the world, was received with enthusiasm. It was fitting that later the 156 voting delegates should again unanimously place Miss Neal in charge of the state forces, pledging their loyalty to her leadership in no unmeaning terms, as the pledges of $3,000 proved.

The convention speaker was Mrs. Mabel Q. Stevens of St. Augustine, whose addresses were splendidly patriotic. The large audience listened almost breathlessly to her ringing appeals for service.

An electric white ribbon emblem, the gift of four electricians in Miami, was presented by Mrs. Charles De Garmo of Cocoanut Grove, in an appropriate address. This bow will remain a constant reminder of the givers.

The last evening a diamond medal contest was held, the speakers being from five different counties.

The general officers for the coming year are as follows: President, Miss Minnie E. Neal; vice-president, Mrs. Ida M. Flower; corresponding secretary, Mrs. S. S. Bell; recording secretary, Mrs. Mabel P. Dean; treasurer, Mrs. Nellie J. Doig.

The convention adjourned to meet in Tallahassee next November.

William Jennings Bryan Among the Noted Speakers at the South Dakota Convention

RUBY R. JACKSON, Corresponding Secretary, South Dakota W. C. T. U.

The South Dakota W. C. T. U. has just held one of the best conventions in its history, delegates being present from all parts of the state. The day sessions were given over to reports, plans and routine work. Mrs. Anna R. Simmons and Mrs. Alice M. A. Pickler, who have held the positions of president and vice-president respectively for the past eight years, gave notice last year that they could not serve another year. It was hard to give them up, but as they insisted we must abide by their decision, Mrs. Flora A. Mitchell of Brookings, a most worthy Christian woman, was elected to the presidency and Mrs. Lucy Borneman, state superintendent of Prison Reform, vice-president. The corresponding secretary and treasurer were re-elected, Mrs. Mary H. Erskine, UNION SIGNAL and Young Crusader superintendent, being elected recording secretary in place of Mrs. Mitchell.

More big men were on the program this year than ever before, and some of them volunteered to come again if they were invited. Among the number were an ex-governor, two Congressmen, a college president and a National ex-Secretary of State. President Warren of Yankton college, Representative Dillon, the federated clubs, through Mrs. Bennett, and the local union, through its president, "sweet" by name and nature, Mrs. C. A. Sweet, welcomed the delegates. A gracious response was given by Mrs. Alice M. A. Pickler, who was present in Yankton when the territorial convention of 1889 was dissolved by Miss Willard and Miss Gordon and was reorganized into the two state unions of North and South Dakota.

Friday evening was devoted to a matrons' grand gold medal contest, and Saturday night and Sunday morning masterly addresses were delivered by Hon. William Jennings Bryan, who came on from Illinois to keep this appointment and who spoke Monday in Ohio. At the time Mr. Bryan promised to attend the South Dakota convention he expected to be in Nebraska. When he found that he was obliged to be in Illinois, rather than disappoint us, he took the long, tiresome journey. I wish it were possible to give a picture of selfishness as he gave it. He singled out the gods most commonly worshipped and placed them before our mind's eye on three shelves. On the first were gold, fashion, fame; on the second, ease, intellectuality, travel; the third shelf held chance, passion, rum. All combine in the god of Self. The comparison between the weaknesses of these gods and the reality and importance of the true God was marvelous. This address was on the first Commandment. He also spoke on suffrage and national prohibition. Sunday night ex-Governor Byrne and Senator Sterling delivered fine addresses.

South Dakota is in its sixth campaign for suffrage and, while we hope the Susan B. Anthony amendment may be submitted to the states for ratification, plans for state-wide suffrage were carefully outlined. Each union was asked to hold one tea or social, one mass meeting with local people as speakers, one debate, one lecture with outside talent, one picnic where the topic of conversation is suffrage. It was also planned to send men speakers into all rural school houses and into districts where the population is foreign.

The resolutions included an appeal to President Wilson and Congress to act favorably upon the resolution submitting the Susan B. Anthony suffrage amendment; a pledge to assist in the enforcement of the prohibition law and to uphold the government through the conservation of food and in other ways; a protest against the giving of tobacco and cigarets to the soldier boys, and a recommendation that the unions establish in towns where it is needed an attractive meeting place for men.

Prohibition Lessens Work of Virginia Domestic Relations Courts

The Domestic Relations courts of Virginia are finding their field of activity greatly restricted since the going into effect of prohibition. "Wife-beating cases used to be a commonplace and everyday affair in every Domestic Relations court; at the present time very few men are brought before the court on this charge," says the Norfolk Virginian.

National W. C. T. U. Convention, Washington, D. C., December 2-7, 1917

ON THE WAY TO WASHINGTON

About the time this issue of the paper goes to press members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union from the West will be on their way to Washington to attend the National Convention. At Chicago the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. and others from National Headquarters, also delegates from northern states will join the party which will then journey eastward on what will be known as the official train. Never has our organization held a national convention of greater significance than that of this year. Meeting in the Capital of the nation, recently cleansed of saloons, with Congress in session and with the certainty that early in the month the House of Representatives will act upon the resolution for the submission to the states of a federal prohibition amendment, results of more than ordinary importance can be anticipated as the reflex influence of this and other subsequent great temperance meetings. Would that each individual member of the half million dry army of white ribboners might have the privilege of attending our annual "harvest home." That the innumerable host of W. C. T. U. women on duty at home will contribute to the enthusiasm and spirit of the occasion, we doubt not, for we know that they will continually remember it in prayer.

They can definitely help by continuing to urge their influential citizens to communicate with their Congressman, urging him to vote and work for the resolution for a federal amendment, and a measure prohibiting the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer. Let us not weary in this particular kind of well-doing, for largely upon our faithfulness depends the result of the vote in Congress upon the measures named. A suggested form for resolution is given on page nine.

The Temperance Educational Quarterly should be ordered directly from the headquarters of the Bureau of Scientific Temperance Investigation, 561 Thirty-third St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin, rather than from National Headquarters. The price of the Quarterly is 50 cents a year.

PROHIBITION IN THE NATION'S DIET

That "prohibition is not going to be accepted as a part of the nation's diet" is the rash and unwarranted statement coming from the editors of Mida's Criterion. In these topsy-turvy days when individual and even national diet are changed by the necessities of war in the twinkling of an eye, only the reckless man ventures a prophecy on the subject. Vodka was eliminated from the national menu of Russia by the sudden stroke of the pen. Absinthe was scratched from the bill-of-fare of France with nearly equal startlingness. Since the war began Canada, by vote of its people, put most of its provinces on a strict diet, from which alcoholic beverages are noticeably absent. Indeed, the matter of restricted fare has come to be of supreme interest and significance in these days of international complications. In an endeavor to account for the unspeakable atrocities credited to the Central Powers of Europe, students of economics have traced these abominations to centuries of beer drinking. James W. Gerard, former ambassador to Germany, in his "Four Years in Germany," says, "Many of the doctors who were with me thought that the heavy eating and large consumption of beer and wine had unfavorably affected the German national character and had made the people more aggressive and irritable, and consequently readier for war." Other investigators go even farther and claim that the degeneration and demoralization of Germany are very definitely the result of its beer drinking. If a diet of beer can produce so obvious a travesty on civilization, is it to be wondered that other nations are seriously considering a strict regimen with beer and other alcoholic beverages excluded?

But the thinking people of the world did not need the lesson from Germany to enlighten them on the subject of a diet conducive to civic and national health. We are not left in doubt as to what will be accomplished by a prohibition diet. In over a score of states and in all but one province of the Dominion of Canada it has been demonstrated that its immediate effect is to eliminate from the social, economic and political system those virulent poisons, crime and vice, so deadly in their effect upon the health of the community or nation; that it clears of disfigurement the civic complexion of jails, poor-houses and insane asylums and puts new vitality into the moral vertebra of the body politic.

Just as physical well-being has come to be the fashion for individuals, so more and more will it shame any city, state, or nation to be unable to show a clean bill of health because it is unwilling to exclude from its dietary that enemy of good health—alcoholic beverages.

WHERE ARE THE MILLIONS?

Noting in a current issue of a liquor magazine that "Millions who deluded themselves into believing that they were prohibitionists have taken to back-tracking," we made a strenuous endeavor to locate this army of turncoats. To date, the strongest-lensed binoculars fail to bring them within range of vision. We sought them in Ohio, where the liquor interests have had special opportunities for setting back the prohibition clock, but we met with disappointment. Indeed the landscape was obscured by the 53,000 voters who since 1915 have turned face about and are now moving forward on the prohibition highway. We looked to the South to see signs by which to verify the assertion of our liquor friends. Not a "back-tracker" could we find. We saw New Mexico rolling up a 20,000 majority, apparently with the greatest of ease. We noted a procession of Texas counties going to the polls to vote out the saloons. We observed Florida's good citizens climbing up on the water wagon, face forward, in a way to make John Barleycorn abandon hope. We saw a line of prohibition states extending the full length of the southern boundary broken only by Louisiana and Texas, both exceedingly active. Next we turned to the West and scanned the horizon for the backward moving millions. Washington and Oregon wouldn't tolerate such "critters," so it was hopeless to hunt for them there. The fact that San Jose had swept out its saloons November 6 and Los Angeles closed hers last week didn't encourage us to investigate farther in California. To the North there seems slim chance of catching them—those fleeing millions—for the great prairies of Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, and rapidly drying Minnesota would be most inhospitable, and Canada would intern them as "alien enemies" and "traitors" to the cause of democracy. Not even the East gave us hope of locating the "back-trackers." There was Maine never so sure of its prohibition policy as today with Governor Milliken as its head. Close by was New Hampshire, a leader in the advance movement of the New England states, and New York, by vote of its men people outlawing the saloon from over one hundred towns, and serving notice on the liquor politicians of the state that the women with the ballot-besoms in their hands are going to do a bit of spring house-cleaning that will make the Empire state take on a decidedly deeper white.

Our "personal liberty" friends of the Criterion will find it difficult to convince any reader of the present day newspapers and magazines that there is retrogression in the prohibition ranks, for the most noticeable feature of the movement is that it is continually receiving the approval and support of men who a year or a month ago were its opponents. Note the new point of view of Mayor Dahlman of Omaha, formerly a zealous anti. Observe the changed attitude of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, ninety-seven per cent of whom are sending out a communication to the clergy urging increased activity for prohibition. Consider the conversion to a belief in prohibition of Washington Gladden, noted writer and speaker on sociology, and that of thousands of others who have slipped into the ranks of the prohibition army and are keeping step to the music of "John Barleycorn, Goodbye."

RESOLUTION

December to be Prohibition Month in Washington

Any Member of Congress who desires at this session to conveniently forget that there is a prohibition question will realize, when he looks at the calendar of conventions and conferences to be held next month in Washington, that it is hopeless. Beginning with the National W. C. T. U. Convention, in session from December 2 through December 7, there will assemble several gatherings with one and the same purpose—the securing of National Constitutional Prohibition. The Anti-Saloon League will meet on the Monday following the adjournment of the National W. C. T. U. Convention. On Saturday, December 8, the National Temperance Council will convene and continue its deliberations on the following Monday. A little later the National Equal Suffrage Association will appear on the scene, and during the weeks following, the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, the Temperance Commission of the Federal Council of Churches and the National Legislative Conference will meet in the Capital City.

Stole Baby's Milk to Sell for Liquor

"Yes, your honor, I sold baby's milk to buy booze!" This was the admission made by Harry Ehring in a Los Angeles court recently. He rose as soon as the milkman came, he explained, took the pint of milk and sold it to buy liquor and then declared to the family that the milkman had failed to come.

We're Glad to Make Correction

Since reporting returns of the Iowa and Ohio elections we have received more authentic figures, in each case increasing the vote for prohibition. In Iowa constitutional prohibition failed to win by a scant majority of 932 votes. Complete official returns at the office of the Ohio secretary of state have reduced the wet majority to 1,137.

"Bone Dry" Law Decreases Demand for New Windshields

Testimony to the value of "bone dry" laws sometimes comes from unexpected places. An automobile dealer in a prohibition state was found to have an exceptionally large stock of windshields. "We sold lots of them before the 'bone dry' law went into effect," he told an inquirer, "but since that time we don't have so many calls. Before the 'bone dry' law went into effect cars were continually turning over and breaking the windshield, and the drivers blamed it on the steering gears. I notice the gears don't suffer so much since there is less booze to drink. Pretty good proof that there was nothing wrong, after all, with the gears, eh?"

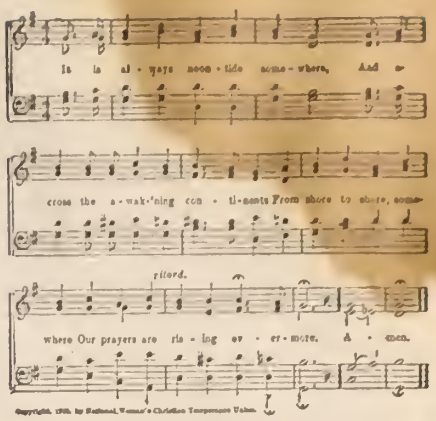
UNION SIGNAL QUIZ

Do you know the answers to these questions? They may be found in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL.

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. Give reasons why organized labor cannot afford to ally itself with the liquor interests.
2. What noted Ohio writer and speaker on sociology admits that the war has converted him to a belief in constitutional prohibition?
3. How has Virginia's prohibitory law wrought a change in week-end experiences of some of its citizens?
4. Give the benefits to a camp from a dry environment, as described by a visitor to Camp Hancock, Georgia.
5. What is the attitude toward prohibition of the majority of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church?
6. What revelations as to the effect of beer-drinking on a nation are coming to light these days?
7. Has beer any food value? What has the organ of the American Medical Association to say on the subject?
8. What has been the experience of grand juries in prohibition territory and why did one grand jury recommend the enactment of a prohibition law?
9. What large Pacific coast city has recently banished saloons?
10. Why are we justified in urging a national measure against the manufacture of beer during the war?

TIME OF PRAYER—NOONTIDE



AT THE NOONTIDE HOUR

At the sacred noontide hour let the white ribboners of the land unite in prayer daily for our country and all other countries, that all may come to see the true Christian and humanitarian point of view in this world crisis; for the protection of "our boys" from the physical and moral deterioration from drink and vice that follow in the wake of war; for our President and his advisers that divine wisdom may rule every decision, that lasting peace may speedily come and the will of the Father of all peoples be done throughout the earth.

"What Color Are You?"

The man who does not put his religion in politics

"never registers at all;
He has no time to hear the call
Of public duty in his ear;
His private work takes all his care.
He does not like to mingle in
The primary's rude push and din,
Nor take the trouble that it means
To circumvent the 'boss' machines.
He has no graft to gain, and thus
He saves himself a lot of fuss.
But when things wrong and crooked go,
He's first to say, 'I told you so.'"

Contrast this versified truth with this bit of history. When the Continental Congress suggested that Boston be bombarded, the presiding officer of that session, John Hancock, who owned large real estate in Boston, arose and said, "It is true that nearly all my property in the world is in houses and other real estate in the town of Boston, but if the liberties of our country require their being burnt to ashes, issue the order for that purpose immediately."

The web of human politics has many kinds of thread. The neglectful citizen is one color; the loyal patriot is another color. What color are you?

* * * * * * * * * * *

"We call the meetings in our churches, services," says one, "but they are really a preparation for service." Down in the valley amidst political corruption, where might is seeking to make right, where hydra-headed graft is undermining law and defaming character, where greed adulterates goods, where labor and temperance laws are avoided, where the devil sits grinning at the polls,—our services should be in such valleys, for if "Christians withdraw and leave the government in the hands of the devil, what can they expect but the growth of evil?"—Record of Christian Work.

On November 22, 23 and 24 the Woman's Christian Temperance Union set a white stone in its records for the future as well as the present, for on those days it dedicated to its service for God and Home and our soldier boys the White Ribbon Home in Ayer. The story of this home from its inception has been the story of a splendid faith venture. Convinced that God had a special form of service for the white ribboners at that great cantonment the first thought was to rent a room or rooms which could be used by the men for rest and recreation when off duty and in the town. When it was found practically impossible to do this there was thrown in our way, by what seemed a special Providence, this large sixteen-room house, three-quarters of an acre of ground, a barn, a garage, and all the essentials of a home which could be ours for the purchasing. We had hardly a dollar in the treasury, but we took the step in faith and the response which has already come from our own women and, to a degree, from the public at large has more than proved our justification.

The local union of Melrose is to furnish the large reception room and parlor, calling it the Mary A. Livermore room. Concord union has furnished the library and reading room, which is to bear, without a doubt, the beloved name of Middlesex county and Concord's president for nearly forty years, Abby F. Rolfe. Lawrence is to furnish the game room and some of the other unions are selecting chambers as their special interest. The hope is to secure at least one dollar from each of the 12,508 members of the state. Between $2,000 and $3,000 have already been paid in and between $3,000 and $4,000 was pledged at the Brockton convention. It is confidently believed that, when the work is once started, it will so appeal to the outside public that we shall receive many hundreds of dollars from those who have as yet evinced no interest. The purpose of the three days' opening exercises was to give all a chance to view the home. The first day, Wednesday, was especially for the general public and the committee in charge of the home, Mrs. Harriet E. Sawyer, Mrs. Abby F. Rolfe, Miss C. M. Caswell, Mrs. Clara A. Webber and Mrs. Alta Hollis, formally received. The second day was for the white ribboners all over the state and the program was in the hands of the state president. The last day was for the men in the camp and they attended in large numbers.

In securing Mrs. Sydna Eldridge as house mother the state is to be congratulated. She is a woman of great strength and sweetness of character, a true-blue white ribboner, having been local and county president for many years, and is one who cannot fail to influence for good all with whom she comes in contact. We trust that many homesick, tempted boys in Ayer may find in her a mother indeed. As troops from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut and from the northern part of the state of New York are to be at Camp Devens, as well as the men from Massachusetts, we are encouraged to believe that we may receive help and co-operation from those states when they shall understand the scope of our work and the need. Connecticut and Maine have already promised substantial help and we are confidently expecting to hear from the others. It is a great work we have undertaken and could only have been attempted under the impulse of the Divine call. Will not the white ribboners all over the nation pray for its success and if there be any "native sons" or "native daughters," who are now far removed from the Old Bay State, who would count it a privilege to help in this work for the conservation of the young manhood of the East, who are giving themselves so loyally and royally for us all, rest assured any gift, large or small, will be most gratefully received, and contributions may be sent to the National W. C. T. U. treasurer, Evanston, Ill., stating definitely that they are for the White Ribbon Home at Ayer.

Among Our Workers

The University union of Seattle is doing much for the boys in training for the navy at the University training camp on the campus. It will be glad if mothers and friends who have sons or relatives there will send names and addresses to Mrs. Sadie Ellis, 4028 14th Ave., N. E., Seattle. The white ribboners desire to invite these boys to their homes and give them special attention and help.

Mrs. Helen J. Andruss, for seven years corresponding secretary of the New York Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and Rev. O. R. Miller, superintendent of the New York Civic League and editor of the Reform Bulletin, were married in the North Presbyterian church, New York City, on Wednesday, November 14. Mr. and Mrs. Miller will be at home after January 1, 1918, at 40 North Allen street, Albany, New York. They have the best wishes of their many friends all over New York state and throughout the United States.

The New York W. C. T. U. will begin immediately to plan citizenship schools in connection with its conventions and institutes in order to train women citizens to vote intelligently and wisely at the next election.

Ontario county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U. institute was held November 2 in Phelps, the new president, Mrs. Bernice C. McKnight, presiding. Former presidents, Mrs. J. S. M. Malette and Miss Malette, were present, and with their usual enthusiasm added to the interest of the program. In their welcome and hospitality the women of Phelps gave a new interpretation to the letters, "W. C. T. U."—"Women Can Toil Unceasingly." The men of Phelps evidently did the same, for they voted to keep Phelps in the dry column. To the credit of the business men of the village, not one signed the petition to vote on the license question. The Voting School seemed most timely now that suffrage has been victorious, and women of the third class cities may vote on the liquor question next April. The chief addresses of the day were along that line and were given by Mrs. F. G. Merson of Yates county, state associate superintendent of Franchise. Mrs. Dingman of Rochester, in her able readings, presented temperance and suffrage truths. The institute went on record as heartily approving conservation of foods by housewives, but earnestly protesting against waste of grains and sugar in the manufacture of beer and wine. A tribute was paid the Helen L. Bullock Training School at Elmira by Miss Malette, for its excellent work in character building, as well as along intellectual and industrial lines. Miss Smith, secretary Social Service League of Geneva, N. Y., urged mothers to give more attention to the question of purity, beginning such teaching in the home in the early years of childhood.

"Home Products" Convention in "Bone Dry" Georgia the Best Ever

MRS. AUGUST BURGHARD

Dawson, a thrifty little city of beautiful homes and lavish hospitality, entertained the Georgia white ribboners at the Home Products convention, the home products idea being carried out in the fine speakers, all Georgia products except Mrs. Ella A. Boole, vice-president of the National W. C. T. U., and Georgia has at least one state's claim on her; in the excellent music; in the superintendents' exhibits, showing some of the best products of the various departments; in the decorations, gorgeous dahlias, roses, chrysanthemums, ferns, and everywhere our beloved national emblem which Georgia possesses in common with all of the other states in our union; in the lunches served one day by the patriotic societies, the next day by the women's clubs and on the last day, a genuine Georgia barbecue with the honorary members of the Dawson W. C. T. U. as hosts.

Welcomes were eloquently voiced by Mayor Weaver for the city, Rev. T. M. Calloway for the churches, and Miss Janie Bush for the W. C. T. U., the presidents of all the missionary societies, woman's clubs, D. A. R., Library Association, U. D. C. and Red Cross Society being seated on the platform. In responding, Mrs. Marvin Williams, vice-president of the state W. C. T. U., set forth the reason why the W. C. T. U. merited the welcome and co-operation of each of these forces for good.

In her annual address, "Patriotic Service of the W. C. T. U.," Mrs. Lella A. Dillard, president of the Georgia W. C. T. U., made clear the truth that the W. C. T. U., while loving peace and working with fervent patriotism for a better citizenry, has been through the years training the efficient soldiers needed in the present emergency, keeping them clear of eye and brain, steady of nerve, combining piety with patriotism, and teaching them as children to consecrate

"My head, my heart and this right hand
For God and Home and Native Land," and in many ways teaching total abstinence, purity, health, thrift, prohibition and self-control.

Thirty-five years ago the W. C. T. U. began the definite, systematic service for soldiers and sailors which is being taken up and specialized upon by so many organizations today.

On Wednesday evening scores of men, women and children took part in the pageant, which visualized the many-sided activities of the W. C. T. U., proving a delight to all and an eye-opener to some in the immense audience.

The address of Mrs. Ella A. Boole, the third evening, thrilled her hearers with its optimistic message. Among "The Allies of the W. C. T. U." enumerated were commerce and industry, the medical world, the insurance companies, athletics, education, war, and both church and state. At the request of the Dawson bankers, Mrs. Boole spoke briefly the following evening on Liberty Bonds, with good results.

An impressive feature was the white ribbon recruits' hour, when about forty mothers brought their little ones, Dawson's "Sweet new blossoms of humanity, fresh fallen from God's own home to flower on earth," to have the white ribbon tied on their tiny wrists, the mothers promising to train them for purity and total abstinence.

The large, well trained Loyal Temperance Legion gave a splendid thirty minute program Friday. Credit is due some of the Dawson teachers for assistance in training the L. T. L. and other children for the pageant.

A grand gold medal contest came next, with George Bankston of West Point as winner, Mrs. Mary L. McLendon presiding. She is a leved pioneer white ribboner, for years superintendent of medal contests, also the president of the Georgia Equal Suffrage Association. She always adds spice to any gathering by the ingenious and happy injection of woman's rights into every subject discussed.

A season anticipated with keenest pleasure is the hour when the college girl delegates mount the platform to give their wonderfully inspiring, bright, original reports, songs and "stunts." The state Normal, Wesleyan, Georgia Normal and Industrial and Andrew Colleges were well represented in every sense.

The consecration service was led by Mrs. J. A. Thomas, and daily Bible readings were given by Miss Carabel Wilkes, state evangelist. In the memorial service deserved tributes were paid Mrs. Jennie Hart Sibley, our promoted leader, and Mrs. J. L. Kennedy, state L. T. L. secretary. Mr. Frank Reagan, editor of the Covington News and a life member of the W. C. T. U., gave his services as convention reporter. The Dawson News issued a fine W. C. T. U. convention edition. A motion picture company put on the great prohibition film, "The Man Who Forgot," in honor of the white ribboners. Two new departments were adopted, Work among Colored People and Work among Foreign-Speaking People. Work for soldiers and all patriotic service will be further enlarged during the coming year. The general officers were unanimously re-elected. The Home Products convention of bone-dry Georgia proved to be the best ever.

Star Legion of Calhoun, One of the "Home Products" of Georgia

These Georgia legioners, under the leadership of Mrs. G. A. Hall, made a war garden and earned $10 toward the adoption of a French orphan. They planted 500 potato slips, seven rows of corn, two of beans and three of peas. The children have sent wash-cloths for the soldiers and have collected glasses of jelly for the base hospital. At the time this work was reported the Legion was but six months old.

"On to Washington," Slogan of Louisiana Convention

MRS. ALICE CARY McKINNEY, President Louisiana W. C. T. U.

All the state officers, the "faithful few," recent "jiners" and members new, reached Lake Charles Saturday night, November 3, ready for W. C. T. U. convention business. By special invitation, Mr. Gillette, Y. M. C. A. secretary from Camp Beauregard, delivered at the Christian church at eleven o'clock and in the evening at the Baptist church, to large and appreciative audiences, two earnest, eloquent addresses full of valuable information concerning camp life and Christian endeavor. Mr. Watson from Colorado, who is traveling in the interest of Y. M. C. A. finances, accompanied by his wife, furnished additional evidence of the need of united effort on the part of Christians for the protection of the moral and spiritual man. Mrs. Watson sang very sweetly "Jesus Savior Pilot Me."

Mrs. Mary Goodale, and Mrs. Kate E. Wilkins, honorary presidents, were present, adding their weight of testimony and rendering valuable assistance. Rev. N. E. Joyner delivered a forceful address, "The Americanization of Foreigners," presenting both sides of the question, as only one who has been a foreign missionary can do. Mrs. H. A. Orcutt, state W. C. T. U. superintendent of the department, related some of her varied experiences with foreigners in New Orleans.

The whole bale of business was compressed into one and a half days, that the delegates, together with their hostesses and Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Soldiers and Sailors, might visit the aviation camps. Mrs. Thacher proved to be the very woman we needed most this year. She was invited to speak to the student body of Lake Charles' high school. Delegates who were being entertained in the homes reported many compliments paid Mrs. Thacher by those who heard her. She was voted a member of the convention, and aided greatly throughout the day sessions, in addition to delivering two splendid evening addresses that delighted and edified her audiences. Mrs. Thacher's winning personality enables her to present the work of her department in the most effective manner possible, helping the people to see the magnitude and importance of our special lines of work. Her twenty-three years of experience make her one of the most valuable assets of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Thacher seemed as much pleased with us as we were with her.

The slogan of the convention was "On to Washington," each department superintendent advertising her particular route. The state officers were re-elected with the exception of the vice-president, who resigned because of multiplied home duties. Mrs. N. E. Oliver was elected to fill her place.

Plans were laid for opening a W. C. T. U. room in Alexandria for the soldiers at Camp Beauregard, which camp was visited by Mrs. Thacher and the state officers, a Y. M. C. A. secretary showing them around in his car. We are planning to help give the mother touch to the Christmas entertainment the Y. M. C. A. has in view.

Mrs. M. C. M. Jones of Kentucky, who has been at our last three conventions, endearing herself to us by her splendid self-sacrificing work, which has resulted in the acquisition of many new members and new unions, was with us again, giving valuable assistance in many ways. Our latch string hangs always on the outside for Mrs. Jones.

HOW THE ENTERPRISE UNION KEPT CHRISTMAS

GRACE BOTELER SANDERS

Mrs. Dunham started it. She is full of ideas and has the ingenuity and executive ability to carry them out. On the night she returned from the convention she called me up and asked me to come to see her. I thoroughly liked Mrs. Dunham, but at times she manifested a tendency to bossiness quite out of keeping with her general all-round good intentions. The dictatorial tone in her voice irritated me but I knew she would have many things to tell worth hearing and I was anxious to respond to her invitation. Each year the local union appoints as its delegate to the state meeting some alert woman who will learn new ways of doing things—and generally it is Mrs. Dunham.

I called back, "Oh, I can't. The baby needs my attention."

"Bring him along," her voice came singing over the wire.

"I'm not dressed up enough," I replied. I knew it sounded peevish, for Mrs. Dunham and I, costumed for the part, had often done together our housewifely tasks.

"Of course I never saw you except in silks and satins," she retaliated sarcastically. For a minute I was very angry, but concluded that I was really acting like a child. There are lots of folks who climb into the "miff" tree when they think they are slighted and stay there until things go all to pieces, unless you coax them down! I didn't care to remain in that class, so I finally said, pleasantly, "All right; I'll be over."

Freddy and I hurried to the house and found Mrs. Dunham busy with buttons, pennants, posters and programs. I rocked the little fellow to sleep, meanwhile asking all manner of questions which Mrs. Dunham answered briefly. Finally she settled herself in a chair and, leaning back comfortably, said enthusiastically: "I have thought of a fine way for our union to celebrate Christmas." Of course I asked her what her scheme was and she immediately began to rattle off a combination talk about the war, the high cost of paper, which made it necessary for many publications to raise their subscription price, and so forth and so on.

"I just must have the paper from my home town," I ventured, "even if the price has been advanced. I can't do without that."

Without a word, Mrs. Dunham handed me a crisp new copy of THE UNION SIGNAL containing pictures of floats and parades, interesting accounts of this or that prohibition battle won, stories, and all sorts of good, practical material.

"There," said Mrs. Dunham, "gaze upon it to your fill. I want you to see what you are missing not to have your own personal copy of this paper. The one the union has isn't enough. How often do you see it?"

"Oh, once in a long while, and then I only half read it, it's so far from fresh looking, having passed through so many hands," I replied. "This does seem helpful." I turned page after page of interesting looking reading matter, then scanned the children's corner carefully and asked, "May I take this home for my little ones? I am sure they will be delighted with it. But, Mrs. Dunham, you haven't yet told me about that new wrinkle of yours."

Mrs. Dunham had the funniest way of answering a question by asking another. "Why don't you subscribe for a paper like that? It gives you something worth while every week. Why, the Washington Letter alone is worth the price."

"I can't afford it."

"You might as well try to do cooking without a stove as to be an intelligent white ribboner without THE UNION SIGNAL. Do you want to hear my scheme? I mentioned it to some of the women at the state convention and they were greatly pleased with it."

"We are proud that the representative from our union was bright enough to advance a new idea. Do tell me what it is."

"Well," Mrs. Dunham began, "the paper needs and wants new subscribers. Some organizations get their official organ into the hands of their members by making the dues cover the subscription price. You, for instance, would like to have THE SIGNAL, but you say you cannot afford it. Of course the state would have to decide the question of increased dues. But this is the plan I have in mind just now: Why not get some friend who gives you a Christmas present each year, to choose THE UNION SIGNAL? And how about giving it to others as a Yule Tide gift? Surely you could find nothing that would instruct, inspire and entertain the family for so small a cost as THE UNION SIGNAL and The Young Crusader."

"I guess you have convinced me of the force of your arguments, but how can you convince others?" She whispered in my ear a plan so unique that I exclaimed aloud over it. The upshot of the matter was that we invited the women of our local W. C. T. U. to an all-day meeting to be held at the home of Dr. Bucyrus, who has the largest house in town. It was announced that a self-served meal, an extra good program, and reports from the convention were to be features of the occasion.

The day came and with it every member of the union and many visitors. They were ushered upstairs to remove their wraps and then escorted to the living room just off the hall. Decorating it was a dado of UNION SIGNALS and Young Crusaders strung on wires. Festooned from the chandeliers and tables were "The Liquor Traffic Must Go" pennants, and pictures of Frances E. Willard, Lillian M. N. Stevens, and Anna A. Gordon were everywhere in evidence. You should have seen the women gather admiringly about them. Altogether as an advertising display that room was a winner. Nobody was permitted to forget for a minute that such papers as our official organs exist and appeals such as "Subscribe Today," "THE UNION SIGNAL Needs You and You Need It," "Remember the little Folks, and the Teachers. The Young Crusader is Their Paper," were conspicuous.

The morning meeting was devoted to business. When luncheon time came, which was immediately after adjournment, Mrs. Dunham escorted us to a table on which were knives and forks, and the blue and white plates, souvenir spoons and paper napkins sold by the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House at Evanston, Ill. The latter looked pretty enough to frame. The pretty cards appearing at each place at the large center table where the white ribboners seated themselves were prohibition post-cards. Everyone commented on the beautiful bouquet of creamy roses which ornamented the center of the board. A florist had sent them in honor of his mother, who had been our first president and loved the temperance work devotedly.

After a delicious repast we grew reminiscent and when we had enjoyed some fine music and everyone was feeling especially genial, Mrs. Dunham made her subscription suggestion. Did it work? Why, there wasn't a woman who didn't take two subscriptions, and some even pledged five. Surely that was doing Christmas shopping with little weariness and expense.

Mrs. Dunham's plan was published in the state W. C. T. U. paper and soon a thousand new names and addresses rolled into the office of the subscription agent.

When the papers come I say, "Now for a pleasant evening," and off go the children into some cosy corner to read the stories or look at the pictures, Daddy reads the Washington Letter and I peruse —well—everything. As for the union, you should see it grow!

Iowa W. C. T. U. Inaugurates "Spreads for Soldiers" to Offset "Smokes for Soldiers"

MRS. ELLA M. HILL, Vice-President
Iowa W. C. T. U.

The forty-fourth annual convention of the Iowa Woman's Christian Temperanco Union, held at Waterloo, October 23-26, was one of the best conventions in the history of the Iowa W. C. T. U. Everything possible for the comfort and convenience of the guests had been arranged by the committees in charge. The convention was held in the beautiful Grace Methodist Episcopal church. War conditions and the probability that the constitutional prohibition amendment had been lost (the official count had not yet been made) many predicted would dampen the enthusiasm and lessen the attendance. You can always count on the loyalty of the W. C. T. U., however, and one would have thought by the happy, determined faces that we had just won a magnificent victory.

Waterloo is a beautiful city of large activities, as the audience could but know from the splendid words of welcome voiced by the mayor, Business Men's Temperance Association, labor organizations, commercial club, schools, churches, woman's club and the W. C. T. U. The response by Mrs. D. E. Williams of Allerton, given in her own happy, effective manner, won the hearts of all.

Mrs. Ida B. Wise Smith, the beloved president of the Iowa W. C. T. U., presided throughout the convention. Every meeting was full of interest and perfect harmony prevailed from first to last. The keynote of the convention was patriotic service. We were happy to have with us again Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, treasurer of the National W. C. T. U., who last year made a big place for herself in the hearts of the Iowa women. Her address on patriotic service plans met a loyal response from the convention, which voted to buy a stereomotorgraph for Camp Dodge, placing in Mrs. Munns' hands a check for $500 for this purpose. To offset the "Smokes for Soldiers," it was voted to inaugurate among the women of Iowa "Spreads for Soldiers," with the slogan, "Mothers' Spread for Soldiers' Bread." Already barrels of jam and jellies are being shipped to Des Moines.

The presence with us on Wednesday of Mrs. Culla Vayhinger, president of the Indiana W. C. T. U. and the speaker of the convention, was an inspiration. The sound logic and forceful eloquence of her evening address on patriotism won the admiration of all.

Dr. Anna Blount of Chicago, in an address, "The Enemy Behind the Lines," told of moral conditions that make imperative more aggressive work to safeguard our soldier boys. Reports showed much good work accomplished, patriotic service standing at the top on account of the large amount of work done for our boys in khaki.

The many visitors presented to the convention gave words of good cheer and Godspeed. Thursday night was Demonstration Night. "Uncle Sam's Wash Day," "Demonstration of Dry States," "The Ballot Box," and "Department Demonstrations" were well carried out.

Friday night was Men's Night. A men's grand gold medal contest and a men's musical contest, with music by a men's orchestra, made a fine program which delighted the great audience assembled. The music throughout the convention by Waterloo talent was of the very best.

The resolutions presented were adopted without a change. The devotional exercises, beginning with the consecration service at the opening session, were unusually spiritual, the closing moments of the convention proper, perhaps, being the most touching of all. As hand clasped hand for the singing of "Blest Be the Tie that Binds," followed by the W. C. T. U. benediction and "God be with you," it did indeed seem that "He whose we are and whom we serve" was very near. Many spoke of the beauty of the service, some who did not "belong" and men who were present taking part in it.

New Jersey W. C. T. U. to Open Soldiers' Rest Room at Camp Dix

Special Correspondence

"Because of love, harmony and co-operation always, a 'stormy convention' is never known in New Jersey," exclaimed the state president, Miss Esther H. Elfreth, upon her re-election for the eighth consecutive year to the state presidency of the New Jersey W. C. T. U.

In the midst of a downpour of rain, October 30, the clans gathered from all sections of the state for the forty-fourth annual W. C. T. U. convention, the ardor of the 300 delegates meeting in the First Presbyterian church, East Haddonfield, the home of the president, being no whit dampened. The predominating thought and prayer in the minds and hearts of the gathered hosts was, "New Jersey Dry," its women enfranchised, and the making of a saner, safer, more sanitary place for men and women, boys and girls to dwell in. The burden of the convention was that something MORE than is now being done may be accomplished for "our boys," something to supply their moral and spiritual needs, which in the life that is facing them in the camps and trenches they will come to realize and meet more courageously if they are "drilled" in these principles which the great W. C. T. U., best of all organizations, is so well fitted to teach. It was voted in executive session, therefore, that the state organization stand back of the Burlington county union in the opening of a rest room at Camp Dix, where the boys may come under real home influence. The big Burlington county delegation was jubilant over this arrangement.

Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, president emeritus of the Burlington county W. C. T. U., who ever carries the soldiers' and sailors' interests close to her heart, was present for a day and stirred things up generally, and the work of this department in the state will be the better for her stirring. Mrs. Franklin Patterson of Atlantic Highlands, state superintendent of the department, was present to aid Mrs. Thacher, and in the matrons' gold medal oratorical contest of the second evening won the medal, to the great satisfaction of her audience, as she recited with fine effect the immortal words of the "Admiral" to his mate: "Sail on! Sail on, and on!"

The special guests of the convention were Miss Mildred Moody, L. T. L. secretary of the New York W. C. T. U.; Mr. Daniel A. Poling, and Rev. Charles Scanlon, D. D. Miss Moody gave a telling talk to the children of the seventh and eighth grades of the Haddonfield public schools, who were ushered in by their teachers. Mr. Poling and Dr. Scanlon delivered addresses the first and third evenings, their subjects being, "For Such a Time as This," and "The Power of the Ideal."

The masterly address of the state W. C. T. U. president gave a clear vision of victory just ahead. As never before opportunities have crowded upon us to make sentiment against the liquor traffic. Its complete banishment is almost at hand. While we have the unenviable reputation of being one of the "wettest" states in the nation, no finer body of workers than the New Jersey women can be found anywhere to uphold W. C. T. U. principles, and this state is where they are indeed needed. The strong hand of the law shut sixteen distilleries in the state, September 8. In spite of the fact that the state-wide prohibition bill introduced in our legislature last winter never saw the light of day, we are not one whit daunted, and again in our coming legislature propose to have presented a bill to forever outlaw the liquor traffic in our commonwealth.

Mrs. Isabella H. Demarest, re-elected the twenty-second consecutive year as state corresponding secretary, reported that, in spite of a slight decrease in membership, the work had progressed with unusual power and enlightenment. Eleven counties made a gain in membership; ten reported a loss; 25 new unions were organized; death claimed from our ranks 204, making the present membership 12,506. Over 900 members were gained through the old fashioned method of circulating the pledge, and social meetings have been a drawing card. New Jersey contributed more than any other state to the National Ambulance Fund.

Cordial welcomes were extended by the city, by the educational interests of Haddonfield with its 1,200 school children, by the splendid churches, including the Friends' Meeting, established in the beginning by that beautiful historic character, Elizabeth Haddon; by prominent men of the town, by Mrs. John Gill Willits, general chairman of the entertaining hosts, for the local union with its 160 members, and by Mrs. Julia A. Senser, for the Camden county W. C. T. U. The response, voiced by Mrs. T. J. Winslade, was all that could be desired. We were at home!

The splendid set of resolutions adopted enthusiastically by the convention, protested against sending tobacco and cigarets to the soldiers and sailors as inconsistent with our long years of anti-narcotics teaching; against the discrimination in asking women to economize while men are wasting money in tobacco and alcoholic indulgences, and urged President Wilson to entirely suppress the manufacture of all alcoholic beverages for the period of the war that this and the allied nations may be fed and their health and efficiency increased.

Miss Elma A. Mathis and Mrs. Ethel Serviss Ackerman were re-elected recording secretary and treasurer. The state president was presented with an umbrella decorated with dollar bills that she may help get "New Jersey in out of the wet."

"Our gathering together unto Him" was a blessed season.

Montana Departments Specialize on Plans for National Constitutional Prohibition

Special Correspondence

The thirty-fourth annual convention of the Montana Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in Havre, October 6-10. Though the meeting place was almost as far north as the Canadian boundary line, the state officers and delegates from every section of Montana were present. The entertainment extended the convention by the Havre union was unusually cordial and gracious. Hospitality was unbounded, including visitors as well as delegates. The weather was as fine as though made to order. "Welcome" cards were displayed in all public places and many artistically decorated store windows gave silent greeting to the white ribbon visitors. Banners, flags and potted plants in the church auditorium expressed the loving welcome of the Havre union.

Loyalty to our own organization and patriotic service to our country were the dominant themes of all sessions. The convention opened with a mass meeting Sunday afternoon. Christian patriotism, welcomes by the Havre churches and citizens, and tributes to the work of the W. C. T. U. were features of the meeting.

A union service of the young people's organizations, under the leadership of Miss Gladys Hannon, was overcrowded. Miss Hannon's talk created great enthusiasm. The convention sermon was delivered at the evening meeting by Mrs. Emma Graves Dietrick, National W. C. T. U. organizer, and an address was also given at this time by Mrs. J. E. Geyer. The convention speakers of the other evenings were Mrs. A. E. McLeish, who has made an exhaustive study of Montana laws; Mr. Scott Leavitt, whose topic was "Patriotism"; Hon. Maggie Smith Hathaway, a member of the state legislature, who spoke on the subject, "A Woman Legislator," and Attorney General Ford, who told of the law enforcement he was attempting, and suggested how the Woman's Christian Temperance Union may assist him.

Organ recitals by Dr. Williams and fine vocal selections were great treats to music lovers. Reports showed the inspiration received during the year from the addresses and personal work of Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, Mrs. Lora La Mance and others, and summarized the efforts made toward the securing of national prohibition and the efficient and patriotic service rendered through six of the departments. A UNION SIGNAL shower brought new subscriptions. The mid-day luncheons, served in the church basement, were delicious and made pleasant occasions for social intercourse.

A prominent and valuable feature was the conference of officers and department superintendents. There were good reports of work accomplished, especially of the organization work done by Mrs. Lottie Hannon, Miss Gladys Hannon, Mrs. Waterman and Mrs. Dietrick. One of the pleasing things of the convention was the honor paid to Rev. Alice Barnes Hoag, a former president, evangelist, editor, and the only charter member of the state organization at present in active service. She was seated on a chair which had been covered with white cheese cloth and decorated with flowers. One friend after another marched by and placed flowers in her lap and in her arms until she was fairly covered with floral beauties, Mrs. Lotta B. Ward of Havre singing most beautifully "Mother Machree." Mrs. Hoag, whom Montana white ribboners call "Montana's Saint Courageous," responded in a few touching words. Flowers were also presented to the officers and a set of silver spoons as an additional gift to Mrs. Alderson, president for the past four years, who refused to serve another term and was accordingly made honorary president. Mrs. A. C. Herbst of Libby was elected to the presidency. Mrs. Herbst is one of the ablest women in Montana and will make a great leader for the state organization. The other officers chosen were: Vice-president, Mrs. C. R. Stranahan; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Cora M. Marsh; recording secretary, Mrs. Edith Cocks; treasurer, Mrs. W. C. Dawes; editor state paper, Rev. Alice Barnes Hoag; managing editor, Mrs. M. W. Alderson. The invitation of Helena to hold the next convention in the capital city was accepted.

Historical Pageant an Interesting Feature of Alabama Convention

MARY T. JEFFRIES, President Alabama W. C. T. U.

The annual convention of the Alabama Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in the First Baptist church of Montgomery, October 16-18. The beautiful auditorium had been made home-like for the occasion with flowers and ferns. The regular program for the opening night was preceded by a historical pageant, fifty or more characters representing different phases of W. C. T. U. development. The pageant was an original thought of Mrs. Chatfield, president of the Montgomery union. The altar decorations made a perfect setting for the pageant and it was pronounced a remarkable presentation. All the state officers and a majority of the state superintendents, and seventy-five delegates were in attendance.

Reports for the year were most encouraging, notwithstanding the fact that patriotic organizations had seemingly taken the front rank. The treasurer reported more money given for state work than in former years. Wednesday afternoon was the real "patriotic" meeting of the convention. Mrs. J. Fullerton Hooper, chairman of the woman's committee of the state auxiliary of the Council for National Defense and president of the State Federation of Women's Clubs, addressed the convention, explaining the work of the committee. The address was the principal feature of the afternoon program and was enthusiastically received by the delegates. Mrs. Hooper spoke in high terms of the patriotic work of the state W. C. T. U.

Evening addresses by Dr. Carolyn Geisel and Miss Christine Tinling, National lecturer, proved a feast of good things.

One of the happy surprises of the convention was the presence one evening of our National vice-president, Mrs. Ella A. Boole. Mrs. Boole was on her way to another state and it was good to have her "run in to see us." Her glowing words, full of encouragement for the final outcome of the world war against alcohol, were the crowning pleasure of the convention.

Mrs. Annie K. Weisel, the state president for six years, declined re-election, as a line of work in which she is engaged will claim all her time. Mrs. Mary T. Jeffries, vice-president-at-large, was elected president. With this change the officers elected are the same as last year.

The grand gold medal contest, under the supervision of the capable state superintendent, Mrs. J. P. Moore, was the best ever held in the state.

Dr. Carolyn Geisel, while in Montgomery, delivered three wonderful addresses to the soldiers at the cantonments. The Ohio men, splendid specimens of manhood, who are largely in the majority in the camp, received her addresses with great enthusiasm. It was the privilege of the writer to accompany her on the visit.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 25th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, we are glad to invest in new friends. THE PATHFINDER, Box 60, Washington, D. C.

PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D. D.

PROPHECY and the World War

IN these days of universal tribulation, the world has been looking for some authoritative voice to speak. It looks not for a Prophet, but for an Interpreter of the Prophets—for one who, by reason of his eminence in the study of God's Word, could speak and command attention; one of whose Christianity there could be no doubt. The Church, regarding Prophecy as a sealed book, had put it aside as an unprofitable study, although the Saviour during his ministry on earth constantly referred to the prophets in illustration of His teachings.

Now, at the crisis, a fearless Expositor has appeared. In the articles by Dr. Gray now appearing in the Christian Herald, the great prophetic themes are dealt with by the master hand of a consecrated writer, whose interpretations are made in the spirit of inspiration. He shows convincingly that we are living in the days of prophetic fulfilment.

What are those vital questions which all earnest men and women who desire to learn more of the Divine will for this earth, and its rulers, and peoples, want to know? Do they not ask

__How is the present war related to Prophecy?
__Has the United States a place in Prophecy?
__Is this war to end in Armageddon?
__What of the Millennium, and when?
__Who is Antichrist?
__What is meant by "The Kingdom"?
__What is the Restoration, and when?
__What is the Restitution?
__When will the "Times of the Gentiles" end?
__When will the Lost Tribes return?
__What shall be the fate of Papal Rome?
__Is Germany an agent in Prophecy?
__Is Russia identified in Prophecy?
__Is Turkey assigned a role in Prophecy?
__Are the Anglo-Saxon nations identified in Prophecy?
__Which nation or power is prophetic Babylon?
__What is the "End of the Age"?
__What is the true teaching concerning the Second Coming?

These are only a few of the many questions answered in the

Wyoming White Ribboners Outline State-Wide Prohibition Campaign Plans

Special Correspondence

The thirty-fourth annual convention of the Wyoming W. C. T. U. was held in Wheatland. Those who were privileged to attend helped greatly in the solving of many of the problems connected with the state-wide prohibition campaign, which is at present uppermost in the minds of Wyoming white ribboners. Plans for making prohibition sentiment were outlined and resolutions were adopted pledging all possible help to the women of the eastern states in their efforts to secure the right of franchise, and urging that all forces be co-ordinated for the securing of national as well as state prohibition.

The speakers of the convention were Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, president of the Colorado W. C. T. U.; Judge Mentzer, of the first judicial district of Wyoming, and W. B. Ross, a prominent lawyer of Cheyenne.

The need of patriotic service was continually emphasized, and the department of Work among Soldiers and Sailors particularly stressed.

W. C. T. U. headquarters are soon to be established in the business district of the city of Cheyenne by Mrs. Anna Allison, state W. C. T. U. president, as a first step in the campaign for a dry Wyoming.

Mrs. Anna Allison was re-elected state president, and Mrs. Christina Wagner, state treasurer. Other officers elected are as follows: Vice-president-at-large, Mrs. Stoner; corresponding secretary, Miss Daisy Streed; recording secretary, Miss Hannah Reed; editor of the Wyoming Watchword, Mrs. Eva T. Putnam. During the convention Mrs. Putnam was made a life member of the W. C. T. U., and Dr. Ellen J. Wetlaufer was made honorary president for life.

Framers of Arkansas "Bone Dry" Law Speakers at Annual Convention

Special Correspondence

The annual convention of the Arkansas W. C. T. U. met in Walnut Ridge, November 7-11. Among the speakers were Mrs. Cora B. Megrail, corresponding secretary of the Texas W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary Sibbitt of Kansas, and Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, one of the most popular women in America, in that she has not only been mothering the soldier boys for twenty-three years but is just now being given the opportunity to teach the other women of the nation how to do the same thing.

The convention drew up resolutions protesting against Mr. Hoover's idea of checking woman's small waste in the home while making no protest against the big waste by the brewers in converting grain into beer, and condemning the candidacy of the man who has announced himself as running on a "local option" ticket.

Each delegate seemed anxious to do her "bit" along every line. There were several young women present with tablet and pencil taking notes—a happy augury for the time when the work must pass from the hands of the veterans into those of the oncoming generations. Mrs. M. A. Dorsey, a former state president, was in attendance and gave several beautiful talks. Judge Doyle and Mr. Ponder, the framers of the "bone dry" law of Arkansas, delivered excellent addresses. The annual address of the president, Mrs. Minnie U. Rutherford Fuller, was a comprehensive survey of the progress of prohibition.

The officers were re-elected, as follows: President, Mrs. Minnie U. Fuller; vice-president, Mrs. Jennie Carr Pittman; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Rose Taylor; recording secretary, Mrs. Lulu A. Markwell; treasurer, Mrs. Eliza F. Furry, who was this year unanimously elected for the sixteenth time to this office.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION IN SESSION AT CAPITAL CITY, DECEMBER 2-7

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Enthusiastic, exuberant patriotism characterized the opening days of the forty-fourth National W. C. T. U. Convention. An immense audience listened to the address of Hon. William J. Bryan, at the mass meeting at Poli's Theater, on Sunday afternoon. Presided over by Miss Anna A. Gordon, National W. C. T. U. president, it was participated in by prominent white ribboners and residents of the Capital City. The speakers on Sunday evening were Mrs. Philip North Moore, president of the National Council of Women, and Congressmen Charles H. Randall of California, M. Clyde Kelly of Pennsylvania and Stuart F. Reed of West Virginia. Great enthusiasm prevailed.

The signal event of Monday morning was the reading of the National president's annual message, a masterly survey of the triumphs of the past year. The reports of the National corresponding secretary and the National treasurer, presented on Monday afternoon, told of a year of wonderful advancement along all lines of activity. Monday evening, representatives of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Chamber of Commerce, the Board of Trade, the Ministerial Association and the W. C. T. U. of the District gave gracious welcome to the delegates. Busily occupied as are the residents of Washington, they are eager to extend gracious hospitality to delegates and visitors, and everybody is having a good time and enjoying to the utmost the convention season.

President Wilson Issues Order Reducing Alcoholic Content of Beer

President Wilson has approved a recommendation made by Food Administrator Hoover, providing for the reduction of the alcoholic content of beer to three per cent and also reducing the amount of grain used in brewing to approximately 70 per cent of the volume now consumed.

The action of the administration was announced in the following statement by Mr. Hoover:

"The president has approved the recommendation of the food administration that the alcoholic content of beer shall be reduced in the first instance to three per cent maximum and that the volume of grain to be used in brewing shall be reduced to an amount approximately 70 per cent of the amount of grain formerly used, enabling the brewing of the same volume of beer.

"Further, provisions are being made to increase the maximum output of cattle feed from brewing establishments.

"The food bill provides for the prohibition of the use of foodstuffs in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes and the use of foodstuffs for the production of distilled drinks was stopped on Sept. 8. There is, however, in the country from two to three years' supply of whisky, brandy and gin and other distilled liquors. The food bill provides that these liquors can be commandeered by the government if required for purposes of manufacture of alcohol for munitions.

"On the other hand, the requirements for industrial alcohol, in addition to the normal output from sawdust and other waste products are at present negligible.

"Those who wish brewing entirely suppressed should therefore bear in mind that if such a course were pursued the country would be placed on a whisky basis entirely and the amount of alcohol consumed would most probably increase.

"The desirability of saving all the grain used in brewing from the point of view of food conservation is therefore limited by the social question involved in the exclusive use of whisky."

The National W. C. T. U. is among those who will continue to believe that as a war measure brewing should be entirely suppressed.

California Councils of National Defense Urge Closing of Saloons

With war as a background the citizens of California are seeing the saloon in a new light, and active measures are being taken for the eradication of this evil. The Councils of National Defense of seven California counties, Fresno, Kern, Stanislaus, Tulare, Merced, Madera and Kings, are asking that all saloons in city and rural community alike, be closed during the war. The chairman of the Yuba county Council of Defense, who is also judge of the superior court, is reported to have issued a call for a meeting of the council to take action to the end that the saloons of Marysville may be closed for the period of the war. By closing the forty saloons of Marysville, Judge McDaniels points out, the $1,600 daily saloon receipts will be saved, and the expense of many criminal trials, directly and indirectly caused by the presence of the saloon, will be eliminated. A Federal grand jury in session in Fresno has gone on record as recommending the closing of saloons. Judge Bledsoe flayed the traffic as an unmitigated evil. "We are confronted with a great emergency," he said. "Every effort must be made to end this war speedily. The greatest efficiency is required of the nation. Any one who does a thing that will impair this efficiency, that will lengthen this war for a single day, or cost the life of an additional soldier, is an enemy to this country, and in the final analysis is a traitor. Those who favor the open saloon, those who advise the use of intoxicants, knowing that in so doing they are advocating a thing that decreases the efficiency of the nation, are working at cross purposes with the government. There is no place for saloons in times of peace or war. They should be abolished."

In this connection will be remembered the action of the grand jury of San Diego county in urging that every citizen cast his ballot against the saloon in the election in the city of San Diego, and the 20,000 majority vote of Los Angeles in favor of closing the saloons for the period of the war.

South Carolina Druggists to Discontinue Sale of Alcoholic "Tonics"

The South Carolina Pharmaceutical Association, at a specially called meeting at Sumter, adopted measures to curtail the indiscriminate sale of alcoholic preparations and so-called tonics, behind which John Barleycorn has been making a last stand to retain a foothold in the state. A committee was appointed to discuss and prepare a proper and necessary bill for passage at the next session of the legislature.

Louisiana Parish Gives 670 Dry Majority

ALICE CARY McKINNEY, President Louisiana W. C. T. U.

To the world at large, the drying up of one parish seems but a small thing, when states and even countries are going dry over night, but we of Louisiana feel that we have cause for great rejoicing because the stronger of the two wet spots in all northern Louisiana bade farewell to John Barleycorn on November 20, when Ouachita parish went dry. The city of Monroe gave us a majority of 198, while West Monroe voted 332 for prohibition and 26 for liquor, which was a surprise to the most sanguine of our side, who were almost sure that the country vote, as usual, would be needed to offset the city vote. New Orleans has succeeded in enforcing the Sunday closing law, and legalized vice is forever banished from her borders. All Louisiana now needs in order to be placed by the side of other prohibition states on the dry line, is a chance to vote on the question. If our people will put solons of the right stamp, instead of saloons incarnate in our legislative halls, we will get the question submitted and vote our state dry, especially if we are true to democracy and our President, by making this "A nation for the people, of the people, by the people," instead of a nation for the men, of the men, by the men. Louisiana women want the ballot, but we want the men to give it to us by means of a plank rather than to have it come to us through tactics pursued by pickets at the White House.

THE PATH OF PATRIOTISM THE PATH OF PROHIBITION

ANNUAL ADDRESS OF NATIONAL PRESIDENT—MISS GORDON RECORDS PROHIBITION TRIUMPHS OF YEAR AND SOUNDS VICTORY NOTE FOR NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION

In this crucial time of a stupendous world crisis it is peculiarly fitting that our unit, representing half a million patriots, should assemble for its forty-fourth annual convention in the city of Washington. Side by side with Old Glory gleam our banners with the sacrificial motto, "For God and Home and Every Land." For forty years a mighty host of home-loving women in our republic with untiring energy and patriotic devotion have wrought marvelous things for the material and spiritual advancement of our own and other lands. We praise God for the prohibition victories rising Phoenix-like from war's awful gloom and overwhelming anxiety. The psychology of good cheer is well understood by our brave, patriotic women. It will ease our hearts to recount the gains and not the griefs, the joys and not the sorrows, of these stressful twelve months. Listen to the patriotic prohibition honor roll of 1917:

Prohibition for the District of Columbia;
Prohibition for the State of Indiana;
Prohibition for the State of Utah;
Prohibition for the State of New Hampshire;
Prohibition for the State of New Mexico;
Prohibition for the Territory of Alaska;
Prohibition for the Territory of Porto Rico.

The Sixty-fourth Congress granted prohibition to the District of Columbia; ratified prohibition for the territory of Alaska; gave prohibition to Porto Rico; enacted a bone-dry federal prohibitory law applying to all prohibition states and localities; enacted an anti-liquor advertising law covering many states and localities.

The Sixty-fifth Congress, in extraordinary war session, protected the enlisted men in all military encampments by providing for anti-liquor and anti-vice zones; prohibited the sale of liquor to men in uniform; prohibited the use of food products in the manufacture of distilled spirits for beverage purposes after September 8, 1917; the Senate adopted the Sheppard-Webb joint resolution providing for a referendum to the states on an amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition.

We clasp hands with our sisters of the Dominion W. C. T. U. and congratulate them on the practically white map of Canada. On October 4, after a most remarkable campaign, the city of Quebec voted for prohibition by 2,000 majority. The Montreal Witness prophesied that if prohibition were victorious in Quebec, the ancient capital of Canada, it would virtually insure in the near future a dry Dominion.

Our nation's flag which we reverently salute is now unsullied as it floats over the homes and the business houses of Washington and the District of Columbia. We are here during the opening days of the Sixty-fifth Congress to petition, persuade and pray that the Star-Spangled Banner may soon throw its protecting folds over our Capitol and Government buildings, an emblem of nation-wide prohibition. We are here with the allied prohibition forces of our country to help prove that the path of patriotism is the path of prohibition and that it leads to the sure triumph of tomorrow. We are here to help elevate the ideals Old Glory champions and to make our flag the radiant expression of a safe democracy—the democracy that is applied Christianity.

November 1, a most significant date in this eventful year of 1917, the District of Columbia prohibitory law went into effect. Thirty-three days ago four breweries, ninety-one wholesale liquor houses and 264 saloons in the District of Columbia were closed by Uncle Sam. Along the wires the glad news flashed and a patriotic prohibition highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Washington to Washington, at last was completed. Our organization celebrated the historic event with public rallies. We helped to kindle in the hearts of the people a civic conscience so that in the horror and tumult of today our great republic shall more truly exalt the Christian principles of love and justice and give life and light to all the nations of the world.

The first state-wide prohibition victory of 1917 was achieved by Indiana. At our National convention at Indianapolis a year ago, the year of the Hoosiers' centennial celebration, we joined Indiana's white-ribboners and emphatically prophesied in song and slogan, "Indiana's Going Dry!" January 19, 1917, the legislature enacted statutory prohibition to become effective April 2, 1918.

Just one month later, on February 19, Utah's legislature adopted a drastic prohibition law and Governor Bamberger promptly signed the bill. The governor estimates that on August 1, 1917, seventy-five per cent of the people of the state were its firm adherents. On October 1, 1917, he declared: "I venture to say ninety-eight per cent are ardent prohibitionists. Could we wish for a stronger endorsement?"

Conservative New England received an irresistible prohibition impulse when New Hampshire caught up with her prohibition past and became the twenty-sixth prohibition state. Seemingly insuperable obstacles were overcome.

On July 16, 1917, after a spirited campaign our island territory of Porto Rico, by an overwhelming majority of 38,000 enacted a prohibitory law. This was the first election at which the natives of the island voted as American citizens. The event marks a new epoch in prohibition history, for the Porto Ricans are the first Latin people to declare against the traffic in alcoholic liquors. The Jones Porto Rico citizenship bill passed last winter by Congress provided that prohibition should go into effect in the island on March 2, 1918, with the proviso that at any time within five years the question might be submitted at a general election upon the petition of at least ten per cent of the qualified voters. The liquor interests lost no time in securing a referendum petition signed by several thousand more than the requisite ten per cent of qualified voters. This precipitated the contest between the adherents of John Barleycorn and his enemies. Symbols were printed on the ballots to facilitate the voting; the bottle being used by the anti-prohibition element, the prohibitionists choosing the cocoanut, the chief ingredient of the most popular soft drink of the island. Evidently Porto Ricans are good conservers and economists. They prefer the milk in the cocoanut to the poison in the bottle. For years the National W. C. T. U. had been systematically at work in Porto Rico to create public sentiment which should in time prove the undoing of the liquor traffic.

"Fair New Mexico" is the latest welcome addition to the swiftly growing list of prohibition states, celebrating its sixth statehood birthday by a prohibition victory of 20,000 majority, November 6, 1917. It is doubtful if in any other state-wide campaign, state officials have been so unified for prohibition. Governor W. E Lindsey, Hon. Antonio Lucero, secretary of state and chairman of the dry federation, the attorney-general, judges of the Supreme court, both United States senators, and many other officials exerted their influence to secure the law. The loyalty of the Spanish-Americans to prohibition demonstrated their unswerving patriotism to their adopted country. They believe that the path of patriotism is the path of prohibition for state and nation.

Liquor propagandists are exulting over their fancied new foothold in the Hawkeye State. The result of Iowa's special election October 15, 1917, was a very small majority against placing prohibition in the state constitution. Iowa is still a dry state—dry by statutory law and bone-dry by federal law. The unconquerable perseverance of Iowa's dry forces will now be put to a severe test. The stay-at-home prohibition vote which might have won the amendment fight must be thoroughly aroused. We believe the great majority of Iowa's citizens have no desire to return to a license policy. We believe Iowa will hold her prohibitory law.

What shall we say for Ohio? Praise, and only praise, for the hard work of three plucky campaigns in the Crusade state "to turn the way of the wicked up-

Never have we had such a substantial basis for the prohibition hope that is within us. When the Federal Prohibition Amendment passes Congress—as it will—and is ratified by three-fourths of the commonwealths of this nation—as it will be—and there comes the day when Christ shall truly reign in the government of this republic, the angelic hosts will join in our glad song of triumph! May we as Christ's followers use every increment of power we possess to help bring to all hearts, all homes and all governments the happy day of freedom from the bondage of the drink habit and the liquor traffic, and thus prove that the path of patriotism is the path of prohibition.

THE PATH OF PATRIOTISM THE PATH OF PROHIBITION

side down," in reality a moral victory of enormous proportions. In 1914 the liquor majority was 84,152; in 1915 it was cut down to 55,408; and on November 6, 1917, in a hotly contested fight and with the liquor forces in control of the election in Cincinnati, the "wicked" could poll little more than a paltry thousand in excess of the prohibition vote. The allied prohibition forces in Ohio already have initiated the fourth and winning fight.

Prohibition Victories in the Sixty-fourth Congress

It cannot be said that the Sixty-fourth Congress went out with flying colors concerning all the great questions it was called upon to decide, but its record on what Senator Kenyon terms, "the great national undodgable question of the liquor traffic," has never been matched by any previous Congress. We have always had in Congress able men to advocate our cause but their tribe is increasing with remarkable rapidity.

A strong impetus was given last winter's Congressional prohibition program by the decision of the United States Supreme court handed down on January 8, 1917, which by vote of seven to two sustained the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon law, designed to prevent liquor shipments from wet to dry states. This was the law vetoed by ex-President Taft on the ground of its unconstitutionality, his veto being set aside by a majority of three to one in the House and two to one in the Senate. At the time of the passage of this law, the liquor interests acknowledged it to be the severest blow that had been dealt the traffic.

It was a special privilege to be an onlooker in Washington when the eloquence and acumen of constitutional lawyers in Senate and House furnished one of the great debates of the session on the Sheppard-Barkley bill which gave prohibition to the District of Columbia.

A second bill championed by Senator Jones of Washington and by Judge Wickersham of Alaska in the House ratified Alaska's prohibitory law. The Alaskan campaign initiated, led and won through the efforts of the W. C. T. U., we joyfully celebrated at our convention a year ago. While young among the members of Uncle Sam's family, Alaska by a two to one vote of her electorate of men and women in favor of prohibition has shown herself sagacious in her desire to promote the public health, prosperity and morale of her vast domain. The area of Alaska is as extensive as the combined areas of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas and a large part of Missouri. Her enormous wealth is still in the beginning of its development. The prohibition impact upon Alaska today insures greater prosperity for Alaska tomorrow.

A third bill, the Gronna-Jones Porto Rico citizenship bill, gave prohibition to Porto Rico to go into effect March 2, 1918, dependent if so desired upon a referendum vote of the men people of the new territory taken any time within five years.

Fourth in the good prohibition deeds of the Sixty-fourth Congress, came the adoption of the so-called bone-dry anti-shipping amendment to the postoffice appropriation bill, making Uncle Sam a bone-dry advocate. Introduced by Senator Reed of Missouri, the proposition to prohibit the shipment of intoxicating liquors into prohibition states, except for scientific, sacramental, medicinal and mechanical purposes, furnished one of the thrills of the session. The senator unexpectedly found himself a Reed shaken by a strong prohibition wind when his challenge was met by an affirmative majority vote of 45 to 11. During the animated debate in the House frequent cries of the new Americanism—"Bone-dry! Bone-dry!"—resounded, and the final roll call showing 321 to 72 in favor of a federal bone-dry prohibitory law was received with tumultuous cheering. The consensus of opinion among those who have studied the situation seems to be that the liquor interests unwittingly and unintentionally have brought about a piece of legislation that will accelerate the speed of John Barleycorn's departure from the United States of America.

Sincere thanks are due our prohibition Congressman from California, Hon. Charles H. Randall, and other prohibition friends for their splendid efforts to secure the successful passage of the amendment to the postoffice appropriation bill, prohibiting under certain conditions the use of the mails for liquor advertising purposes, a law which went into effect July 1.

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, Vice-President-at-Large National W. C. T. U.

The passage of the anti-liquor advertising measure meant the wiping out of the well established mail order liquor business, and Mr. Tom Gilmore, president of the Model License League of America and owner of Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular, and other editors and newspaper owners pleaded at committee hearings for the saving of their publications. Already nearly a thousand daily papers of the United States refuse to accept liquor advertising and ,we rejoice in a federal law that will expedite a change of attitude in many others. We heartily congratulate the newspapers that have had the courage and the foresight to lead in the anti-liquor advertising movement and who are now able to say, "We long ago severed partnership with the liquor business and do not need to be forced to take such action." The vacant publicity space, should any exist, will at once be needed by the Commission on Temperance of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, of which Governor Carl E. Milliken of Maine is chairman. This commission has a plan to "purchase advertising space in over one hundred leading labor papers to counteract the influence of the liquor men and the professional labor leaders who are on the payroll of the liquor men." Rev. Charles Stelzle, who is directing this campaign, spent two years studying the liquor problem as it affects workingmen, and in pushing unusually effective campaigns with this information as a basis.

War Time Prohibition

"The opening of the extraordinary or war session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, Monday, April 2, 1917," to quote Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis in one of her inimitable Washington letters to THE UNION SIGNAL, "will stand out in history as one of the most momentous periods in our nation's life."

The third day of the session Senator Sheppard introduced a resolution for an amendment to the federal constitution providing for national prohibition "as a vital war measure." Before introducing the resolution he declared that the adoption of the amendment is a measure of preparedness. The bill, the wording of which had been unanimously approved by the Amendment Commission of Nineteen, embracing all the national temperance organizations of the United States, provided authority for Congress to absolutely prohibit the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors.

War-time prohibition as a stern necessity from the standpoint of conservation of grain was incessantly urged upon members of the Sixty-fifth Congress. "Every white-ribboner a prohibition patriot," became our enthusiastic slogan. Letters, telegrams and petitions—a veritable avalanche of them—went Washingtonward.

In common with the allied temperance forces, the Committee of Sixty for war-time prohibition led by Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale University, the churches of all denominations, organizations of every name and every mission, governors, scientists, preachers, publicists, merchants, manufacturers, bankers and editors, we kept the wires humming with our womanly note of human appeal. There has been nothing like it in the history of effort concentrated upon a Congressional measure—a measure tingling with desperate need and made more urgent by lessons learned by the allied nations in the school of bitter experience. The Federal Food Control bill was our point of contact for war-time prohibition, "conservation" the keynote of our appeal.

A thousand leading Americans, men and women of all classes and creeds, united in a memorial to Congress asking for national prohibition for the period of the war. These signatures were collected under the direction of a sub-committee of the Committee of Sixty, led by Ex-Governor Foss of Massachusetts and Prof. Fisher of Yale University. The list classified according to states completely fills one issue of the Congressional Record.

The womanhood of America with the "vested interests" of their best beloved at stake united in this unprecedented appeal to Congress and begged also for the enactment of prohibition to protect the enlisted men, menaced by commercialized liquor and vice.

The House of Representatives voted in favor of war prohibition by the adoption of an amendment to the administration Food Control bill. Representative Barkley of Kentucky introduced this amendment: "No person shall use any foods, food stuffs or feeds except for governmental, industrial, scientific or sacramental purposes, in the production of alcoholic beverages." The amendment authorized the President, "if in his opinion it is necessary, to require any person having control of alcoholic or distilled liquors to turn them or any proportion of them necessary, over to the government for use or re-distillation for use in the manufacture of munitions or other military or hospital supplies." The Food Control measure with this amendment passed the House by a vote of 365 to 5.

For six weeks the Senate labored over the bill and at last in patriotic deference to the urgent appeal of President Wilson the beer and wine section was withdrawn and the use of grain in the manufacture of distilled beverages alone came under the ban of prohibition. When all had been said and done in the House and Senate the temperance forces took account of the response made to the great host of petitioners and could sum up the following results: The Council of Defense arranged for a saloonless, viceless zone around each army post and naval station; a military law was enacted against selling liquor to men in uniform; the manufacture of distilled liquors for beverage purposes was prohibited after September 8, 1917. If our gratitude to the members of the Sixty-fifth Congress is tinged with "a lively sense of favors to come" the very serious and exigent need for further legislation for the conservation of food and for the protection of the enlisted men at home and abroad must be its explanation.

National Constitutional Prohibition

Monday, July 30, the day the debate on the Sheppard-Webb joint resolution submitting to the states an amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition was scheduled to open in the Senate, our W. C. T. U. legislative party secured gallery front seats. Facing the Senate solons and with hearts aglow with splendid hope we eagerly awaited the significant prohibition discussion on the following resolution: "Section 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited. Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Senator Sheppard presented the great petition on behalf of National Constitutional Prohibition, secured through the efforts of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. A page carried to the front of the Senate platform the huge roll recording the number of those declaring in favor of the resolution, more than 12,000,000 men and women of the republic. This remained in front of the platform during the three days' discussion on the amendment.

Senator Sheppard opened the memorable debate with a masterly speech, arraying reliable statistics on the scientific, economic and social aspects of the prohibition question which unanswerably proved that the liquor traffic is "a menace to the nation's health, the nation's wealth, the nation's morals, the nation's efficiency, and is a stain on the nation's name." "Another charge against beverage alcohol must now be added," said the Senator, "that of economic waste." "For the first time in its annals," he continued, "the Senate is to vote on the submission of a constitutional amendment for nation-wide prohibition. The method ordained by the federal constitution for its own alteration is being strictly followed. If the proposed amendment should be adopted by three-fourths of the states the traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes would be forbidden anywhere within the American republic. Prohibition would be imbedded in the organic law of the nation. Is it not time that the federal government, the largest social unit we have, should take a hand when the traffic in a poisonous drug is taking from the earnings of the American people six times as much as they expend for bread, ten times as much as they expend for furniture, and twice as much as they expend for clothing?" "As I view the matter," concluded Senator Sheppard, "the member of either branch of the American Congress who denies the power of amendment to the states, especially an amendment which vast numbers of the people desire the states to consider, violates the basic principles both of the constitution and of popular government, repudiates the fundamental rights of the states and overturns the two most sacred privileges the people possess, the privileges of referendum and of petition."

The debate of three days was warm in more senses than one. The July mercury and the eloquence of the Senators kept even pace and soared to a high point. At four o'clock on the afternoon of August 1 every Senator in the city was in his seat when under the unanimous consent rule voting was to begin. A number of amendments were voted down but a proposition to limit the time for ratification by the states to six years, offered by Senator Harding of Ohio, was agreed to by a vote of 56 to 23. When at last the vote on the resolution as amended was reached the tense silence of the great throng in the galleries during the ten minutes required for the roll call was impressive. The announcement, "65 in favor, 20 against," thrilled our hearts. More than the required two-thirds of the Senators present had voted for the passage of the joint resolution! With gratitude we recalled the famous first debate on national prohibition in the House of Representatives when in 1914 the Hobson amendment received a majority vote.

With unresting feet we have traveled the patriotic highway leading to National Constitutional Prohibition. We have nearly reached the top of its steep and rugged mountain side. With unfaltering faith we can declare with Lillian M. N. Stevens, "We are to win! The destruction of the liquor traffic will glorify God in heaven, and on earth will hasten the establishment of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

Victory has followed victory. Countless tributary streams from prohibition counties and cities have this past year largely increased the volume and power of the nation's prohibition wave. It will not recede as predicted by the liquor men but will sweep on and make its conquering way throughout the entire nation.

The enormous advance of prohibition has aroused the indifferent, has won big business corporations to belief in the efficiency value of a prohibitory law and has carried consternation to the ranks of liquor makers and liquor sellers. The present hour is God's o'clock in the twentieth century for the triumph of nation-wide prohibition. The stock arguments of the liquor trade have no value today. Great cities have adopted prohibition with no disturbance to banks, groceries, real estate or hotels, except on the right side of the ledger. Unprecedented prosperity has silenced the liquor men's prophecy of "miles of empty stores and decreased bank deposits." Increased population and additional throngs of summer tourists have forever quieted the liquor men's groan that "summer travelers and prospective home-seekers avoid prohibition centers." Even the circus performers prefer dry to liquor localities —on the plain proposition of larger profits. The nation today needs the able-bodied men who make and sell liquor. Useful and constructive jobs are awaiting those who by the coming of prohibition would be "thrown out of employment." Hundreds of avenues of urgent work beckon the seller of distilled liquors and the men engaged in the brewing and vinous trades.

The destructive liquor business is no longer tolerated in the District of Columbia, twenty-seven commonwealths, two territories, and eighty-seven per cent of our country's area. The liquor man who is a patriot will heed this clarion call. This is his opportunity to help the constructive forces of the nation. A decade ago four white prohibition states gleamed on our map of the United States; today there are twenty-seven, and the District of Columbia, Alaska and Porto Rico. At the 1918 general election we expect Minnesota, Missouri, Florida, Wyoming, Kentucky, California, Texas and Nevada to bring us within one of the glorious thirty-six whose legislatures should be safely counted upon to ratify the prohibition amendment to the national constitution.

Never have we had such a substantial basis for the prohibition hope that is within us. When the Federal Prohibition Amendment passes Congress—as it will—and is ratified by three-fourths of the commonwealths of this nation—as it will be—and there comes the day when Christ shall truly reign in the government of this republic, the angelic hosts will join in our glad song of triumph! May we as Christ's followers use every increment of power we possess to help bring to all hearts, all homes and all governments the happy day of freedom from the bondage of the drink habit and the liquor traffic, and thus prove that the path of patriotism is the path of prohibition.

Suffrage for Women Sweeping Onward

Friends of John Barleycorn did not clamor for reserved seats at Cooper Union, New York City, November 7, when the greatest suffrage victory in the United States was enthusiastically celebrated. Why should not national and New York suffrage leaders be jubilant? Why should not W. C. T. U. women everywhere rejoice? The long and hard fought battle of sixty-nine years has been gloriously victorious and 2,000,000 women in the Empire State have been granted suffrage on equal terms with men. New York men paid New York women and the women of the nation a wonderful and well-deserved tribute when by nearly 100,000 majority they enfranchised the women of the state—the native state of Susan B. Anthony and of Frances E. Willard. They paid a tribute to our comrades of the National and New York State Woman Suffrage Associations, to Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, to Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, to Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse, to Miss Mary Garrett Hay, who with many valiant men champions of woman suffrage won this notable triumph. They recognized the vital, outstanding fact that women today are grandly proving themselves equal to the multitudinous war demands. Politicians, while voting against woman suffrage, have ever chivalrously averred that "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." Now they know that it does. The nobility of woman's sacrifice, the fine quality of her patriotic service, her keen discernment in the adjustment of industrial conditions for women and children, her tender ministrations at home and on the battlefield, all entitle her from henceforth to "walk beside her sons, sweet and serious and clad in the garments of power."

Maine's suffrage campaign was energetically pushed by national and state suffrage workers under the direction of our own gifted National superintendent of the department of franchise. For many years the W. C. T. U. of the old conservative Pine Tree State has been a strong factor in awakening public sentiment in favor of woman's ballot.

Today we greet as full-fledged voters our great delegation from New York state and most heartily congratulate them on the newly-acquired power bestowed through the ballot. There are twenty-one suffrage states, twelve of which have full suffrage. I invite the women citizens present in this convention to stand, and as women voters congratulate alike the leaders of the National and state suffrage associations, and the host of W. C. T. U. women who helped usher in the victories of the past and those of the year just closing, namely, New York, Indiana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Michigan, Vermont, Rhode Island and Arkansas. Today there are 10,000,000 women of voting age in the United States, the suffrage states count 175 votes in the electoral college and the present day shibboleth, "democracy," in the nature of the case must soon include all women of our republic.

The federal suffrage amendment, popularly known as the Susan B. Anthony amendment, is the immediate objective. For the first time in the history of the United States a woman was sponsor in Congress for a bill giving equality of citizenship to her sex, when the Hon. Jeannette Rankin, Representative from Montana, introduced in the House the Susan B. Anthony amendment: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex." This bill is on the Senate calendar and, championed by Representative Pou of North Carolina, has its own committee secured in the House. Suffrage for women is sweeping onward. Today woman suffrage prevails in a large part of North America. Canadian provinces one after another have swung into line in favor of the ballot for women. Abroad this has been a winning year for woman suffrage. May 23, 1917, the British House of Commons by a vote of 329 to 40 granted the parliamentary franchise to women. November 20, 1917, by unanimous vote the House of Commons extended to women on the same terms that govern the parliamentary ballot, the right to vote in municipal elections.

Any movement forwarding woman suffrage is obstinately and persistently opposed by the liquor traffic. To the liquor dealers the defeat of suffrage always means a victory for their interests. The trade expends thousands of dollars each year in promoting publicity against votes for women. "Woman suffrage in New York state," predicted one widely distributed circular of the liquor trade, "would kill the malted industry of the United States." Woman suffrage in the Empire State has arrived! The malted industry must go!

The pathway of prohibition for many years has run parallel with the pathway of woman suffrage. Today brave women who have blazed the way for suffrage or prohibition are jubilant as together they press forward on the broad highway of Christian citizenship and exalted patriotism.

Patriotic Teetotalism

Total abstinence and prohibition can both be recommended to the American people as articles not "Made in Germany." It is true that in the years agone the Kaiser, desiring to maintain autocracy and conquer the world, advised his naval cadets to abstain from alcohol. But the chapter of horrors familiar to readers of war news proves that German officers and men demoralized by drink have committed unspeakable crimes against womanhood and childhood—the blackest page in the world's history of inhumanity. The Kaiser ought to have long and serious thoughts concerning his prophecy that "the nation which takes the smallest quantity of alcohol will win the battles of the future." Autocracy and alcohol will both be overthrown. Democracy and sobriety will win. If the path of patriotism is the path of prohibition, as we firmly believe, it is assuredly true that patriotism is the path of total abstinence.

"The day of the drinking soldier is past," declares Major General John J. Pershing. "There was a time when it was a natural part of a soldier's existence to drink and carouse. That day is past with the soldier sworn to defend his country's flag and representing the power and dignity of the nation. Strong muscles, clear brains, high ideals in the soldier increase the fighting efficiency of the army and these qualities in the citizen insure the permanency of our institutions."

Total abstinence is also the rule in the Navy. Not a ship in our fleet carries intoxicating beverages for the use of either men or officers. Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, claims to be fathering 150,000 boys in whose spiritual and moral welfare he is vitally interested. "The American uniform a symbol and guarantee of real manhood," is the superb standard of thousands of our soldiers. In the first reserve officers' training camp at Fort Sheridan, Illinois, 4,000 men subscribed to this sentiment and covenanted together to lead a clean life and, "free from hatred, wanton brutality or graft," to be true to the American purpose and ideals.

In the stress of our battle for prohibition we must also be mindful of the great open doors of opportunity for total abstinence teaching afforded us in the public schools and the Sunday schools. We must aid our capable National and state superintendents of these important departments in the enforcement of scientific temperance instruction laws, in winning school boards and teachers to a sympathetic unity of desire to make the most of

The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by Congress.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

this golden opportunity. We must steadfastly cultivate in the minds of the rising generation the scientific truth concerning alcohol.

The American Medical Association, representing over 80,000 physicians and surgeons of the United States, at its recent annual convention adopted strong resolutions that mark a very great advance in the opinions of leading doctors concerning alcohol. Dr. Charles H. Mayo, president of the association, declared in his installation address: "Alcohol's only place is in the arts and sciences. National prohibition would be welcomed by the medical profession."

Bone-dry Harvard and bone-dry Yale are to be congratulated. This year these popular eastern universities inaugurated bone-dry schedules for their reunion festivities. At Harvard even the class of '67 did not serve champagne—the custom of fifty year classes from time immemorial. Hereafter the students of these two colleges will "drive dull care away" by other and saner methods than indulgence in alcoholic beverages

Dr. Arthur Hunter, president of the American Society of Actuaries, speaking for life insurance men says: "Taking the mortality risk of the entire group of insured persons as represented by 100, the probability of death in the case of total abstainers is 75, of moderate drinkers 115 and of excessive drinkers, 185."

"The first wealth is health." Health officials in our great cities from San Francisco to New York City, whether under license or prohibition policy, are issuing circulars warning against strong drink. Thousands of manufacturers and corporations are on record in favor of total abstinence. Ninety-five per cent of mileage is held on railroads that insist on no-drink employes. In some of the high circles of government wineless banquets are setting a new and desirable example to the nation.

General Sobriety should be in command of a mighty army of patriotic total abstainers.

W. C. T. U. Patriotism

Our glorious banner with its "red for love and its white for law and its blue for the hope that our fathers saw of a larger liberty," is dedicated to the sure triumph of world-wide democracy and human brotherhood. All women in our republic are called to the colors and no women are more at the front in deeds of every day patriotism, sacrifice and service than are the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. We are patriotic, first, last and all the time. W. C. T. U. women, like all women whose arms have cradled sons of their tender love, crave peace and loathe war. Our organization hailed the twentieth century as the harbinger of peace on earth, good will toward men. During its forty years of faithful endeavor it has conducted a propaganda for arbitration and the settlement of disputes by international courts of justice. For this very reason, paradoxical as it may seem, we have sent our best beloved to the cantonments and to the European trenches that they may help hasten the victorious day when peace and safety will be assured to all the nations of the world.

The National W. C. T. U. is closely co-operating with government plans for women's war service through its membership in the advisory committee of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense and of the advisory committee of the Woman's Liberty Loan Committee. We also are members of the National Council of Women, the National Temperance Council, the United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy, the National Legislative Conference and the Commission of Nineteen on National Constitutional Prohibition.

The war emergency found the Woman's Christian Temperance Union singularly well prepared for immediate service. In our organization of half a million women we have many departments of work. We believe in the "Do everything, go everywhere" policy, as our work is characterized by a favorite epigram, "Womanliness first; afterward what you will." Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, for many years National superintendent of our department of

Mrs. Elizabeth P. Anderson, National Recording Secretary

Work among Soldiers and Sailors, gives us splendid marching orders for a time of war as well as for a time of peace. Gratefully we recognize that it has been her able, devoted leadership for thirty years that has made it possible for the National W. C. T. U. to swiftly embrace the opportunities for the greatly intensified emergency service. The activities of the National W. C. T. U. departments most closely related to emergency service, namely, Legislation, Work among Soldiers and Sailors, Relief work, Moral Education, Temperance and Labor, and

Mrs. Sara H. Hoge, National Assistant Recording Secretary

Americanization will be reported by the superintendents of these departments and by our National corresponding secretary.

The National W. C. T. U. has sent two ambulances to the front and has done its generous share in the purchase of Liberty Bonds. As one of the co-operating agencies in the United Committee on Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy, we have contributed sixteen stereomotor-graphs, one for each cantonment of the new national army. Recreation and rest rooms opened near camps are greatly appreciated by the enlisted men. They say, "The Y. M. C. A. fathers us, but we need mothering, and the W. C. T. U. is our mother." The appeal of the hungry children of Europe has touched the hearts of our women and many French and Belgian orphans are being supported by money contributed by the W. C. T. U. In countless ways the tender ministrations of our women cheer and comfort homesick men and strengthen their moral fiber and manliness. "There is nothing," says George Sherwood Eddy, "that will so quickly overcome the influence over our soldiers of a bad woman as the atmosphere and presence of a good woman." Young soldiers, sailors and marines, on week-end leave, enjoy the enlivening society of bright, womanly girls who remind them of their sisters and friends at home. Properly chaperoned entertainments in which the young people can happily mingle are most desirable and helpful. Our white ribbon girls by setting a high social standard can exert a restraining influence over foolish girls who fail to observe toward men in uniform the proprieties that prevail in times of peace. The innate chivalry and respect all men hold for womanly women will thus be strengthened and wholesome recreation will render our brave defenders more fit to meet the exactions of camp life.

Figures furnished by military and medical officers concerning the number of enlisted men rendered incompetent for service through degrading and preventable diseases are appalling. Maintaining the morale of the army is of prime importance. Toward the achievement of this great task in addition to the magnificent work of the Fosdick Commission under the War Department, the churches, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the united temperance organizations and a mighty host of social uplift workers are donating richly service and funds. Morale has been defined as more than being moral or "good"; as including energy, the kind of energy that is deeper than hustle, steadier than "pep," and calmer than spunk. Nothing so seriously impairs the morale of an army as vice and alcohol, not alone for the serious business of war but for the future well-being of our national life. A popular song with the men in camps over seas is, "Keep the Home Fires Burning." Let us do our bit in the days to come by keeping alive the fire of consecrated devotion that our service for these heroic men may be God-inspired.

Patriotic Conservation

If food is to win the war the 68,400,000 bushels of grain used each year in the production of beer should be conserved. A vital issue now before the American people is "Bread or Beer." Let us have protection for soldiers and civilians and not protection for beer—conservation of grain and the nation's young manhood and not conservation of brewing companies. British brewers are well named "food destroyers." Let American brewers beware! The same lamentable title may be given to them. The grain and sugar they destroy means starvation to many.

A report of the United States Department of Agriculture based on figures secured from the office of the Internal Revenue bureau shows that 3,004,754,590 pounds of food stuffs were used by the manufacturers of fermented liquors during the year ending June 30, 1916. This is a fuel value sufficient to supply the energy requirement of 3,000,000 men for a year. The fuel value of this food wasted in one year in the beer supply alone of the United States is sufficient to supply for a period of three years the energy requirement of the men in khaki and blue uniforms of our nation who are now in training and those already at the front.

RESOLVED, That we are in hearty favor of National Constitutional Prohibition and will do all within our power to secure favorable action by the United States Congress on the joint resolution for a referendum to the states of the amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation and importation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

ing to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy to insist that Uncle Sam sign a conservation pledge that will stop the awful waste of food stuffs in the manufacture of beer and wine during the war. We patriotically observe "seven wheatless, fourteen meatless, and twenty-one wasteless meals" each week. We have registered, have purchased Liberty bonds, we knit and sew, we conserve and preserve, we dry and can, we waste not a slice of bread nor a grain of sugar, we eat war bread, we follow the excellent advice: "Use cornmeal, common sense and calm." But do not blame us if our woman soul is tried and our woman brain fails to comprehend why the powers that be continue to waste enough food stuffs daily in the manufacture of beer to send to our enlisted men and the allies 6,000,000 loaves of bread. The liquor dealers boast in the manual for 1917 that they employ 1,200,000 persons and consume the products of 7,500,000 acres of land.

The inconsistency of the super-patriotism women are called upon to display and the need of protection and food for our boys in the tented camps and the great cantonments of our country, as well as of their safeguarding from drink and vice on the battlefields of Europe, surge through our souls.

It is to be regretted when any woman declines to sign the Hoover pledge, even though the whole soul revolts against allowing the brewers each year to waste countless bushels of grain. To be unpatriotic because some one else lacks patriotism is not a consistent position for a true patriot. "Beer-making," so Congress has said, "can go on unless the President shall find it essential to limit brewing to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food." If we patriotically respond to government appeals for conservation we are in a position to approach the government for the diversion of food stuffs from beer to bread.

The Case Against Beer

"Beer should be prohibited," is the dictum of scientific experts who declare that alcohol is a poison. Even its moderate use has been proved by scientific test to be detrimental to the human system. This gives us our case against beer.

The actuary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company investigated separately non-abstainers who drink beer only and ascertained that there is an unmistakable difference between water drinkers and beer drinkers. The loss to the company on beer drinkers has been almost the same as the loss on the users of whisky. Leading magazines and metropolitan newspapers which no longer take beer advertisements proclaim in their headlines the downfall of beer because, "Brewery stocks are on the toboggan."

Prof. Rauschenbusch of Rochester, New York, educated in both Germany and the United States, recently gave a remarkable address at Dessau, Germany. He warned the people that they were incapacitated for good mental or physical work by the insidious influence of beer drinking and said: "When we look closely at German life we see that the drinking habit is far, very far from harmless. The worst, most brutal scenes that I have ever witnessed were in Germany. We see continually how many lives are spoiled by beer drinking."

A Harvard University professor asserts that "mild, eternal intoxication on beer by German officials is a partial but a very real explanation of unforgettable crimes. The poisoning of nearly all officials by perennial beer means collective panic and collective stupidity in the higher strategy."

Unwarranted fear is felt for the congested centers of population in our big cities if we stop the manufacture of beer. "Take away the beer and riots would result," "Liberty loans would fall off," are the dire prophecies of those who are promoting the beer and wine trade at the expense of our brave fighters at the front. "Better a beer riot without beer than a bread riot without bread," is a sentiment we highly approve. Close the saloons and much more money will find its way into patriotic and safe investments. Within the last few years great cities like Denver, Detroit, Seattle, Spokane and Portland have accepted prohibition through state-wide elections. The dry forces were bitterly fought in most cases by the metropolitan press of these big cities, but the prohibition policy has quickly and satisfactorily adjusted itself.

The liquor men are establishing a new battle line of defense in the "beer and wine to be substituted for brandy and whisky." It is important that the next session of Congress should make no compromise. Prof. Struempell, one of Germany's noted physiologists, says of the national drink, beer: "Nothing is more erroneous from the physician's point of view than to think of diminishing the destructive effects of alcohol by substituting beer for other alcoholic drinks." No half-way measure of this character should be permitted to pass either house of Congress. It will not if intelligent, right-minded citizens of the United States are alert to the danger. Let us keep the issue clear. "Camouflage" is well understood by the W. C. T. U. For years the liquor men obscured the issue and deceived the very elect. Today, however, the American people have no illusions about alcohol. The light of scientific truth is shining. Alcohol is a poison, beer is an alcoholic drink. Its manufacture destroys valuable grain. Patriotism —the safeguarding of this and other nations—demands prohibition of the manufacture and sale of beer. A wise working man says: "With the brewers 'personal liberty' means personal profit." Loyalty and patriotism demand that they use their plants for constructive and not for destructive business.

Prohibition Promotes Thrift

Because prohibition promotes thrift, conspicuous labor leaders, John Mitchell, John B. Lennon and others, counsel their followers to practice total abstinence and vote against the liquor traffic. The comptroller of currency in the Treasury Department at Washington in a recent circular letter to all national banks said: "The savings of the people, in spite of the high cost of living, have increased enormously because of the higher wages paid to workmen and the large returns to capital." The comptroller recognized the economic value of prohibition when he added: "The growth of prohibition has also stimulated thrift and helped materially to swell savings deposits." This statement from high authority should be given wide publicity. It is a strong argument for National Constitutional Prohibition. Mr. Mitchell of the United Mine Workers of America is a keen observer and makes this strong statement: "If a brewery is closed down, in its place springs up a factory; if a saloon is closed, in its place springs up a store. Almost every disturbance in the ranks of organized labor can be traced back to some connection with the saloon." Many manufacturers are using in substance on their special safety bulletins these trenchant truths: "Booze will never get you a job nor help you hold one." "Booze will not help you pay your debts nor increase your earning power." "Booze and work won't mix. Sooner or later one must be sacrificed for the other." "Sidetrack booze before booze sidetracks you."

Epoch-making experiments of European and American scientists prove that be-

Report of National Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Frances P. Parks

Review of W. C. T. U. Work and Patriotic Achievements of States

"Come, take that task of yours before which you have been hesitating, and on this very day, lift it up and do it." In her address on "The Challenge of a Big Task" at the Indianapolis Convention, Miss Gordon quoted these compelling words of Phillips Brooks.

Thus prompted, I searched myself, as you who were so fortunate as to hear that inspiring address must have searched yourselves. As your secretary, charged with the duty of aiding our great organization with each succeeding year to become more efficient, more powerful, in its manifold activities for good, the task that faced me was a great increase in membership. For, you know, "The world is moved along not only by the mighty shoves of its heroes, but also by the aggregate of the tiny pushes of each honest worker."

A little later I took up with the state secretaries the possibility of our doing more and better work to increase the membership of the W. C. T. U. as our part in the Big Task. We felt that the Micawbers who wait for something to turn up wait in vain; that to go after the thing desired and get it is the only sure way to success. The National W. C. T. U. had set a goal of twenty per cent net gain in membership for 1917. We knew that this gain must be made in the local unions, the unit of power in our organization.

In many of the states, through the division of work by the team plan, it falls to the corresponding secretary to superintend organization and to mother the local unions. In every state she must carry some share of the responsibility for keeping the local unions alert and aggressive, must take the initiative in forwarding some part of the state plans. With the earnest desire to line up my co-secretaries for a definite program of work to secure the National goal, I sent to them in February, for their signatures, the following resolution:

> I resolve to meet "The Challenge of a Big Task" by doing all I can to expand organization and to reach the membership goal set for my state by the National W. C. T. U.

I asked for information about the plans for organization department and for increasing membership. The response was prompt and cordial. All but twelve signed the resolution at once and all fell in with the suggestion for an exchange of ideas through a Co-operation Bulletin issued every-once-in-awhile from my office. Mrs. De Yo of Northern California furnished the slogan:

> "All together, now 'to-get-her.'
> All together, we'll 'go-get-her'!"

That was the first of April. A week later our nation was definitely involved in the world war; the question of the hour, "What can I do to help my country?"

In common with other women, your corresponding secretaries, who had just nerved themselves for a task with a capital T, saw the Biggest Task that Americans have ever attempted calling for the best of their time and thought and energy. They met the demand with that clear-eyed discrimination of essential from non-essential, that brave dependence upon energy sufficient for each day's need, with which trained women always meet emergencies. The membership campaign to which they had pledged themselves might have been termed a non-essential. In the face of the government's prompt call for help from the organized women of the country, it became one of the most powerful war weapons your national, state and local secretaries could wield. So it is with glowing pride in the patriotic value of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and in the loyalty of its many officers who have not been swayed from their duty by weariness nor by manifold temptations to take up spectacular work, that I present my report of the states.

In the Trenches

Who can estimate the heroic work and devoted sacrifice in the states when there is no apparent gain in membership? From statistics at hand it may be honestly claimed that from eight to ten thousand women have been added to the membership in these states. Noteworthy achievements run like a thread of gold through the reports. Educational work continues with unabated zeal. Law enforcement in prohibition states, prohibition by local option in license states, are in the study course by which local unions are trained for duty. All of which goes to prove that even where the honors of Recognition Night cannot this year be bestowed, the fight has been successfully waged.

Over the Top

Thirty-two states successfully met the test of net gain and are on the honor roll for Recognition Night.

Three colored state unions are to have part in the program Friday evening—the Frances E. W. Harper union of the District of Columbia, the Cummings union of Maryland and the Emilie D. Martin union of South Carolina. Viewed from the numerical standpoint the membership in these colored unions is small, but a strong foundation is being laid by them upon which to build in the future. Special emphasis is put upon training the children in the Loyal Temperance Legions. The departments have been very active. A colored state union has been organized in Florida by Mrs. Frances E. Preston, with the approval and help of Miss Neal. A cordial welcome is extended to Mrs. Keiser, the new state president.

There is the group which did not reach the one hundred in membership gain. That does not mean lack of effort to increase membership as great as in some of the states celebrating a gain of ten times one hundred members; nor does it mean any absence of fine reports.

Michigan's statistical report closed with the convention in May, at which time a review of progress showed an average annual gain for 15 years of 845 members. Fifty new unions had been organized and to these and the existing unions the good advice was given at the annual convention: "Enter every open door of opportunity and service and other doors will open. You will find the W. C. T. U. still has a place to fill and a great work to do. Ours is not a finished task." The crystallized efforts of the many white ribboners since that time puts Michigan well to the front in emergency work. The W. C. T. U. was assigned the leader's place in correlating the work of women's organizations in conserving the moral and spiritual forces of the nation.

Iowa's activities were centered in the fight to make the dry policy the permanent program of the state. It was a great fight and the stay-at-homes must bear the responsibility for the disappointing delay in victory. Educational work of inestimable value was done from pulpit and platform, through the generous use of carefully selected literature and through department channels. In fullest confidence that the object for which they were organized will be brought to pass, the abolition of the liquor traffic not only in their own state but in the United States, the white ribboners of Iowa enter upon a new year with unabated courage. Their membership gain is small but it is gain!

North Dakota aims to have a working unit of the W. C. T. U. in every community. State organizers have overcome obstacles peculiar to the times, and convinced people that, while prohibition is our main objective, through the educational, evangelistic, social and legal departments of the W. C. T. U., the highest patriotic service can be rendered; that the W. C. T. U. is not going—it is coming; and coming to help in the reconstruction of society after the present upheaval. Thus they have won new recruits to the organization.

Raleigh, the home city of the president of North Carolina W. C. T. U., is the banner union in membership gain. There is a new realization by the working forces that the departments are the strong life currents that keep up a healthy circulation in the work of the W. C. T. U. in a prohibition state. War service through other organizations has weakened the membership returns to some extent, but there is a small and encouraging net gain.

A campaign is on in Illinois for a constitutional convention, which may open the path to prohibition to another state with a stupendous city problem. Meantime the fight is on for a dry Chicago, and the big city may beat the state to the goal of prohibition. War service has stimulated the local unions in recent weeks to new activity in regular lines of work. Forty counties increased the state membership by 1,000.

In Kentucky present conditions have quickened women to a keener perception of the values of W. C. T. U. methods. Hearts are tender and more closely drawn together in a common anxiety. "Service" is the catch-word to use in seeking new members. "Definite things to do" wins recruits. Kentucky won 500 new members. It is the old story of uncollected dues. Fifty joint meetings have been held with other state organizations co-operating in campaign plans.

Ever foremost in the response to patriotism's call, Virginia is in her accustomed place at this time. Virginia women stood at the polls and ushered her sons into the booths on Registration Day, cheered them at their departure on "Send Off Day" and watched over these and other boys in training within her borders with true motherly solicitude for their physical and moral welfare. Telegrams innumerable, urging war prohibition, have been sent to President Wilson. Intensive farming, conservation of food, "all these things have we done and not left the others undone." The best of organizing plans, the best of organizers, an addition of 834 new members made the outlook wholly bright—until the "dues paid" report was in and the net gain found to be 92!

Maryland has been campaigning for new unions and new members in existing unions, while seeking to add to her "dry land." In addition to the home forces, many of the best national workers have been afield. While greater gains were planned at the beginning of the year, the state officers rejoice in the net gain of 101 members under the strain of the months since April. In the Maryland woman's section of the Council for National Defense, the W. C. T. U. was assigned to the work of Americanization in co-operation with the Suffrage Association.

Delaware's patriotic membership drive was a success. As the same women belong to practically all women's organizations in the state, with the notable exception of the city of Wilmington, it naturally follows that all women in Delaware co-operate with the W. C. T. U. in war work done by the W. C. T. U. pattern.

Texas, as one of the spring convention states, does not report to this convention the achievements of the interim. Fine work has been done by the local unions scattered over the big Lone Star state of which we hear but have no official record. Through county local option campaigns and war welfare work the membership has been increased to a much greater extent than is shown by the National treasurer's figures, though these entitle Texas to a place on the Honor Roll.

East Washington had a good year. Women are joining the W. C. T. U. because they find it is prepared to engage in emergency work of real value. Church organizations and the W. C. T. U. have co-operated in other lines and are beginning to unite in Christian service for the army and navy.

Wyoming, for the first time in history, claims a place with the winning states on Recognition Night. Not only a place, but she leads the group of states making a net gain of over 100 members. The actual gain is 147; every woman hand-picked. There are an even dozen of the decorative red spots on the Wyoming section of the organization map.

New Hampshire rejoices in the clean, white surface of her map. The red stars for the new unions established this year stand out with clearness and beauty on that background! In addition to these new workers, twenty-nine unions made a net gain in members. A Food Thrift Exchange was a war work feature of the state convention. A Liberty Loan bond for the state was another evidence of the patriotic spirit of the convention.

Oklahoma has stressed increased membership as a necessity in carrying forward her educational campaign and for law enforcement. While many women's clubs disbanded for the period of the war, W. C. T. U. activities have continued in proportion to the number of local unions getting a true perception of their importance to their communities in constructive work. Church women have to some extent co-operated in program meetings with talks on informing subjects, while fingers were busy with knitting or sewing needles!

Florida W. C. T. U. is growing and getting "good and ready" for a big prohibition campaign in 1918. Organization is being pushed in every place, large and small, where the W. C. T. U. can get a foothold. When a spark of interest has been kindled it is nursed and developed into a live union. Every local union was challenged at the beginning of the year to find unoccupied territory and move in!

Volunteers for service have made this year count in the three means—agitation, education, organization—used to reach the end so devoutly desired. Florida is out to win!

Over 1,500 new members were secured in Wisconsin's membership drive. Again the decrease made by withdrawals, deaths and failure to pay dues cuts the net gain down to a little over one-third of the gross gain. The preparedness machinery of the W. C. T. U. is beginning to be appreciated by local unions which thought there was nothing more for them to do at this time. The team plan grows in favor as it is understood. All of the unions want to do something. The work as a whole was never in better condition.

Minnesota has directed all work toward the goal of state-wide prohibition, "the next thing" on her program. The State Central Committee is in conference every six weeks, ready to consider any new recommendations sent out from National headquarters. The committee plan for war service met with immediate favor. The section on Americanization fitted into plans already in operation. The list of drafted men from Minnesota contains many foreign names. "Send Off Day" brought pain as well as pride to many a foreign-born woman. No opportunity is lost to interest these women in the war work of the W. C. T. U. They are specially invited guests at community or neighborhood meetings, of which the W. C. T. U. is in many cases the promoter. Church organizations of women and the women's clubs are co-operating well with the W. C. T. U. Patriotic Membership Day was widely observed.

The Sun Flower state is in its customary glow of enthusiasm and energy. The war work of the W. C. T. U. has been of the best quality and unstinted in quantity. "Don't stuff husbands! husband the stuff," a slogan used by Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace at an old settlers' picnic, aroused more enthusiasm than any speech made to Kansas farmers since the entering of the United States into the world war. Kansas issues a fine set of programs for use in the local union. The service plans issued by the National W. C. T. U. committee have a conspicuous place in the programs for 1917-1918, insuring the intelligent co-operation of the more than 500 local unions in the plans. An intensive campaign for new members is already well under way in Kansas.

The field covered by the winning states offers an interesting study in the lights and shadows of organization.

Colorado and West Virginia are a well matched W. C. T. U. team of states. Conditions are more or less the same in these mountain states. Mrs. Hungerford and Mrs. Yost have each been the leaders of two campaigns and the winners in one, with problems of the same complexion and an equal fighting force. Both have been ambitious to build up an ideal prohibition commonwealth as an unanswerable argument for constitutional prohibition. In the membership contest of 1917 Colorado leads West Virginia by one member.

Patriotism of a practical type has characterized the W. C. T. U. from north to south, from east to west, finding expression in varied forms. And it works true to rule criss-cross of the country as well, as illustrated by the Old Bay State and the Land of the Golden Gate. What could present a greater contrast in conditions than staid Puritan New England and the unconventional, untrammeled western coast? And yet Massachusetts and Southern California stand out conspicuously as making the patriotic service of the W. C. T. U. so attractive and appealing that men as well as women are flocking to their aid with money and personal help.

Southern California quickly adapted her work to the patriotic plan and affords a shining example of the success of this work in unifying the activities of the local unions and in attracting new members. The Comfort Bag Shop is a center from which radiate influences which are reaching the church societies of women, the club women, the business women and, yes, the business men! The big Los Angeles dailies have discovered this hive of war industries and find the "story" of value for their columns! A buyer for a big department store in Los Angeles visited National headquarters the other day for the sole purpose of telling the General Officers of the great work centering in the Southern California W. C. T. U. headquarters. "It is taking a strong hold on the people of Los Angeles. The practical plans for conservation of man-power by war prohibition, of foodstuffs for our allies; of the home forces for the constructive period which must follow the war, these things appeal to Californians. The W. C. T. U. is doing a wonderful work in our state," was the testimony given by Mr. Lawler.

War service bulletins, giving the most explicit directions for the work to be done under the various sections of the National W. C. T. U. Service Plans, are issued monthly from the state headquarters. A patriotic membership campaign, fixing as its immediate goal 1,000 recruits, has recently been inaugurated. The enlistment pledge reads:

> That I may give patriotic service to God and my country I hereby enlist in the White Ribbon Army and solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including wine, beer and cider, and to employ proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same.

The war welfare work of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. is attracting wide and favorable attention from press, pulpit and platform. Local unions are vying with each other in good works and novel schemes. The new year has started off with bigger plans than ever for increasing membership and efficiency. Mrs. Frisbee, by the way, was the first state corresponding secretary to sign the pledge to do her level best to meet the "Challenge of a Big Task" in 1917.

Ohio and New Mexico should enter together to the strains of "See the Conquering Hero Comes!" That they do not is a fresh, strong argument that the Big City problem remains to be solved by campaign leaders. That membership has been increased in these states while every energy was concentrated on winning votes for prohibition is cause for warm congratulations. Ohio needs to call in the reserves for the new contest upon which she has already enlisted with heart and soul aflame to win. With her great Spanish population, New Mexico has need to enter upon an intensive educational campaign for total abstinence and law enforcement. A strong membership will prove a valuable asset and the present is the time to press the campaign for this goal.

No two states began the year with better plans for increasing membership, and with more enthusiasm to put into the effort, than Pennsylvania and Georgia. Second in the honor list is Pennsylvania. Georgia is at the end of the line! It would be difficult to explain why. In both states the field has been covered by choice speakers. Notable achievements are to the credit of these states. Pennsylvania's greatest advance, it is claimed, is in the successful training school of the summer which is to be made a feature, only on a four-fold scale, of the new year. Probably a factor explaining the delayed success, is that Georgia bent much of her energy to the slow but sure plan of definite work among colored people. Under the auspices of the state W. C. T. U., Mrs. Peterson visited twelve cities, interesting leaders among her own people in temperance and moral issues, laying a good foundation for future work. In the college work of the Y. P. B. Georgia probably leads all states. In neither of these laudable activities was there a chance to add to the paid membership, but paying dividends in character building may confidently be expected.

Then comes a "soot and whitewash" picture. The blackest state on the prohibition map and the one having the smallest W. C. T. U. membership is Nevada; also on honor roll of Recognition Night. Yet on the percentage basis, Nevada would lead the march on Friday evening, having made a nineteen per cent gain in membership, while New York's gain on the same basis is five per cent! Again: Nevada has but five unions on the survey map, as far apart as they could be placed to be within state boundaries. But Nevada has a prohibition campaign on for 1918; and Mrs. Dietrick, trained in New York, is busy looking up locations for live unions to help in Nevada's program for the new year. Mrs. Linville, president of the W. C. T. U., has crossed the continent to get the inspiration and help of this convention to fit her for the fight. If Nevada wins prohibition, National Constitutional Prohibition will be advantaged just as much as if the victory were achieved by the great Empire state. It is the number of states lined up for prohibition and not the number of voters in any one state that counts in this contest! But, by the way, Nevada women have been voters for three years!

New York shines out among her sister states claiming recognition for net gains as the leader of all the states in membership. The W. C. T. U. Survey Map shows New York decorated with 55 bright red spots where new W's and Y. P. B's have been established since the Indianapolis Convention. There are now 1,084 local unions in the state. A red ribbon and a prize lecture by the state president were won by twenty-five unions for a gain of 50 or more members; a blue ribbon was won by sixty-two unions for a gain of from 25 to 50 members. Every county in the state nominated, on the National W. C. T. U. basis of 500 members, a delegate to the National Convention. Two counties are entitled to name four delegates; one, three delegates, and six, two delegates. And New York women are voters!

"What has the District to report this year?" The District of Columbia has set the standard for the country which looks to Washington for its models. The District of Columbia is free from the legalized saloon. The District of Columbia is setting a standard for future National conventions by its devoted service on behalf of the comfort of the assembled hosts, its untiring efforts to promote the happiness of delegates and visitors—all this under conditions which made the task seem one impossible of accomplishment. That with all else they were doing so well, the District of Columbia unions, white and colored, should add to their membership and share in the honors given the winners on Recognition Night makes us all very happy. We salute you, comrades. We congratulate ourselves that we are here.

In compiling figures from the state secretaries' reports I did not find, in many instances, exact data on the success of the drive for new members irrespective of losses. My report is necessarily, therefore, incomplete. But I am very happy to assure you that between 30,000 and 50,000 "rookies" have within the year volunteered for service in the army of the W. C. T. U. Between 1,200 and 1,300 new unions, W. and Y. P. B., have been organized. That is no small vote for preparedness of the finest, most womanly kind, is it?

Memorial Fund

Of all the W. C. T. U. funds none can ever exceed in significance and importance the Frances E. Willard Memorial organizing fund raised each year through the local unions for the purpose of extending and perpetuating the principles and work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. This past year isolated and needy places were reached with speakers and informing literature. New unions and renewed unions owe their existence to the organizer whose visit was made possible by this fund. Exhibits designed to educate and convince the skeptical that national prohibition is near at hand have been installed at Chautauquas, conventions, conferences and fairs. Mr. Paul Barnhart, who so successfully managed the prohibition campaign in Porto Rico, received his salary and traveling expenses as well as a big supply of campaign supplies from the Memorial Fund. The W. C. T. U. campaign in New Mexico was largely financed from it. Iowa, Ohio and New Mexico campaign literature committees literally covered their states with posters and leaflets secured from the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, through a special offer made possible by the Memorial Fund. National W. C. T. U. headquarters at Chautauqua, New York, was kept open for six weeks by an appropriation from this fund. The great departments of Work Among Foreign Speaking People and Work Among Colored People are maintained by the Memorial Fund.

From many missionary states, from Panama, Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines we have the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." Our National president is casting longing eyes toward our new possessions, the Virgin Islands. The work of Annie Robbins opened the way for the prohibition victory of Porto Rico. Emma Dietrick, working in the little mining towns of Nevada seven days a week, forenoon, afternoon and evening, traveling to her next appointment by night, writes that the ministers beg that the National W. C. T. U. send an organizer to spend all of next year in that terribly hard field "where there are plenty of saloons and hardly any religion."

There is some danger that in the number of worthy appeals crowding upon us we shall forget or neglect the great constructive enterprises to which the W. C. T. U. is committed, which it is under sacred obligations to conserve. The mother heart has been poured out in the generous contributions for every kind of war work. The constructive work of the W. C. T. U. is just as much emergency war work as any of the other numerous campaigns now waging. We must maintain at home the standards for which our men are fighting over seas. The moral and spiritual forces of the nation must be conserved by "overcoming evil with good." Remember the Memorial Fund in your giving. The larger the fund the more efficient and the more extended will be the work of your organization department.

Lecturers and Organizers

When one reads that five states have been entered by W. C. T. U. lecturers and organizers, 10,000 toilsome miles traveled, 200 addresses made, 100 talks given to mothers, 10,000 pupils of the public schools addressed and 300 members secured for the W. C. T. U., one does not yet realize the work done. The twenty lecturers and thirty organizers formed into a board are due to appear before the convention Tuesday morning, and their "Reminiscences" will doubtless add flavor to the statistical reports filed in the office of the National corresponding secretary—I hope you will hear the story of the brewer's offer to the minister to pay him a year's salary to keep one of these women out of the town!

Headquarters

National W. C. T. U. headquarters in Evanston, Illinois, is the center from which radiates the work of the National organization as planned and ordered by National conventions. This national center reaches the field through six points of contact, the General Officers, THE UNION SIGNAL, the Publicity bureau, the Literature department, the organizers in the field, and the auxiliaries in every state and territory in direct touch with their local auxiliaries; while National superintendents of departments co-ordinate the more than forty lines of special endeavor with the general plan of work for the convention year. At this time when new organizations are springing up over night and when conservation and preparedness are the watchwords of the day, we may pause for a moment to consider with justifiable pride the machinery of the W. C. T. U. Conservation of effort, time, money, harmony—of, indeed, every factor making for work of the highest quality, exists in the Headquarters force, comprehending as it does four of the six points of contact I have just named, and comprising a loyal, trained, well-adjusted body of women from the president to the youngest stenographer. And surely it is a fine test of preparedness that in this world crisis, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union stands unique among women's organizations in having ready such thoroughly organized state and local auxiliaries, and such loyal superintendents of its far-reaching departments that no vital changes of organization have been necessary to meet the new duties.

Committee on Patriotic Service

I have referred again and again throughout this report to the war and to war work. I could not, if I would, dismiss from your minds or mine the struggle that is shaking the civilized world. Yet I am making an annual report—and annual reports are expected to be unemotional documents. So I shall try to tell you briefly, dryly perhaps, of momentous events in the history of the W. C. T. U.

It is many years since, in their wisdom, the founders of this organization made patriotism a part of our triune battle-cry, "For God, for Home, for Native Land." Early in the past year the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in co-operation with the National Council of Women, of which it is a part, prepared to engage in definite work under the government in bettering conditions for women. Almost coincident with the declaration of war and of a suggestion from governmental sources that the organized women could render service to their country, a myriad of organizations, big and little, old and new, hastened to offer themselves. The Council of National Defense appointed a Woman's Committee to consider the claims of these many agencies and co-ordinate the efforts of the approved organized forces of the women of the country in defense work for the nation. Many organizations federated with the Woman's Committee, Council of National Defense, created war councils and war boards, necessitating extra financial provisions, to direct their new activities. As it did not seem necessary for the National W. C. T. U. to take this course, the General Officers called to their aid the heads of the six departments most closely related to emergency service: Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, Legislation; Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, Soldiers and Sailors; Miss Lella M. Sewall, Flower Mission and Relief; Miss Mary E. Brown, Moral Education; Mrs. Lucia F. Additon, Temperance and Labor, and Mrs. Ella B. Black, Foreign Speaking People. The National Committee on Patriotic Service was organized with the six General Officers and these six superintendents as members. This committee recommended a similar combination of forces for every state, county and local union in the United States. The emergency or patriotic service to which the entire organization has been called is grouped under ten divisions:

1. Nation-wide Prohibition as a War Measure.
2. Soldiers and Sailors.
3. Relief Work.
4. Moral Education.
5. Women in Industry.
6. Americanization.
7. Co-operation with the United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy.
8. Community Interest.
9. Finance.
10. Membership.

This comprehensive program of war-time service met with immediate, enthusiastic response from every section of the country. State leaders realized that it could be made to harmonize all the resources of the W. C. T. U. The machinery was ready. Nothing was needed but the co-operation of committees organized on the plan of the National Committee, from the local union up. New York, Virginia, North Dakota, Southern California and West Virginia put the plan into operation at once. Other states followed. To be successful, the plan must be automatic, local to national. As this plan comes to be clearly understood, when the call for special effort to carry National W. C. T. U. President Speaker at Thirty-fifth Annual Convention of the Missouri W. C. T. U.

FANNY TAYLOR

Patriotism and prohibition was the keynote of the wonderful convention of the Missouri W. C. T. U. held at Warrensburg, Nov 6-9. It was a big dry meet in a big dry town and county, with a week of dry, sunny, delightful weather and a company of dry, hopeful, enthusiastic women and men who kept the program moving to the rhythm of the "Make Missouri Dry" song.

It was a record-breaker as to the large amount of business transacted, splendid addresses, fine music, helpful devotional hours, executive sessions, conferences and committee meetings.

Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, president of the Missouri W. C. T. U., with untiring zeal and energy presided over every session from start to finish. About her were her splendid official board—Miss Roena E. Shaner, vice-president; Mrs. Lettie Hill May, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Emma G. Pitzer, recording secretary, and Mrs. Neva Thomas, treasurer. These fine women, with a large delegation, made the convention one long to be remembered.

A strong patriotic and prohibition resolution was adopted the first hour. The first day was devoted to an executive meeting in the Presbyterian church and a superintendents' efficiency congress in the Christian church, with a splendid patriotic service in the evening when stirring patriotic addresses were delivered by the state lecturers, Mrs. Neva Thomas, Mrs. Sylvester Wells, Mrs. Ross Hayes Schachner, and Miss Anna MacZentmyer. A large audience greeted the speakers.

For the 1918 Campaign

It was voted that a per capita tax of ten cents be assessed on the membership as a nucleus of the 1918 campaign fund. Pledges of $2,000 were made in a few minutes for state work. Squads of "four-minute" speakers are to be organized in each community to address ready-made audiences, movies, etc., and to visit each school district. Glee clubs, children's choruses and bands of Young Campaigners for Prohibition will be formed for the same purpose. Addresses and contests are to be given in each town and community and in order to emphasize the necessity of total abstinence, an opportunity for pledge signing will be provided at each meeting.

Four National and eight state lecturers and organizers told in fine short addresses, "How to Win Our 1918 Campaign." Thirty-five state superintendents gave new plans of work including campaign features. Mr. Elmer Ball, secretary of the Citizens Dry Alliance of Missouri (of which the Missouri W. C. T. U. is a part) gave a fine address on campaign methods.

National President Welcomed

When our National president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, arrived, the convention arose and expressed its great joy by giving the white ribbon salute and applauding vigorously. Mrs. Burger introduced our leader as "the beloved commander-in-chief of our white ribbon army." Miss Gordon's address was full of inspiration. She related many interesting and helpful experiences in connection with the Ohio and New Mexico campaigns and spoke just the words Missouri comrades needed. The largest audience of the convention greeted Miss Gordon and was plainly appreciative of the splendid service and leadership of this wonderful woman of fame.

Union Signal Rally Hour

The placards, posters, and map used at THE UNION SIGNAL rally convinced delegates of the need of the official paper and a large number of subscriptions were taken. Mrs. Lettie Hill May was assisted by Mrs. Margaret B. Platt of Evanston, Ill., who represented the National literature in the rally. There was also a suffrage pageant.

Thirty-five counties reported a gain in membership, and ninety-seven new local unions have been organized. The Star-Journal published a special white ribbon issue, containing a large part of the president's annual address. There were seasons of prayer for our boys in the service when many tears were shed. One-hundred-thirty-five mothers having sons and relatives in army or navy, were present at the convention. A large service flag floated in their honor. Every state officer was re-elected. Mrs. Burger's annual address was, as usual, eloquent and masterly.

Report of National Corresponding Secretary

forward any of the work covered by it is made, the local unions will not fail to rise to duty and opportunity. As white ribboners come to see it is good sense and good citizenship to co-operate with the government through its authorized agencies, they recognize the value of a central committee in their own organization, through which these connections can be made and the patriotic work of the W. C. T. U. directed.

As white ribboners check upon their fingers the ten points of the W. C. T. U. war service program, they may well be startled at the proof that they have been in the vanguard of the army of patriotic Americans the emergency has called forth. No single subject of this program arranged to give the service our government finds itself in need of, presents an unfamiliar topic. Nine of them, National Prohibition, Soldiers and Sailors, Relief Work, Moral Education, Women in Industry, Americanization, Community Interest, Finance, and Membership are well developed phases of peace-time effort. Never before have trained women been in such demand. Never before have all the men and women of the country been so roused to the value of the things the W. C. T. U. stands for. Never before has it been so evident that every bit of work we do as an organization is patriotic service and in the present crisis is helping to win the war.

Thus I come back, inevitably, to mention of new members. The W. C. T. U. offers a tremendously big, efficient machine for enlisting, training and putting into the field of service to her country and to civilization, every woman, black or white, rich or poor, trained or untrained in America. I know of no other organization that can say as much. And the women of America are eager, as never before, to be enlisted. Let us in the year 1918, create in addition to the splendid force we now have, a "New National Army" of women for service to God, to Home and to Native Land!

Miss Gordon's Annual Message

For space reasons we publish this week only excerpts from the annual address of the National W. C. T. U. president. This comprehensive review of the gains and victories of the past year is invaluable as a reference book and should be not only in the private library of every W. C. T. U. worker, but have a place in public, school and college libraries. Order of National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Ill. Price, five cents per copy.

cause of drinking employes industry is paying millions of dollars annually in preventable losses by accident, spoiled work and inefficiency. * * * More than a million responsible positions in the United States, it is reliably computed, are now closed to the man who uses alcoholic liquors. "There is as much place in business for alcohol," affirms Mr. Edison, "as for sand in an engine." Speaking of the signs of the times, the Brewers' Journal said: "There are even companies and individual employers who threaten to discharge employes for drinking alcohol AT ANY TIME. They do not care if that is social and economic slavery; their main object is to protect their pocketbooks." Coal miners have always been the victims of a tradition that coal could not be dug and mines could not be worked without the assistance of John Barleycorn. Sturdy, sober, safe and sane minds now laugh at this senseless, out-of-date tradition. The Interstate Steel & Iron Company has issued a mandate protecting its employes from drink and its men cheerfully support the rule which keeps liquor off the premises. The success of the company is assured.

Enforce the Law

Since "Law is love and love is law" and "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor," the reign of a righteous prohibitory law is unselfish love in action. In the homes of communities thus protected are heard the laughter and songs of children. Industry and good cheer abound and there is respect for every beneficent law. Reared in such an atmosphere young citizens grow to manhood and womanhood educated to maintain the ideals of our American republic.

How can every prohibition community exemplify these ideals? How can better enforcement of a prohibitory law be secured? The altruistic unity of action and untiring industry used in obtaining the law must continue. An electric current of responsibility, personal and perpetual, must imbue such a body of community workers. In some states and cities measures making the laws more effective should be secured and law enforcing officials and sheriffs should be elected. Everywhere evil doers take fewer risks when they know the law in the shape of heavy fines and imprisonment is sure to lay its strong hand upon them. In license localities large numbers of blind tigers and bootleggers are always found. There they are happily at home. Unhappy is their lot and short is their stay in prohibition cities and towns that are under a good enforcement régime.

No longer do we need to argue this question. Necessity of enforcement is clear. What we really work for we get. Let us not be lulled into apathy concerning the activities of the liquor traffic in areas where a prohibitory law has been secured. It is at such points that the enemy masses its educational publicity, makes an adroit attack on public sentiment, and by subtle, undermining personal work in influential circles weakens the enforcement of prohibitory laws. If at such a time, while "on guard," the temperance forces are sleeping and indifferent there will be a rude awakening. You should be at war with non-enforcement as vigorously and valiantly as you were with the open saloon. See to it that unlawful conditions are promptly righted. The war against evil is a long campaign and there is no discharge in prohibition warfare. The "great undone" ought to haunt all workers in prohibition centers, and be the spur to continuous endeavor.

Enforcement of law is an important feature of our war emergency service. The liquor dealer who sells drink to men in uniform is a traitor to his country. At all hazards the men of the Army and Navy must be protected. Enforce the law. The law-breaker himself will be the one most benefited when enforcement becomes habitual and normal, and national prohibitory law, the law of love and the law of God, prevails.

A World Glimpse

We send sisterly and compassionate messages to our beloved comrades in Canada and over the sea—comrades who through suffering and sacrifice are bound more closely than ever to our inmost hearts. We greet our noble, generous-hearted Rosalind, Countess of Carlisle, the brilliant and sagacious leader of our World's W. C. T. U. forces; Miss Slack and Mrs. Sanderson, general officers; and our representatives in China, Japan, India and South America. Miss Flora E. Strout tells us a marvelous story of Burma's progress and we are glad to welcome her here on her brief furlough at home. We are keeping her busy prior to her departure in March for Malaysia and Ceylon. She is inspiring our United States women to greater zeal for temperance work in the Orient and around the world. Miss Hardynia K. Norville in South America, where alcohol is a blighting curse, is accomplishing prodigious results that will stir all Latin America. Japan's white ribboners move grandly forward. One of their choicest representatives, Mrs. Etsu Sugimoto, will speak to us at this convention.

Mrs. Goodrich, so long our representative in China, and Dr. Mary Stone, whose Chinese name I will not attempt to pronounce, are now reënforced by richly endowed Mrs. Ren Yen Mei and several young women who are giving their entire time to the service of the World's W. C. T. U. March 31, 1917, the Chinese republic accomplished its freedom from opium. The efforts to shake off the shackles of a century-old habit have been superhuman. Chinese students educated in the United States helped in the awakening of the republic.

The Light of Liberty

The awful calamity of war calls forth the noblest qualities of mind and soul and draws us nearer the great heart of the Eternal to whom alone we look to bring order out of chaos, calm out of convulsion. We believe that a miracle of blessing, now unseen, will be wrought out for all the warring nations. It is natural to dwell on the dark side of this conflict —its terrific loss of life, its colossal cost, its direful ravages upon the human race. For courageous souls who know the hidings of power in God, a crisis is a means of growth and refining of soul rather than a time of fear, depression and pessimism. "We see a star, a star ascending, the star of freedom; and its light forever white and burning shall shine upon us living or dying."

There is weight in the viewpoint of a staunch Friend, Hannah J. Bailey, who for many years was our World's National superintendent of the department for the promotion of peace and arbitration. No one could hold stronger convictions against war than does Mrs. Bailey. She thoughtfully says: "I fully believe that the prediction long ago given by God's prophets will some time come to pass and the blessed Prince of Peace will reign supreme. This war may have been permitted in order to help bring this about by showing people that love and unity are needed to make the world happy and a fit abiding place. I do not believe that any of the work of the followers of Christ will be in vain. 'All the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our God and of His Christ.' He and His followers shall have the victory."

The wonderful electrical illumination of the dome of the Capitol building of our republic and the permanent lighting of the Statue of Liberty in New York harbor are significant of the President's prediction that "Peace is coming to the world only with liberty." Democracy in its best sense, according to James Russell Lowell, is "merely the letting in of light and air." When our country is sympathetically responsive to the impact of true liberty of which prohibition is a vital part, then shall our great American republic send out to the waiting nations of the world the transcendent light that means "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

"They Break Not Their Ranks"

Never were we so proud of W. C. T. U. women. With the present high cost of printing we cannot follow conservation convictions and at the same time tell the entire wonderful story of progress. The year 1917 with its grave vicissitudes is no exception as to record of achievements. Rather does it far exceed any previous twelve months in that patriotic service has been added to the program of temperance effort. To hold our own in membership surprises the most optimistic among us—but to show a net gain is cause for mutual felicitation and devout gratitude. In every state and territory of the nation W. C. T. U. leaders of the grand divisions of our white ribbon army have given publicity to the valorous deeds and noble achievements of nearly 500,000 true Christian patriots. Editors, publicity experts, National Headquarters assistants, National organizers and lecturers, department superintendents, evangelists, the Young People's Branch of the National W. C. T. U., and the Loyal Temperance Legion Branch, state, county and local leaders, and the faithful rank and file all merit our admiring gratitude.

During the coming year as we traverse the road to victory let us heed the words of a seer given to Israel of old: "They march every one on his ways and they break not their ranks." It is vitally essential to the life of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union that each local, county and state unit shall vigilantly maintain its own identity. Under the distraction and stress of war we must not set aside our educational and legislative propaganda, but in addition we must face squarely those duties which the present emergency presents. As our splendid forces become better adjusted to the insistent call of the war situation we shall find that vigorous pushing of our patriotic service program and sympathetic co-operation with other war service organizations can be made the means of increasing our membership, of strengthening our solidarity and of widely extending our influence.

Women are born conservers. Let us not lose sight of the fact that the organizations which make possible the most efficient emergency service must also be conserved. It would be deplorably short-sighted not to conserve the conserver and preserve the preserver. No limit should be placed on the amount of energy expended in the conservation and preservation of the specific agencies on which the defenders of our nation depend.

A man once said to the venerated Dr. Lyman Beecher, "You have too many irons in the fire." "Bless me, too many irons in the fire," retorted Mr. Beecher, "that cannot be. Why, a person ought to have all his irons in the fire and the shovel and tongs and the poker and the coal scuttle, too." Something of the good doctor's spirit should take possession of the white ribboner who immediately places an extinguisher on the work of the W. C. T. U. whenever and wherever a prohibitory law is secured. Our temperance irons must still be kept at white heat. The enthusiasm of children and young people must be continually rekindled that they in turn may swing out to the succeeding generation the light of a prohibitory law. Successful law enforcement will require shovel and tongs, poker and coal scuttle, and all the irons at our command.

At the present time the W. C. T. U. in prohibition communities has more than enough to keep it busy beyond belief if it shall carry on our program of war service. If this additional work were not prompting us to heroic endeavor, there are countless bits of civic housekeeping which white ribboners can undertake to the immense advantage of locality or commonwealth.

Thousands of women can be drawn to us by the opportunity to participate in our unique patriotic program. Prohibition has a new, vital significance to many who hitherto have taken only a superficial interest in the progress of the movement in our land and in the countries of the allies. Especially should we invite the mothers of our enlisted men to unite with our nation-wide and world-wide organization, well termed, "Organized mother-love." The W. C. T. U. affords them the privilege of translating their quenchless mother love into patriotic devotion as they help drive from America and Europe the traffic in liquor and in vice.

We must be prepared to take our full part in the mighty constructive temperance program that will be ready for us at the close of the war. Only with trained, disciplined, well organized forces can we adequately hold our place in the ranks of the temperance hosts. While we co-operate with all other agencies it is of vital moment that we break not our ranks but alongside the banners of our various nations fly our own W. C. T. U. colors.

The worst foe of democracy is the liquor traffic. Arrayed against this colossal wrong and united for the triumph of democracy, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union may well adopt this new slogan: "Patriotism and Prohibition, Now and Forever, One and Inseparable."

QUIZ ON THE ANNUAL ADDRESS OF THE NATIONAL PRESIDENT

The use of these questions as a part of local union programs is suggested.

1. Name the states and territories on the 1917 prohibition honor roll.

2. What prohibition measures have been enacted by Congress since the last National Convention?

3. Tell something of the victorious campaigns in Utah, Indiana, New Hampshire and New Mexico.

4. What can be said of the anti-liquor victories in the Captial City and in the territories of Alaska and Porto Rico?

5. Why is the failure to adopt the constitutional prohibition amendment in Iowa not regarded as a victory for the liquor interests? What is the encouraging feature of the 1917 Ohio prohibition campaign?

6. Tell the story of the adoption by the Senate of the resolution submitting to the states an amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition.

7. Why is the New York suffrage victory a triumph for the anti-liquor forces?

8. In what way does the present conduct of Germany furnish striking confirmation of the findings of science concerning beer?

9. Explain the attitude of the industrial world and the labor movement toward prohibition.

10. How does Miss Gordon show that "The path of patriotism is the path of prohibition?"

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.
Author of "In His Steps"

LIFE is a story. Your life is. That's why you like a tale that lives. Some tales are written; some are forged upon the anvil of the author's necessities; some grow day by day—like life. Now and then an author lives the tale he writes. Now and then some rare author is able to weave into his tale the drama, the sorrow, the joy, the struggle, the failure, the success, the doubt, the faith of the life of men, and to weave them skillfully into a story so vivid that, as you read, you see its action filmed upon the screen of your mind.

But only one author of whom we know acts his stories. Charles M. Sheldon does. Every episode of has been portrayed by the author before his Sunday evening congregations. Every dramatic climax, every incident has been tried on his sympathetic hearers. They found it good and only when they did was Dr. Sheldon willing to give it to the world. Thus this story lives as few do, for it has been lived and it vibrates with the vital force of real life. It is not wholly fiction. In fact, it is largely true, and its characters are only faintly camouflaged, so that old acquaintances might easily recognize in them the very human folks they once have known. But we aren't going to tell you the story here. We couldn't do it well enough.

Dr. Sheldon's new novel surpasses all of his previous works in thrilling human interest and moral power. "Howard Chase" is a church story, but intensely human.

"Howard Chase" will be published serially in the Christian Herald beginning December 12th. It may eventually be published in book form, but subscribers to the Christian Herald will be able to read it without one cent of extra expense. Dr. Sheldon's new story alone is well worth the subscription price.

West Washington to Push National Constitutional Prohibition

The opening of the thirty-fourth annual convention of the West Washington W. C. T. U. was preceded by a three hours' consecration service in charge of Rev. Wilhelmina T. D. McCullough, state Evangelistic superintendent, with such leaders as Libbie Beach Brown, Anna Osborn and Rev. Abbie Danforth.

The convention proper was called to order by Mrs. Harriet B. Dunlap, state president, after which greetings were read from Miss Anna A. Gordon, the National W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, National treasurer, and Mrs. Margaret B. Platt, both of whom were for so many years leaders in the West Washington W. C. T. U.

The county presidents' hour, under the heading, "On the Firing Line," brought to the platform the leaders in thirteen counties, each of whom claimed for her county the most successful warfare against the foes of home protection.

Mrs. Nettie Hallenback and her helpers, Mesdames Wallace, Townsend and Additon, most ably handled "The Tobacco Menace." The memorial service, conducted by Mrs. Lottie Sahlbom, was one of the most precious hours of the convention. Mrs. Jackson Silbaugh pleaded for the organization of a Y. P. B. by every local union and for the banding together of our young people "For God and Home and Every Land." She also urged continued work for a woman's reformatory in the state as one of the effective methods of helping to combat the social evils of today.

"The Effect of the War on Child Life" was ably presented by Dr. Maybelle Park, assistant medical inspector of the public schools of Seattle, who pointed out that in England, since the beginning of the war, juvenile delinquency has trebled, due to the breaking down of the educational system, the stopping of child-welfare work, the premature employment of children in agriculture and munition factories, but above all, to the loss of home influence. When the father is at the front and the mother is at the factory the child has no one to keep it from going wrong.

Hon. Ernest Lister, governor of Washington and a strong advocate of prohibition, gave one of the evening addresses and urged continued uplift work.

Senator Wesley L. Jones, our champion of National Constitutional Prohibition, fresh from Washington, D. C., brought inspiration for renewed activities and the hope that the Christmas gift to the Nation may be the news of the adoption of the referendum to the states of a prohibition amendment to the United States constitution.

Mrs. Harriet B. Dunlap, the able leader of the white ribbon forces during the past year, was unable, on account of home ties, to serve longer as president, and was reluctantly released. Miss Mary E. Brown, National superintendent of Moral Education and Race Betterment, was elected to succeed her. The other state officers were re-elected, as follows: Vice-president, Mrs. C. Belle French; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Elizabeth E. Thayer; recording secretary, Mrs. Ella H. Booker; treasurer, Mrs. Lola J. Flagg.

CAMPAIGN PLANS
for National Constitutional Prohibition
Adopted at National W. C. T. U. Convention at Washington, D. C.

SPECIAL SERVICES: Thursday, January 24, to be observed by local unions as a Day of Prayer for National Constitutional Prohibition, with an appropriate program; all clergymen to be requested to make special mention of this subject on Sunday, January 20; special program to be given in Sunday schools on that day; programs to be outlined by the National W. C. T. U.

APPEALS: Resolutions, telegraphic and personal appeals for National Constitutional Prohibition with the six-year clause eliminated, to be sent to Representatives and Senators, according to the directions of the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U.

ELECTIONS: That we work for the election to our state legislatures of men who will vote for the ratification of the Federal prohibition amendment.

FUNDS: Every state to contribute at the rate of one dollar per union to the Lillian Stevens Campaign Fund for National Constitutional Prohibition.

FOR PROHIBITION STATES: Concentrate on the work for National Constitutional Prohibition rather than initiate new state-wide campaigns, while patriotic demands are so exigent. Hold what has been won; make prohibition effective through law enforcement; give wide publicity to the benefits of prohibition; co-operate definitely with a campaign state under a plan made by the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U.

FOR STATES IN CAMPAIGNS: The greatest asset for National Constitutional Prohibition is to win additional prohibition states. A pending prohibitory law belongs to the people and success demands united forces and subordination of all other issues. Use up-to-date methods; make detailed survey of the state's relation to the liquor traffic; have campaign teams of men and women, speakers and singers; provide display advertising for unions.

EDUCATIONAL CAMPAIGNS: Emphasize the necessity of total abstinence. Promote universal pledge-signing.

CHANNELS OF EDUCATION: Essay, oratorical, declamatory medal and original poster contests; Loyal Temperance Legions, Young Campaigners for Prohibition, Young People's Branches, Sunday Schools, Young People's Church Societies, speakers, literature, the press and "Americanization" plans for the foreign born.

CO-OPERATION: We express profound appreciation of the spirit of co-operation shown by the boards of temperance of the various denominations. We hail with delight the awakened interest of women's missionary societies and women's clubs in National Constitutional Prohibition and seek closer co-operation with all religious, fraternal and patriotic organizations of women.

DEMONSTRATIONS: Multiply posters, poster parades, poster hikes, and billboards; arrange exercises, playlets, cantatas, pageants, and other spectacular programs; encourage community singing of prohibition songs; use exhibits in conventions, windows and other public places, illustrating the financial and other phases of the drink problem.

STATE PAPERS: The January issue of state W. C. T. U. papers to devote space to plans for National Constitutional Prohibition.

SPEAKERS: Every platform representative of the W. C. T. U. shall be prepared to show that prohibition is patriotism and that conservation of national resources demands the destruction of the liquor traffic.

WAR MEASURES: In the interest of efficiency, conservation of manhood and material resources it is, first: the duty of every citizen to abstain from alcoholic liquors during the period of the war and to this end the circulation of war-time pledges is urged; second: we, the mothers of the nation's defenders, appeal to Congress to give complete and immediate war prohibition.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

OPENING OF CONGRESS — PRESIDENT WILSON DELIVERS MESSAGE — HON. F. H. GILLETT, STAUNCH FRIEND OF REFORMS, TO BE REPUBLICAN LEADER IN THE HOUSE

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS. National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

The first Monday in December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Sixty-Fifth Congress convened December 3, 1917. In the Senate, Vice-President Marshall was in the chair and the chaplain of the Senate, Rev. F. J. Prettyman, offered a fervent prayer. Sixty-eight Senators then answered to the roll-call. Sessions in both Senate and House were formal and brief. Notification was made to the President by a committee of the Senate and House of Representatives that a quorum of each House was assembled and that Congress was ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make.

Senator La Follette of Wisconsin formally announced to the Senate the tragic death of his colleague, Senator Paul O. Husting, who was shot by accident during a hunting trip. As a mark of respect, Senator La Follette sent to the desk a resolution requesting an adjournment of the Senate for the day.

In the House, the Speaker, Champ Clark, presided and upon taking the Chair was greeted with hearty applause. Prayer was offered by the blind chaplain, Rev. H. N. Couden. Three hundred and forty-five Representatives then answered to their names and several new members were sworn in. Announcement was made of the deaths of Senator Husting and Representative Martin of Illinois, after which the House adjourned until Tuesday, December 4.

President Wilson Delivers Message to Congress

December 4 was a great occasion in history. On that day the President of the United States went to the Capitol to deliver his message to Congress. After the regular opening the members of the Supreme Court, in their judicial robes, led by Chief Justice White, marched in a dignified manner to seats in front of the rostrum and soon thereafter members of the Senate, led by Vice-President Marshall, entered the Chamber. In a short time the sergeant-at-arms announced the President of the United States. Every one rose as President Wilson, accompanied by a committee of Senators and Representatives, walked briskly to the clerk's desk immediately in front of the Speaker's rostrum. He was greeted with tremendous applause which lasted fully a minute. After shaking hands with the Vice-President and the Speaker, the President began his message to Congress, speaking in a carefully modulated voice which carried to every part of the crowded galleries. Every listener was eager to catch every word of what is considered to be one of the world's great statements. Faces were tense, but when some particularly forceful sentiment was expressed, the applause was deafening.

"Our Present and Immediate Task Is to Win the War."

The President began by saying that eight months had passed since he had addressed the Congress and that great events had transpired since then. After referring to the causes of the war, among other things he said: "Let there be no misunderstanding. Our present and immediate task is to win the war, and nothing shall turn us aside from it until it is accomplished. Every power and resource we possess, whether of men, of money, or of materials, is being devoted and will continue to be devoted to that purpose until it is achieved. Those who desire to bring peace about before that purpose is achieved I counsel to carry their advice elsewhere. We will not entertain it. We shall regard the war as won only when the German people say to us, through properly accredited representatives, that they are ready to agree to a settlement based upon justice and the reparation of the wrongs their rulers have done. They have done a wrong to Belgium which must be repaired. They have established a power over other lands and peoples than their own, over the great empire of Austria-Hungary over hitherto free Balkan states, over Turkey, and within Asia, which must be relinquished.

"We intend no wrong against the German Empire, no interference with her internal affairs. We should deem either the one or the other absolutely unjustifiable, absolutely contrary to the principles we have professed to live by and to hold most sacred throughout our life as a nation.

TEXT OF PROPOSED FEDERAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT AS ADOPTED BY THE UNITED STATES SENATE

The manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by Congress.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"We Are Seeking Permanent Foundations for Peace of the World"

"The wrongs, the very deep wrongs committed in this war will have to be righted. That, of course. But they cannot and must not be righted by the commission of similar wrongs against Germany and her allies. The world will not permit the commission of similar wrongs as a means of reparation and settlement Statesmen must by this time have learned that the opinion of the world is everywhere wide awake and fully comprehends the issues involved.

"We are seeking permanent, not temporary, foundations for the peace of the world and must seek them candidly and fearlessly. As always, the right will prove to be the expedient.

"What shall we do, then, to push the great war of freedom and justice to its righteous conclusion. We must clear away with a thorough hand all impediments to success and we must make every adjustment of law that will facilitate the full and free use of our whole capacity and force as a fighting unit.

"One very embarrassing obstacle that stands in our way is that we are at war with Germany but not with her allies. I therefore very earnestly recommend that the Congress immediately declare the United States in a state of war with Austria-Hungary. Does it seem strange to you that this should be the conclusion of the argument that I have just addressed to you? It is not. It is, in fact, the inevitable logic of what I have said. Austria-Hungary is for the time being not her own mistress but simply the vassal of the German government. We must face the facts as they are and act upon them without sentiment in this stern business. The government of Austria-Hungary is not acting on its own initiative or in response to the wishes and feelings of its own peoples but as the instrument of another nation. We must meet its force with our own and regard the Central Powers as but one. The war can be successfully conducted in no other way.

"The Very Existence of Democracy and Liberty Threatened"

"The purposes of the Central Powers strike straight at the very heart of everything we believe in; their methods of warfare outrage every principle of humanity and of knightly honor; their intrigue has corrupted the very thought and spirit of many of our people; their sinister and secret diplomacy has sought to take our very territory away from us and disrupt the Union of the States. Our safety would be at an end, our honor forever sullied and brought into contempt were we to permit their triumph. They are striking at the very existence of democracy and liberty.

"It is because it is for us a war of high, disinterested purpose, in which all the free peoples of the world are banded together for the vindication of right, a war for the preservation of our nation and of all that it has held dear of principle and of purpose, that we feel ourselves doubly constrained to propose for its outcome only that which is righteous and of irreproachable intention, for our foes as well as for our friends. The cause being just and holy, the settlement must be of like motive and quality. For this cause we entered the war and for this cause will we battle until the last gun is fired.

"A supreme moment of history has come. The eyes of the people have been opened and they see. The hand of God is laid upon the nations. He will show them favor, I devoutly believe, only if they rise to the clear heights of His own justice and mercy."

We regretted that hundreds of delegates to the forty-fourth convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which was held in Washington December 2-7, could not attend this important session of Congress, but special tickets are provided for the occasion, each Representative having but one and each Senator two. These are usually given to members of their families. However, a goodly number of our white ribboners did secure tickets and were in-

PATRIOTISM DOMINATES FORTY-FOURTH NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

"EVERY WHITE RIBBONER A PROHIBITION PATRIOT" ITS SLOGAN

Editorial Correspondence

An all-pervasive spirit of patriotism dominated the National W. C. T. U. Convention held last week in Washington, D. C. Taking as its keynote, "The Path of Patriotism is the Path of Prohibition"—the theme of the annual message of the National W. C. T. U. president, all who participated in the occasion sounded a clear, strong, unfaltering note of ardent love and loyalty to America.

On the program appeared the names of some of the foremost patriots of the nation—men and women who in Congressional halls or as leaders of great organized patriotic efforts, are enlisted in their country's service as truly as though they wore the khaki.

Mr. Bryan Speaks to Immense Audience

At the mass meeting Sunday afternoon, December 2, at Poli's Theater, an immense audience listened to a masterly address by the Great Commoner, Hon. William J. Bryan, every paragraph of which was permeated with fervid patriotism. An hour before the time announced for the meeting an army of men and women eagerly awaited entrance to the theater. A few minutes after the doors were opened the house was filled, pit, parquet, galleries and platform, and hundreds could be seen standing.

Mr. Bryan's optimistic prediction that the present Congress would, before adjourning, pass both the resolution submitting a prohibition amendment to the Constitution and a war prohibition measure met with enthusiastic response—Mr. Bryan was simply voicing the conviction of every delegate to the great convention.

Sunday evening's meeting furnished a "surprise" program. Conscripted as substitutes, three prohibition patriots of the first magnitude kept the audience from indulging in regret that Congresswoman Jeannette Rankin and some others, who had been expected, failed to appear. United States Congressmen Charles H. Randall of California, Stuart F. Reed of West Virginia and M. Clyde Kelly of Pennsylvania did some rapid firing of prohibition-patriotic oratory.

One of the most delightful unexpected features of the evening was the appearance of Mrs. Newton D. Baker, wife of the Secretary of War, as a soloist. Mrs. Baker's rendering of Kipling's "Recessional" was rich and forceful. Most graciously she responded to an encore and sang with tenderness and spirit Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Miss Gordon's Eloquent, Comprehensive Address

The big event of Monday morning was the annual address of the National W. C. T. U. president, Miss Anna A. Gordon. It was a comprehensive, eloquent, logical review of the progress of prohibition the past year, enlivened by witty comments and characterizations that delighted the hearer.

The large part of this message was given in THE UNION SIGNAL of December 6. In the afternoon Mrs. Frances P. Parks, National corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, National treasurer, gave interesting reports, which were printed in full in last week's paper.

Welcome Night Full of Enthusiasm

On Monday evening the delegates and visitors were formally welcomed to Washington as citizens of the United States, and by virtue of that fact, citizens of the Capital city. Unusually gracious was the greeting of President Brownlow of the Board of Commissioners of the District, who won all hearts by his tender tribute to his white ribbon mother and reference to the fact that his first successful literary effort as a boy was the writing of an essay on Frances E. Willard, which won a prize in Sunday school and was published in THE SIGNAL. Mr. Brownlow's speech will be given in a later issue, as will a further account of Welcome evening.

Statue of Frances E. Willard, which occupies a place in Statuary Hall, the National Capitol, was a center of interest to all Convention visitors and was constantly referred to by Convention speakers.

Record-Breaking Attendance—906 Voting Delegates

By Tuesday morning it was realized that the convention was record-breaking in attendance. The Credentials Committee reported 906 voting delegates on its list, each representing a constituency of 500 members—the largest convention in the history of the National W. C. T. U.

Tuesday morning was devoted to organization business and to delightful "Ramblers' Reminiscences" by the lecturers and organizers.

The afternoon meeting was a succession of surprises, each and all of a delightful variety. They began with the appearance of Hon. Jeannette Rankin, Congresswoman from Montana, who gave a spirited speech on a free press as related to the temperance question. Surprise Number 2 was weighty, numerous and masculine—the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal church, which had been holding a meeting in the city and adjourned to visit the convention in a body. Led by Bishop William F. McDowell, they filed onto the platform and were greeted by enthusiastic applause. Bishop McDowell, Dr. Clarence True Wilson, Deets Pickett, Dr. Elmer Williams, the fighting parson of Chicago, and a dozen others gave brief, pointed, pithy speeches. Look for them in the next issue of THE SIGNAL. It was a wonderful afternoon, everyone agreed, and at its close John G. Daily, the author of "A Saloonless Nation in 1920," sang that history-making prophecy in song, and with Mrs. Frances W. Graham, led the convention in the triumphant chorus,

"In 1920, with ballots plenty,
A saloonless nation we shall be."

The victories in the states and territory that had won prohibition during the past year were lived over again Tuesday evening, when the presidents of these successful commonwealths told in forceful, eloquent language to a realistic Uncle Sam and Aunt Columbia, "how they did it."

Wednesday was a red letter day in the history of the official papers. At the morning meeting there was inaugurated a tremendous "drive" for doubling the circulation and in response to a rousing appeal by Mrs. Addie B. Parsels for THE UNION SIGNAL and Miss Mildred Moody for The Young Crusader, over $17,000 in new subscriptions were pledged.

Julia C. Lathrop, chief of the Children's Bureau, and Dr. Harvey W. Wiley were the "stars" of the afternoon. When you read their speeches next week you will agree that they displayed great powers of illuminating the subjects with which they dealt.

Every hour, yea, every minute of the convention, was devoted to patriotic utterances, but on Wednesday evening it specialized on "Patriotic Work of the W. C. T. U." The National superintendents of the six departments which have been doing definite work along these lines told of their achievements in demonstration or speech.

At the close of this presentation, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, chairman of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense, discoursed for fifty minutes in her inimitable fashion on the history, purpose and plans of that committee and the part of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in its work. Rich, rare and racy was every paragraph of her speech, which SIGNAL readers will later have the opportunity to read.

All National Officers Re-Elected

Election was the special order for Thursday morning. Voting for the National General Officers was conducted with the usual enthusiasm, resulting in the re-election of Miss Anna A. Gordon as president; Mrs. Ella A. Boole, vice-president-at-large. Mrs. Frances P. Parks, Corresponding secretary; Mrs. Elizabeth P. Anderson, recording secretary; Mrs. Sara H. Hoge, assistant recording secretary, and Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, treasurer.

Mrs. Josephus Daniels and Mrs. Thomas A. Edison Visit Convention

During the morning many distinguished visitors were introduced, among them Senator Fernald and Senator Hale, both of Maine, and three Congressmen from that state; also Mrs. Thomas A. Edison, who brought greetings from her distinguished husband, and Mrs. Josephus Daniels, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, who came to invite the delegates to an informal reception at her home that afternoon.

Prohibition Proves Its Worth in Virginia, Says Former Wet Publisher

Prohibition in operation in Virginia has won to its standard almost the entire number of its former enemies. John Stewart Bryan, publisher of the Richmond News-Leader, a former opponent of prohibition, declares, "Prohibition of the bone dry sort works in Virginia. Even 'wets' admit that, and there are very few 'wets' left because improved conditions consequent upon cutting off economic waste through alcohol have converted nearly every opponent that prohibition had. Personally I was very much opposed to prohibition, because I feared it would be impossible to enforce it in a city the size of Richmond.

"In Norfolk the experiment seemed most doubtful because it is on the sea and filled with seafaring men who expect to drink when and where and what they please. Yet Norfolk is as dry as Sahara. Of course, whisky can be bought, but in such small quantities and at such prices as practically not to affect city life. Numbers of men in Norfolk told me that without prohibition Norfolk would not be endurable under the present influx of soldiers and sailors, and the dry situation had worked out so well that if a new election for prohibition were left entirely to those who voted 'wet' at last election, the city would go overwhelmingly dry.

"It is unquestionably a shock to the feeling of personal freedom not to be allowed to 'git drunk and fight in peace,' but the larger satisfaction of increased health and happiness and the general elevation of the standard of life has, I am sure, determined the South to stand by prohibition as an unshakable principle of administration."

National Grange Passes Three Prohibition Resolutions

The National Grange, patrons of husbandry, in its fifty-first annual session in St. Louis, passed resolutions urging President Wilson, as a military necessity, to make the United States dry immediately; asking the House of Representatives to concur in the resolution already passed by the Senate to submit a prohibition amendment to the constitution, and appealing to the President to establish seven liquorless days a week. The liquorless days, says the resolution, are in line with the meatless and wheatless days established by the food administration.

Fruit Growers of California Urge Closing of Saloons

The fiftieth convention of the Fruit Growers of California, in recent session in Pasadena, endorsed the movement to close the saloons of the state during the period of the war as one of the means of meeting the labor shortage situation. Efficiency in the labor employed in the production of fruit is decreased 25 per cent by the presence of saloons, declared the fruit growers.

Beer and Tobacco War Enemies Says Irving Fisher

Prof. Irving Fisher, in a lecture delivered to a Yale University audience, on "The Economic Aspects of Food Conservation," scored the liquor traffic as the "greatest of our pro-German enemies within." "We use up in beer daily," he said, "enough grain to make 6,000,000 loaves of bread, or nearly enough to supply the soldiers of all our European allies." He also attacked the tobacco organizations.

Ban on Sale of Liquor to Philadelphia Coal Drivers

Philadelphia coal wagon drivers must be total abstainers during working hours as a result of an order issued by Francis A. Lewis, coal controller, whose power is backed by the government machinery, says the Washington Times. Saloonkeepers are forbidden to sell to the drivers of coal wagons between the hours of 6 a. m. and 6 p. m. Failure to live up to this mandate will result in an appeal being taken to the liquor license court to refuse renewing the license of the offending party.

"In such a crisis as this," Mr. Lewis said, "something drastic must be done to relieve legitimate suffering, and this office is going to see to it that saloonkeepers do not impair the system by helping men to get intoxicated. During the day it's going to be 'The Water Wagon Is the Place for Me' to the letter."

Santa Monica, Cal., in a wet and dry election held December 5, voted to close its saloons and prohibit the sale of liquor in cafes.

Governor Brumbaugh Predicts Dry Pennsylvania

Governor Martin G. Brumbaugh of Pennsylvania, in a Thanksgiving sermon delivered in Pittsburgh, enumerated among other causes for thankfulness the fact that the outlook for prohibition in his state is better than it has ever been.

"I thank God, King Alcohol is on the retreat. Isn't it significant that in a time of world-wide test, when a man is called upon to do a man's part, it is recognized that he cannot do it unless King Alcohol is first banished? There are now twenty-seven 'white' states in America, and the outlook is better now than it has ever been for Pennsylvania to become dry in the very near future."

Prohibition Well Enforced in Texas County

From a police standpoint, Dallas county, Tex., is greatly improved under prohibition, says the Journal of Dallas. The chief of police, the district attorney and the sheriff are pledged to law enforcement and their efforts, plus the $5 imposed for drunkenness, are reducing to the narrowest possible margin violations of the prohibition statute.

"An illustration of the comparatively peaceful condition is shown in the night reports which have been turned in since local option became effective. With very few exceptions, practically every record is worded, 'Beg to report a very quiet night,'" recently said John W. Ryan, chief of police.

"There is no organized bootlegging and no bootlegging in a big way being carried on in Dallas county," said District Attorney Lively.

"Considering the proximity of Fort Worth and Dallas and the ease of communication between the two, it is rather remarkable how well the law is being observed. The really splendid co-operation of the police department and of county officers, with my department, is largely responsible."

Sheriff W. K. Reynolds affirms that there have been no operations on a large scale and that the activity of the officers in prosecuting disorderly houses has done away with much selling that might have been expected from these sources.

Commercial Paper of South Dakota Enumerates Benefits of Bone Dryness

So successful has been the operation of prohibition in the state of South Dakota that the Commercial News, a trade paper published in Sioux Falls, has felt the call to spread abroad to its readers in other parts of the United States who may not have first-hand knowledge of the workings of prohibition, the benefits of the dry law as seen in Sioux Falls and throughout the state. Bankers, merchants, hotel keepers and men in every line of business were interviewed concerning the effects of prohibition. Seventy-five per cent of those interviewed, says the Commercial News, are strongly in favor of the present condition of dryness and would not go back to the old order of things under any circumstances.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN ADDRESSES CONVENTION

MAKES STRONG APPEAL TO CHRISTIAN CONSCIENCE IN BEHALF OF PROHIBITION AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE

I esteem it not only a privilege but an honor to be invited to participate in the program on this occasion, when for the first time the Woman's Christian Temperance Union holds a National Convention in a Capital that is dry. (Applause.)

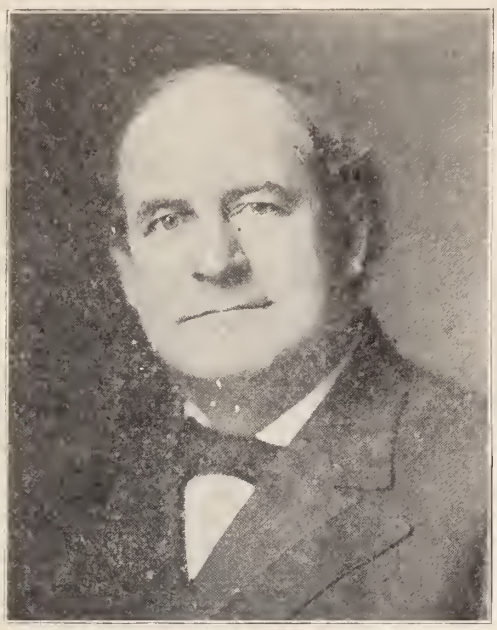
I am interested in this organization personally—by marriage! (Laughter) and by heredity! (Laughter.) My mother was a member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union when I was a boy, and my wife was connected with it when she was a girl, and it was because a Christian father and mother taught a little boy in southern Illinois to believe in total abstinence, and because another Christian father and mother taught a little girl in central Illinois to believe in total abstinence, that when the boy and girl were grown and married, and sojourned for a little while at the National Capital, (Prolonged applause), they, as a result of the teaching received in their youth, and especially, I think, because of the work of this mighty temperance organization, united in banishing intoxicating liquor from the table when diplomats were officially entertained in Washington. (Applause.)

I do not know how much of the firmness of my convictions on this question is due to the influence that this great society had upon my mother at a time when my opinions were being moulded, and the fundamental principles of my character were being laid, but I do know that no one goes beyond me in respect for this organization, or in the estimate that I place upon the work that it has done. And I am not speaking words of flattery when I say to you that I believe that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the greatest organization among women that the world has yet known! (Applause.) When you remember the forty-four years of its life, when you recall the number of thousands who have received inspiration from it, when you bring to mind the wide field that it has covered, and the persistent effort that it has made in behalf of great reforms, whose righteousness has been demonstrated by their continuous growth, until now they are within sight of triumph and victory,—when you remember all these things, I believe you will agree with me that human history has so far given us no other organization among women that has reached the high point of usefulness that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has done. (Applause.)

Therefore, I repeat that I feel honored to be invited to address this organization at this time, and I desire to spend the time that it is proper for me to occupy, in giving to these good women a few words of encouragement. If any women do not need encouragement, I think it is the women who belong to this organization (Applause), for they have demonstrated that they find sufficient encouragement in their own conviction of right, and duty, to dispense with encouragement from the outside; and it is fortunate that they had this inward source of encouragement, because for many years there was no other source from which to draw it. (Laughter and applause.)

They were the pioneers in two great reforms, and for a great many years they labored without any great evidence of progress made, and without any large assurance of an early victory for the causes in which they were enlisted.

Before speaking of the temperance side of their work, I would like to say a word about another line along which they have been toiling; I think that when they united woman suffrage with prohibition they showed a knowledge of woman and a knowledge of the nation's need. (Applause.) Woman suffrage is just as sure to come in every state and in this nation as tomorrow's sun is sure to rise. (Applause.) It had been growing even before it received a stimulus from this war, and it is interesting to note that the very arguments that have in the past been most universally used against woman suffrage are now turned to its advantage. The one argument relied upon to defeat woman suffrage in the past has been that a woman could not take a man's place in war; that is, if a woman could not fight she should not vote; and that has been put forward as the unanswerable argument when all other arguments had been overthrown. I remember that when I was a boy, we had a stanza in our grammar that has often come to my mind,—"God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform. He plants His footsteps on the sea and rides upon the storm." And it's one of the mysterious workings of Providence that war, that heretofore stood in woman's way when she appealed for the right to vote, has now become woman's aid, and is helping her to secure the ballot, not only here, but throughout the world. (Applause.)



Hon. William Jennings Bryan

Just before this war came on, the Parliament of Great Britain refused to listen to woman's appeal, but a few weeks ago, by an almost unanimous vote, Parliament declared the purpose of Great Britain to extend suffrage to women, when the war was over, and since that time, only a few days ago, by a unanimous vote, municipal suffrage was extended by the act of the House of Commons.

And we find that this leaven is spreading in France, and we discover that in Russia it has been taken for granted ever since the exile of the Czar that suffrage there would include suffrage for women on equal terms with men.

And in our own country we have seen an adverse majority of something like 200,000 in the state of New York turned into a majority of nearly 100,000, and the Empire State now takes the lead! (Prolonged applause.)

It is not necessary now to enter into any argument because the presumption today is on the side of woman suffrage. She has had to combat that presumption in the past, and a presumption is a very important thing in the life of a reform. To illustrate the value of a presumption, let me remind you that young men are not permitted to vote until they are twenty-one because of the presumption that exists before this time against their intelligence. The law that denies to them the right to vote until they are twenty-one rests on the presumption that until they reach the age named they haven't sense enough to vote intelligently, and this presumption is so strong that they are not even allowed to make a valid deed to their property. Someone has called attention to the fact that a young man is allowed to marry before he is allowed to make a deed to his property, but only as a basis for the suggestion that the government allows a man to throw himself away before it permits him to throw his property away! (Laughter and applause.) I say until a man is twenty-one the presumption is against him, but the day he is twenty-one the presumption crosses over to his side. Before that day, no matter how smart he thinks he is, nor how smart he actually is, the presumption is against him; but after he is twenty-one, no matter what an ignoramus he is, he is presumed to be intelligent enough to vote, and you cannot prevent it or overcome the presumption.

In the beginning the presumption is against every proposed reform. The conservatism of the nation is such, aye, the conservatism of the human mind, that a man who produces something new is presumed to be wrong on the theory that never having been it ought never to be! (Laughter.) Everyone with a new idea has to combat that presumption, and has to appeal against it, and the burden of proof is on him. But there comes a time in every reform that succeeds when the presumption passes over to the side of the advocates of the reform, and after that the presumption is on the side of the reform and the burden of proof is on the one who opposes the reform.

Last year every party in the United States declared in its platform that the time had come for the extension of suffrage to woman on equal terms with man; and when every political organization in the United States recognizes the righteousness of a reform the man who opposes it has brought upon himself the burden of proof to show why he differs from the judgment of all the nation expressed through the leaders of all the parties.

And, if you will pardon me, I will take just time enough to show what a difficult task the man has who does oppose woman suffrage. Let me state five undisputed facts upon each of which there rests a presumption in favor of woman's capacity for suffrage.

The first is that man trusts woman when he marries her. From the time of his marriage she, more than anyone else, will determine his happiness and his success. If a man has enough confidence in woman to put himself in her hands, it raises a presumption that he could afford to put the ballot in her hands, unless he thinks the ballot is harder for a woman to manage than a man! (Laughter.)

In the second place, man trusts woman when he makes woman his partner in the finances of the family, and the more completely she is his partner the better, as a rule, are the finances of the family managed. I know the papers have their cheap wit about the amount of money that women spend on Easter hats, but we might just as well be honest and admit that if men spent no more money foolishly than the women do, there would be more money in the savings banks. (Applause.) If a man can afford to trust his wife as his partner in the finances of the family, it raises a presumption that he could afford to trust her as his partner at the polls.

The third fact is that the father has such confidence in the mother that he entrusts her with the care of the body, the mind and the soul of the child. And if a woman is fit to be trusted with the care of the child, in the development of its body, in the training of its mind, and in its spiritual development, it raises a presumption that she might also be entrusted with the ballot.

The fourth fact is not less convincing. A large majority of the men who vote never go beyond the eighth grade of the common school, and therefore all they have learned from books about the continuance of their own government they learn from the women who teach in the public schools. (Laughter.) Now, if a woman knows enough to teach man all he ever knows (Laughter), then woman ought to know enough to use the ballot.

The fifth fact is that nowhere where woman suffrage has ever been tried has it proved a failure. No state or nation that experimented with it ever went back to manhood monopoly of the ballot. My friends, it is not true of everything we try in politics that it is established the first time we try it, and we know that experience under a policy is the final test of a policy in government; but wherever woman suffrage has been tried, it has succeeded; wherever it is an issue in a new state, women who call themselves "anti-suffragists" go out and appeal to men not to put this burden upon woman. Why, if they think that it is a burden, and that women do not want to bear it, don't they go into the states where women vote, and where by their own vote they can relieve themselves of the ballot! (Laughter.) Why do not they go there and organize the women for themselves? But an anti-suffragist never goes into a state where women can vote. She never trusts the question to woman, but just appeals to man not to put this burden upon woman. Anyone who knows women as well as I do (Laughter) knows that if you put a burden on a woman and she does not want to bear it, she will get rid of it. (Laughter.) It rests on the good women of the states where women vote to say that they would have borne this burden all these years, and borne it in silence, too! Think of a woman bearing a burden in silence! (Laughter.) The fact that nowhere where it has been tried has there ever been a movement to go back to a manhood monopoly of the ballot is proof conclusive that it has been a success. More than that, you will find in every state where it is presented as a new issue that those men who profit by vice and make money out of sin are opposed to woman suffrage. How can you explain that the wicked are united in this opposition to woman suffrage? There is only one explanation, and that is that they know instinctively that woman's conscience is against their business. If the wicked oppose woman suffrage that wickedness may thrive, why don't the righteous unite to invoke woman's conscience in the day of their righteous cause that the cause may triumph? (Applause.)

But, my friends, there's an argument that I regard of more weight than any I have given you, and with that I shall turn from this question. It's the "mother argument." It's the right of a mother to a voice in the environment that shall surround her child. I love my three children, I think as well as a father can, but I am not in the same class with my wife when it comes to the love of a child; and I do not put any father in the same class with the mother in the love of a child. If you would know why it is that a mother's love for a child is the sweetest, most tender, and most lasting thing in the world, you will find the explanation in the Bible where it says, "Where your treasures are, there will your heart be also." The child is the treasure of the mother; she invests her life in the child. Two thousand years ago, when the mother of the Gracchi was asked, "Where are your jewels?" she pointed to her sons and said, "These are my jewels." The mother's life trembles in the balance when the child is born, and for years that child is the object of her constant care. She expends upon it her nervous force and energy; she endows it with the wealth of her love, and she dreams of what that child is to be and do; and, oh, if a mother's dreams only came true, what a different place this world would be! And the most pathetic struggle that this world knows is not the struggle between armed men upon the battlefield; it is the struggle of a mother to save a child when wicked men lay snares for it and set traps for it; and as long as you give the ballot to the men who conspire to rob a home of a child, it is not fair, and no one dares to say it is fair, to tie a mother's hands while she struggles to protect her home and save her child. (Applause.)

If there's such a thing as justice in this world, the mother has a just claim to a voice in the shaping of the environment that may determine whether her child will realize her hopes or bring her gray hairs in sorrow to the grave. And because I believe that God has planted in every human heart a sense of justice, and that this mother argument appeals irresistibly to this universal sense of justice, I believe that more than any other argument it will batter down all opposition, and in the end open woman's pathway to the polls.

How shall we secure woman suffrage? Well, my friends, I have long since adopted the policy of securing anything in the way of reform and then commencing to fight for something better, as soon as that is secured. (Applause.) And, therefore, I am in favor of the adoption in every state of the Union of the amendment to the Federal Constitution conferring suffrage on woman to the same extent that it is conferred on man. And I am in favor of statutes in every state going as far as statutes can until the amendment can be secured, and then I am in favor of securing just as soon as we can an amendment to the Federal Constitution (Applause) conferring suffrage on women everywhere. In other words, believing that woman suffrage is right, believing that it is the thing for our country, believing that the world needs woman's ballot more than woman needs the vote, I am in favor of suffrage at all times and everywhere, and secured by every possible means (Applause); and I hold the victory in New York (Applause) is a good omen, and I hope that it will have an influence sufficient to secure from the Congress soon to assemble an amendment to the Federal Constitution giving woman the ballot. (Applause.)

Now, my friends, so much for woman suffrage. The women understood when they started out to get prohibition that by such a proportion of women as they could bring into the arena would they secure the laws they wanted, and they would keep them after they secured them. And now for just a little while I want to speak to you of the fundamental basis upon which this great organization has been doing its work, and I beg to suggest to these good women that their work will not be done when we secure an amendment to the Federal Constitution and make our nation saloonless. (Applause.) Their work will still continue, for all our fight rests upon the horribleness of alcohol as a beverage, and we will not be sure of keeping the ground we gain except as we cultivate among people a knowledge of the effects of alcohol upon the system, and excite in them not only a desire to fight it themselves, but a willingness to become teachers to others.

In Statuary Hall at Washington there is the statue of a great woman, who, for many years, was the head of this organization. What is the value of her life? It was under the leadership of Frances Willard (Applause) that we began teaching in the schools the effect of alcohol upon the system, and I believe it will be of sufficient importance to keep this organization growing and at work even when it has celebrated the advent of prohibition as a national policy in the United States. (Applause.) And so, for just a moment, I want to speak on that foundation principle upon which all of our effort is based. It is that alcohol is a poison, that when it is taken into the body it weakens the physical man, weakens the mental man, and menaces the moral man. That proposition is either true or it is false. If it is false, then no temperance speech ought ever to have been made; no Woman's Christian Temperance Union ought ever to have been organized, and no law ought ever to have been passed regulating or restraining the manufacture, sale or use of intoxicating liquor. All that has been done, all that is to be done, all that shall be done hereafter, rests upon the single proposition that alcohol is a poison to man's body.

I will now lay down three propositions,—I make no reservations, I put no limitations upon them. They appeal to all ages, and to all people.

The first is that God never made a normal human brain that needed to be stimulated to action by alcohol. The second is that among the countless millions of men God never created one who was strong enough to begin the use of intoxicating liquor with certainty that he would not become its victim. And, third, that there is no time in a human life after which man is immune from danger.

If these three propositions are true,—that no normal brain needs alcohol, that no man is strong enough to be sure that he will not become its victim, and that there is no hereafter in which it is safe to begin, there can be no excuse for the use of alcohol.

But this organization has the letter "C" in its name. It's the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and its first appeal is to the Christians of the country. And, my friends, I believe that just now we ought to make an appeal to the Christian conscience of the nation in order to persuade Christians to give up the social glass rather than have their influence on the side of intoxicating liquor. (Applause.)

THERE IS NO TIME IN A HUMAN LIFE AFTER WHICH MAN IS IMMUNE FROM DANGER FROM THE USE OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

Let me give you three arguments, which I believe to be unanswerable from the Christian standpoint:

The first is that a Christian having given himself to God and to Christ in service, has no moral right to take into his body that which will impair the value of the service he has to render, and he has no moral right to contract a habit which may not only destroy his capacity for service, but his disposition to serve. Every man who has fallen into a drunkard's grave, disgraced, has passed through that period when he hoped that he could break away when he wanted to and let it alone when he wanted to, but he has overestimated his strength, and fallen a victim to the appetite. No Christian man can afford to take the risk that every man takes who begins the use of alcoholic beverages.

The second is that the Christian has no money that he can spare for intoxicating liquor. There are so many noble causes that appeal to a Christian heart that I know not how a Christian can justify before his own conscience the wasting of any money on intoxicating liquor. Those in charge of home missionary work will show us that there are sections in the country where there are neither churches nor Sunday schools for lack of funds. They will show us those engaged in foreign missionary work—areas of the earth's surface with millions of inhabitants to whom the light of the Gospel has not yet been carried for lack of funds. Little Christian colleges are starving to death for lack of money, colleges, which if properly equipped and supplied, would be entwining spiritual development with the training of the mind. With altruistic developments, church enterprises, so many of these things sorely in need of funds, how can a Christian get down on his knees in the morning and pray to his Heavenly Father, "Thy kingdom come," and then rise up and spend for alcohol money that he could spare to hasten the coming of God's kingdom on earth! (Applause.)

And how can a Christian put his influence on the side of a habit that brings tens of thousands to the grave every year? All religion is propagated by example, and the Master himself says that we should so live that others, seeing our good work, may be constrained to "glorify the Father." Christians, we will have enough to answer for when we stand before the judgment bar of God without having a ruined soul rise to testify that our example led him to ruin. The great Apostle said, if eating meat would make his brother to offend, he would eat no meat. It was not because he did not like meat; it was because he loved his brother better than he loved meat. And what Christian man can stand before his fellow Christians and admit that his fondness for intoxicating liquor is greater than his love of his brothers, whom he might save by setting them a good example?

These are three arguments which I believe can not be answered from a Christian standpoint; and, my friends, our work must go on, commencing with the young, and it must be done among all classes, men and women both, that we may bring a nation of total abstainers up behind a law that makes the saloon an outlaw under the American flag. (Applause.)

But this organization long ago decided that this nation could not afford simply to appeal to people to avoid the use of liquor, and at the same time license men to put the temptation before them. There is a test of sanity that I think the founders of this association must have heard about. It is this: If you have doubts or questions about a man's sanity, put him in a tank of water, give him a bucket and tell him to dip the water out of the tank, and then turn on a faucet, and let the water in while he dips it out. If he goes on dipping without stopping the water from running in, you may consider that he is insane; but if he is sane, he first turns off the faucet, and then does his dipping. (Applause.) And so the founders of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union decided that they must stop the running in, and by law they have sought to take the saloon away from each community, and they have acted wisely, I think, in supporting everything restricting the saloon within reach. They have tried to shorten its hours for doing business; they have tried to put on laws restricting and restraining, but looking forward all the time to the complete and total prohibition of the saloon anywhere and everywhere. They have commenced with the small unit; they have organized their forces and fought in the cities and the towns; they have fought in the counties where they had county option; they have fought in the states where they could get state prohibition, looking always to the time when they could secure national prohibition. They were wiser than I. I have lived until within the last few years under a delusion. I thought that people would vote for prohibition in their towns before they would in their counties, that they would vote for it in their counties before they would in their states, that they would vote for it in their states before they would in the nation; and I therefore thought we would have an overwhelming majority in favor of prohibition in our towns and local communities before we had a chance of carrying it in the nation. I discovered that I was mistaken in the basis upon which I calculated. I found that the argument that had most influence with the voter was an assurance that the law could be enforced, and that the larger the unit the more easily could the law be enforced. (Applause.)

And, therefore, I found that men who would not favor prohibition in one town when an adjoining town had saloons, or would not favor it in one county when an adjoining county sold liquor, or would not even favor it in one state when an adjoining state had it, would favor it in the nation, for then it would be wiped out everywhere. (Applause.) And it was the discovery that I was building my argument upon a false foundation that convinced me that the day of national prohibition was near at hand. (Applause.) And I have seen the logic that I had disregarded. I have seen it indicated in elections. In my home city, for instance, we had something like twenty-five saloons, and the last time they voted on the subject, the wets had a majority of something like 1,000, but when they had a chance on state-wide prohibition, the city of Lincoln went dry by 3,000 majority. (Applause.) I have found elsewhere that communities that would vote wet when the election was left merely to the community, would vote dry when they joined with other communities to make the state dry. And I am satisfied that there are a great many people, aye, thousands, tens of thousands, if not millions, who have opposed state-wide prohibition who will vote for nation-wide prohibition.

Then let me remind you of an advantage we have in the ratification of a Federal amendment. Most of our states require more than a majority of the legislature to submit a constitutional amendment. In my state, our constitution requires three-fifths of both houses. Therefore, as long as the liquor interests could control no more than two-fifths of either house, they could prevent the submission of a prohibition amendment, and it was not until they secured the initiative and referendum that we were able to submit the question, and when it was submitted, Nebraska, as you know, went dry by 29,000 majority! (Applause.)

Let me call your attention to the experience of Texas. Last summer Texas, in its Democratic primary, where more than 300,000 Democrats voted, declared in favor of submission, and when the legislature met it lacked about two only of having two-thirds of both houses in favor of submission, but because their constitution said that they must have two-thirds of both houses, they were not able to submit a prohibition amendment, and the constitution of Texas ties the hands of the people so that a minority in favor of the saloon can prevent a majority of the people from having their will in this matter; but if we had a Federal amendment submitted, a majority of the legislature could ratify such an amendment, and while Texas could not go dry as a state, great influence could be exerted in favor of prohibition in the nation. (Applause).

You will find that the wet vote is largely centered in the cities, and that the state legislature is therefore likely to be dry even when the total vote of the state is wet. Take the state of Ohio. We came within less than 2,000 of carrying the amendment in Ohio, that is, according to the returns! (Laughter.) I think the chances are we carried Ohio! (Applause.) Over in the city of Cincinnati I am not sure that they intended fraud; I think they are so accustomed to fraud that they can't tell an honest vote from a dishonest vote! (Laughter and applause.) But they had to find two bunches of votes after the polls closed in order to save that state from going dry. But I was informed the other day that while they secured, because of a big wet vote in two or three cities, a bare majority against prohibition, we carried sixteen Congressional districts out of twenty-two, and that means we would have the legislature of Ohio voting upon

Prohibition a Boon to Utah Mine Operators

According to James H. Wolfe, assistant state's attorney general of Utah, who is in charge of the prohibition bureau of the state, mine operators are expressing satisfaction over results of the bone dry law.

Formerly, the mine operators tell Mr. Wolfe, there was always a scarcity of men immediately after pay day, because the miners remained away from their work anywhere from two days to a week or ten days. Some even "jumped their jobs," he says, after a "spree," and employers were constantly put to the necessity of hunting other men to take their places. This condition, Mr. Wolfe says, had a tendency to reduce production from the mines, because it was always difficult to get men to take the places of the absentees on short notice. While the fact was known and guarded against as well as possible, there nevertheless was constant trouble from this source.

Since the prohibition law has got to working in good form men stay at their mine work with splendid regularity, Mr. Wolfe asserts, and the mine output is therefore greatly increased without the old inconvenience. This the assistant attorney general regards as a great benefit now that maximum metal production has become a war necessity.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS
Order copies for your local union, public, college and Sunday school libraries. Every white ribboner will need one for reference. Send to the National W. C. T. U. Publishing House, Evanston, Ill. Price, 5 cents per copy.

RECOMMENDATIONS BY NATIONAL PRESIDENT IN HER ANNUAL ADDRESS

That we strenuously push the passage of the Sheppard-Gronna-Webb-Smith bill for a referendum to the states on National Constitutional Prohibition. The joint resolution has passed the Senate; effort must be concentrated on the House and on the elimination of the six-year clause. That all local unions closely follow the plans adopted by the convention for this mighty campaign and also press through letters and telegrams to members of Congress such additional measures as the legislative superintendent at Washington and the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. may endorse.

That members of the Young People's Branch and the Loyal Temperance Legion be given a definite part in our patriotic service and in our legislative program nationally, as well as in state and local campaigns. Let us constantly seek to develop their alertness and enthusiasm.

That the W. C. T. U., especially in prohibition localities, take a more aggressive part in the enforcement of law by arousing public sentiment, by giving to pulpit and press the provisions of the prohibitory law and by furnishing evidence of violations; that wherever liquor law violators are on trial, groups of white ribboners wearing the white ribbon, strengthen the backbones of judge and jury by their influential presence in the court room.

That we create prohibition and law enforcement sentiment by holding at populous centers, W. C. T. U. State and Interstate Campaign Conferences.

That we multiply our benefactions for the brave men of the Army and Navy, and continue our co-operative patriotic service plans.

That total abstinence principles be given a new strong impulse. That we everywhere emphasize the value of pledge-signing and of a life of sobriety.

That the W. C. T. U. in prohibition territory in state, county, city or town, inaugurate the custom of an annual celebration in honor of the prohibition law.

That we renew our efforts to secure from Congress a bill for the payment of contributors to the Ellen M. Stone Ransom Fund.

That at this opportune time we seek to show our genuine good will toward all foreign-speaking people; creating toward them a community attitude of friendliness and helpfulness; that we aid Americanization plans far more vigorously. The urgent need of national solidarity and of the extension of the principles of brotherhood among the 8,000,000 foreign-speaking people in the United States cannot be over-stated. Here is a grand field of endeavor for local unions in localities blessed with a prohibitory law. This vitally needed work will answer the frequent query, "What next?"

That we make more intensive and insistent the work and the principles of the W. C. T. U.; that we urge temperance women of the churches and clubs with whom we are now co-operating in emergency service to identify themselves with the W. C. T. U.

That our educational propaganda should be strongest in populous license centers where John Barleycorn is strongest in adherents and in autocracy. That we have a big city campaign in 1918, a campaign of personal work and publicity in advocacy of patriotic total abstinence and prohibition through pulpit, press and platform.

That special effort to get out the woman's vote be made at all elections.

That local unions, in connection with parliamentary drills or Christian citizenship meetings, arrange public forums or parliaments where the duties of citizenship shall be studied and discussed.

That the dictums of famous scientific, military and medical men against the use of beer be given the widest publicity through posters and press.

That local unions give to wage-earners in mills or factories National W. C. T. U. literature, and publicity to prohibition utterances of labor leaders.

That social centers as substitutes for the saloon be introduced in license and prohibition localities.

That we oftener utilize W. C. T. U. window, fair and poster exhibits to make converts among the masses who furnish for such exhibits a moving audience reached by no other advocate or argument.

That residents of dry states aid in securing prohibition in license states by sending to friends in such localities items clipped from local papers testifying to the good results of prohibition in the business life of a community, and urge the importance of asking editors in license localities to publish these unanswerable arguments.

That we aim to secure a W. C. T. U. day or a W. C. T. U. speaker at all Chautauquas and fairs; and whenever practicable plan for street and open air meetings or automobile speaking and literature distributing trips.

That we endeavor to secure in all states an annual Temperance Day in the public schools; urge wider observance of World's Temperance Sunday, and give to public libraries and the libraries of Sunday schools, day schools and colleges, temperance reference books and our up-to-date prohibition map; and endeavor to hold in every public school a scientific temperance instruction essay contest.

That in public schools and on Temperance Day in the Sunday schools we emphasize the injurious effect of the cigaret, and that we post in public schools and public places the anti-tobacco law.

That we promote the circulation of The Union Signal, The Young Crusader, The Temperance Educational Quarterly and the splendid output of our publishing house, including posters, charts, stereopticon slides, exhibits, campaign supplies, literature and books. "If I could put the Campaign Edition of The Union Signal in the home of every doubtful voter in this county I'd guarantee to carry the county for prohibition," was the sensible statement of a business man in a western state during a state-wide campaign.

That in addition to the membership goal which may be agreed upon for 1918 we endeavor to accomplish three things:

A local union in every community in our nation;

Every county in the United States organized for the W. C. T. U.

An honorary member for every regular member in each local union.

That we push W. C. T. U. publicity work by the use of the ready-print and plate service furnished by the National W. C. T. U. Bureau of Publicity.

That we organize for the W. C. T. U. our dependencies, including the Virgin Islands. After fifty years of effort for their purchase, these fifty far-away islands have been added to the United States possessions. On April 3, 1917, the Stars and Stripes were raised as these new possessions passed definitely under the authority of our government.

That we commemorate the Jubilee birthday of the National W. C. T. U. in 1924 by completing the raising of a jubilee thank-offering fund and by reaching a high membership goal; that we designate our jubilee fund "A W. C. T. U. Jubilee Foundation for the Advancement of Total Abstinence and Prohibition."

PASTOR OF HISTORIC WASHINGTON CHURCH EULOGIZES WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

Characterizing women as "the binders together of society, the beautifiers of life, the preservers of morals, and the inspirers of religion," Rev. Harry Dawson Mitchell, pastor of the Metropolitan Methodist church, delivered a convention sermon of great power on the morning of Sunday, December 2. The service was held in the historic church in which President McKinley and President Grant worshipped. It was beautifully decorated with flag draperies and the altar was banked with wheat, corn, and fruits of the field. The National president and other General Officers and the president of the District of Columbia W. C. T. U. were in the pulpit. The body of the church and galleries were filled with W. C. T. U. delegates and visitors. Dr. Mitchell said in part:

The presence of so many good women, who have wrought so heroically and gloriously in the field of the world's endeavor, representing as they do an organization which has been a most potent agency in accomplishing such magnificent results in the outlawing of the liquor traffic, prompted me this morning to speak not specifically on the theme of temperance and prohibition, but on the general subject, "The Influence of Women in the World's Activities."

Such a topic opens the door to the broadest kind of discussion. There was a day when many good people, like Judas, would hurl obstacles in the way of woman, and prevent her if possible from serving the human race in any other capacity except that of motherhood, a time when such a work as Mary wrought for our dear Lord was condemned, and when it was considered an act of presumption on the part of woman to attempt to leave the beaten path in order to make a contribution to the world's great work.

Our Lord in His acceptance of the service, and in His commendation of the work that Mary wrought, blazed the way for woman, so that this great system of religion which we call Christianity has emancipated her and opened to her endeavor the doors of preferment and honest toil everywhere.

The centuries have forced upon the world the conclusion that whenever or wherever God puts His spirit upon a soul, giving it a message or a mission, recognition must be accorded to that one regardless of sex.

We repudiate the statement that the Scriptures teach the divine right of kings. We laugh at the man who, in this day, says he can prove the righteousness of human slavery out of the Scriptures. In this glorious day, when human freedom and democracy are the ideals of every soul who has caught the light of the breaking day of "the Kingdom," we would stamp one as "off balance" who would command that woman keep silent either in the church or state. It is her God-given right to be heard.

If she has a message, Jesus Christ says to all who would hinder her in the giving of it, "Let her alone," and the day of grace in which she now lives says, "Give it."

If she has a song to sing, Jesus Christ says, "Let her alone," and this day says, "Sing it."

If she has a vision of service, Jesus Christ says, "Do not stop her," and this day says, "She has a right to do it. Get at it."

If any door of opportunity opens to her this age would smite the hand that would close it on her.

There is glory enough to go all around. I would not rob any one or any organization of a scintilla of praise in this day of moral achievement, but never suffer the crown to be torn from the brow of Frances Willard, nor allow the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to be eclipsed by the brightness of any later sun that arises across the horizon of moral endeavor.

—Rev. Harry Dawson Mitchell.

So we find woman in every profession; toiling in every craft; battling in the forefront of every reform, taking her place in the world's great work, and in this day, that our industries may not suffer, leaping into the breaches made by the going to the battle front of our noble men to preserve freedom in the earth—3,000,000 girls and women are today working in the munition factories in England.

She is breaking her alabaster boxes, pouring out her loving service in hospital camps and on battlefields. Her fingers are busy weaving, weaving, knitting, knitting that our boys may not feel the cold as they stand like a wall against the enemy. She is away from the comforts of the fireside and the luxuries of society seeking to guard the morals of our boys, or toiling to put heart into many a homesick lad as only a woman can do.

And who will dare stop her? It has seemed to me that my Christ—Mary's Lord—stands in our midst today saying with new emphasis, "Let her alone"—and out she goes to her toil and sacrifice with heaven's benediction upon her.

We welcome this new departure. May our precious women fully realize their mission and may they be watchful of the influence they exert, is our prayer. If woman fails, then the whole fabric of society and civilization disintegrates, for in my humble estimation the future of this world is to be determined by our women.

I do not know of any characterization of woman and her work that surpasses that of Caroline Hazard, when before the students of Wellesley College a few years ago she said, "Women are the binders together of society, the beautifiers of life, and the preservers of morals." I would add, "She is the inspiration of religion."

Is she not the bond that encircles society and prevents its total disintegration? What is the unit of human society? Dispute it as you may, God has builded the whole fabric of human society on the one foundation of the family.

What is the outward expression of the family? Not a mob, nor a club, nor even a house; it is the home.

Who is the soul of a home? Who is the heart, from which goes out the warmth and life which holds the home together? Who? It is rather ludicrous to say it is a man. He may be the provider of a home but never the maker of a home.

Most of you are familiar with that beautiful poem by Will Carleton, "The First Settler's Story." The old man, a wanderer on the earth, tells the story of his brutal treatment of his young wife who, like a true woman, went with him to the far west to build their home amid all the loneliness of the western frontier. It was in an unguarded moment that he spoke the word which drove her out into the night to seek the cows in the storm. She searched and found them, only to fall in death on the cabin floor. But all that night he searched for her and there is no finer expression in the English language than the words Carleton puts on his lips:

"Three times again my cabin home I found
Half hoping she might be there, safe and sound;
But each time 'twas an unavailing care
My house had lost its soul; she was not there."

The bonds that bind together the homes of this world and thus bind together society are the wives and mothers and women. They hold together the units which make society.

And woman is the beautifier of life. The influence of the beautiful upon moral character and spiritual life is a recognized fact. That is the reason God placed us in the midst of the beautiful. And is it not in abundance? There is beauty everywhere. Why? It is all about us to influence us for good. It is hard to imagine what we would be if we were compelled to live in the midst of everything hideously ugly and repulsive. It would undoubtedly be reflected in our characters.

I cannot reason it out why some folks would seek to incorporate into our civilization the customs of the heathen. It is a marked decline and a serious disadvantage to us to place on our writing desks and mantel-pieces the copies of heathen images. Of all the hideous fads, the most hideous is the "billikin." Is there anything beautiful about such an image? Oh, the horror of it all! Ugly, repulsive, depressing rather than exhilarating, for commercial reasons we simple-hearted people buy them and look on them and try to force a laugh. Do you not know that heathenism is only the reflection of its gods and goddesses?

I know the love of the beautiful, or the science of esthetics will never make a bad heart good, but the change of ideals from those which are ugly to those which are beautiful and refined is a long stride toward God.

That is particularly the mission of women. They are the apostles of order and the missionaries of the beautiful.

God has made woman the embodiment of grace. Physical beauty is found in her. You can always tell when she is around because of the touches of beauty and refinement in office and home.

This world suffers a distinct loss and society a stunning blow when woman permits herself to become coarse and vulgar. She is the beautifier of life.

Woman is the preserver of morals. That may seem to be according her an unusual place in the world's work, but it is the truth.

Is it not true that universally there is an inherent regard for the virtue and nobility of true women? Every one is ready to smite the man or woman who dares to challenge the inherent virtue of the female sex. The startling exceptions to the rule only emphasize the truth of my statement.

Above all the restraining influence of law, woman is the mighty bulwark against the inundating tides of immorality. Will you tell me who have been the relentless foes of organized evil? Who but the women of our land?

I read the history of the war against the double standard of morals and I cannot fail to discover that women have been the instigators and furnished the fighters against this monstrous wrong in society.

I read the history of the winning warfare against the organized forces of the liquor traffic, and to whom must the credit be given? The very pioneers in this great crusade were women who, like Joan

GLIMPSES OF W. C. T. U. ACTIVITIES IN MINNESOTA

Special Correspondence

The Twenty-third district W. C. T. U. has established headquarters in St. Paul where small meetings will be held and supplies kept. The regular sessions will take place each month in the beautiful new public library building. At the September meeting the white ribboners were welcomed by Dr. Dawson Johnston, librarian. Prof. Maria Sanford gave a patriotic address in which she paid tribute to the W. C. T. U. for its work along many lines.

The Seventeenth district W. C. T. U. is holding sessions monthly in the art gallery of the new Hennepin Avenue M. E. church. The November meeting stressed the state-wide prohibition campaign. The discussion was led by the state president, Miss Rozette Hendrix, who was followed by Rev. Father Cleary for the Catholic Total Abstinence Society, John A. Shields for the State Prohibition Committee, Professor Mathilda Wilkin for the Independent Order of Good Templars and Rev. S. M. Dick for the Anti-Saloon League. A short praise service was held to celebrate the dryness of our national Capital.

Petitions from all over the state are being sent to the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety to close the saloons during the war in the interest of conserving men, money and food.

The state officers and college Y. P. B. secretary held a charming reception for the university girls at the historic home of Mr. N. H. Winchell. Mrs. Horace Winchell, who accompanied her husband to Russia last March, gave a most interesting talk on the women of Russia, dwelling upon their heroism. She said she saw but one drunken soldier during all the time she was in the country.

Miss Juel Hendrix is the newly appointed state superintendent of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors. On request of Colonel Luce of Camp Cody, Deming, N. M., the Minnesota W. C. T. U. will supply 2,000 comfort kits to the men at the cantonment and to others who will come later. The first one hundred have already been sent. The women are also working on the many-tailed bandages and knitting bed comforts for the hospitals.

Miss Jennie Smith, National W. C. T. U. railroad evangelist, who was in attendance at the Ohio state convention held this year in Springfield, was a guest of the Clark county W. C. T. U. in South Vienna, her birthplace, the union in which town bears her name. Miss Smith held a very successful service on Sunday evening, when she met many of her childhood friends and viewed the old family residence. She also held very delightful meetings at other points, arousing great interest everywhere she spoke.

SURVEY OF WORK OF OUR YOUNG PEOPLE'S BRANCH and LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION BRANCH

REPORTS OF MARY F. W. ANDERSON AND MARY B. ERVIN

Young People's Branch

MARY FRANCES WILLARD ANDERSON, National General Secretary

In addition to the words of inspiration we see printed in this convention hall—"National Constitutional Prohibition —We Shall Win"—let me bring other words of wisdom spoken by our beloved Lillian M. N. Stevens, "Blessed is the state which recognizes as its chief asset its young men and women." May the time speedily come when this truth shall be not only assented to, but made a living, vital part of our W. C. T. U. work.

One of our great statesmen has said, "If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble to dust; but if we work upon immortal souls, if we imbue them with principles, with the fear of God and the love of their fellowmen, we engrave on those tablets something which will brighten all eternity."

During the past year, in the very nature of things, the Young People's Branches have been called upon to weather the stormiest gales. Our young men members have nobly responded to the nation's call to arms and there is scarcely a Branch in the United States that has not contributed a large percentage—and in some cases all its male membership. Because of existing conditions it has been impossible for our state secretaries to report the exact number of young men in our Young People's Branch. While we miss them in the Y. P. B. activities of our local Branches, we are a thousand times grateful that in principle and spirit, they are still our members. God bless them, keep them, spare them and bring them back again to us and to the work.

We have cause for rejoicing in the fact that our National dues-paying membership has increased from 9,548 to 9,873, a net gain of 325. A word of explanation: According to the constitution of the Young People's Branch, only the young women's dues are sent to the National treasury, the dues of the young men being retained in the local treasury. Up to and including last year, the dues of both young men and young women in the Ohio Branches were sent to the National treasurer. In that way 946 young men were included last year. In my report this year only the young women members are included. Deducting the above named number of young men, a net gain of 325 young women has been made.

I wish there were time and space for more than a mention of the splendid work of a number of our state Y. P. B. secretaries, of our three field secretaries, and of Mrs. Danser, our Missionary Fund promoter. They have worked faithfully in behalf of our Young People's Branch.

Twenty-four states have made gains. Kansas heads the list with a gain of 470 young women. New York is still the banner state for Y. P. B. membership.

While the call has been sent forth and we see thousands of our young men in the uniform of the United States Army and Navy, there are still hundreds of thousands of young men between sixteen and twenty-five years of age whom we covet for our Y. P. B. temperance army. They are in your communities, in high schools, in academies, in stores, in offices, in factories, some in your very homes. What are we going to do for them the coming year?

It is a startling statement, but nevertheless a true one, that there is only one Young People's Branch to every twenty W. C. T. U.'s in the United States. If we really believe that "The glory of the present is to make the future free," we must pray more earnestly and work more enthusiastically to win the youth for our Young People's Branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Loyal Temperance Legion Branch

MARY B. ERVIN, National General Secretary

It is with gratitude and pride that during this terrible war year, when interests have been divided and responsibilities enlarged, we are able to report for our Loyal Temperance Legion Branch a magnificent gain along all lines; the "call for patriotic service" has but intensified the needs and value of the best of all patriotic organizations for boys and girls—the Loyal Temperance Legion!

Mary B. Ervin

Patriotism, loyalty, love for God and humanity—these are the fundamental principles of the Loyal Temperance Legion. Our colors—red, white and blue—symbolize a membership constantly heeding the "call to the colors," ever alert against the enemies of Old Glory! Throughout the year our legioners have faithfully demonstrated what invincible soldiers and true American patriots they really are.

The appeal sent out by our National superintendent of the Flower Mission and Relief department, in behalf of the war orphans across the sea, found a wonderful response in the hearts of boys and girls everywhere and the paths of fatherless little ones in France and Belgium have been made a bit smoother by the generous contributions of our legioners all over the nation. Money has been liberally contributed to the French Orphan Fund through local, state and National L. T. L. channels. Personal contributions and gifts from local legions have been received by the National Loyal Temperance Legion—$36.50 of which is today being used in the support of a sad-faced French laddie, Sylvain Poulet, by name.

Our legioners have been doing their best to "make the world more bright" by bringing sunshine into the lives of the boys who have left their homes and loved ones in answer to their country's call. Through the Soldiers and Sailors department they have been lending a helping hand in making comfort bags and other useful articles, besides sending messages of cheer and boxes of "sweets," so welcomed by the soldier boys.

In no way have our legioners revealed their patriotism more than as Young Campaigners for Prohibition. They love so well the star spangled banner that they expect to stay in the fight until every legalized saloon is driven from our land! Throughout the year they have been dealing fatal blows to John Barleycorn, America's greatest destroyer. They have proven themselves invincible soldiers in our great onward march for a saloonless nation and have done valiant service in the various campaign states this year, being among the justly proud victors in the District of Columbia, Indiana, Utah, New Hampshire, New Mexico and Porto Rico!

A high standard of efficiency has characterized the year's work, many local legions having adopted the star legion plan as their goal for the year. More than one hundred legions fulfilled all the requirements set forth and were accordingly awarded an attractive silver star L. T. L. pin. Many other legions found the plan a satisfactory working basis and their activities were stimulated thereby to a marked degree.

Calls for literature have been more numerous this year than usual, signifying an increased interest in L. T. L. work, a growing realization of the local union's responsibility and appreciation of the need of this training among the boys and girls.

Reports show that more than 600 new legions have been organized this year. Eighteen states—Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Maryland (No. 2), Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and West Virginia—merit honorable mention for having reached the goal set for them.

Dues amounting to $1,183.69 paid into the National treasury show the L. T. L. paid membership to be 23,673, a net gain of 2,564. Thirty states made an appre-

AUNT MARY'S CHRISTMAS

MABEL DUFFORD PINKERTON

Aunt Sally Littlejohn, black-eyed, white-haired, petite, sparkling with fun and wisdom—never would one have guessed what shadows lay behind the light in her smiling face. I thought I knew her well—indeed, I did know her well—but never a hint did I have until that Christmas Eve of my story. The older residents of the town knew all about it, but either they supposed that I also knew, or else they had well-nigh forgotten, so well had Aunt Sally covered her own sorrow with a mantle of helpfulness.

In theory, Aunt Sally lived alone. In fact, her house nearly always sheltered some guest—someone who needed the quiet and the cheer of her snowy guest-room, and sunny garden, and vine-hung porches, and glowing fireside. It was to help make cheer for such a guest—and, too, I thought, to ease my own loneliness on that first holiday season after my "own folks" had all moved away from Merryvale—that I was asked to spend the week at Aunt Sally's. The other guest? A quiet little widow whom Aunt Sally had brought home with her from her annual autumn trip to the city. She had gone from Merryvale years before, the bride of a young missionary. Aunt Sally found her "clerking" in a big city store, lonely, tired, discouraged, and brought her home on the plea that she—Aunt Sally—needed someone to keep her company about the house. I think the little widow knew Aunt Sally's motive perfectly; but I have told you she was a missionary's widow—she understood the desire to serve. Besides, as you would know if you lived in Merryvale, one does not resist Aunt Sally for long.

All that afternoon, while we three worked together in Aunt Sally's roomy kitchen, putting the last touches to a number of holiday tasks, it seemed to me that Aunt Sally was not quite her usual self. She seemed less sprightly, and at the same time more restless. In the early evening, the little widow and I were sitting in the guest-room, resting and waiting for the hour when we three were all going to the church to hear the children's Christmas program. The door into the hall stood wide, and we saw Aunt Sally, further down the hall, enter a door which I had never before seen opened.

"Aunt Sally misses Miriam tonight," said the widow, softly.

"Miriam?" I queried, blankly.

"Her daughter—didn't you know?" was the surprised answer. "Aunt Sally's only child, and my dearest girlhood friend. It was on a Christmas Eve that she went away—fifteen years ago tonight."

The little widow sat there, musing, a moment, then went softly and closed the guest-room door. "One does not wish even to seem to spy upon her," she said. "I wonder if she has spent a part of every one of these fifteen Christmas Eves there in Miriam's room."

Then, as if she turned from talking to herself and began to speak to me, she went on with Miriam Littlejohn's story. "She was such a beautiful and charming girl, and she was all Aunt Sally had. Her mother's heart nearly broke when Miriam fell in love with Jack West. Aunt Sally was an ardent white ribboner then, as now, and Jack drank. More than that, there was something about his face that hinted of a vein of cruelty in his nature. But he was handsome and dashing, and a good deal older than Miriam, and he took her impulsive heart by storm. He signed the pledge, and to Miriam's girlish trust that made everything right.

"Aunt Sally begged them to wait a year, until Jack had proved himself, but they wished to marry at once, and felt themselves badly used because of Aunt Sally's insistence upon at least a year's engagement. Or perhaps it would be more nearly true to say that Jack felt badly used; and Miriam had become his echo. I was young with a mind filled with romantic dreams, too, in those days, and I sympathized more or less with the headstrong young things. Some of the people here supposed that I helped them in their scheme, but that was a mistake. They did not confide in me, and I have never ceased being thankful that I had no part in what they did.

"It was on Christmas Eve, as I said, that they went away. They started, as Aunt Sally thought, for the evening service at the church, but took a train south, instead, were married at the next town, and that is the last that anyone in Merryvale ever heard of them.

"Miriam wrote me a letter that night, telling me of her marriage. She bade me tell her mother that she was very happy, and that it would be of no use to try to find them, because they were going far away from the place where they had been 'so happy and so miserable and so misunderstood.' Poor misguided child! I fancy there was much that I might have read between the lines of that letter. Jack had the name of being vindictive toward anyone who he imagined had injured him, and I have always believed that it was his will, rather than Miriam's, that kept her from writing to her mother.

"I gave the letter to Aunt Sally. Of course she tried to find them, but they made good their plan to leave no clue. It is like Aunt Sally that she has been silent about her own sorrow all these years while she went on striving to relieve others' troubles."

We sat there, the little widow and I, each busy with her own thoughts. Mine were chiefly wandering in imagination with the wilful daughter who had doubtless paid dearly long ere this for her folly. Surely, if she had continued to be "very happy," she would have written to her mother. Perhaps she was dead. Perhaps—a thousand things. I could understand, now—how it came about that Aunt Sally was a second mother to every young girl she knew, and why it was that her sympathy was always so ready and so full of understanding.

When she came to join us for the walk to the church, Aunt Sally seemed quite her usual serene and smiling self! and we knew that she had been, as she would have said, "talking it over with the Lord."

The Merryvale Christmas program was like a thousand others in villages all over the land—dear little tots lisped and sang of the Christ-child; older children said and sang the same thing in more grown-up words; gifts for the little folk were distributed; and we turned homeward with hearts attuned to the season's gladness. Yet I marveled at the lighted face of the white-haired woman beside me, who must surely be thinking, down in her heart, of that other Christmas Eve, that other walk home to an empty house. For I know that a mother's heart cannot forget her lost child. The number of the years that have passed matters little.

As we approached Aunt Sally's gate, it seemed to me that I saw figures standing by it, but if any were there they melted out of sight in the falling snow. I told myself that I had become over-wrought by too much thinking of Miriam.

Presently we three lonely women sat around Aunt Sally's fireplace. "There should be a little child in every home at Christmas," Aunt Sally said softly. "If my baby had lived—" began the widow.

Suddenly we sat up and looked at each other, startled. Each of us wondered whether it was really a child's voice we heard. The door-bell rang, and Aunt Sally, her face gone strangely white, went to answer it. Afterward we two recalled that we were not at all surprised at what we saw and heard in the dimly lighted hall.

Two snow-starred figures entered when Aunt Sally opened the door. One moment they stood, silent. Suddenly Aunt Sally's arms went out, and with a cry, "Mother,—O my mother!" the taller figure crept into that refuge. Aunt Sally's hands reached for the child then.

Presently they turned and came to us by the fireside, and Aunt Sally found her voice again enough to say to me, with tears still flowing unchecked down her cheeks, "This is my daughter." There was a confusion then of taking off of wraps, cries of recognition on the part of Miriam and her old-time chum, and the presenting of little Sally to the widow Anna and me, who promptly nominated ourselves her "aunties."

Once, as the light fell upon Aunt Sally's head, Miriam cried out, "Mother, your hair is white! And it was so black and beautiful—I did that to you!"

But Aunt Sally "saved the day" and the self-control of all of us. "They tell me my hair is very becoming as it is, daughter," she said, one of her irresistible little pouting smiles gleaming through her tears.

We two guests would have gone upstairs presently, and left the re-united family to themselves, but Aunt Sally would have none of it. "You and Anna bring in the tea-wagon with what you find on it," she said to me, "and we'll have a little supper just like we used to have, daughter—toast and broiled bacon and apples."

"Oh, yes, I expected you," she went on, to Miriam. "Your room has always been ready, and every Christmas Eve I've looked for you; but tonight I was sure you would come. The Lord told me, I think. But I hardly dared hope for this beautiful Christmas gift." She laid her hand upon the head of little Sally, in her lap.

The pleasant task of making toast and broiling bacon over the coals presently had us all at least partly in command of our emotions; and then Miriam West told us her story. Not at all an uncommon story—the long journey into the southwest, the husband's broken pledge, poverty, the pledge renewed, a fortunate mining venture, better days, a fall in the mine shaft resulting in injury which the drink-weakened body could not resist, long illness that made way with the new-found prosperity and ended leaving Miriam a widow.

"Jack was changed, in his last days," she said. "He begged my forgiveness, and asked me to seek yours, for keeping us apart all these years. When Sallie and I were left alone, I sold everything in the house to bring us here, hoping that I should not find you—gone. The mine will yield us a little income by and by, when it has paid off the mortgage we had to put on it in Jack's illness. Meanwhile I must find some work—"

"Meanwhile, and all the while," interrupted Aunt Sally, "you will stay right here with me. I need you both, and I have enough for us all. My little poultry business is growing fast enough to keep us busy—and you also, Anna, if you care to stay and join in our partnership." I saw a look of relief and gladness overspread the little widow's face, at that.

Aunt Sally had her way. They are all with her yet. Miriam looks younger than she did that Christmas Eve. So does Aunt Sally, and so does Anna. And little Sally has changed from a pale, solemn child to a merry girl with dancing eyes, a youthful edition of her grandmother. Sometimes I tell Aunt Sally that I almost wish misfortune and poverty might be my portion, so that she would take me in and make me one of her happy family.

Pastor of Historic Washington Church Eulogizes W. C. T. U.

of Arc, in the dark days of the history of France, drawing her sword and with the cry of Jesus on her lips stirred the French to battle in order to save their land. Such were Mother Thompson and Frances Willard.

Go read again the history of those early days, when the cause was not so popular as it is today, and learn the truth that against all opposition, and braving ridicule, those women of the Crusade blazed the way for the glorious triumphs of this day.

When I was in Paris I was profoundly touched as I stood before the statue of Strassburg and Metz in Place de la Concord; wreaths always adorn it and pilgrimages to it are frequently made. The French are never allowed to forget the days of the Franco-Prussian war and the loss of Alsace-Lorraine.

I would have a wreath placed perpetually on the brow of the statue of Frances Willard which stands in Statuary Hall in the Capitol Building, now the focal point of the world's thought. I trust our children may never forget to make their pilgrimages to that statue, and have some one tell them the story over and over again of the uncrowned queen, who placed on the altar of her country her brilliant gifts to make and preserve this people sober.

How I wish she could be here in this day. How I wish she could witness the coming triumph within a few days when we confidently expect Congress to complete its work and submit to this nation a referendum on national prohibition. Frances Willard from the heights of glory must share in this great triumph; and I think some bright angel will lead her to the throne the day we write into our Constitution the nation-wide prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and say, "This, O God, is the angel of prohibition, the inspiration of the women of America who put scientific temperance instruction into the hands of the children of the land,—and her name is Saint Frances!"

Women, you hold in your keeping the morals of this nation. No nation is ever better than its women. Hear me, she makes the moral atmosphere of the streets, the city, the nation.

I have rejoiced in the work at your recreation hall. I looked upon the splendid women and the maidens who mingled with the boys in khaki, profoundly impressed that you made the moral standards of those young men and determined their thinking by your conduct. "As one thinketh in his heart, so is he."

What a trust! I sometimes wonder why God has thrust you out into the busy world away from the shelter of the home. Why? I think God is making a last grand effort to save the world, through Jesus Christ, by women. You are there to preserve the morals of the nation. What if you fail?

I tarry a moment to say that woman is the inspiration of religion. I have a friend in the evangelistic work, who says that we are coming back to the original plan,—women the high priestesses.

Who teaches religion to the child? Who but a woman, a mother or some other woman who rears the child. You can trace the inspiration in religious thought almost invariably to a woman.

When William McKinley turned and kissed his mother, the whole story was told.

When Cleveland kissed his mother's Bible, it was all out.

When Frances Willard, dying, said, "I will creep in with mother and rest," the tale was all told. Yes, God committed his only begotten son to a woman.

When the story of Christianity is all written, the largest credit must go to the women, who have taught the children, and in these last days with the spirit of the Master have gone, or sent as messengers, their comrades, to the end of the earth.

If you fail, the nation fails. Keep the ideals high. Keep your living on high moral and religious levels. Serve your God, your fellow-man, and your nation.

a basis of wet or dry. So, my friends, with twenty-seven dry states, with this same remarkable voting in 1918, with Kentucky likely to vote next year and states like Missouri (Applause) dry—outside of the city of St. Louis (Applause), and California dry outside of San Francisco—and the splendid vote against the saloon in a city larger than San Francisco, for Los Angeles is now the great city of California (Applause), I believe, my friends, if we can but get this question submitted, the United States will go dry before 1920! (Applause.)

Some of our temperance friends seem to have been a little worried because the liquor interests, the beer manufacturers, think that they have gained a victory in retaining the manufacture of beer. May I have your attention for just a moment? I believe that the order of the President reducing the alcoholic content in beer to three per cent is a step toward national prohibition. (Applause.) This is my reason: Beer, with three per cent of alcohol in it, is not as harmful as beer with a higher per cent. It's the alcohol that makes the liquor injurious, and therefore those who are using a three per cent beer will be using a beverage not quite so harmful as beer with a higher per cent of alcohol.

Second, we are in a great war, a war that's taxed our resources and strained our people. We are needing food for the table; we are appealing to people to have their wheatless days, and the order of the President saves for the table thirty per cent of the grain that has been converted heretofore into alcoholic liquors; so that the important advantage is a beer not so harmful and a less quantity of foodstuffs converted into beer.

But that, my friends, is the least part of the argument. If you will read the reason given for not suspending entirely the manufacture of beer you will find it is simply the fear that if people are denied the beer they will turn to the use of stronger drinks, of which there is a supply for two or three years on hand. Now the President has the right to commandeer the alcohol in whisky when it's needed, but at present the evidence does not seem to show a necessity for the commandeering of all of it. But remember that the argument that the President uses to sustain him in his action has no bearing on Congressional action at all. The Congress is free to act; it is not bound by any necessities; and when Congress gets ready to close the breweries of the nation under the same law by which it closes the distilleries it can protect the country from the fear that was the basis of the President's action in refusing to suspend entirely the manufacture of beer. (Applause.)

But, my friends, I have another point to present to you. I believe that when the President based his action on that one reason—fear that the people would turn to the consumption of the store of whisky on hand—I believe that when he did it on that one argument and repudiated every other argument, and thus repudiated every argument upon which the liquor interests rely for the defense of the saloon, that he struck a blow at the liquor interests from which they cannot recover. (Applause.) There isn't an argument that has ever been made in behalf of the liquor business, brewers, distillers, or saloons, that is not by implication repudiated when the President gives just one reason, and one only, for the fact that he does not suspend entirely the manufacture of beer. Congress, therefore, is free to act, and I hope that Congress will exercise its freedom to act. (Applause.) I hope that when Congress meets it will lose no time in suspending, during the war at least, as in the case of whisky, the conversion of foodstuffs into any kind of alcoholic beverages. (Applause.)

My friends, as long as this nation finds it necessary to be careful in the selection of its food, as long as the men upon the fighting line need the stronger foods and grains to the extent that a patriotic people feel justified in making the sacrifice, just as soon as that is necessary, not one single bushel of foodstuffs should be permitted to be converted into alcoholic liquor. (Prolonged applause.)

Still less does the President's argument interfere with the submission of a Federal amendment. If we submit a Federal amendment, it will take at least two or three years to secure its adoption and ratification by thirty-six states of the Union, and this store of whisky supposed to be sufficient for two or three years only, will, in the course of nature, be exhausted before that amendment could be ratified, and therefore no one could use that reason for being opposed to the submission of a Federal amendment.

But, my friends, we have an argument which I believe just now will prove an unanswerable one in support of our Federal amendment. Personally, I have seen legislation secured by trade and exchange until I am in a trading mood (Laughter), and I am willing to trade anything on the liquor question and everything for the submission of a Federal amendment upon which the states can act. (Applause.) I believe if we can ever get that amendment before the nation the states will ratify it, and then our fight is ended so far as national legislation is concerned.

And now we have an argument that we have never had. The ideal of democracy is being emphasized throughout the world as never before, and that word "democracy" can be used by us in our fight. What does "democracy" mean? It is the rule of the people. What is the difference between autocracy and democracy? With autocracy an emperor decides: with democracy it is the will of the people that's expressed in law. We have now called more than a million men to offer their lives to extend democracy across the seas. We have loaned the government more than five billions of dollars to carry on this war to extend democracy. Now, my friends, if democracy is a thing so sacred that we can give away our blood and our money to teach democracy to people in foreign lands, what representative of brewer, or distiller, or saloon will dare to deny the principle of democracy and forbid the people to vote upon this question in their states? It seems to me that the enthusiasm that's being aroused throughout the world for democracy must engulf and overwhelm thousands who would forbid the American people to decide the prohibition question.

thought of the convention Thursday afternoon, when it had the pleasure of listening to an inspiring address by Mrs. Gordon Wright, president of the Dominion of Canada W. C. T. U. Ex-Governor Frank Hanly "dropped in" during the afternoon and gave a spirited speech.

That champion disturber of consciences, Mary Harris Armor, gave the address Thursday evening on "The Storm Cloud's Silver Lining," a prophetic utterance of indescribable power and eloquence.

Every hour of Friday was full and running over with speeches from distinguished visitors, Congressmen brought in by the state W. C. T. U. leaders, representatives of our World's W. C. T. U. work and noted residents of the District. That the District is now dry territory has been a cause for rejoicing in every meeting.

The enthusiasm of the convention, rising higher every hour, reached its climax Friday evening, Recognition Night, when a processional of the states that had made large membership gains furnished a unique program. As the more than 900 delegates joined hands in the closing service on the last night they realized with unspeakable gratitude that they had had the privilege of participating in the largest, most enthusiastic and most epoch-making convention in the history of the organization.

ciable gain along this line. The following ten states attained the goal set for them: Alaska, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, New York, Oklahoma and Pennsylvania, and to the secretary of each of these states is awarded an L. T. L. membership-gain pin.

The department prizes are awarded as follows: Medal Contest prize to Arkansas; Flower Mission prize to California (North); Comfort Bag prize to Maine; the prize for the observance of the most Red Letter Days to Iowa. The Branch contributed to the Anna A. Gordon Missionary Fund $226.98, an increase of $11.99 over last year.

Our earnest desire is that the record of the year just closed may prove a mighty impetus to enlarged activities during the coming year in behalf of our nation's greatest asset—its boys and girls—and that our legioners and leaders may remain steadily on the firing line. "All at it and always at it" is sure to mean destruction to the enemy and triumph for the forces of righteousness in our land. The determination of the foe must be met with greater determination and the allied forces must be offset with new recruits, well-trained and well-armed.

Every new legion organized, every new member won, every brave endeavor to enlarge our work and to inspire the workers are but added blows against our arch enemy, the liquor traffic!

Let the boys and girls in America today who want to show their colors, enlist in our splendid Loyal Temperance Legion Army and help hasten the "children's happy day" when peace and sobriety shall reign supreme and our beautiful Stars and Stripes shall wave over a nation and a world redeemed from strong drink!

Hon. F. H. Gillett Republican Leader in House

There will be some important changes in Congress at this session. Hon. F. H. Gillett of Massachusetts will become the Republican leader in the House, taking the place of James R. Mann, who on account of illness will not at present be able to assume the responsibilities attached to this position. Mr. Gillett is a staunch friend of all reforms. He is not only a temperance advocate, but has the distinction of having introduced more reform measures in Congress than any other member. Hon. John J. Fitzgerald of Brooklyn, N. Y., for several years chairman of the Appropriations Committee, announces that his Congressional career, after nineteen years, will cease December 31.

Is This the Explanation?

An Ohio paper ventures this explanation of how it happened that the wet vote in Cincinnati was large enough to slightly overbalance the dry vote in other sections of the state:

A "wet" judge was unfolding and reading the ballots to another officer who was keeping tally. "Wet" he would say as he found a ballot so marked and lay it down. "Wet," and another went on top of the first. "Wet—wet—wet," and the pile grew.

"Dry," he exclaimed, and laid that down in another place. Then, after a succession of "wets," he found another not to his liking.

"Dry—why that fellow voted twice. We'll just throw both out."

PATRIOTIC POINTS IN PROGRAM OF NORTHERN CALIFORNIA CONVENTION; LUTHER BURBANK A VISITOR

DORCAS J. SPENCER

To use liquor is to the nervous system like placing sand in a watch; it wears it out rapidly, making it a worthless, useless thing.—LUTHER BURBANK.

The thirty-eighth annual convention of the Northern California W. C. T. U. was held in fair Santa Rosa, a city that has triumphed over the havoc wrought by the earthquake of 1906 and now sits serenely among its fruitful orchards, the center of superb Sonoma county. The program was full of work and the church full of people at all sessions. Every officer was in her place, and there was a fine representation of delegates from far and near, the sisterhood of travel enabling women living in the most distant parts of the state to be present.

Northern California White Ribboners in Demonstration of Prohibition States

Official reports showed a year of splendid service, sanctified by abundant sacrifice, an item not recorded.

The address of the president, Mrs. Sara J. Dorr, dealt largely with legislation, giving an outline of fourteen bills in which the W. C. T. U. was interested, which were passed by the last legislature, though the distinctly reform measures dealing with the great moral issues dearest to the heart of the white ribbon organization failed to become laws.

The president's recommendations, above all else, pointed to the election of the right kind of men to the legislature. Her entire address was an appeal to the highest patriotism, and the utilization of our thoroughly organized system in all its branches to meet the present needs of the nation. (By the way, what a different affair is a convention of voting women from that of other days. God speed suffrage for women.)

The state officers were re-elected. Ten newly elected county presidents came into the official board. Few changes occurred in the list of superintendents, all but four of these specialists retaining their several posts.

In local, county and state unions there is a notable increase of active young women. The "good gray heads" of veterans richly adorn our councils, while the veterans hail with unspeakable joy the oncoming youth.

The necrology of the year gives an unusually long list of promoted comrades, among them five ex-presidents of counties, and many others whose records are as full and complete.

The new certificates of junior membership plainly met a long felt want. Fifty were taken as a beginning.

The sum of $1,600 was pledged by delegates as gifts for state work.

Amid all the busy crowded hours of the week delightfully pleasant incidents often occurred. Not least of these was the introduction of Luther Burbank, scientist, philosopher, and friend, the wizard who at will brings to perfection wonderful flowers and fruits. He paid a beautiful tribute to Frances E. Willard and her work, saying, "She still lives in all our lives."

A fine evening feature was the presentation of all the dry states, the District of Columbia and Porto Rico, each represented by a woman in white, bearing a pennant. Led by Mrs. Anna Beal, they marched around the church, grouped themselves on the platform, gave the salute to the flag, and then sang with the audience the Star Spangled Banner.

Attention to business relaxes with the last evening and the climax of enthusiasm forces expression. The salute to the flag must be repeated, then the march of the counties, always a fine spectacle. Each president followed by her delegation, carrying sample products of the county, took the platform and in the space of one minute fired off a witty speech telling the vast superiority of her county over all others, its dry vote in 1916 and its prediction for 1918.

This convention had no backward look; it was intensely patriotic, as was the organization when it adopted its first slogan, "For God and Home and Native Land." Plainly it felt the thrill of the coming Congressional conflict for National Constitutional Prohibition.

What 15c Will Bring You from the Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 25th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, we are glad to invest in new friends. THE PATHFINDER, Box 60, Washington, D. C.

"NEVADA DRY IN 1918," SLOGAN OF W. C. T. U CONVENTION

Special Correspondence

The slogan of the thirty-fourth annual convention of the Nevada W. C. T. U., held in the Congregational church at Reno, was "Nevada Dry in 1918." The chief speaker was Mrs. Emma Graves Dietrick, National organizer.

Local pastors and the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League delivered inspiring addresses. Resolutions endorsing the patriotic service plans of the National W. C. T. U. and pledging support to the food conservation program were adopted.

Reports showed a gratifying increase of activity in all departments, that of Flower Mission and Relief having to its credit the adoption of a French orphan.

The officers were re-elected, with the exception of the recording secretary, who could not serve another year.

Victory in House of Representatives for National Constitutional Prohibition

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 17 (Special)---The House of Representatives, by a vote of 282 to 128, a majority of eight votes in excess of the necessary two-thirds, adopted a resolution submitting to the states an amendment providing for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the United States one year after the ratification of the amendment by the required thirty-six state legislatures, and also providing that the amendment shall be inoperative unless ratified within seven years from date of submission.

The measure now goes for concurrence to the senate, which has passed a similar resolution providing, however, for a six-year instead of a seven-year limitation. The allied temperance forces are already in a campaign for ratification by the state legislatures.

Later News

Washington, D. C., December 18 (Special)---By a vote of forty-seven to eight, the Senate this afternoon adopted the resolution as passed by the House.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

HOUSE VOTES DECEMBER 17 ON NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION RESOLUTION—PRESIDENT WILSON AGAIN REDUCES CONTENT OF BEER—WASHINGTON THE SCENE OF CONVENTIONS OF NOTE: NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE, NATIONAL TEMPERANCE COUNCIL, NATIONAL AMERICAN WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION, AMERICAN ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE, INTERNATIONAL REFORM BUREAU

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

Surely we are living in wonderful days. Great events in the world's history follow each other so rapidly we can scarcely keep tally on them. While it is not strictly a Washington item, your correspondent may be permitted to commence this letter with an allusion to that which has thrilled the hearts of all Christendom, viz., the wresting of Jerusalem from the hands of the Moslem by Christian Great Britain, which has raised its flag over the Holy City. The Christmas bells will ring out marvelous tidings of great joy this year and together we may sing, "Jerusalem, my happy home, name ever dear to me." Word comes from London that until there is a general peace no attempt will be made to define the future position of Jerusalem.

The Supreme Court of the United States has again placed itself on record as upholding temperance laws by this week rendering a decision in favor of the Idaho law, which may be a far-reaching victory for bone dry prohibition. It was held that a citizen has no constitutional right to possess liquor for his personal use if a state wishes to forbid it. The court also upheld North Carolina's law, requiring common carriers to keep a permanent record of all persons to whom liquor is shipped.

House to Vote on National Constitutional Prohibition Resolution

Tuesday, December 11, the House Judiciary Committee favorably reported the resolution for National Constitutional Prohibition by a vote of 15 to 5 and the House agreed to take up the resolution for consideration Monday, December 17. As passed by the Senate the resolution provides that the necessary three-fourths of the states must act on the amendment within six years from the time of its passage in Congress. The House Judiciary Committee extended the time to seven years and would make the amendment effective one year from the time of its ratification. The suffrage amendment was reported without recommendation by a vote of 18 to 2. The understanding among leaders is that the suffrage resolution will not be called up in the House until after the holiday recess. The poll made by Republican and Democratic leaders in the Senate indicates a vote of 25 Democrats and 11 Republicans against the suffrage amendment, but we are hoping a change of heart may come to many before a vote in the Senate is taken.

National American Woman Suffrage Association Meets at Poli's

The National American Woman Suffrage Association, which is in session at Poli's Theater in Washington this week, sent 500 delegates, as units from the different states, to call upon Senators and Representatives to present a plea for the speedy passage of the suffrage amendment. Republican members on the new Committee on Woman Suffrage named this week in the House are Congresswoman Jeannette Rankin of Montana (heading the list), Representatives Mondell of Wyoming, Carter of Massachusetts, Little of Kansas, Meeker of Missouri, and Eliot of Indiana. The two last named men are counted as anti-suffragists.

The District of Columbia has no Sunday law and Senator Jones of Seattle, Wash., on Wednesday of this week introduced a bill to provide for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia. This is greatly needed, as contractors have invariably taken advantage of the lack of Sunday protection and kept men and horses at work seven days in the week. We most earnestly hope the bill may pass both Senate and House and become a law.

President Wilson Further Reduces Content of Beer

President Wilson has issued a proclamation reducing the alcoholic content of beer brewed after January 1, 1918, to two-and-three-quarters per cent by weight, and prohibiting the use in the manufacture of malt liquors of more than seventy per cent of the average amount of foods, fruits, food materials and feeds used in such manufacture during the one year period ending on that date. Following this proclamation, Senator Jones of Seattle, Wash., had an article read in the Senate concerning the appointment of a committee to investigate the shortage of fuel and sugar. This article, which was from the Toledo Blade, said:

"The greatest saving now when most needed would be made by stopping entirely the shipping of beer and also the returning of barrels, kegs and cases of bottles, which take as much freight as the original shipment. The railroads formerly carried these returns free.

"You will see side tracks filled with cars loaded with coal while people are suffering for the want of coal and factories shut down, throwing employes out of work because of the lack of coal, but you will see train loads of beer going by on schedule time.

"Even with the 25 per cent reduction in the amount of alcohol there will be wasted in the manufacture of beer 54,000,000 bushels of grain a year, and the weight of the water in the beer and the kegs and bottles multiplies this by eight, so you have on a transportation basis the weight of more than 432,000,000 bushels of grain used up for beer shipment alone, or 1,080,000 carload lots a year, enough to relieve the railroad congestion of the United States for all time."

Review of National W. C. T. U. Convention Scenes

There is so much going on during a great National W. C. T. U. Convention, one has little time to take in and digest what is transpiring, but when it is all over and there is time for connected thought, many scenes pass like a panorama before one's vision. Miss Anna A. Gordon again won all hearts by the wisdom and fairness she displayed in her numerous decisions as presiding officer. The president of the National W. C. T. U. is second to none and the way in which she held the more than 900 delegates, keeping them in check as to time and order, was a striking lesson in parliamentary procedure. The appearance on the platform of so many distinguished persons was also particularly gratifying, especially to those living far from the Capital City. Sitting in the section assigned to the board of superintendents was Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, who, as National superintendent of the department of Peace and International Arbitration, was in her seat day after day, following the proceedings with keen interest. The white ribbon cheer, which was given with enthusiasm, was evidently appreciated by our guests, Senators and Representatives being taken by surprise at the volume of sound which came from the throats of that distinguished body of women, but when 900 or more women all speak on one theme, they are bound to be heard; then, too, when 400,000 women unite on any one plan of work, concentrated on gaining one objective point, something is bound to be done.

National Legislative Conference Meets

Since the close of the convention there have been many other great gatherings. First came the annual meeting of the National Legislative Conference, of which Dr. Howard Russell, vice-president of the Anti-Saloon League, is president, Miss Anna A. Gordon, vice-president, and Mr. D. Leigh Colvin, president of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, secretary.

National Temperance Council Adopts Resolution

Monday afternoon the annual meeting of the National Temperance Council was held. All temperance organizations were represented. The following resolution was presented by Clinton N. Howard and overwhelmingly agreed to by the members:

"RESOLVED: That it is the sense of the National Temperance Council that in securing the ratification of the national prohibition amendment, the friends of ratification should give their support to that candidate, or where more than one is to be elected, to those candidates who, declaring themselves for ratification, have the best claims for election.

THAT: Where the candidate or candidates of either dominant party favors or favor ratification, no nomination should be made by the Prohibition Party, or other minor parties.

THAT: Where no dominant party candidate is committed to ratification, the united Dry forces should support the Prohibition Party candidate, or the independent or minor party candidate who has the best chance of election."

The gatherings mentioned were followed by others of national character. As I write, the American Anti-Saloon League is in session at the Metropolitan M. E. Church, with a large and most enthusiastic attendance. Miss Gordon and other notable speakers have addressed the convention.

Thursday morning had been set apart for a public demonstration on the part of the temperance forces on the steps of the Capitol, but the weather was too severe to admit of it.

Friday the International Reform Bureau began a series of ratification rallies, extending through Sunday with an elaborate array of speakers—and so the good work goes on. Never was there a more earnest, devoted company of temperance men and women gathered at the nation's Capital. The fact that not an open saloon exists in the city appeals to every one and every allusion to the fact has aroused a wave of enthusiasm.

Constitutionality of Idaho's Prohibition Law Upheld by the United States Supreme Court

The United States Supreme court, on December 10, affirmed the validity of the prohibition law of Idaho that prohibits the possession of intoxicating liquor without a permit for medicinal use, for religious, sacramental ceremonies or for industrial purposes. The case involved the possession of a bottle of liquor by a man named Ed Crane who was taken into custody by the sheriff of Latah county.

Mr. Crane sought discharge on the ground that those sections of state law under which he had been taken into custody were in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, which says that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

The decision of the Supreme Court is, in part, as follows:

"It must now be regarded as settled that on account of their well-known noxious qualities and the extraordinary evils shown by experience commonly to be consequent upon their use, a state has power absolutely to prohibit the manufacture, gift, purchase, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within its borders without violating the guarantees of the fourteenth amendment.

"We further think it clearly follows from our numerous decisions, upholding prohibition legislation, that the right to hold intoxicating liquors for personal use is not one of the fundamental privileges of a citizen of the United States which no state may abridge. A contrary view would be incompatible with the undoubted power to prevent the manufacture, sale, purchase or transportation of such articles—the only feasible way of getting them. An assured right of possession would necessarily imply some adequate method to obtain not subject to destruction at the will of the state."

On the same day the Supreme Court also upheld the validity of the North Carolina prohibitory law.

Anti-Liquor Victories in California

California is very practically showing its patriotism by the vigorous manner in which it is dealing with the liquor traffic to provide protection to the men who are in the training camps and naval stations of the state. A sequel to the 20,000 dry vote in Los Angeles is the action of the city council on December 5, in voting to have the law go into effect in the Harbor district on January 31, two months earlier than the measure takes effect in the remaining sections of the city.

A leading factor in the adoption of the ordinance was the statement of Col. E. M. Blake, commanding the Coast Artillery at Fort MacArthur, who declared that the enforcement of a "bone dry" law at the harbor would increase immeasurably the efficiency and the morale of the men in the service. He made the statement on his own responsibility, he explained, and not as representing any request of the government.

The police commission of Los Angeles is also reported to have adopted resolutions, which went into effect at once, that no civilian can be served with intoxicating drinks in any liquor establishment, wholesale house, saloon, club or cafe if there is an American soldier or marine present in uniform. A violation of this provision shall be cause for the revocation of the license of the offender, it is said.

A five-mile dry zone has been established around Camp Fremont by the authorities of San Mateo county, according to an announcement made by District Attorney Frank M. Swart. "The present law will not only be enforced, but further and more drastic regulations will be created at the next meeting of the supervisors." The five-mile zone will automatically make dry the Beresford County Club and the summer place of the Family Club. The victory in Santa Monica, which voted dry on December 5 by 1,276 majority vote, was announced last week. The only blot on the record of war dry victories in the great state of California is the failure to carry the "bone dry" measure which was voted on in San Diego recently.

Pennsylvania Grange Urges War Prohibition

The Pennsylvania state grange in annual session in Williamsport recently passed strong resolutions in favor of war time prohibition.

Canadian Soldiers Prohibited from Buying Liquor in the United States

It is reported from Montreal that orders have been issued by Major General E. Wilson barring any Canadian officer or soldier in uniform from drinking intoxicating liquor in places where it is on sale in the United States.

200 Dutch Distilleries Can Get No More Grain

A cablegram from Amsterdam, Holland, published in the Chicago Herald, reports that 200 distilleries of Schiedam, which produce vast quantities of gin and other liquors, have been notified by the government's grain bureau that no more grain will be supplied for conversion into alcoholic products.

Norfolk Naval Station Shows Big Drop in Venereal Diseases Under Prohibition

"There is an intimate and not well understood relation between alcohol and the venereal diseases," says Dr. Charles E. Riggs, medical inspector of the United States Navy at Norfolk, Va., as reported in the New Castle (Pa.) News. "Alcohol and venereal disease are close allies."

"Our statistics show that prior to the time of enforcement of the prohibition law in the state of Virginia," says Dr. Riggs, "there were 365 infections and 137, or 37.5 per cent, of the infected admit being under the influence of alcohol at the time the disease was contracted, and 228, or 62.5 per cent, deny drinking. Since the enforcement of prohibition there have been 93 infections, of which 11, or 11.8 per cent, were acquired while under the influence of alcohol, and all but two of these were contracted outside of the state and in 'wet' territory. Alcohol is still a factor in the venereal problem, but owing to increasing prohibitory legislation it is a diminishing factor."

Dr. Riggs quotes Dr. Douglas White as saying that 80 per cent of the men who acquire venereal diseases, do so while under the influence of alcohol.

95 Per Cent of Trouble Due to Liquor, Says General Penn

Brigadier General Julius A. Penn, in an address in Detroit recently, declared that at the end of the war enlisted men will demand prohibition. Ninety-five per cent of all the trouble in the army is due to liquor, he affirmed.

"The men serving in the army learn the harm liquor is responsible for and the advantages of total abstinence, and there is no doubt in my mind that a great organization for prohibition, which will strike at the end of the war, is being constructed."

Directors of the Minneapolis Athletic Club recently voted unanimously to make the club dry for the duration of the war.

Gridiron Club of Washington Entertains President Wilson at Dry Dinner

At a dinner given by the Gridiron Club of Washington at which President Wilson and noted men of the nation were guests, no liquor was served. This was the first dry dinner in the thirty-three years of the club's existence.

PATRIOTISM KEYNOTE OF FORTY-FOURTH NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

"My Country 'Tis of Thee" was the theme, with variations, of virtually every participant in the program of the National W. C. T. U. Convention. Although the National W. C. T. U. president, in her annual address, proved beyond the peradventure of a doubt that "The path of patriotism is the path of prohibition," the truth was reaffirmed by every speaker at the great meeting.

The strains of the "Star-Spangled Banner" and "America" would burst spontaneously from the delegations whenever there was opportunity for an expression of patriotism. The decorations of the interior of Poli's theater were the national colors, flags draping balconies, floor and platform. The exercises of each day opened with a salute and a pledge of allegiance to the flag, led by Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors. With few exceptions, the musical selections, solos, duets, quartets, choruses and orchestral numbers, were of the patriotic order. So also were the spectacular features, and unusually varied and unique in character were the pictorial presentations of love and loyalty to the Star-Spangled Banner and God and Home and Native Land.

The largest attendance at a National Convention in the history of the organization, 906 voting delegates, was a significant demonstration of patriotism on the part of white ribboners. So also were the facts given in the reports of the National General Officers, showing in these times of high cost of living an increase of membership in thirty-two states, and unprecedented generosity in contributions to war welfare enterprises; ambulances for the French front; stereomotorgraphs for the cantonments; comfort bags; establishment of soldiers and sailors recreation rooms; the adoption of dozens of French orphans.

It is quite safe to say that at no previous convention have there been presented from the platform so many and such weighty testimonies to prohibition's value as a patriotic policy, the acceptance of which is a vital necessity at this time. Members of Congress from many states, with unanimity witnessed to the worth of prohibition and paid homage to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as one of the chief factors in securing such legislation.

One of the elements necessary for the perfect working out of our national program is the cordial co-operation of all organizations. It was a cause for gratification that representatives from women's and men's national organizations welcomed the opportunity to voice from the platform of the W. C. T. U. Convention their desire for such co-operation. All differences of opinion on minor questions were put aside in a victory-bringing determination to work together for the one national goal—the making of this world safe for democracy, through conservation, protection of the nation's defenders, and internment of the greatest enemy of the nation, the liquor traffic.

Beginning with the National W. C. T. U. president, the burden of the speakers, one and all, seemed to be "Patriotism and Prohibition, now and forever, one and inseparable."

OPENING HOURS OF CONVENTION

The opening hours of a National W. C. T. U. Convention are filled with tender, sacred memories. In hymn and psalm the assembled company is reminded of the Divine call to service that came over forty years ago to a little band of heroic Christian women, and the miraculous answer to the prayers of these pioneers in the prohibition victories of today.

Promptly at 9:30 o'clock Miss Anna A. Gordon, the National president, formally opened the Convention at Poli's theater. The key-note of the great meeting was sounded in the opening hymn, "America," the Convention standing to sing it and with bowed heads uniting in the last verse as a prayer:

"Our fathers' God to thee,
Author of Liberty,
To Thee we sing.
Long may our land be bright
With Freedom's Holy Light,
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God, our King."

As the last words died on the air, Old Glory was unfurled, and led by Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, the delegates saluted the flag: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the republic for which it stands; one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." Standing at attention they sang "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Following the rendition of that wonderful prophecy in song,

"Give to the wind thy fears,
Hope and be undismayed,
God hears thy sighs and counts thy tears,
God shall lift up thy head," came the repetition in unison of the Crusade psalm, and Mrs. Florence D. Richard, president of the W. C. T. U. of the Crusade state, led in a prayer of gratitude for the Divine guidance of the past years, gratitude for answered petitions and for fulfilled prophecies.

As the original Crusaders seated upon the platform arose in response to the enthusiastic applause of their white ribbon comrades, the audience, led by Mrs. Frances Graham, National musical director, sang, "It's Coming, It's Coming, The Morn for Which We Pray. We'll take the World for Christ's Own Kingdom, Some Glad Day."

Reading of President's Address Notable Event

Following the roll call and the reading of the report of the Executive Committee, which had met on the previous day, came the notable event of the first meeting of the Convention, the reading of the President's annual address, "The Path of Patriotism is the Path of Prohibition."

Miss Gordon's logical, eloquent, convincing, comprehensive review of the work accomplished and the victories achieved during the past year was interrupted with frequent and enthusiastic applause. The message was enlivened by wit and humor. When she referred to the number of states needed to ratify the amendment, she turned appealingly to Ohio and asked, "Ohio, will you be the twenty-eighth?" Loud and strong came the response, "We will." Then turning to Delaware, Miss Gordon asked, "If Ohio does not come in as the twenty-eighth, will you promise to be the twenty-eighth?" A vigorous affirmative testified to little Delaware's determination to drive John Barleycorn from the only point in the state where he now has legal right.

The reading by Miss Gordon of the assertion by the brewers, "Woman suffrage when it arrives will kill the malted interests," was a challenge the New York delegation of women voters eagerly accepted.

The president's address was received with enthusiastic applause and on motion a rising vote of thanks was given her, the recommendations contained in her message being referred to the Official Board and Executive committee.

The roll-call of the prohibition states has come to be a regular order of business at the Convention. Mrs. Cornelia T. Hatcher, president of the Alaska W. C. T. U., gave the following up-to-date rhythmic version of "We'll Make the Map all White":

"Maine is at the head for she has led for half a hundred years,
And Kansas great and North Dakota stand among their peers;
Georgia next, and Oklahoma, won their place among the free,
Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee;
West Virginia, and Virginia too, and Colorado's white;
Arizona then, with Washington and Oregon's all right.

"The sixteenth state was Arkansas John Barleycorn to slay,
Then Iowa and Idaho were victors in the fray;
South Carolina next, and Michigan, Montana, all so grand,
Nebraska's rolling prairies and our South Dakota land;
Then along came Indiana in her great centennial year,
And Utah followed with farewell to whisky, wine and beer.

"As New Hampshire climbed to high dry land where now she looks so fine;
Porto Rico and New Mexico came swinging into line;
Yes! the District of Columbia on Old Potomac's shore,
Where stands our nation's Capitol, shall see saloons no more;
Over all now shines the polar star, Alaska's golden light,
And all the states will follow till we make the map all white."

This poetic review of the prohibition states called forth a response from every state delegation, beginning with "Indiana has gone dry," to the tune of "Bringing in the Sheaves," closing, at the musical director's suggestion, with "a discord of harmony" when everybody sang, "The World is Going Dry."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WELCOMES CONVENTION

PRESIDENT BROWNLOW OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS, THE PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE, THE MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION AND THE W. C. T. U. OF THE DISTRICT EXTEND GREETINGS

Every white ribboner feels a sense of ownership in the Capital City of the nation and a pride in its freedom from saloons. This feeling was accentuated by the utterances of the District officials, who with heartiest cordiality on Monday evening welcomed the delegates and visitors to Washington and pointed with pride to the satisfying results of its well enforced prohibitory law. That these prominent residents of the District showed a keen appreciation of the part taken by the W. C. T. U. in achieving the victory was gratifying to the white ribbon visitors.

Hon. Louis Brownlow, president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the first speaker, said in part:

I cannot exactly claim to be a member of the W. C. T. U., but my mother was the president of the W. C. T. U. in a little village in the Ozark Hills of Missouri, where I was born, in a county that even then was dry. I was an invalid all my young boyhood, but I did go to Sunday school and on one occasion a prize was offered by the superintendent of the Sunday school for the best essay on the greatest living American. The other boys and girls all wrote on military leaders or statesmen, but I choose as my subject Frances E. Willard. From the time I was twenty years of age until I took this office I have made my living writing for the newspapers, but that essay won the prize, and later this, the first article I ever wrote, was printed in THE UNION SIGNAL. So you see, although not a member of the W. C. T. U., I can claim to have had a part in its traditions. I remember how devoted my mother was to the W. C. T. U. in that little village, and it was the work that was done in just such places as that by white ribboners when the temperance cause was scorned and laughed at, that has brought you today to a dry national Capital.

Among other duties I have charge of the police department of the District and, I am glad to say, we are enforcing the law. I want to give you the figures showing the number of arrests in the District for November, 1916, as contrasted with November, 1917. The number of arrests for intoxication in November, 1916, was 838 and in November, 1917, 199, a decrease of 639, or more than 76 per cent. The highest number of arrests for any one week in November of last year was 218, so that in one week in November, 1916, there were 19 more arrests than during the whole month of November, 1917. A very large majority of the cases this year were found at the terminals of the steam and electric railways leading into Washington; they did not originate here. Furthermore, the chief of police and his officers say that the going into effect of prohibition has resulted already in a great diminution of arrests for disorder, assaults, etc.

What it means in increased happiness we cannot, of course, tell. About a month before the fatal or happy first of November, I met a business man who said he was pretty blue over the prospect—he owned a large mercantile establishment and he was very much afraid that Washington's going dry would seriously injure his business. I replied that I did not believe it. "Before the town has been dry a month you will call me up on the telephone and admit that I was right and you were wrong," I told him. Sure enough, the day before Thanksgiving he did call me up. "You were right and I was wrong," he said, "and I think prohibition is the greatest thing that has ever happened to Washington."

So vigorously and vociferously did the Missouri delegates express their approval by applause of Commissioner Brownlow that Miss Gordon wondered if in their pride they would not coax him to go back to Missouri so they could make him governor of the state.

Mr. A. Leftwich Sinclair, president of the Chamber of Commerce, echoed in cordial words the welcome already extended, complimented the convention on its excellent judgment in having chosen Washington as a meeting place and expressed the hope that the stay of the delegates and visitors would be a pleasant one.

Mr. W. T. Galliher, vice-president of the Board of Trade, referred facetiously to his heroic efforts to respond to the invitation to attend the convention, having been on the way virtually three consecutive days, owing to a misunderstanding of the date, but the expenditure of this effort had proved well worth while, he admitted. Mr. Galliher said, in part:

I say all honor to the magnificent womanhood of America! She has taken her place side by side with the manhood of America. The two great things for which this convention stands, I take it, are prohibition and woman suffrage. In the interest of these measures you are knocking at the doors of state and national legislative halls and you already have assurance that you will find there a sympathetic hearing.

Our commissioner has told you the result of thirty days' experience with prohibition. Let me add that I have it directly from one liquor dealer that he is glad the town has gone dry. I have heard the same thing in other days from other saloonkeepers, how they wished they might find a different means of livelihood because they could not keep open the doors of their dramshops and still maintain their dignity and self-respect.

When Rev. Earle Wilfley, pastor of the church to which Mrs. Emma Sanford Shelton belongs, extended a welcome in behalf of the Ministerial Association, and admitted that he, too, was from the state of Missouri, he was greeted with cheers from the Missouri delegates and in melodious measures they prophesied, "The star of old Missouri will surely shine some day." After responding happily to the ovation, Mr. Wilfley said, in part:

I am sure we have all felt that the commissioner of the District and the gentlemen representing the great business interests of this city have spoken with absolute sincerity when they welcomed you to the city and when they spoke of the achievements of this great cause. May I give you in addition just one little word. The commissioners of the District of Columbia are men who have proved themselves absolutely faithful to the execution of the law. At the head of the police force of this city is a splendid type of Christian gentleman, a former newspaper man and a superintendent of the Sunday school of his church. You have already heard from the commissioner of the District, who speaks with absolute authority of what has occurred during the first month of prohibition, and certainly if you were to try to hunt for something in the way of strong drink you would realize that you were in a dry city. I remember, on my first visit to Washington, seeing three men in the cloak room of the National Capitol who were intoxicated, and down below the bar was running at full blast. When it was proposed to drive the bar out of the Capitol building, people said, "It cannot be done; Congress will not stand for it and never will pass such a measure, for too many men want it." But the bar in the Capitol building has long been a thing of the past. Then some one said, "Let us get rid of the bar at the Union Station," but people said again, "It cannot be done; the thirsty visitors at the National Capital must be greeted with some sort of respectable hospitality;

MAJOR R. W. PULLMAN, SUPERINTENDENT OF POLICE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, GIVES SIGNIFICANT STATISTICS, SHOWING EFFICACY OF PROHIBITORY LAW

Major Raymond Pullman, superintendent of police for the District, introduced as a man who had demonstrated that prohibition does prohibit in the Nation's Capital and also as a very successful Sunday school superintendent and an all-round church worker, received an ovation from the convention. Major Pullman said the average resident of the District, regardless of his views a year ago, was now ready to admit that prohibition has proved a civic asset of real value. "I have talked with former opponents of prohibition, hotel men, merchants and men in other lines of business, and they virtually all admit that having seen the law in operation for over a month, they realize their attitude toward it was wrong. The city is growing by leaps and bounds; we have today 60,000 more people than a year ago, and everyone is sober and happy, with a very few exceptions—the men who go to Baltimore to secure the forbidden drink. These men are picked up by the policemen at the railway and electric stations, and are given no chance to go home in an intoxicated condition and abuse their wives and children." Major Pullman read the following significant figures as indisputable proof of the efficacy of the District's new dry law:

ARRESTS FOR INTOXICATION

Total number of drunkenness cases in November, 1916	838
Total number of drunkenness cases in November, 1917	199
Decrease in number of arrests for intoxication	639
Highest number of arrests for intoxication for one week in November, 1916	218
Highest number of arrests for intoxication for one week in November, 1917	71

Highest number of arrests for intoxication for one week in November, 1916, was 19 more than for the whole month of November, 1917.

OFFENSES GROWING OUT OF INTOXICATION

	November 1916	November 1917
Assault	151	78
Carrying weapons	27	11
Cruelty to animals	47	38
Disorderly conduct	336	136
Housebreaking	57	32

we cannot abolish the bar in the Union Station." But that bar was long since abandoned. Likewise, when the outrageous proposition was suggested of making the National Capital dry, people said emphatically, "It cannot be done." They said, "It is not possible, with all the corruption money and the powerful liquor lobby, that Congress will vote the National Capital, the playground of the United States, dry—it is an unheard-of proposition."

Well, today, if you want a drink badly enough, you may find some one who will bring it in to you from Baltimore, but to get it or drink it with any sort of ease or respectability is absolutely impossible. I heard one of the police officials say the other day that the commissioners, the district attorney, the chief of police and all the authorities are determined to see that the prohibitory law is enforced, and the vigor with which they are executing it is evidence of their sincerity. The men who stand at the head of your District government mean business and along with them and with you have always gone the Christian ministry.

I am going to make a little confession. When I was a very young minister I started out to annihilate the saloon at once, and the first thing I did toward that end was to go to a W. C. T. U. prayer meeting. It did me good in one way, but it was dreadfully discouraging in another. It was away back twenty years ago when the liquor traffic was entrenched in the Capital, in the great cities and in most of the states, and when the liquor men snapped their fingers in the face of the W. C. T. U. and sneered at them as fanatics. I went to this meeting where the women knelt in an agony of prayer, and I must admit that little parlor group was the most disheartening thing I ever saw, and I said to myself in despair, "Is that all we can muster against the liquor traffic?" From that little gathering I went to a political meeting. About the time I entered a notorious ward heeler was talking about temperance fanatics. "Why, of course, I am for temperance," he said. "We must get rid of all these drunkards, but we want to do it without the help of the fanatics. After all, our opponents are only women who cannot vote and a few preachers who don't know enough to vote." And yet, somehow or other, the women who could not vote did virtually vote, if not by direct ballot, by proxy, by prayer and by the power of God. And today, thinking of that W. C. T. U. meeting, I see it differently. Then I only saw a little group of nine or ten praying women. Now I know that all over this country there were similar groups, some larger, some smaller, but making in all a great host of praying women. And so tonight your brothers in arms, the ministers of the gospel, stand by your side as you have stood by their side in this great campaign. In this stupendous world and national crisis this country cannot afford to be anything less than its very best.

No man, no woman, no child, who is not at his or her best, has a right to the protection of the flag. A few nights ago over in Philadelphia, a policeman noticed a sailor boy wandering about the building where the Liberty Bell is kept. "What do you want?" the officer of the law asked. The young fellow replied, "I want to see the Liberty Bell." "The place is closed," said the policeman. "Come again tomorrow." "I want to see the Liberty Bell and I must see it tonight or not at all," the boy persisted. "My ship sails at three in the morning. It is now one o'clock." The official queried, "Why are you so anxious about the Liberty Bell?" The sailor lad replied, "My mother told me when I came to Philadelphia to see two things—one an old family Bible, scarred and marred by the tears of several generations, and the other the Liberty Bell. Today I saw the Bible and now, before my ship sails, I want to see the Liberty Bell."

Although it was long past the hours for showing the bell, the official, without a moment's hesitation, said, "Let him in," and the young sailor went in, pulled off his cap and almost in a dream walked around the emblem of human liberty and then, oblivious of the presence of the other men, he reached out his arms to the great bell and cried, "Help me to make good." And he will, and we are sending out as our nation's defenders such heroic spirits. Who are we at home that we should not do and dare and die if need be that we may keep our flag stainless while we ourselves make good.

Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, President Indiana W. C. T. U.

In response to the welcomes extended, Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, president of the Indiana W. C. T. U., said, in part:

As our hospitable friends of the District were saying "welcome" to us, our hearts responded that we accepted the challenge implied in their words and would endeavor to show them that we have "well—come" to this beautiful city.

Mrs. Emma Sanford Shelton, President District of Columbia W. C. T. U.

I remember some time ago I passed from the United States to Canada, and the government officials insisted on our opening our baggage for inspection. I passed that same gateway just after the war broke out, but then we were not only asked to leave our baggage open, but as we passed from under the folds of Old Glory to those of the Union Jack, we were closely questioned as to whether we came as friends or foes. You good people have a right to ask how we come to your city, and I want to make two statements that will, I am sure, prove to you that we come as real friends.

When the W. C. T. U. was first organized, it gave to the world a great declaration of principles—the platform upon which this organization was founded, and the first principle is: "We believe in the coming of Christ's kingdom." We did not imagine that this kingdom was to come by chance. We knew it was going to take definite service on the part of women filled with the Holy Spirit, and so the Woman's Christian Temperance Union bowed at the altar of the church of Jesus Christ and asked for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit for its great task, and that is why we had the high faith to see the victory for prohibition in the far distance and hailed it even before it came to be a reality. And the second principle for which we stand as an organization is: "We believe in the Golden Rule—Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you." It was because the W. C. T. U. believed in the Golden Rule that we flung out the banner for national prohibition years ago; it was because we knew that not only the men who drink and the men who justified the wicked for the sake of reward were under the woe pronounced by Almighty God but because we knew that the manufacturer of strong drink and his family were under the same woe. It was because of these two great principles that the W. C. T. U. has the right to say we are "welcome" to this city. We come not only with thanksgiving for victories past, but we come to ask for further favors. So, while we are grateful for what we have already received, we come asking of those who sit in authority in high places that they will give us national prohibition in this, the greatest nation that the world has ever seen.

I want to remind you of that little incident when 10,000 Russian patriots, every one of them maimed, some of them blind in one eye, some in both, some lacking an arm or a leg, 10,000 men who had served their country for twenty-five cents a month for two long years, heard that the duma was considering a separate peace with Germany, marched down the streets of Petrograd and made their declaration that if the government accepted a separate peace with Germany it would do it over their dead bodies, because they would enlist again, they would give their last drop of blood in order that Russia might be free in deed and in truth. And so the Woman's Christian Temperance Union issues this word to the nation: that its members will not rest, but will lay on the altar of our Lord Jesus Christ and our country everything we have and are, and will not give up this fight until we have secured that for which we have fought and struggled and prayed in the years gone by; until this nation shall not only have prohibited the saloon and the distillery, but until every fire shall be extinguished from under the brewery engine and not another single drop of alcohol for beverage purposes shall be manufactured.

Mrs. Emma Sanford Shelton, President District of Columbia W. C. T. U.

As I stand here and look into your faces I feel that, while a plain everyday dictionary may supply the mere words of welcome, even the New Century Dictionary cannot supply words to express the feelings with which I greet you and welcome you, not only to my city, but to your own city—the Capital of our beloved nation—a dry Capital of what we hope soon—very soon—will be a dry United States.

Today we both rejoice and mourn together—mourn that our nation is plunged into this cruel conflict between right and wrong—mourn because our brave boys are going from us to take part in the conflict. Yet do our hearts rejoice that never before in the history of the world has so much been done to preserve our armies in health, in comparative comfort, and in morals. Never were men so prepared for the conflict, never was there such surgery to restore them when wounded.

Many here present are mothers, saying not only to America, but to France and Italy and Belgium, "Here's my boy," and those who have no boys to send are sending their prayers, their money, and giving their time in helping to make other mothers' boys clean and pure and in this way strengthening our army, for we desire and pray for each soldier who fights under our glorious flag that "His strength may be the strength of ten, because his heart is pure."

And so in these days, as never before, we are living in feelings, in emotions, as well as activities, transcending any previous times. It is good for us that we may also rejoice together over our dry city—dry through our labors.

DISTINGUISHED WOMEN SPEAKERS AND VISITORS AT THE CONVENTION

Some of Washington's most distinguished women citizens found time to visit the Convention. Among them were Mrs. Josephus Daniels, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, who opened her home for a reception to the delegates; Mrs. Newton Baker, wife of the Secretary of War, who on the opening night of the Convention sang as a solo, Kipling's "Recessional," and responded graciously to an encore with "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Mrs. Josephus Daniels

Mrs. Daniels arrived at the Convention just at the time there was under consideration the paragraph of the resolutions referring to the duty incumbent upon the mothers of the nation to give to girls and boys "the protection of knowledge and proper restraint."

"I think it is very opportune that I came in just at this moment," said Mrs. Daniels. "It especially interests me, because the only thing I am in life is a mother—the mother of sons. And I can sympathize with any resolution which affects girls because we cannot separate the interests of the boys and the girls. We women have to bear the burden of the war as truly as do the men. We give our sons, our husbands and brothers. The country has called to the colors the boys from a million homes, but it is just as necessary to call on the moral fiber of the nation at this time as it is to call the boys to the colors. And I trust that in your convention you will do everything in your power to uphold the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in their fight for moral protection in the camps."

Mrs. Daniels closed her brief talk with a cordial invitation to the delegates and visitors to attend a reception at her home.

Miss Gordon, on behalf of the Convention, asked that Mrs. Daniels convey to her distinguished husband, Secretary of the Navy Daniels, the hearty thanks of the delegates for the help and protection he had given to the enlisted men, in whom all white ribboners are deeply interested.

This reference to the Secretary caused Mrs. Daniels to share with the Convention the following comment her sons had overheard concerning their father: "There is one thing about Daniels," said a gentleman who had not favored all of the policies of the Secretary of the Navy, "he is never found on the wrong side of a moral issue." "I consider that the greatest heritage my boys can have," said Mrs. Daniels, proudly, as she smiled down at the great audience of mothers.

It only needed a suggestion from the president of the Kentucky W. C. T. U., Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, for the whole convention to burst into cheers for the Secretary and his devoted and charming wife.

Mrs. Thomas Edison

Mrs. Thomas Edison, who with her noted husband, was stopping in the Capital, spent one afternoon at the convention.

She was introduced by Miss Gordon as the daughter of an original Ohio Crusader and of Lewis Miller of Chautauqua fame.

"I regret that I cannot bring a message of victory for prohibition from Ohio, my native state," said Mrs. Edison. "But when I recall the days when my mother, one of the Crusaders of Ohio, with other dauntless women, visited the saloons and pleaded with the men to close their doors, when they were subjected to insult and had buckets of water thrown over them —when I look back to those days and note the growth of our great cause, I cannot be discouraged. I am proud, too, to remember that my father was one of the pioneer advocates of woman suffrage. I regret that Mr. Edison could not be here to greet you, but may I give you his recipe for success: 'Ninety-nine per cent perspiration and one per cent inspiration."

As Mrs. Edison left the platform she was given a rousing cheer by the delegation from the Crusade state.

On Sunday evening Mrs. Philip North Moore, president of the National Council of Women, brought greetings from that body and told of its far-reaching and comprehensive work. Elizabeth Pierce, chaplain general of the Daughters of the American Revolution, appeared for that great organization of women. Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, World's W. C. T. U. superintendent of the department of Sunday School work, recalled the days thirty years ago when Frances Willard stood before the International Sunday School convention held in Pittsburgh and pleaded for temperance teaching in the Sunday schools, pleaded until she gained her point.

Never have relations between the church missionary societies and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union been so close and cordial as today. This thought was voiced by Mrs. William F. McDowell, president of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who brought greetings from that body to the Convention.

"Our societies have one common aim," said Mrs. McDowell. "It is to lift this world a little nearer to God. You are lifting in one place, and we in another, but together we are working with the same purpose and our work overlaps. Especially are we interested in the work of the W. C. T. U. in foreign fields,

HON. JEANNETTE RANKIN, CONGRESSWOMAN FROM MONTANA, ADDRESSES CONVENTION

I want to say a few words in appreciation of a fundamental lesson that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has taught the women of the nation, and that is the great value of education. No one seems to have appreciated this as much as did Frances Willard, and I believe the great victories for prohibition that we are experiencing today are the outcome of your organization having appreciated the value of teaching the child, and the result of the work along that line started years ago today being realized. Today the press is the great educator of the masses and if you wish to continue your success you must use your influence to put the press on the same basis as the other educational institutions through which you have secured prohibitory legislation. For if the schools had not been both free and public it would have been impossible for you to have entered the public schools and given to the children lessons in scientific temperance. And you know that we have taken out of the class where they are run for profit or for private propaganda all our educational institutions, beginning with the public school, then the high school and the university and lastly our technical schools. Yet today all our newspapers are run for profit or for propaganda. We must make our papers free in order that we may have the facts on which to base our judgment on public questions. It would be a very simple matter to make our papers both free and public if we recognized that they were educational institutions. Each community could have its press board which would correspond with the present school board. The head of this community press board would be responsible to the public. The paper could be given free to every one in the community, so it would have a one hundred per cent circulation. The editorials could be written by the people of the community and they should be signed editorials. In that way we could make our press public as well as free and we could extend our education so that the men and women would have the same opportunity to learn the facts that the children now have. It seems to me that more than any other organization the Woman's Christian Temperance Union should appreciate this need, as your work has been so thoroughly educational. If you would make the demand for a public press you would certainly gain it. There is no question but that if today we had the facts concerning alcoholic liquors disseminated among the people it would be unnecessary for us to ask for war prohibition. For we know that the nation needs prohibition not only from the standpoint of food and for the efficiency of the army, but for the sake of the social problems that must be dealt with at home while the war is on.

DISTINGUISHED WOMEN SPEAKERS AND VISITORS AT THE CONVENTION

where the liquor traffic is such a handicap to the missionaries. Our workers in Africa say that the greatest difficulty they have to combat is not Mohammedanism nor paganism but the liquor traffic. The task before us is not an easy one. We dream at night and have visions in the daytime of how easy it would be if every Christian woman would put her shoulder to the wheel and help. I read not long ago a story of a girl called Alice, a story I loved as a child. She came one day to a country called Wonderland and in that country the queen took her by the hand and together they started to run a swift race. After they had run a long time Alice said to the woman, 'We do not seem to get anywhere. If we ran in my country we would get somewhere after so much swift running.' 'In this country,' replied the queen, 'it takes all the running you can do to keep in the same place. If you want to get somewhere else, you must run at least twice as fast as that.' And so perhaps we have come to the place in our two organizations where we must run just twice as fast as we can if we are to get anywhere else than where we are."

Mrs. John Meigs

Mrs. John Meigs, representing the National Young Women's Christian Association, spoke briefly on "War Work of the Y. W. C. A." She said, in part:

"Soon after the war began we were met with the question as to what work we ought to do in the vicinity of the camps. We were told that the very day the troops mobilized the underworld also mobilized. The first thing undertaken was the establishment of hostess houses, where soldiers could meet their mothers, fathers, sisters, and sweethearts. One woman visitor said, 'I felt as I went around the camp that I had almost lost my identity, for at least one hundred soldiers called me mother.'"

Mrs. Meigs also told of the establishment of cafeterias in the vicinity of the military camps, the appointment of workers to take care of girls who are making uniforms, etc., and the sending of seven fine secretaries overseas to look after the welfare of Red Cross nurses and workers in munition factories. Another branch of activity of the association is in the interests of the "teen" age girls, who are attracted by the lure of the khaki. The two methods used are Patriotic Leagues introduced in the public schools and in the factories, to instill in the girls a patriotic sense of duty toward the soldiers, and social morality lectures. In this connection, Mrs. Meigs read from a letter from a soldier overseas the following words: "The girls in America have a real duty to perform in letting the soldiers know they expect them to maintain the single moral standard." "It is our responsibility," said Mrs. Meigs in conclusion, "to make the girls of America worth dying for in this great war."

Mrs. Gertrude Bonnin

No more picturesque visitor appeared upon the platform than Mrs. Gertrude Bonnin, secretary of the Society of American Indians, resplendent in a costume, every part of which was beaded in harmonious colors. Upon the midnight blackness of her lustrous hair like a star gleamed a bow of white ribbon. She brought to the Convention an eloquent message expressed in excellent English. "My heart is proud that I am your sister," said Mrs. Bonnin. "I am a new member and I am anxious to do all in my power to aid in this grand work that you are doing, for it is truly carrying out the great command of the Christ—purity in the world, purity in the home and purity in the heart." Mrs. Bonnin came to the Convention primarily to ask the help of the W. C. T. U. in securing legislation against the unscrupulous traffic in peyote, which is destroying her race and undermining the work she has done for them, as well as the work of the churches and of the government. Mrs. Bonnin explained that peyote is a certain kind of cactus that grows in the southwest; it is known as "dry whisky." The properties of the drug are deadly, akin to opium and morphine. The traffickers in peyote tell the Indians that it is a "cure-all." They resort to every means to induce the Indians to try it and thus form the habit. It is given to the children and even to the baby in arms. "The death from peyote," declared Mrs. Bonnin with deep feeling, "is a threefold death—physical, intellectual and spiritual." Mrs. Bonnin appealed to the Convention for assistance in the passage of an anti-peyote bill now pending in Congress for the protection of the Indian, who has no legislative voice.

Later in the Convention Dr. Harvey W. Wiley confirmed all Mrs. Bonnin had said in regard to the destructive effects of the drug and the need of legislation against it.

Miss Gordon on behalf of the Convention assured Mrs. Bonnin that every possible assistance in securing the passage of this measure would be given.

OPENING HOURS OF CONVENTION

The noontide hour of prayer having arrived the Convention was led in a brief petition by Mrs. Clara L. Roach, a former president of the District W. C. T. U.

A delightful patriotic demonstration—a welcome and appeal to Columbia, arranged by Mrs. William R. Loney, closed the morning meeting.

The first hour of the afternoon program was devoted to a service in memoriam of the three members of the National Executive Committee, who have the past year gone to their heavenly reward: Mrs. W. A. Loyne, National superintendent of Work among Lumbermen and Miners; Mrs. Elizabeth G. Emmons, National lecturer, and Cassie L. Smith, National evangelist. Following a tribute to these promoted comrades by the National president, the Convention repeated in unison comforting selections from the Scriptures, Miss Esther H. Elfreth, president of the New Jersey W. C. T. U., offered prayer, and all joined in singing, "Blest be the Tie that Binds."

Of more than usual interest was the survey of the work of the organization as given in the reports Monday afternoon by Mrs. Frances P. Parks, National corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, National treasurer. A commendable gain in membership—thirty-two of the forty-eight states successfully meeting the test of net gain and appearing on the honor roll on Recognition Night; war welfare work promoted in every state, and a satisfactory financial condition in all branches of the work were the encouraging statements made by the National officers. Equally gratifying were the reports given by the National general secretaries of the Young People's Branch and the Loyal Temperance Legion Branch, Miss Mary Frances Willard Anderson and Miss Mary Ervin.

UNION SIGNAL CONVENTION REPORT

The story of the National W. C. T. U. Convention, which met in Washington December 2-7, is given in the issues of The Union Signal of December 6, 13, 20, 27. Every member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union will desire and should have these numbers, which contain an account of the six days' proceedings and the chief addresses delivered. The four numbers will be mailed to one address for 15 cents.

Chief of Federal Children's Bureau Speaks on "Children in War Time"

Excerpts from Address Delivered at the Washington Convention

In addressing the Woman's Christian Temperance Union one feels that she is addressing a body of experts, you have dealt so long with the education of the children and have seen such rich reward from that education, in prohibition legislation, which is clearly the result of a generation taught in the schools the difference between a sober and a drunken people.

It is a great thing, of course, that the Federal government has in any way expressed the belief that nothing is more precious to a nation than its children, though but a small beginning has been made in putting that expression into living facts. This bureau, which you, I am sure, helped to secure, is a little over five years old. When it was inaugurated it had an appropriation of about $26,000, and a clerical force of fifteen people. At the present time the appropriation, which somehow seems the most palpable gauge of progress, is about $425,000, and the work which the bureau is doing has enlarged in many particulars.

At first we were just a research bureau, pursuing investigations and making reports, but when the Federal Child Labor law went into operation on the first day of September of this year, we were given the execution of that law, an added responsibility and a new kind of work. May I say something of the spirit in which we are trying to do this work under the Secretary of Labor? He, of course, has power to delegate the enforcement of the law to any division of his department he thinks best. When he turned it over to the Children's Bureau, and made the formal announcement, he explained why he was so interested in the measure. It seems to me his words ought to be like a legend hung up before the bureau all the time, showing the spirit in which we should aim to carry out the provisions of this beneficent law enacted to give children a chance in the world and to protect them from labor before they are fit for it.

Federal Child Labor Law Fulfillment of Long Cherished Dream of Secretary of Labor, Once a Child Worker in the Mines

The Secretary of Labor, when a little boy about nine years old, living in western Pennsylvania, worked in a coal mine. He said he could well remember going along the rails, his dinner pail hitting the ends of the ties. He thought if he ever lived to grow up that he would try to see if there were not some way to have boys and girls go to school and learn something before taking up the burden of work. When I heard him tell that story I realized with what deep feeling he had spoken to the President on the day, a year before, when the head of the nation signed the Federal Child Labor law, and had said: "This act is the fulfillment of a long, long cherished dream on my part."

There is nothing more incumbent upon us than to see that this new type of legislation for the benefit of children is truly and genuinely effective. The law may seem to be very well enforced, having to its credit a lot of first prosecutions of unscrupulous employers, which make it appear admirably administered, when in reality it is a bitter, sterile thing, because it is impossible to stir men and women of a community to a sense of personal responsibility toward the children who are released from toil through the enforcement of the law. They should be sent to schools, well-equipped schools, well-lighted, well-heated—and taught by people who love their task, and are trained for it. Nor should these boys and girls go back to school pinched and cold and poor because of lack of the small wages they may have earned. The community should have enough patriotism, nay, more, enough common sense, to see that these citizens of the future are warmly clothed and fed, cared for by their own mothers in their own homes. Then only will they possess a vitality and a vigor calculated to give education a chance to open their minds and enrich them. This is a task that cannot be forced; it must be done because of a warm sense of personal responsibility springing up in the human heart toward the young creatures who are coming along in life.

Every now and then we receive letters concerning these children, some coming through the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense, with which the Children's Bureau has the privilege of co-operating in this time of stress. One letter came from a remote rural state. The writer says: "You ask if all the children that are released from labor are in school. No, they are not. I know, because I am the wife of the superintendent of schools. What do they need? They need somebody who will see to it that they do go to school, but will make it impossible for them to do so unless they are fed and comfortably clothed. There is not the proper feeling in this community. Just the other day the law was violated. A man turned away from a certain establishment grown men able to work and wanting jobs, and in their places put children, because they are little and cheap."

The community referred to is not the only one in America in whose midst that very thing has happened. No law can be enforced except as it is enforced because of public sentiment in favor of it. We of the government are doing what we can, but the final decision of whether the Federal Child Labor law is really a help to the children of the present day rests with the people in a thousand towns throughout this country. I know no body of women more thoroughly committed by a sort of noblesse oblige to this opportunity than the organization which already has done so much for children—the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

And now I desire to speak of an important phase of our work for children. When the war broke out the Children's Bureau began an investigation to ascertain how children in the warring countries were faring. I should have said when the United States declared war, because for three years we were singularly remote from the war. While we knew something about it, we received the news much as we do the painful announcements which occupy the first pages of our newspapers. We did not think about it as something of personal concern which was to grip with authority the young men of our households and change in a certain sense the fate of every human being now in America or ever to be born here. When, then, the war began we endeavored to study child welfare in the warring countries with the thought that the information thus ascertained might be useful in this country. We set translators and readers to work, asking them to investigate child labor and find out how mothers and little babies were getting on, and how children were treated at school, and the amount of delinquency, etc. The reports thus far returned to us have been sent out in brief bulletins to the various parts of the country. One longer bulletin has been published and is now ready for distribution, and from time to time we shall issue others.

When we begin to talk about conservation and saving things that are precious because they are being wasted over there in Europe, we must place first the conservation of human life, and it is no new thought, because England and France and all the warring countries are thinking of it, too. No country, perhaps, has made so wonderful a record as England. Forty-five years before the war the rate of infant mortality in a certain district was very high. The first year of the war it rose much higher because of all the confusion incident to the war. The second year of the war, when the local sanitary board really began to work, the rate fell in a wonderful way. It was cut in two in some places. It was lower than any rate we have recorded in this country—all in the midst of this fearful war and waste. So you see what can be done if through the councils of defense and the allied bodies we are willing to put ourselves to the human task of finding out how to save the lives of mothers and babies in the places where we live.

A Twice-Fought War—For Victory in Europe and Maintenance of Home Standards

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT NATIONAL CONVENTION

PREAMBLE

"In the name of our God we set up our banners" at this Forty-fourth Annual Convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. With profound gratitude we recall some of the signal victories since, seventeen years ago, we met in this our Capital City. At that time only three states, Maine, Kansas and North Dakota, had outlawed the liquor traffic. Today twenty-seven states, with Alaska, Porto Rico, and the District of Columbia, stand free.

The victory in Porto Rico, the constitutionality of the Webb-Kenyon Bill upheld, the adoption of the Post-Office Appropriations Bill Amendment, the increase of dry territory in license states, the magnificent campaign for war prohibition which contributed to the rapid growth of public sentiment for prohibition through constitutional amendment, the favorable vote of the United States Senate for the submission of the amendment; the great hosts of helpers who are coming to us from church and mission circles, from women's clubs, from social workers, from scientists and economists and from the public press—all these triumphs of the year just closing mark such a phenomenal advance as has attended no other great moral or economic reform in the world's history. Truly "Our eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord."

We reaffirm our belief in the following principles:

That total abstinence from alcoholic liquors is the only safe law of life.

That total prohibition is the only effective means for the destruction of the liquor traffic.

That a single standard of purity for both men and women is a physical and moral necessity for the preservation and development of a nation.

That justice demands that men and women have equal right to hold opinions and to express the same in the home, in the church, and at the ballot box.

To the end that these principles may be wrought out in custom and in law, be it hereby resolved:

TOTAL ABSTINENCE

That we wage an intensive campaign, first, for personal, life-long total abstinence, and second, for total abstinence during the period of the war as the duty of all patriotic citizens.

PROHIBITION

That we continue our efforts in behalf of State and National Constitutional Prohibition and that we pledge our support to only such candidates for office as are pledged to these principles.

That we favor the repeal of all laws which provide for revenue from the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages and protest against the war tax on beer, wine and tobacco, as the acceptance of such revenue gives endorsement to the same.

CONSERVATION

In order to secure the highest conservation of man power and material resources, we urge complete prohibition of the liquor traffic during the period of the war; and as mothers of America we plead that the same protection against liquor and vice accorded to our soldiers and sailors at home be extended to them abroad, and earnestly protest against drink being furnished which is more deadly than machine guns and U-boats.

SUFFRAGE

We urge united effort for the submission of the federal amendment to the constitution granting suffrage to women on equal terms with men and the continuance of every effort in state-wide campaigns for partial or full suffrage for women.

PURITY

We rejoice that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy have given official recognition to the great truth which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has so long promulgated, that continence is the only safeguard against the ills attendant upon sexual vice.

We again declare segregation and regulation of prostitution to be wrong in principle and utterly inadequate to lessen the evil.

We record our appreciation of the laws already enacted by Congress for the protection of our soldiers, and call upon our government to give adequate protection to our men both at home and abroad, and to our women in industry, and we call upon the mothers of the nation to give to our girls and boys the protection of knowledge and proper restraint.

WAR

While we deplore war as wholly evil in its inception, we yet believe that when it became necessary for our nation to enter the present world conflict, we came in on these high moral grounds, namely: "To vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power, and to set up among the really free and self-governed people of the world such a concert of purpose and action as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free."

As home makers and housekeepers we pledge to the government our loyal support in all food conservation and service registration plans, and our allegiance as patriots, to the end that Christian democracy and a just and lasting peace may be established throughout the world.

CO-OPERATION WITH ALLIES

We recognize that with our entrance into the world struggle against autocracy we have become allies in the great moral warfare against drink, and extend the greetings and sympathy of this convention to all the national branches of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union now engaged in the effort to hasten victory for the forces of world democracy through the enactment of national and war prohibition.

THANKS

We hereby voice our hearty and sincere thanks to the friends of our cause and to our comrades of the District of Columbia unions for the cordial welcomes accorded us, for all the many arrangements made for our comfort and pleasure and the success of the convention. To all who have contributed in any way to make this a great and memorable occasion, we hereby express our profound gratitude and deep sense of appreciation, and shall take with us only the most pleasant memories of our convention in our saloonless Capital City in 1917.

Children in War Time

be fought over in Europe and it must be fought here at home, so that the men shall not come back to find home and family standards destroyed or even lowered over here. To accomplish that will require enormous sacrifices for the leisure and comfortable class, sacrifices that we have not yet begun to measure, but we must have no lower ideal as the purpose of this war.

And one last word as to the spirit in which our work must be done. Not very long ago I heard a young woman, whose husband had gone to France, tell how proud she was to have him go, because she realized the patriotism such a determination expressed, but as she turned back to her family, she said, "Now I am searching for a creed for my children. They must not grow up in an atmosphere of hate." It is for the women—the women of this day and of this generation upon whom rests this enormous responsibility for keeping the home fires burning bright—to conduct our great campaign in a spirit which shall eliminate that ugly hate—the root and the essence of war. This will be a very little world after this war is over. It is, indeed, a very little world today. It became infinitely little the moment we went into what three years ago seemed a remote war. We, the women of America, must see to it that the war behind the lines is fought in a spirit of such devotion, such true love for humanity that hate shall be eliminated.

NATIONAL W. C. T. U. PUBLISHING HOUSE
Evanston, Illinois

CANADA AT WAR

MRS. GORDON WRIGHT, President Dominion of Canada W. C. T. U.

Address delivered at the National Convention

I count myself indeed privileged to be with you on this great occasion, this epoch-marking, this historic occasion, when from coast to coast the white ribbon motherhood and sisterhood of your land assemble in National convention and for the first time meet under the unfurled banner of American democracy, lined up in allied march, victoryward, not alone for national protection, but for world victory and human liberty. I also count myself singularly fortunate in that upon the first time I have had the honor to foregather with you, your chosen meeting place is the governmental center of your national life. Washington, the beautiful, Washington purified and invigorated into a greater power, not alone in the United States but in the world at large, because of the ban it has placed upon the liquor traffic. All honor to the advanced public sentiment which has made this fine achievement a possibility, and all honor to your twenty-seven prohibition states which blazed the pathway for this forward move at your nation's Capital.

Nation-Wide Prohibition Aim of Dominion W. C. T. U.

May I linger long enough to congratulate your law-makers on the partial but effective prohibition war emergency measure, which renders illegal the use of grain for the manufacture of potable or distilled liquors. But white ribboners are not yet satisfied. An order in council of our own federal government, which became operative November 20, marks the self-same advance, but we of the Dominion W. C. T. U. cannot think of relaxing by one jot or tittle any possible effort for the securing of a nation-wide prohibitory law, at least during the period of the war. Indeed, in war's first opening days, those sadly unreal days, we took the stand, and have unflinchingly held to it, that not until we had banished this great offense to God, this menace to a nation's highest development and expansion, the legalized liquor traffic, had we the right to expect victory for our arms. Yet, we white ribbon mothers, fearing this, facing this, unfalteringly gave consent to our sons and our husbands to answer the high, strong call of duty and of Empire, though from the first hour of our inception as an organization we had taken the firm attitude that the only ethical way, the only righteous way, to settle international difficulties is through arbitration. Alas! we little dreamed that a great, powerful nation, inoculated to the last degree with the war virus, and filled with an insatiate lust for world conquest, and world dominion, would be ignoble enough to attack a little, defenseless kingdom—brave, heroic Belgium. England, the motherland of most of us here assembled, would have been unworthy of the proud position she occupies among the world's nations had she not done as she did—gone at once to Belgium's aid—and Canada, one of the choicest jewels in her imperial crown, would have been unworthy to call her mother had she not unhesitatingly sent forth her sons. And so we gave them, our boys from their safeguarded, cherished homes, our university trained men—for in Canada's first division went verily the flower of the Dominion's young manhood.

Yet all the while we were possessed with the thought that history was repeating itself, that again the Lord Jehovah was saying to us, as He did to Joshua of old, "There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel; thou canst not stand before thine enemies until ye take away the accursed thing from among you."

Mrs. Gordon Wright, President of the Dominion W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Wright is the mother of three sons who are serving in the Canadian Army. Her husband, Chief Recruiting Officer, has secured more recruits than any other man in Canada. Her brother, Hon. Newton Rowell, as president of the Privy Council and Acting President of the War Cabinet, occupies a position second only to that of the Prime Minister. His influence is unfalteringly on the side of prohibition and other righteous governmental policies.

It is sadly strange that it has taken so long for our statesmen and yours and those of the motherland to catch the vision that God really meant what He said when through His prophet He proclaimed, "If ye walk in my statutes and keep my commandments and do them . . . I will give peace in the land and ye shall lie down and none shall make you afraid, and I will rid evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land." Had these great Bible truths been realized and given practical expression, who dares say that this awful carnage might not now have been finished or perhaps never have been. Our Dominion Woman's Christian Temperance Union was the first organization to petition our government for the complete prohibition of the manufacture of all liquors during the period of the war, not alone to conserve our grain for national use—food—but also to preserve the best physical and mental development of our most precious asset—our nation's young manhood.

Although the prayer of our petition has not yet been answered in full, we are hopeful, most hopeful, that the day is not far distant when, from our fortress city of Halifax on the east to our naval base, Esquimalt, on the west, and from our southern boundary to our well-nigh boundless northern limits, shall float the white flag of prohibition. Nor is our hope a foundationless one. At last Canada's statesmen have caught the vision of a land in peril, so acute, so deadly a peril, that strife for petty place, for party preferment must be laid aside, if not forgotten, and a unification of thought and action of Canada's law-makers formed, with one outstanding purpose—to help end this war (which we earnestly hope is a war upon war) by sending forth at the earliest possible moment as full reinforcements as our country can supply. In this new union government we find Sir George Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, a lifelong prohibitionist, and Hon. Newton Rowell, president of the Privy Council and acting president of the War Cabinet, who occupies a position only second in importance to that of the Prime Minister. This is the man who, as leader of Ontario's opposition, preferred to go down to political defeat as the standard bearer of the "Banish the Bar" policy for Ontario, rather than climb into power on any neutral or compromise policy. Canada is fast coming to her own along prohibition lines. The faith and hope and courage and agonized prayers of her white ribbon motherhood are nearing their fullest fruition. We have already sent to Sir Robert Borden "a notice of motion," stating that as soon as the new government is formed the Dominion Woman's Christian Temperance Union will again present its request for prohibition of the manufacture of all liquors in Canada, as a war emergency measure.

I am not unmindful of some specific requests which came to me through your corresponding secretary touching conditions growing out of Canada at war. First, what about the rum ration? Realizing the vital importance of most accurate answers, I have sought information at the fountain head, Major General Mewburn, Canada's Minister of Militia, who was good enough to give full data. Major General Mewburn states, "The rum ration consists of one gill of Jamaica rum, issued to soldiers desiring it, as an emergency stimulant, during the winter months, when the weather is very wet, or after special exposure or exertion. Rum is not used nor issued as a beverage. Its use for the above purpose has been universal, both in the Navy and Army for many years." Dr. Chown, official head of the Methodist Church in Canada, who has just returned from a tour of investigation at the Front, fully corroborates this statement, saying, "Nowhere have I been able to find that the rum ration (about a thimble full) has been given other than medically."

Lord Kitchener Warns British Soldiers Against Drink

Rev. Dr. Gordon (Ralph Connor of literary fame) goes even farther. Upon his return from the Front, he stated to our government that without hesitation he would say the provision of this stimulant "under the strong existing safeguard, is necessary for the health of our troops in the field." With all deference to the high authorities quoted, we white ribboners must still continue to desire and earnestly pray that applied science may speedily discover a medicinal substitute for this (at best) undesirable stimulant. Would that our honored Field Marshal, Lord Kitchener, were still with us to sound his strong high note of warning, as contained in his instructions to every man in the empire's service. From his parting, personal message, just one sentence must suffice: "Your duty cannot be done unless your health is sound, so keep constantly on your guard against any excesses. In this new experience you may find temptations both in wine and women. You must entirely resist both temptations and while treating all women with perfect courtesy, avoid any intimacy. Do your duty bravely, fear God, honor the King."

No Wine Served to Men in the Trenches

In regard "to the wine served the men in the trenches," so far as we can learn, no wine is served to them, and for this we are profoundly thankful.

But it is with unfeigned regret we mothers of Canada learned that though our Militia department, under General Sir Sam Hughes, had abolished the wet canteen when our troops went over seas, and were under British direction, by order of General Alderson, the wet canteen was introduced into our training camps

Mr. Frederick Walcott, Representative of Federal Food Administration, Speaks on Food Conservation

Mr. Frederick Walcott, representing Mr. Herbert Hoover, Federal Food Commissioner, spoke on food conservation, basing his appeal on his experience in Europe among the starving women and children of Poland and other countries. With great dramatic power he pictured the pitiful, heart-breaking condition of these victims of the war, starving by the thousands for lack of food. Asserting, "It is up to this country to win this war by dealing promptly and effectively with the food situation," Mr. Walcott suggested that in order to do what we are asked, "Double the amount of cereal exports to the Allies over last year," we co-operate with the Federal Food administration in the following ways:

1. Save by substitution. 2. Save by not permitting grain to be used in intoxicating liquors. 3. Save by eliminating household waste, for which we, as a nation, are notorious. "What we are now asking this country to do," he said, "is a very mild request, but I give you fair warning that if this war goes on even six or eight months longer, the people of this country are going to be asked to respond to a drastic program such as they have so far never dreamed of. Mr. Hoover asks of us four simple things:

"1. Save wheat in order to double our exports of wheat. Substitute for wheat other cereals, principally corn and oats.

"2. Save meats, especially red meats: pork, beef and mutton.

"3. Save animal fats, for which we must substitute vegetable oils, chief among which are corn oil and cottonseed oil.

"4. Save sugar. English and French troops are practically without sugar in their rations, and they need it. America must provide it."

At this point Mr. Walcott read the statement issued by the administration (heretofore published in THE UNION SIGNAL) in regard to the reduction of the alcoholic content of beer.

In reply to a question asked from the floor of the convention as to whether the grain we are saving is being used in the manufacture of beer on the other side of the ocean, Mr. Walcott replied:

"No distillation is in progress now in England or France, except for industrial alcohol for munition purposes, for which they are using whisky and brandy redistilled in former years. Brewing in England has been reduced one-fourth in volume in barrel. No grain shipped from America to England has been, or will be, used for the manufacture of beverage alcohol. Furthermore, beer has been reduced to under 2½ per cent and none of our grains are going over there to be used in the making of malted liquors."

Canada at War

in England. At once our Dominion union sent earnest protest over seas. We hold in our possession, a now precious document, signed "Kitchener, acknowledging receipt of same," but so far, the wet canteen is still an institution among our troops, though its use is greatly restricted, as will be seen from the following statement made by our present Minister of Militia: "As you know, the Canadian military authorities have encouraged and enforced abstention from use of alcoholic liquors in camps. All are agreed that discipline and training are promoted by such a course. By actual practice it has been found that the wet canteen system permits of better control than would be possible if these canteens were not allowed, and men were encouraged to go to public houses or other places not under military supervision." No "hard" liquor is permitted to be sold at any wet canteen in Canadian areas, light or bitter beers being all that are used and the "beer bar" is allowed to be open only for an hour and a half at the mid-day meal and from 5:30 to 9:30. "You will notice," adds Major General Mewburn, "that these hours cover two meals, and the men are required to parade immediately after dinner, and as the period after supper until 'Lights Out' is devoted to all sorts of amusements, there is very little temptation to excess between 5:30 and 9:30."

Again, while grateful for this modicum of safeguarding, we women of Canada, members of an organization similar to your own, feel most strongly that when we unhesitatingly sent forth our best beloved to help the motherland in her brave defense of the weak against the strong—and in the hour of her own national peril, we were not asking too much in requesting that the home training of our sons and the natural safeguards our own government had thrown around them, should be sustained, and that no undesirable alternative, such as the wet canteen, even under the most favorable conditions, or licensed English public houses, should be given them in return for their devotion and heed to duty's call.

Major General Mewburn further assures us that "the moral safeguards for troops in camps and in the field are as effective as can be provided. They consist of the service of qualified chaplains, the influence of Y. M. C. A. workers and institutions, and the provision of healthy sports and clean amusements."

Canadian Dry Battalion Makes 99 Per Cent Health Record

Quoting from further official records, "It is interesting to note that the incidence of disease among Canadian troops in Britain is no higher than in Canada, and furthermore, is decidedly lower among Canadian troops than among other troops in Britain under similar conditions." The official record keeper thus explains, "This is probably due, in part at least, to the large prevalence of teetotalism among the Canadians." This statement is more than substantiated by the record of the dry battalion, raised in our Canadian west, the chaplain of which bore testimony to the fact of their exceptional record; 99 per cent of the men presented a clear and clean "bill of health," prior to their leaving England for the Front. In face of all known and unknown dangers may I, the mother of sons at the Front, take time enough to say that it is possible to have sons in the battle line and yet be kept free from undue anxiety. God is just as near them, yea, we believe infinitely nearer to many, than here in the homeland. The safeguards of a Christian home and the years of tender, loving training and earnest prayer will bear, is bearing, richest fruitage. This is our main safeguard, our "rock of defense." The careful home training which has surrounded our sons through the years and the importunate, faith-filled prayers on their behalf, is an earnest that a prayer-hearing, covenant-keeping God will guard those committed to His care. One further word touching menacing dangers indicated in statements made by Dr. Chown, and corroborated by letters received from those in touch with conditions over seas—we greatly fear our Canadian soldiers, to use Dr. Chown's own words, "are subjected to greater temptations while in London than they should be called upon to bear." A senior chaplain in charge of the Australian forces, writes of "the severe and unjust temptations to which our men are subjected in London." We earnestly hope that the attention of the imperial authorities has been drawn to this grave matter and that an improvement in the environment surrounding our men, while in London, may speedily be effected. But this great menace emphasizes the need for prayer, and still more prayer on their behalf.

We white ribboners in Canada made, perhaps, a grave mistake, at the beginning of the war, in not focusing the efforts of our membership in our own patriotic or Red Cross work, and standing unitedly together, having this special department affiliated with our Canadian Red Cross through which all our supplies and goods have gone. We will now never be able to tabulate our tremendous activities in this particular, but through the authorized Red Cross and Canadian war contingent associations our membership has rendered valiant service.

After war's outbreak the Dominion W. C. T. U. felt that the department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors should be immeasurably enlarged. It is now known as the department of Militia and Red Cross work with the former superintendent, Mrs. E. Starr Whitty, as its official head. The work tabulated through this department does not begin to represent the tremendous achievements of our white ribboners along relief lines, for as previously stated we neglected to arrange for this, but we are greatly impressed with the thought that perhaps God's plan for the white ribbon women in this great world conflict is work along more spiritual lines. Any effort that will promote the moral or spiritual welfare of our men in khaki—those men who are going forth to hold for our sakes a daily tryst with death—should be of chief concern to us. Ah, surely this should be all-appealing work to an organization such as ours!

Indeed, sometimes we think "We have come to the Kingdom for such a time as this," for soon in your land, as well as now in my land, the after consequences of war will confront us. I know of no organization in your land better equipped for this work than your own National W. C. T. U. with its splendid machinery from the fountain head, the National organization, down to the most remote union in the most remote section of your republic.

Already in Canada there is an increasing host of widows and fatherless children, of lonely, bereft mothers. Have they not great claim upon us? Already over a thousand men have returned stricken with tubercular trouble. Then there are the wounded, the halt, the blind, the nerve-racked men. Oh, the ghastly appealing multitude of sufferers that need just such help as we can give.

Dear comrades in arms, if you will permit me to say it, let there be no diminution of effort, no relaxation from the strenuous work on your part, no standing still anywhere in white ribbon ranks, but rather an expansion of plans. "Forward, March!" is the word of command. Increased membership, increased effort, and more important still, increased spirituality should be your slogan and ours for 1918.

WHEN CONGRESS CAME TO CONVENTION

UNITED STATES SENATORS GORE, FERNALD, SHAFROTH, HALE, AND REPRESENTATIVES COOPER, RANDALL, DECKER, CRISP, LITTLE, REED, WINGO, KELLY, TIMBERLAKE, KEATING, HERSEY AND PETERS SPEAK AT NATIONAL MEETING—SOUND OPTIMISTIC NOTE CONCERNING NATIONAL PROHIBITION

"Some of us have been wishing our Convention could visit Congress," remarked Miss Gordon in introducing some members of that body. "But, behold, Congress has come to visit our Convention." One of the delights of the great meeting was the "dropping in" of Congressional friends from the Capitol, state presidents vying with each other in an effort to secure an attendance of Senators and Representatives from their respective states. We give brief excerpts from their speeches, as follows:

Senator Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma Confesses Himself a Convert to Woman Suffrage

I esteem it a great privilege to be presented to this magnificent convention of American women. It would of course be unfitting to speak of temperance before the W. C. T. U. That would be a good deal like carrying gold to Ophir or pearls to Ceylon. It would be like an untutored boy addressing a convention of learned Gamaliels. I may say, however, that I want you women to have anything on earth you want and more, too, if you want it, and I rather think you do. I may say for myself as a politician that I am for you women right or wrong. I say that because I know you are in the right, because I know that you stand for the right, that you stand for temperance, that you stand for justice, that you stand for a dry nation, and for a sober world, and because I know you stand for the achievement of an honorable and everlasting peace. I must congratulate you on the crusade that you have been waging with so much patience. The crusade of the middle ages endured for two centuries, and it was merely a passing episode. You have been waging a crusade for centuries. The first prohibitory law I have been able to find was issued by the Emperor of China. The crusade is still being waged, but I congratulate you upon your progress and upon the prospect of victory. You can already look down into the valleys of the promised land, a land flowing not with malt, vinous or distilled liquors, but with milk and honey. I pledge you my continued support. I am willing to help you whenever and wherever I can. Certainly I will do what I can to help in securing the ratification of the prohibition amendment. And now let me make a confession. I intend to vote for the woman suffrage amendment pending in Oklahoma and I intend to vote for the Federal amendment. I formerly opposed woman suffrage, but I have changed my mind. People vote in accordance with their principles, their habits and their prejudices. Women have better principles, prejudices and habits than men and so I believe in giving them the vote. We are engaged in the worst war of the ages. Let us pray God that it may be the last war of the ages. I believe if all the women were invested with suffrage, war could easily be prevented. I want to see the time come when the mothers as they rock their babes to sleep and invoke God's blessing upon them may know that they are not raising them to give them as sacrifices upon the bloody altars of war.

Senator Bert M. Fernald of Maine Enumerates Advantages of Prohibition

It gives me unusual pleasure to bring to you greetings from the old state of Maine, the first to embrace prohibition. For fifty years that grand old state has held up the standard, and for thirty-five years we have had in our constitution a law against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. We have lived up to our motto—Dirigo—We Lead. And if there is one thing of which I am more proud than another it is that in this great national movement the state of Maine was the first. Well can I remember when as a young man I was pointed to as coming from the state having prohibition, and I have lived to see a majority of this country embrace that great doctrine. In those early days before we had prohibition we were laggards in all good causes, and I want to tell you that one reason for our marvelous progress has been the elimination of the legalized liquor traffic. We have more schools and a wider circulation of newspapers than any other state. A few years ago when I was governor of the state and fighting for this great principle I took occasion to look about the country to see what other states were doing. In that splendid commonwealth of Massachusetts only 19 per cent of her citizens own their homes. In Connecticut only 18 per cent, in the great state of New York that has license, only 17 per cent own their homes, but in our grand old state of Maine that has had prohibition for fifty years, 49 per cent of the people own the homes in which they live. I want to assure you that our delegation in Congress will stand steadfast for the principles our state represents.

Senator John F. Shafroth of Colorado Predicts Victory in the House for Prohibition Amendment

Senator Shafroth quoted England's premier, the Hon. David Lloyd George, General von Moltke of Germany, and Gen. Frederick D. Grant to show what a great handicap the use of alcoholic beverages is in the army. "Having heard the testimony of these three men," said Senator Shafroth, "perhaps the men best qualified of any in the world to speak on the evil effects of drink to the soldiers, it does seem that Congress and the people of the United States should be aroused to the dangers of strong drink. It is said that the Army War College in this city several years ago made an estimate of the deaths caused by the war, and stated the number of deaths as 700,000, and the number of wounded in battle as over 2,000,000. It has also been estimated that the total number of deaths and disabilities by reason of strong drink amounts, among the white race, to 3,500,000 per year. In other words, every year there are greater losses from drink than have resulted from all the destructive wars of the world from before the birth of Christ up to the time of this war. This great issue is coming to a focus. We are going to pass upon the question in Congress very soon. I believe it is going to be carried in the House of Representatives by fully as large a majority as it was carried in the Senate. And when this has been done the greatest liberty-loving people in the world will have put the stamp of disapproval upon the manufacture and sale of liquor.

Senator Frederick Hale Reminds Convention that the Attitude of the Representatives from Maine is Always Right on the Prohibition Question

Senator Hale, the son of Hon. Eugene Hale, introduced by Miss Gordon as the honored son of an honored father, referred briefly to the attitude of the Senators and Congressmen from Maine on the prohibition question suggesting that the vote of the Maine delegation in the Senate on the resolution for Constitutional Prohibition plainly showed where they stood on the question.

Congressman John J. Cooper, Son of an Ohio White Ribboner and a Life Member of the W. C. T. U.

I have now and always have had a warm feeling of brotherly love in my heart for the W. C. T. U., for those who have been nearest and dearest to me in this life have been affiliated with your great organization. How well do I remember many years ago when I was the companion of a Christian mother in Ohio, as she went around through different sections of the state working for the cause of temperance, and whatever little part I may have taken in this great temperance movement today I owe to the teachings of that God-fearing mother who wore upon her breast the little white bow. Then again I feel proud of the fact that my wife, the mother of my boys, wears the white ribbon. There is hanging upon the walls of my home back in Youngstown, Ohio, a little certificate which I prize most highly, and I trust and pray that I shall always prove worthy of that little emblem. For that certificate hanging upon the walls of my home signifies that I am a life member of the W. C. T. U. I feel proud of the splendid patriotic attitude this convention is taking at this time. As I was listening last evening to the wonderful address of Mrs. Mary Harris Armor I thought of the stand the liquor people are taking in this country at this time along patriotic lines. You know they maintain we cannot win this war unless we are a drunken nation. This is a pretty bold statement for me to make from this platform, but I am going to prove it to you by reading to you part of a letter from the Model License League: (Congressman Cooper at this point read a letter from the president of the Model License League saying that that organization believed the soldiers needed wine and beer and whisky in and out of the trenches and that a good drink by the soldiers would insure a steadiness of nerve that would win battles.) What an insult for these liquor men to say that your boys and my boys will be cowards unless their minds are befuddled by alcoholic liquors. What a consolation it must be to the mothers of this land that their boys who have been reared in good Christian homes located in dry territory, brought up under the teachings of Christian fathers and mothers, that these boys may be given intoxicating liquors and be sent back confirmed drinkers.

This letter to which I refer was signed by the president of the Model License League of America, one of the greatest and strongest liquor organizations in the country. And as a rule the president of an organization always represents the sentiment of the stockholders, so you can see where the liquor dealers stand on this great question. I say that no American who has a drop of red blood in his body can listen to the contents of that letter without determining to repudiate such an insult to our soldiers.

Congressman Charles H. Randall of California Tells of Los Angeles Victory

I am very happy to greet the conquering army which has come to Washington, I am informed, to complete the interment of John Barleycorn, not only for the term of the war, but for all time to come. Furthermore, I am glad for the first time to be introduced as a prohibition Congressman from a dry community. Heretofore, I have been introduced often as the only prohibitionist in Congress from the wettest state in the Union—California. Of course I have had to take some time to explain. Explanations are a thing of the past, because the next dry Congressman from a really wet state, will have to explain his state, and I will say that I now represent the largest city on the American continent which is dry, for Los Angeles voted one week ago last Tuesday by 20,000 majority (Applause), to close out the liquor business, and November of next year the voters of California will close the last wet gap between the extremity of Alaska and the Gulf of California.

I have explained heretofore how I came to be elected. California does things differently from West Virginia, where I am happy to hear the men vote as the women tell them to, and were it not for the votes of the Los Angeles Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which at the time of my first election was the largest local union in the United States, a union organized by Frances Willard, I think that I should not be here tonight.

You have come to Washington, as I take it, with a definite program, and I am here to promise you that if you put that program up to this session of Congress, Congress will give it to you in full.

I understand that you want the National Constitutional Prohibition amendment adopted before the holidays, and that you want the immediate enactment of wartime prohibition. Congress is ready to give you that if you demand it.

Congressman Perl D. Decker of Missouri Explains "Who Is the Governor"

The man who thinks that any war can be won without the sacrifice and loyalty of the women of the country has not yet cut his wisdom teeth. Perhaps you have heard the story of Governor Bob Taylor of Tennessee, who had not only southern hospitality but a brand all his own. He would even get up in the night to meet and talk with his constituents. One day the dinner was on the table and was getting cold and his wife was getting hot, when the colored servant announced that four gentlemen were down in the parlor and wished to see the governor of Tennessee. The governor said, "Tell them I will be right down," but his wife said, "Sam, tell them the governor of Tennessee is at dinner and will be down presently." The governor again repeated his message to the servant, and the wife of the governor again commanded the man to deliver the message as she had given it. Finally, Governor Bob said, "Sam, do you know who is the governor of Tennessee?" Sam replied, "Yaas, yaas, boss, I know who is the governor of Tennessee. I'll tell the gentlemen they'll have to wait half an hour for the gentleman to come down." Most of the men in this country are beginning to realize more than ever before "who is the governor" in this nation, and before this awful war is over they will know it better than they ever knew it before. I believe we will soon settle the question in America of the right of the women to decide at the polls any question which concerns their welfare or the welfare of their children.

Congressman Charles R. Crisp of Georgia a Longtime Supporter of Prohibition, Local, County, State and National

I am very conscious of the high honor conferred upon me in being introduced to this convention. I believe the greatest asset of any nation is its men and women and I know their best interests are advanced by prohibition. From the time I became of age I have always voted for and supported prohibition whether it was in my city, my county, my state or my nation. It has been a source of great joy to me to see the cause of prohibition grow throughout the United States until today it is a militant power in every state of the Union, and I am confidently hoping before the Christmas recess the resolution will be submitted to the states for ratification. In my judgment your great body is more responsible for the growth of prohibition sentiment than all the other agencies in the United States combined and I wish you Godspeed in your noble work.

Congressman E. C. Little of Kansas Declares Intemperance and Vice the Greatest Trouble-Brewers in the Army

In the few months I have been in Congress I have resolutely refused to announce how I would vote in advance, but this afternoon a reporter for the New York World asked me whether I would vote for prohibition and woman suffrage, and I told him "Yes," that I would vote for both measures. So I have put my hand to the plow and I will not turn back. If the other Members of Congress were to vote as do the Representatives from Kansas, we should have national prohibition and woman suffrage very soon. My experience in the Army in the Philippines showed me that from intemperance and the vices that accompany it come our greatest troubles. If we could have absolute abstinence in the Army we would add 50 per cent to its efficiency. Because I realized this the very night war was declared I introduced in Congress a bill providing for the creation of a zone twenty miles wide around every fort and camp as long as this war should continue. Unfortunately there is a camp in New York City, in San Francisco and other large cities and if such a law had been passed it would have closed the saloons in these cities. This feature made it difficult to pass the bill because it aroused the suspicions of the Representatives of these sections of the country. Otherwise we would have had national prohibition some time ago, for the moment we close the saloons in the big cities we break the backbone of the liquor traffic in the United States.

"We are only now Discovering the Power of the Womanhood of America," says Congressman Stuart Reed of West Virginia

I have been introduced as from West Virginia, the state that occupies a rather unique position nationally. The women of my state have not yet been accorded the ballot, but the men are so subservient and so completely in harmony with the aims and aspirations of the women of West Virginia that—God bless them!—we have given them everything they wanted without their having to vote. When the question of prohibition came up, West Virginia set a pace that has not yet been excelled in our nation in voting for this great measure in our government and under our glorious flag!

We are all getting a greater vision of what America means today than we ever did before. We are getting our Americanism unified; we are understanding it. Someone said one time that Columbus did not discover America, that Columbus just discovered the shell of America. America was another name for opportunity, and it's the splendid brain-power of America's men and women that has been discovering America all these years. There came the scientist, Audubon, to discover "bird" America; Bancroft and other historians to discover "historical" America; the Wrights to discover the way to "cloudland" America; and Longfellow, Whittier and James Whitcomb Riley to discover "poetic" America. Now we are discovering the power of the women of America, and I have faith to believe that the manhood and the womanhood of America will together carry the old flag to a new destiny; that what America stands for—America, that land hidden away so long, reserved, we believe, to be the great stage upon which should be developed that character that will make of our country the Messiah to the nations, like a sunburst of liberty, like an apotheosis of hope, will flood this old world of ours with the sunshine of the principles for which the women of America stand.

Congressman Otis Wingo of Arkansas Defends Total Abstinence for the Soldier

I am proud of the fact that I represent a state that has driven from its borders one of mankind's worst evils. You have noticed in the organs of those who oppose your work the statement that if we undertake to drive alcoholic liquor from this country and keep it from the soldiers they will not put up as good a fight at the front. My blood always boils with indignation when I hear that a soldier cannot fight without alcoholic liquors. I do not believe that the brain of any man needs to be poisoned in order to make him brave. I want my boy to go into this fight with a steady hand and a clear brain. If he must go down to the depths, I want him to go to the open grave with a sober prayer, not stupefied by drink.

Congressman Clyde Kelly of Pennsylvania Characterizes the Triumph of Prohibition as a Victory for Democracy

In this world there is not room enough for a triumphant Kaiser in Berlin and a free American citizen in Washington City. Another thing is equally true: There is not room enough in America for the organized liquor traffic and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union at the same time! These are two ideas which are so eternally opposed that one or the other must triumph in a decisive battle. Now we have come to a time when the issue must be decided and I have no doubt of the result,—the organized liquor traffic must be destroyed! It must be destroyed because of the lives it has wrecked, the homes it has robbed, the wealth and property it has ruined. The liquor traffic must be destroyed because of its influence in politics, its vicious corruption of the very source of government, its monopoly of the ballot, and robbing of the ballot box, its cracking the whip over the candidates for offices, and the cowards it has made of men in public office. It must go because it's an evil that threatens the ruin of our entire body politic. I am for the national constitutional amendment that is now awaiting action in the House of Representatives because it dares put into politics a moral issue, and scorns those fears that have made cowards of so many men in the past. I am for it because it is a national solution of a nation-wide question, because it refuses to be swept aside by states rights ideas on a national question. I am for it because it is a fundamental solution of a fundamental evil, and I say to you that that solution is coming, and is coming soon.

I congratulate this organization with all my heart. I have been a part of it and have been closely connected with it for some time; have known something of its history from its beginning, almost from my own family. I say to you now President Wilson expressed it well when he said, "Now the time has come when we must all think and serve and act together." We now begin to see it is a test of sanity to work together in a noble cause.

I heard Elbert Hubbard say just a week before he sailed on that ill-fated Lusitania from which he went down to a watery grave that he had been in a New York insane asylum, had gone out over the grounds and had witnessed with great pleasure various things of interest. About a mile away from the buildings, out in the park, he found a little bit of a manikin guard in charge of twenty-five of the huskiest insane inmates he ever had seen, people like heavyweight prize fighters.

He walked over to the guard and asked:

"What would you do, Mr. Guard, if these twenty-five husky men should all come after you at one time and attempt to overpower you?"

"Why," he said, "you would not last a minute, you have no weapons, you have no gun, not even a club. What would you do?"

And the little guard, looking up into Mr. Hubbard's face, with a smile, replied:

"Mr. Hubbard, you belong right here all right. Why don't those men get together and come at me all at once? Why if they could get together with anybody, at any time, at any place, they would not be here. That's why they are in an insane asylum—they can't get together!"

It is true that it is a test of sanity to be able to "get together" as you are getting together in these various organizations for a concerted drive. I think this is the most wonderful age in the world in which we could be living. I think this is an age that is going to have its influence on unborn centuries like the days of Caesar or Alexander, or Napoleon. I believe with all my heart that in the next five years this loved nation of ours—America—is going to mould the history of the next five hundred years of the world's history. Why is our position so important? It's a pivotal point in all the world's history, and we are moulding the future, because we have come down to the mightiest battle of fundamental ideas that the world has ever seen. On one side is the idea of autocracy, the idea of despotism, the idea that one man should sit on a plush covered chair and give orders to his people, the idea that one of a few men has been born to ride on the backs of the people. And I say to you that no brighter, cleaner blade has ever flashed defiance at this gigantic evil than the sword that has been wielded by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of America. You have kept the battle up for years. Now lay your weapons by, for victory is yours; and your victory will be the victory of every man, woman and child in all America. It will be a victory for the Democracy for which we are fighting all around the world.

Frances Willard and Lillian Stevens "Spiritual Mothers" of the World, says Congressman Charles B. Timberlake of Colorado

I am a representative from Colorado, which, as you know, is a "sure enough" prohibition state, and that condition was brought about largely through the influence of your organization. Today I believe that my sainted father and mother, whose prayers I heard in my youth ascend to heaven for this cause, will be looking down with favor upon the action that is to be taken very soon in the United States Congress. I look with reverence upon the statue of our great leader, Frances Willard, standing in Statuary Hall, and I remember with like reverence Lillian M. N. Stevens, and it seems to me that they might be truly designated as the "spiritual mothers" of the world.

I have just returned from the battle front in France. One thing which I heard interested me immensely, that defeat of the Germans at the battle of the Marne was due, in addition to strategical mistakes, to the fact that the Germans had invaded a great wine producing country and before the battle indulged in large quantities of the wine and champagne stored in the cellars of the houses.

Congressman Edward Keating of Colorado says National Prohibition is Won

Congressman Edward Keating of Colorado stated with great positiveness that he believed the battle for National Constitutional Prohibition is won already in the national legislature. He asked to be excused from speaking longer in order to keep an engagement in the interests of that other important federal amendment, woman suffrage, of the fate of which he was not quite so certain. The convention sent him on his mission with enthusiastic applause for his good intentions.

Congressman Ira G. Hersey of Maine Predicts Anglo-Saxon Love of Country and Love of Home will Destroy the Liquor Traffic

The late Joseph Cook said that the day would come when the two strongest passions of the Anglo-Saxon—the love of country and the love of home—would lock themselves about the neck of the liquor traffic and destroy it forever. That day has come. The two strongest passions of the Anglo-Saxon race are about to lock themselves about the neck of the liquor traffic in this nation. Before the beautiful Christmas day of peace on earth, good will to men, shall dawn, the Congress of the United States will submit to the sovereign legislatures a national constitutional prohibition amendment.

Congressman John A. Peters of Maine

Congressman John A. Peters of Maine spoke optimistically of a speedy victory for national prohibition.

Ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly Furnishes Surprise Number on Convention Program

Ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly, former Presidential Candidate of the Prohibition Party, was a visitor at the Convention and spoke as follows:

Grateful I am to you for the warmth and cordiality of your greetings, and I shall not interrupt the proceedings of your great convention for more than a moment. It is significant that at a supreme hour in our own and the world's history when the energies and resources of the nation are being severely taxed, when the minds of men everywhere are centered upon great affairs of worldwide moment, that the cause for which you stand and for which you have so long and valiantly stood should continue to grip the thought and hold the heart of the American people. Its significance is finding reflection in progress made and in advancement achieved. I am wondering if ever again you will convene at so climacteric a moment. Even as you are assembling here the committee in the House of Representatives having in charge the two great measures in which you are so definitely interested is giving them consideration and in all probability will report them favorably within a few days. I know there are many wise and thoughtful men who believe it would be best to accept the resolution for the constitutional amendment as it came from the Senate. Personally I cannot agree with that conclusion. I believe it ought to be the attitude of those responsible for the advancement of this great cause that the action taken by Congress on the amendment submitted should be clearcut and beyond doubt or cavil. Personally, as a lawyer, I believe the six year clause in the amendment pending is an invalid clause. I know there are many lawyers who do not think so. I believe, however, that if thirty-six states should ratify the amendment—some of them after the six years—the courts would hold the amendment valid. But I believe, also, it would be unwise to charge so great a matter with so grave a doubt. The worst that might happen if the House were to strike the objectionable provision from the resolution and send it back to the Senate would be the Senate's non-concurrence and a conference between the two parties that in the end might accept the resolution with the clause in it. But, on the contrary, it might well be that the Senate would recede from the clause in the resolution and accept the amendment clean-cut for state action without limitation by the legislatures of the several states. And it seems to me it is our duty to hold steadfast to the ideal for which we fought without yielding here, there or anywhere. It is a great hour. Out of the stress and strain, the sacrifice and the atonement of the mighty worldwide war there is to come a new Heaven and a new earth. The world is to be made safe for Democracy, aye, and American Democracy is to be made safe for the world. I congratulate you on this vast assemblage. I congratulate you on having at the head of your organization the great woman who presides over your deliberations. I met her last on the battle front on the firing line way yonder in New Mexico. And in the victory won there no one had a greater part than she.

We in Washington hardly realize as yet that the saloon is actually gone from our midst. "Not in the storm or the whirlwind," but silently, as at the bidding of a still, small voice, was the change made. We sometimes wonder if, when the last light was out, the last saloon closed, there was not more stir in Heaven than on earth, for if angels rejoice over one repentant sinner, surely when the Capital city of a great nation banishes that which prevents repentance of so many of its victims, surely there must be rejoicing—and, oh, does she know? Our translated chieftain, whose cherished figure stands so silently in our National Capitol, does she not know of this fulfillment of her desires and hopes and life's work? Does she not, with her clearer vision, read in this the prophecy of that time when our legislators will see that the protection afforded to our National Capital, our Army and our Navy, should be extended to the humblest citizen of our great republic, from Maine to Texas, from Washington to Florida, and in its possessions everywhere? And we who rejoice together, do we ask ourselves, would anything be as it is had there never been a Frances Willard or a Lillian Stevens or an organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?

And now, with our hearts tender with memories, aglow with patriotism, astir with desire to do, we would reach out helping hands to our own land and beyond as never before, for where our laddies are, there our hearts are, and there must be our activities.

Truly we are learning the deeper meaning of our motto, "For God and Home and Every Land." Our work must never stop. Should this nation be voted dry tomorrow our vigilance must not cease or it would not long be kept dry. No matter what our government has done, is doing, and will do for our armies, still the W. C. T. U. must be on the alert and enfold these mothers' sons in a panoply of helpfulness. Not yet must we rest on our oars, but use them to stem the tide of sin, which would engulf men, women and children. More far-reaching and more wise must be our plans; more faithful our work in every detail, more earnest our prayers, more absolute our faith, more unselfish and more consecrated and more thoroughly organized our forces.

We welcome you as sisters beloved, we welcome you as comrades fighting under the white banner of purity. We welcome you from every state, a great company of women whose lives are consecrated to making this world purer and safer for oncoming generations, and we welcome you with a most loving and sisterly welcome and an earnest desire to do everything possible for your comfort while here.

Response for the Young People's Branch by Mary Frances Willard Anderson, National General Secretary

In behalf of the Young People's Branch of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, it is my privilege to thank these friends for their cordial greetings.

It is the ambition of every youthful American to visit Washington and I know every Young People's Branch member in the North, South, East and West rejoices that the District of Columbia is now free from the thralldom of the liquor power. We are grateful that no longer are these beautiful streets marred by the legalized saloon.

"For now we see it! In the sun
A free flag floats from yonder dome,
And at the nation's hearth and home
The justice long delayed is done."

Since our last convention great changes have come into the lives of the youth of America. In nearly every Young People's Branch the male membership has been depleted, and our young men have joined the army of the republic to fight for civilization and democracy. While we sorely miss them and are following them with our prayers, we rejoice that they have been trained in the temperance army of the Young People's Branch and we are sure they will march under "Old Glory" with heads erect, still steadfast to their principles of purity, total abstinence and prohibition.

Two years ago, on December 12, in this very auditorium, I was present at an inspiring meeting held in the interest of National Constitutional Prohibition. At that time there were nineteen dry states. In the intervening years battles have been fought and won in eight other states, in Alaska, in Porto Rico and in this, our nation's "hearth and home." Beginning here in Washington, with renewed courage the Young People's Branch members pledge anew to work, and to sacrifice, if need be, for the final overthrow of our enemy,—adopting for our own, a Scotch nobleman's motto, we'll "Stand firm! gang forward! and be aye ready."

It is not too much to ask that while the young manhood of America has been called to the colors we who are left "to keep the home fires burning 'til the boys come home" should do all in our power to win victories in the remaining license states that the boys may return to a country wholly redeemed and free, where waves the white flag of National Constitutional Prohibition.

Serve! Sacrifice! Ratify!

Our Slogan for 1918

The passage by the United States Congress of the federal prohibition amendment resolution, House Bill No. 17, on December 17, 1917, is a wondrous Christmas gift to our Republic. Well may the "Hallelujah Chorus" echo the world around. For the allied temperance forces this victory is the culmination of long years of unremitting toil. To members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union it is a sacred hour. We are grateful for our beloved "comrades of yesterday, now saints of God"—Frances E. Willard and Lillian M. N. Stevens—who with unfaltering faith led our great host of white ribboners to the goal of the passage of the prohibition referendum resolution. The hearts of all good people thank God for our prohibition pioneers in Congress and in the Nation who had faith to push the battle to the gates of Washington, and to agitate for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

As we enter a new year with its unbounded opportunities for service and for sacrifice we must mobilize for the mighty moral struggle for National Constitutional Prohibition now transferred from the Congress to the states. Ratification by thirty-six states, is our new watchword! We now enter upon the most intensive patriotic and meaningful stage of our battle for righteousness. "The fight is on, oh, Christian soldiers!" In God's name, "We shall win!"

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

STORY OF GREATEST DAY IN HISTORY OF PROHIBITION—HOUSE ADOPTS PROHIBITION REFERENDUM RESOLUTION—SENATE CONCURS—TEARS, LAUGHTER, PRAYERS FOLLOW ANNOUNCEMENT—VICTORY MEETING AT NATIONAL W. C. T. U. HEADQUARTERS

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS, National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation, Washington, D. C.

The victory is ours! Praise be to God! The greatest day in the history of the temperance reform has come and gone. The referendum bill for National Constitutional Prohibition has passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 282 in favor to 128 against, and the Senate concurred in this the following day by a vote of 47 to 8. Monday, December 17, 1917, had been set apart as the day when the House would take final action on the measure. This body convened at eleven o'clock, the doors being opened at ten o'clock. A large group of white ribboners stood for a half hour awaiting entrance. In this company were Miss Anna A. Gordon, president of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the entire official staff, it being the first time the General Officers had been to the Capitol together. As we waited, Miss Elizabeth Gordon began to repeat that beautiful Psalm, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills," which was taken up by the rest in a spirit of trust, believing that the God of our fathers, who "neither slumbers nor sleeps," would give us victory. The great galleries filled as soon as the doors were opened and all day, until six in the afternoon, that great "crowd of witnesses" sat almost motionless. The members of the House came in leisurely and just before the hands of the clock reached eleven, the Speaker, with smiling face and wearing the customary carnation pinned to his coat, ascended the steps of the rostrum and, with a sharp rap of the gavel, called the House to order. The blind chaplain, Rev. Dr. Couden, offered a fervent prayer and the journal of Saturday was read. The members kept coming in until the seats were nearly full. Representative Webb was surrounded by men desiring to speak during the day.

The Battle Begins

After a few preliminary arrangements as to time, etc., the battle began. Mr. Webb, standing in front of the Speaker's desk, opened the discussion by exhibiting a poster bearing the sentiment of a number of leaders of labor organizations, commending and endorsing prohibition, in reply to Samuel Gompers' recent statement that a majority of the leaders of labor were opposed to the proposed amendment. About fifty speeches, pro and con, were made during the day. As five o'clock, the hour set for the vote, drew near, the interest, if possible, grew more intense. Three amendments were offered which were overwhelmingly voted down, and at five minutes past five the roll call began. Silence prevailed as this historic roll call proceeded and the ayes and noes responded. This was the culmination of a struggle that has been fought over and over for many years. Tally sheets were in the hands of scores of people, and as the ayes began to gain there was a rustling of leaves and a feeling of expectancy everywhere. Not until the Speaker announced the result, 282 in favor to 128 against, were we absolutely sure we had won a great victory. Then the floodgates of enthusiasm burst forth. Even though the Speaker had twice warned the galleries "to refrain from any demonstration," it was impossible to stop them, both floor and galleries evidencing their delight.

Tears, Laughter and Prayers Follow Announcement of Victory

William Jennings Bryan had occupied a seat in the reporters' gallery most of the day and when the result was announced, he hurried to the floor and was the first to reach Mr. Webb to congratulate him. In the gallery where was seated the white ribbon contingent there was a diversity of expression in the way of rejoicing; some were in tears, others laughing, while still others with closed eyes were speaking to the Lord concerning His great goodness. It was very noticeable that those who had opposed the referendum hurried away, evidently greatly surprised at the result. One of the incidents of note connected with the roll call was when ex-Speaker Cannon, who had not responded to his name when called by the clerk, rose just before the vote was announced and asked that his name be called again. This was done, Mr. Cannon responding most heartily, "Aye," which brought a round of applause from his colleagues.

Mr. Bryan was asked if he believed that the action of Congress would bring a new issue into the next presidential campaign. "I do not," he responded, quickly. "How can you make an issue out of a thing that is already settled? I am very happy over the result. The majority was greater than we anticipated and it only shows how rapidly the tide is rising. The sentiment has now reached a point where it carries with it those who might have opposed it, had there been a prospect of successful opposition. I feel sure that the states will ratify it and I think it is likely to be ratified within three years, so that the next national conventions will have nothing to do but to express satisfaction over the success of national prohibition."

LETTER FROM MISS GORDON READ BY CONGRESSMAN WEBB AT HEARING IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

"It is an honor to present to you, and through you, to the House of Representatives, the appeal of 500,000 members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, praying for the passage of the joint resolution providing for a referendum to the states on National Constitutional Prohibition. This appeal comes from a host of home-loving women who with untiring energy and unstinted devotion have wrought marvelously for the moral and spiritual advancement of our country. This appeal comes from half a million patriots who answered promptly the call to the colors. The nobility of woman's sacrifice, the fine quality of her patriotic service, her keen discernment in the adjustment of industrial conditions for women and children, her tender ministrations at home and on the battlefield should entitle her to the granting by the Congress of this appeal.

"In addition to the petition of women members of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, I beg to present a huge petition of the indorsers of the joint resolution for a referendum to the states on National Constitutional Prohibition secured through the efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and representing 8,000,000 men and women of our republic. Adding to these the petitions sent directly to Members of Congress it is safe to say that our appeal is backed by more than 11,000,000 people. If these petitioners could be massed in solid phalanx in our Capital City you would see more than thirty times the population of the District of Columbia. Unquestionably it is an appeal for an act of true democracy, an appeal for a patriotic economic measure. Autocracy and alcohol must both be overthrown. 'Speed up' is the urgent cry echoing back to us from the awful battle fronts of Europe. 'Speed up' on prohibition legislation is the respectful appeal of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to the Congress of the United States. We pray that in this crucial time of a stupendous world crisis the House of Representatives will rise to this exalted opportunity and give to the legislatures of the various states the chance to deal with a question so enormously vital to the economic and moral interests of our republic. When the war is over and a righteous peace has been secured, only the clear brain of a sober nation can be intrusted with the solution of the mighty problems that will then confront the greatest democracy on earth—the United States of America."

Miss Gordon and Official Staff Wait Upon Mr. Webb to Congratulate Him

Miss Gordon, with her official staff, waited upon Mr. Webb to congratulate and thank him, in behalf of thousands of white ribboners, on the wonderful victory. During his address in the House Mr. Webb read a letter from Miss Gordon, which appears in full in the Congressional Record of Monday, December 17. This is a concise resume of the work of the W. C. T. U. in its efforts to secure a Federal prohibition amendment.

The House resolution gives the states seven years in which to act. The Senate resolution, passed August 1, 1917, by a vote of 65 to 20, gave the states six years to act; hence the need of ratification by the Senate of the House resolution. This was done on Tuesday, December 18, without the formality of a roll call, but by a rising vote, 47 to 8. Having received a two-thirds vote in both Houses, the resolution does not require the approval of the President. Ratification requires the approval of three-fourths of the states of the Union, thus removing the struggle from the Congress to the state legislatures. It will mean hard, persistent work to bring the states up to the required standard. The liquor hierarchy knows it means the death knell of their trade if the necessary thirty-six states ratify this resolution, so we call out to our never failing, always ready constituency, "Prepare for the battle." Money without stint will be used by the liquor power to prevent the election to the legislatures of men favorable to the amendment. We have many good men in every state and they are the ones to fill our legislative halls, and our energies must go to have them elected. I hail you, comrades of long, hard years! Let us still press on to complete victory.

Victory Meeting at National W. C. T. U. Headquarters

Monday evening, Washington headquarters of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was filled with a large company of happy visitors who, all unknown to each other or to those of us who stay at the Driscoll, gathered to rejoice over the events of the day. Miss Gordon, always ready to make much of such a coming together, turned it into a "Victory" meeting. Workers from Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana, West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Massachusetts and other states took part in what proved to be a service of prayer.

Excerpts From Speeches in House of Representatives on December 17

Arguments eloquent, convincing, incontrovertible in favor not only of the submission of the prohibition amendment but of the prohibition question generally were presented at the hearing in the House of Representatives on December 17.

Representative Webb of North Carolina, the sponsor of the measure in the House, spoke ably on all phases of the question.

"Is it not time for us to become aroused to the necessity of using the strong arm of the national government to help suppress this great source of national weakness?" said Mr. Webb. "This government can be no stronger than the combined strength and vitality of the people. The government can not serve its people better than by helping to preserve its people's strength and life.

"The problem of suppressing the use of alcohol as a beverage is bigger than a county or a state. It is a national problem. Local regulations have been of great help in curbing the evil but they are not adequate. It has been demonstrated by an honest effort to regulate the traffic that one wet county in a state will inflict this evil upon the rest of the state. The same is true of a wet state in relation to the other states of the Union. You can not, by regulations, localize the bad effects that flow from this national evil.

"Those engaged in fighting this great national evil think that this government should cease to be a partner of the liquor manufacturer and seller by licensing such business in return for the tax which such a policy is made to pay. It is estimated that for every dollar collected by the government in the shape of a tax $20 is paid into the pockets of the men carrying on this business by the poor, diseased slaves of drink. The government can not afford to pursue this policy for the sake of the revenue it derives, when by doing so it puts it within the power of the liquor interests to collect for their own pockets many times this tax, and often from those who deprive their families of comforts and necessities to pay it. There is no way to accurately estimate the cost to the government of accidents, crimes, and diseases caused by the traffic, but it must be appalling, and if it could be accurately stated in figures, I feel safe in predicting that no man, in opposition to this resolution, would ever have the temerity to speak or vote its adoption on account of the incidental loss of taxes that might result from its ratification by the states."

Mr. Barkley of Kentucky Asks Questions

"In determining our attitude upon this great question, we need not journey far into the realms of metaphysics or philosophy," said Representative Barkley. "We need only to consider whether the thing we propose to eradicate is an evil and whether our Nation and the world will be better and safer when it no longer exists. Having determined these questions, our duty is made plain and will be fulfilled in proportion as we act upon the conclusions we reach in the exercise of our moral and mental perceptions.

"Is the saloon an evil? Does it contribute to the physical strength and well being of mankind, or does it retard them? Does it lengthen or shorten the lives of men? Does it conserve or dissipate the mental vigor of our race? Does it accentuate and buttress the moral perceptions of those who are its devotees, or does it warp, debauch, and finally destroy them?

"Does the liquor traffic bring happiness or misery to those whom it touches? Does it fill our land with riches, or does it bring poverty instead? Does it fill our churches with worshipers and our schools with children, or does it fill our jails with criminals? Does it clothe the naked, or leave them to shiver without raiment? Does it drive hunger from cottage doors and humble homes, or is it the prolific source and cause of unfed mouths and unnurtured bodies? Are happiness and sunshine its finished product, or does gloom settle upon all that comes within its blighting touch? Does it foster the refinements of art and of literature, or does it appeal to the most brutal and coarsest appetites of which men are conceivably capable? Does it lighten the burdens and solve the problems of government, or does it increase and complicate them? Does it seek to advance and uphold public and private morality, or does it invade every private and public right that stands in its way and seek to befoul and corrupt or destroy every agency that is not its willing tool?"

Representative Cooper on Labor

Representative Cooper of Ohio disposed satisfactorily of the labor argument, apparently the stumbling block in the way of the opposition. He said on that subject:

"I desire to say a word about the relation of the liquor traffic to organized labor. There is at this time an effort being made by the representatives of the liquor interests to give the impression that the labor unions of the country are opposed to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and the members of this Congress are being threatened and flooded with numerous memorials, telegrams, and petitions by these men, protesting against the passage of this resolution and pretending to speak for the workingmen of this country. I deny and challenge the statement that the laboring people and the thousands of members of organized labor are in sympathy with the un-American licensed liquor traffic and that the beer keg and whisky bottle are their emblems. It is true that certain labor organizations are opposed to prohibition, but these men represent various crafts that are engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of alcoholic liquors.

"Ohio, the state which I have the honor to represent in part, ranks third or fourth among the great industrial states of the Union. About a million wage earners are employed at present in the manufacturing industries and on the railroads of the state. The result of the state-wide vote on prohibition in Ohio last month shows conclusively just where the workingmen stand on this question. I make the statement that the workers of Ohio voted dry by an overwhelming majority in many communities on the 6th day of last November. Several of the large industrial centers, with thousands of workingmen voting, gave prohibition majorities, while every large city in the state showed dry gains. Youngstown, the second largest steel manufacturing center in the country, with its thousands upon thousands of skilled mechanics, gave a dry majority of over 1,000. Summit county, in which is located the city of Akron, the greatest rubber manufacturing center in the world, with many thousands of high-class workingmen employed in its factories, gave the largest dry majority of any county in the state—4,316. Stark county, including the cities of Canton, Massillon, and Alliance, all important manufacturing towns, showed a prohibition majority of 3,404. Columbus, the capital city, with many factories, is located in Franklin county, which cast a dry majority. During the last fight in Ohio there was organized a trade-union dry league, its officers being prominent labor leaders, and the good work they did in this campaign helped very much in the splendid dry gain Ohio made this year."

TEXT OF PROPOSED FEDERAL AMENDMENT

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Sec. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Sec. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

††Now has statutory prohibition. Will vote on constitutional amendment.

WASHINGTON LETTER

Mrs. Beauchamp said she hoped that the legislature of Kentucky might be the first to ratify the amendment. The meeting was brought to a close by the "God be with you" benediction, and we separated for a few hours of rest before attending the session at the Senate on Tuesday.

Tuesday afternoon, December 18, Congress adjourned for the holiday recess, to convene Thursday, January 3, 1918.

DEMONSTRATION IN HONOR OF NEW PROHIBITION STATES

The ever popular story of "How we secured prohibition," was told by six successful W. C. T. U. leaders on Victory Night.

A realistic Uncle Sam and Aunt Columbia received the "conquering heroines" of prohibition campaigns and listened eagerly to their recitals.

Mrs. Emma S. Shelton, president of the District W. C. T. U., with a company of her co-workers, related briefly the history of the effort to secure a dry law for the District.

Mrs. S. C. Nutter, president of the New Mexico W. C. T. U., told the tale of New Mexico's triumph under the leadership of a dry governor and his gifted wife.

Mrs. C. A. Walker called to mind Utah's victory.

"The result of the going into effect of the dry law in Utah was only a repetition of what had happened in other states which had previously entered the dry column," said Mrs. Walker.

"Drunkenness during July was the worst ever known and the night of July 31 was celebrated by drunken orgies. Since August 1 there has been very little drunkenness, as the officers of city, county and state have been diligent in the enforcement of the law. The citizens of the state—bankers, merchants and all business men generally—say that business is much better, and those who were skeptical as to the results of prohibition now admit their error in judgment. Few business rooms are unoccupied and it is almost impossible to rent a residence or an apartment. The large corporations, which have in their employ many workmen and which come under the state law providing for compensation in case of injury or death, are well satisfied as the chances of men being injured or killed are greatly lessened. The moral effect is still greater, as the wives and children of former hard drinkers testify. We are gratified and happy over the operation of our law, and when the votes are counted next year Utah will be dry forever by constitutional amendment."

Indiana's hosts, a goodly number, led by Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger, marched on to the platform to the music of "Onward Christian Soldiers." "We want you to know, Uncle Sam, that Indiana wasn't handed prohibition on a silver platter. In the first place there was a long campaign of education because Indiana tried all the wrong methods of dealing with the liquor traffic before it discovered the right method. It invited the National W. C. T. U. to hold its convention in its capital city and during this meeting it invited the representatives of all the state's dry organizations to come together for a conference." Mrs. Vayhinger gave interesting sidelights on the methods used to persuade wet legislators it would be politic for them to vote dry. "It was my privilege to sit in the senate chamber at Indianapolis and see 300 telegrams delivered to one man who intended to vote as his wet constituents demanded," said Mrs. Vayhinger. "He would read a dozen or so and then get up and pace back and forth, and finally go back and read a dozen more. In exasperation, he at last remarked to a colleague, 'I wouldn't read another one of those confounded telegrams if I wasn't afraid somebody back home might be sick or dying.' When the vote was taken that man voted as the telegrams demanded he should."

Mrs. E. Raymond Hildreth, president of the Porto Rico W. C. T. U., rehearsed with fine dramatic effect the events leading up to the prohibition victory in Porto Rico. "I want to thank the National W. C. T. U. for the literature they sent to us," said Mrs. Hildreth. "This was well received by the natives. The Latin reads every printed word that comes to him and this prohibition literature went into every small town and village. When a native is through reading a circular, pamphlet or paper he nails it upon his front door where everybody can see it. So you see the truth in the literature sent had a wide reading and influence."

Mrs. Ellen R. Richardson, president of the New Hampshire W. C. T. U., gave the following brief history of New Hampshire's emancipation from John Barleycorn:

"The modern prohibition movement has really taken possession of the Old Granite state. For forty-eight years, from 1855 to 1903, New Hampshire was on the list of prohibition states. The legislature of 1903 did not repeal the prohibitory law of 1855, but it did enact a local option provision by which all the towns were required to vote every two years and the cities once in four years on the question of license or no-license. Wherever the majority of votes cast were against license the prohibitory law of 1855, with its amendments, remained in full force. When the first license vote was taken 165 of the 235 towns in the state voted against license. When the last vote was taken in the state only seventeen towns voted in favor of license and four of these were so small that no license was granted. Shall New Hampshire have state prohibition, was the most important question before the 1917 legislature. The greatest argument advanced against it was that public sentiment had not reached the point where the law could be enforced. But public sentiment has changed in the Old Granite state. You know God hung out a sign there to show that is where we make men.

"Ah, when the old world counts her kings
And from lordly castle and palace brings
The dainty lords her monarchies mold,
We'll point to the hills and cry, 'Behold,
Webster and Greeley and Chase for three Princes of our Democracy!' "

"And New Hampshire still has her princes. You have some of them here in this city—Ex-Senator Henry W. Blair, who introduced the first bill for national prohibition in the United States Congress on December 27, 1876, and Senator Jacob H. Gallinger, who introduced the present bill. We had some of them in the 1917 legislature, who stood as firm as granite for state prohibition and won the victory."

"THERE IS NO DEFEAT"

WORDS SPOKEN BY LILLIAN M. N. STEVENS, SEPTEMBER 10, 1911

KATHARINE LENT STEVENSON

Written on the occasion of the Prohibition Victory in the House of Representatives, December 17, 1917

O, Prophet soul, rapt Seer, whose vision clear
Pierced through night's darkness to the coming day,
We give thee joy; thy radiant dream draws near,
Thy truth's great triumph sweeps its onward way;
In whatsoever far-off world thou art,
We know the joy-bells ring in thy great heart.

"Within a decade," spoke thy faith serene,
"This truth shall written be in our land's laws."
Was ever faith more built on things unseen,
Had ever courage less of outward cause?
A David gainst Goliath thou didst go,
And lo, Goliath meets his overthrow.

Four years are lacking of the decade still,
Yet now we read, writ by the nation's hand,
The confirmation of thy dauntless will,
The earnest of the long-sought Promised land.
Great Heart of faith, for this thou gavest thy life,
And thou art victor in the glorious strife.

We follow in the path trod by thy feet;
Our faith mounts up to meet thine on Heaven's height;
There shall be "no defeat"; no called retreat
Shall sound forth from the bugle of our right.
We pledge ourselves to God, and thee, anew;
Thy vision for our land we'll help make true.

PATRIOTIC WORK OF THE W. C. T. U. CONSIDERED WEDNESDAY EVENING

One evening of the Convention was devoted to the presentation of the patriotic work accomplished during the past year by six special War Welfare departments. Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, National superintendent of Legislation, gave a brief review of the efforts made by the W. C. T. U. to secure through legislation protection for the military camps, naval stations and cantonments from the liquor traffic and commercialized vice.

Miss Lella M. Sewall, National superintendent of Flower Mission and Relief Work, spoke on "Relief Work at Home and Abroad." She said, in part:

"You are all familiar with the many and varied relief activities of the department of Flower Mission and Relief Work, so, in the few moments allotted to me, I shall not dwell upon these, but tell you a little about the war service accomplished through this department during the current year. Not a few states have contributed their quota of hospital supplies. Knitted articles, too, have been provided —excellent work has been done in Rhode Island, West Virginia, New Jersey, New York and elsewhere.

"The most significant work of the year, however, and the most far reaching, is that accomplished for the fatherless children of France. The soldiers of France have been fighting nearly three years for the freedom of their country, our country and every country, willingly sacrificing their lives for this great cause—they have died for their country, our country and every country; they died that freedom might live.

"Now that the children of many of them are left without a father's care and protection, are they not in very truth a legacy to the people of America from the soldiers of France?

"Their sacrifice imposes upon our country a sacred obligation—imposes upon the women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union a sacred obligation. This obligation our organization has met nobly, is meeting nobly today, through the department of Flower Mission and Relief Work. Sixty-three children have been adopted and one re-adopted this year, between the dates of March 20 and November 1. The work still goes on. Since November 1 (when the W. C. T. U. year closed) sixteen more French children have been added to the list.

"Women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, continue to bear on your hearts these children—'our legacy from the soldiers of France.' Do what you can, all you can, in gratitude to these brave men."

At the close of her talk Miss Sewall presented to Miss Gordon, for National W. C. T. U. Headquarters, a framed picture of a group of French orphans as a reminder of the work we are doing and must continue to do for these bereaved little ones.

On the vital subject of "Americanization" Mrs. Ella B. Black, National superintendent of Work among Foreign Speaking People, said:

"The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is fully aware of the fact that now, as never before, America must be 'one people.' Patriotism is service. We can serve our nation in this crucial hour by helping the millions of aliens within our borders to become good citizens. 'Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.' This is the law of the crucible; this is the law of American life. We should encourage our foreign-born neighbors to become American citizens. Only by keeping his oath can the new-made American serve the larger ends of national life.

"Investigations have revealed that about 5,000 Austro-Hungarians living in New York City have applied for citizenship since April 6, 1917. Since suffrage has been granted to New York state many immigrant women—unmarried—have asked to become American citizens. During the year, 1917, a special effort has been made to help these women. Reports from many states tell of efforts made to help them to understand American standards of home and community life.

"Requests for literature and help are constantly received from parts of our nation not previously engaged in Americanization work, proof that interest is growing tremendously. Reports show that more money has been expended, more literature used, more visits paid, more contests held, more clothing, fruit, etc., donated and more personal help given than in any previous year."

Miss Mary E. Brown, National superintendent of Moral Education, told of the efforts of her department to deal wisely with that difficult problem. She said, in part:

"Never before in the history of the world and of war has such care for the physical, mental and moral welfare of the soldier been attempted. Never has any nation reached the moral plane assumed by our government when it decided not only that prostitution among enlisted men must be suppressed but announced as a scientific fact that an absolutely chaste life is conducive to health and efficiency among men.

"In harmony with this attitude 'white zones' have been established around all camps and cantonments, adjacent cities and communities have been compelled to 'clean up' morally and the enlisted man is required to attend lectures on personal hygiene and accept the tiny manual on the subject provided him by the government. Never again can 'physical necessity' find credence among intelligent people.

"But there are some things the government cannot do for its soldiers and sailors. As yet there has been found no adequate means of protecting them from the unwise approaches of the unchaperoned young girl whose patriotic fervor, love of the heroic and admiration for the courageous have been aroused by the uniform. Many young women who would not think of violating the conventions where a man in civilian dress is concerned, seem to lose all sense of propriety regarding the soldier. Without hesitation easy acquaintance is made, with imminent danger to both girl and soldier. The government cannot combat this malady, sometimes called 'uniformitis.' The responsibility for the remedy lies with the earnest women of the land.

"Nor can the government retrieve the neglect of parents who have failed to instil in the hearts and minds of the boys and girls the high ideals, staunch principles and reverence for the body as the temple of God which are essential to safety. No amount of later instruction can atone for failure of parents and teachers to supply the right teaching during the early years of childhood.

"The National W. C. T. U. department of Moral Education believes that its most valuable patriotic service can be rendered by setting in motion forces which shall awaken and educate parents and young people in the essential truths of personal and social moral hygiene. This instruction, combined with desirable outlet for the love of the romantic characteristic of girlhood, will help solve the difficult problem of protection for the adolescent young woman and the enlisted man. We are responsible for this work since the government cannot provide for this phase of the emergency."

"Women in Industry" was the theme of Mrs. Lucia F. Additon, National superintendent of Temperance and Labor. She spoke as follows:

"'A man shall be more precious than gold.' Did Isaiah, the prophet, foresee the present exploitation of human life and warn against it? Human conservation

WOMEN PATRIOTS

DR. ANNA HOWARD SHAW, Chairman of the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense

Address delivered at the Washington Convention

As I looked over this company of old friends here at the National W. C. T. U. Convention tonight, and tried to pick out one after another, I noted the gray hair of some, and I said to myself, "Can it be that the country which boasts of its justice, of its far-vision, of its idealisms,—can it be that such a country has compelled a body of women like this to give two score years and more to effort to bring to the mind of the American people the mighty fact that mothers have some rights in their children; that they, of all beings in the world, have the right to protect and demand that the government shall protect the children for whom they were ready to sacrifice their lives to give them birth?" Yes, for more than forty-four years the women of this country have been pleading for that form of protection for their children which would guarantee not only security at home, but peace throughout the world.

When, from day to day, I see our khaki-clad young men my heart is filled with a great pity that it was necessary for women to bear sons that they should go out to fight in this year of our Lord, nineteen seventeen, to fight and kill that peace might come to the world. Today is a fateful day for us, and yet we women in this land are not yet free to speak our thoughts, and to bring to the focal point of our national life our crystallized will in regard to the protection of our homes, our sons, and our country. As I sat here tonight, I reckoned that just forty-four years ago tonight I was out with the Crusading women in Michigan, and for these forty-four years the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been striving to secure legislation against that thing which the man at the head of our army in France, General Pershing, declares is the greatest foe to the soldiers, even more so than bullets.

I had the pleasure of meeting this great hero last spring in San Antonio, Texas. The citizens of the city gave me a banquet, and among the honored guests was General Pershing. When he was called on for a toast, this great leader of the army stood up and pronounced himself a confirmed believer in the enfranchisement of woman and in prohibition. After he had taken his seat and the program had been concluded, General Pershing was told by some of his Texas friends, "Prohibition is an unpopular subject in Texas. We are not in favor of it." The general replied, "So long as I am at the head of the army I shall speak for prohibition." "Oh," they said, "but go slow in this matter." General Pershing responded, "I shall not go slow on prohibition, for I know what is the greatest foe to my men, greater even than the bullets of the enemy."

Dr. Anna Howard Shaw

What this man has said, this great leader of our army in France, has been repeated over and over again by men of our nation.

Why is it, then, that sometimes we see soldiers on the street under the influence of liquor? Why is it that these men are being debauched by the forces of evil against which this organization has pitted itself for, lo! these more than forty years? Why is that the men and women of this country are appealing to the War Department and to the Navy Department and to the President of the United States to protect their boys? Why is it that the people do not know that these men can do nothing unless the men and women of the United States stand with them in helping them to enforce their will as they have promulgated it? And the responsibility does not rest alone here in Washington; it rests with the men and women from one end of this nation to the other. And it is their business to see that these young men are protected; it is their business to see that the young women are protected; it is their business to demand that in every community where these young men congregate the people shall see to it that these men are not tempted, and that our young women are not tempted, and that the morale of our people at home shall be as high as we demand that the morale shall be in the army in the field.

We talk of the army in the field as one, and the army at home as another. We are not two armies; we are one,—absolutely one army. The army in the field can no more win for us peace without the army at home than the army at home could win for us peace without the army in the field. We are two arms of the same army, and we must work together, is the greatest of all conservation problems.

PATRIOTIC WORK OF THE W. C. T. U. CONSIDERED WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Prohibition, mobilization, conservation, co-operation are the magic watchwords of the hour. Much has been said about conserving food materials by stopping the manufacture of all alcoholic drinks. Surely National Prohibition as a war measure is a necessity, not only to save the grain for bread, but to stop decreasing the efficiency of the industrial army as mobilization in that direction is as necessary as mobilization in the military army. Behind every soldier in the Army and Navy there must be ten soldiers of industry. We have taken 1,000,000 men out of the ranks of producers and put them into the non-producing consumers' ranks; they must be clothed, fed, equipped and kept in perfect condition. Women are being called into every conceivable kind of industrial service. Let us see to it that they are safeguarded as carefully as we are praying and working for the safeguarding of the military soldiers.

"There are thousands of toil-worn women and children, many working overtime, and many underpaid. 'The measure of national exhaustion will not be gauged by rivers of blood or by mountains of dead, but by the dying flame in the foundry, by the silence of the munition plant, by the drained treasury or by the tragedy of an empty grain sack.'

"Let us see to it that there is no breaking down of industrial standards, that every member of the industrial army shall have one day's rest in seven, that there shall be equal pay for man and woman for like work, and no nullification of our eight-hour laws. Long days are a menace. Night work for women is a menace. Fatigued people are partially poisoned people.

"The problem of women and children in industry is a tremendous one. But the great industrial womanhood of the nation has enlisted for war service and will 'stay on the job' and see it through. We shall win. 'They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks and learn war no more.' 'They shall see eye to eye, for the mouth of Jehovah has spoken it.' Out of this terrible conflict will come a new social era, a new freedom, a new democracy."

Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, National superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors, reported the work in her department by means of a very effective and striking tableau. There was shown a well-equipped, home-like recreation room for soldiers and sailors, young men in Army and Navy uniforms sitting at tables, writing letters, reading, playing games or studying French. The scene shifted and the boys partook with evident enjoyment of refreshments brought in by the house-mother and her assistants. Later the lads gathered around the piano for music. After singing popular and patriotic melodies, all joined in "Nearer My God to Thee" and stood with bowed heads as in unison they repeated the Lord's prayer. Mrs. Thacher explained that scenes identical with the one presented may be seen at the Soldiers and Sailors' Recreation Rooms at 1418 Pennsylvania Ave., Washington, any evening. Similar social centers for the "boys" are being opened in many states and there cannot be too many to meet the needs.

"Hats Off to the Flag," as sung with fine spirit by Mrs. Frances W. Graham, the popular musical director, set the Convention aglow with patriotic fervor.

Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, chairman of the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense, found a very receptive audience when she arose to speak on "Women Patriots." However, one cannot conceive of any audience that would not have responded to such an eloquent and captivating speaker. At the close of Dr. Shaw's address, on the suggestion of President Gordon, all the mothers and grandmothers in the audience who had sons or grandsons in the service, stood and with deep feeling the Convention sang the wartime benediction:

"God bless our splendid men,
Bring them safe home again,
God bless our men.
Keep them victorious,
Patient and chivalrous,
They are so dear to us,
God bless our men."

Uncle Sam, Aunt Columbia and the Prohibition States as they appeared in a Demonstration the Opening Morning of the Convention

The demonstration was arranged by Mrs. W. R. Loney, chairman of committee, assisted by Mrs. G. A. Colbe, Mrs. W. O. Ison and Mrs. J. A. Boyd.

RECOGNITION NIGHT

PROCESSIONAL OF THE STATES

Recognition Night began, continued and ended with jubilation.

"Oh, sound the jubilee
For the yoke of Rum is broken
And the people shall be free,
Oh, sound the jubilee."

Thus sang the Convention chorus, preceding the processional of the membership-winning states. Certainly it was cause for rejoicing that in this war-disturbed year thirty-two state organizations had made a gain—eight states of over 500, two of more than 300, seven of over 100, and fifteen of less than 100.

President Gordon, as Commander-in-Chief of the white ribbon army, was in waiting to review her forces. To the accompaniment of a medley of patriotic airs, the thirty-two divisions marched with precision across the platform, each patriot holding aloft the colors. As the various state divisions approached President Gordon, Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher, her aide-de-camp, saluted and announced the name of each "general."

Group 1 included the states, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Illinois, Maryland (No. 2), North Dakota, Colorado, West Virginia, Iowa, District of Columbia (No. 2), South Carolina (No. 2), Nevada, New Mexico, Michigan, Georgia, all of which had made a gain of less than 100.

Group No. 2 included Southern California, Wyoming, East Washington, Texas, Delaware, District of Columbia and Maryland, each of which had rolled up a gain of more than 100.

In Group No. 3 appeared Oklahoma and New Hampshire, each bringing more than 300 new recruits.

New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Florida appeared in Group No. 4, each presenting to Commander Gordon over 500 newly enlisted white ribboners.

General Neal of Florida led a delegation gayly bedecked with poinsettia blossoms on costumes of white.

"Where is that state where the small and the great
Are working for prohibition;
Where all things they dare and no labor spare
To bring that blessed condition?"

asked General Neal, and her delegation responded in gleeful unison, "Florida."

General Hendrix of Minnesota brought a happy combination of history and prophecy: "We have come to tell of victories of the past year—making Duluth dry and securing through our state legislature the submission of a prohibition amendment. The day for 'going over the top' has been set. It is November 5, 1918, when the voters at the ballot box outlaw the liquor traffic in Minnesota."

General Stevenson of Massachusetts presented what she said were just a few of the 12,507 women of Massachusetts "who are pledged to the protection of the home, the abolition of the liquor traffic and the triumph of Christ's Golden Rule in custom and in law. In addition to our other activities we have concentrated on war welfare work, having opened in Ayer a home for the soldiers at Camp Devens."

General Lawson, bringing 525 new recruits, told of the passage of a prohibition referendum bill by the Wisconsin legislature which was vetoed out of existence by an unfriendly governor. "The fight is on to secure a prohibitory law," said General Lawson, "and to elect a governor who will not veto the measure."

General Mitchner, with her Kansas sunflower regiment, discoursed briefly and breezily on the always fascinating theme, "We in Kansas have everything we have asked for, prohibition, suffrage, etc., etc. We have the best set of Congressmen and the two best Senators in Congress." Certainly Kansas had a right to "point with pride" to her net gain this year of 940 members, half of them young women.

General Richards, with her army of Ohio campaigners, filled the commodious platform of Poli's. "We bring you 1,178 new recruits," the General announced to her commanding officer. "We had hoped to bring you a clean pure white state, on the prohibition map, but booze and Cincinnati prevented. However, we have pierced the Hindenburg line of the liquor traffic in Ohio and we are marching straight on to victory."

The company that General George of Pennsylvania led taxed the capacity of the stage even more than did Ohio's delegation. "The women in my company," asserted General George, "represent 44,442 white ribbon soldiers and there is not one slacker among them. One and all are doing their bit. In harmony with the teachings of William Penn, our illustrious founder, we carry high the flag of brotherly love, but when President Wilson declared that a state of war existed our flag of patriotism was raised to an equal height and immediately we began war service and the brave boys on our battleship 'Pennsylvania' carried with them across the water 1,200 comfort bags made by white ribboners. Commander-in-chief, do you know that prohibition was born in Pennsylvania? Do you know that Dr. Benjamin Rush published his wonderful opinion on the effect of alcohol in Pennsylvania 150 years ago. There is one more stunt Pennsylvania, the Keystone state, wants to perform. She wants to put the Keystone into the arch, but this she cannot do until that arch is formed by the other states."

As Pennsylvania disappeared behind the scenes there was heard the tread of many feet, then came a flutter of yellow banners borne aloft by a mighty army and the audience burst into applause as General Boole led forward her enfranchised hosts. "New York brings to you 2,302 newly enlisted women," announced General Boole. "In our ranks we have 2,000 young women and 2,000 young men belonging to the Young People's Branch. Every county in our state is organized. This year we came to the National Con-

MATERIAL FOR NATIONAL CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION MEETINGS JANUARY 24

The next issue of THE UNION SIGNAL, January 3, will contain the program prepared by the General Officers for use at the meetings to be held January 24 in the interests of the ratification by the states of the national prohibition amendment. It will also give a program and material for use in the Sunday schools on the preceding Sunday.

CONVENTION RESPONDS GENEROUSLY TO APPEALS

Notwithstanding the fact the members of the Convention had been giving for the past twelve months very liberally to W. C. T. U., Red Cross and other war service enterprises, they responded generously to the appeals made. The following pledges were made:

For the Lillian M. N. Stevens Campaign Fund, $8,468.

For life and memorial members, $725.

For new subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL, $16,059.50

For new subscriptions to The Young Crusader, $1,368.65.

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY DANIELS AND MRS. DANIELS RECEIVE CONVENTION DELEGATES IN THEIR HOME

One of the delightful "extras" of the Convention was the reception tendered by Secretary and Mrs. Daniels to the delegates at their home Thursday afternoon. In the receiving line on that occasion with Secretary and Mrs. Daniels were Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, Miss Anna A. Gordon, Mrs. Emma S. Shelton, Mrs. Bishop McDowell, Mrs. Gordon Wright, Mrs. Bishop Cranston and Mrs. William Hamilton Bailey.

THE NEXT STEP IN PROHIBITION'S ONWARD MARCH

With grateful, joyful hearts the allied prohibition forces of this country are readjusting their campaign programs. By the action taken by the House of Representatives and the Senate last week the question of National Constitutional Prohibition has passed from the control of Congress to that of the legislatures of the states. Special interest will center in the twelve states whose legislatures meet in 1918, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Rhode Island, South Carolina and Virginia in January, and Louisiana in May. Already there is a friendly rivalry among the advocates of prohibition as to which of these states shall have the honor of first ratifying the amendment. Of almost equal importance to the securing of favorable action by these twelve legislatures is the election of legislators who can be depended upon to vote for ratification in the states whose legislatures meet in 1919. Coincident with these direct efforts for national constitutional prohibition there will be a vigorous drive all the year for a victorious termination of the state-wide prohibition campaign now in progress in Minnesota, Florida, Nevada, Wyoming, Missouri and Ohio.

Every local union should immediately begin to plan for a mass meeting in its community on January 24, National Constitutional Prohibition Day, and for the holding on the Sabbath preceding of special services in the interests of the nation-wide prohibition movement in the churches and Sunday schools. Program and material for use on these occasions will be given in next week's UNION SIGNAL.

CONVENTION SIDELIGHTS

A constant reminder of the prophecy of our sainted leader, Lillian M. N. Stevens, was the beautiful banner suspended over the platform, "National Constitutional Prohibition—We Shall Win." Mrs. Gertrude Stevens Leavitt, daughter of Mrs. Stevens, was present throughout the Convention and spoke with deep feeling of her joy over the fulfillment of her mother's purposes and prophecies.

The Convention was honored in having as its timekeepers one of the beloved W. C. T. U. pioneers, Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, former National superintendent, and her daughter, Mrs. Florence Mitchell.

In thanking the Convention for again selecting her as the leader of the National W. C. T. U., Miss Gordon said, "The prayer of my heart is that God will help me make good for the coming year and that cannot be unless we believe as thoroughly as we do believe in the great word of the present day, 'Together.' If we are together in our purpose for achievement God will lead us into a great year of victorious progress. We must pray for one another from this moment to the close of the year."

Members of the New York delegation —110 strong—wore a special "Victory badge," presented by "Mother National" for the largest gain in membership. Oklahoma and Maryland (No. 2), for having made a 20 per cent gain in membership, were awarded banners inscribed, "Goal Reached 1917."

The inevitable knitting bag was a necessary part of the equipment of the delegates. Most of these receptacles were of such generous proportions that, as Miss Gordon suggested, one might well paraphrase the popular song in the war zone and sing, "Pack your troubles in your new knitting bag, and smile, smile, smile." But then, the only trouble a white ribboner admits having is the continued existence of the liquor traffic, and that is fast disappearing.

Word was received during the Convention that the Women's Missionary Societies of the Congregational and Baptist Churches, at their national meetings had endorsed National Constitutional Prohibition, and had sent hundreds of individual telegrams to members of the House of Representatives.

No number on the program elicited from the Convention more enthusiastic applause than the introduction of the Convention hostesses, to whose generous hospitality the delegates owed so much of their pleasure.

One of the delightful features of election day was the appreciation shown the re-elected officers by the delegations from the states which proudly claim them as "favorite daughters."

Much was said about conservation pledges of one sort or another at the Convention, but none of these remarks called forth as much applause as did the suggestion from the National president, that "We want Uncle Sam to sign a conservation pledge including all alcoholic liquors."

So prompt was the response in Scripture quotations by white ribboners at the devotional hours of the Convention that Mrs. Elizabeth P. Anderson, president of the North Dakota W. C. T. U., and the leader on one occasion, said she wondered if the Bible were destroyed, if the whole or at least the choicest parts of both Old and New Testaments could not be reproduced from the memories of white ribboners alone.

That the literature published by the National W. C. T. U. is absolutely indispensable to the local unions in their organization and campaign work was the burden of the appeal of Mrs. Ida Wise Smith, who brought the subject to the attention of the Convention. The large amount of literature sold at the Literature table and carried home by the delegates indicates that her hearers took to heart what she told them.

"THE STORM CLOUD'S SILVER LINING," AS MARY HARRIS ARMOR SEES IT

The announcement that Mary Harris Armor, that "champion disturber of consciences," is to give an address always arouses in her audience great expectations, which, unlike some orators of renown, she never disappoints. Like the prophets of old, she seemed divinely inspired to speak a message of hope and her interpretations of present day conditions were given as by one with authority from on high.

"Registration day was the saddest day I ever experienced," said Mrs. Armor, in introducing her subject, "The Storm Cloud's Silver Lining." "I awoke in the morning realizing that thousands of mothers' boys, and among them my own boy, were to be called to the colors to defend their country. My heart was heavy within me. Suddenly I remembered the admonition of the Scriptures, 'In everything give thanks,' and I tried to recall something I could be thankful for in these troublous days." Mrs. Armor then enumerated in her illuminating fashion six reasons for thankfulness that came to her as she prayed through the problem with which so many are grappling in these difficult days.

"I thank God that this is not a civil war; that we stand together as an undivided people in this great calamity.

"I thank God that I believe when this war is over, as a result of it all barriers of class and creed, of sect and section, will be broken down as never before, and knit together by sacrifice, and fused by fire, we will present to the world the spectacle of a nation absolutely indissoluble.

"I thank God that we have unsheathed a stainless sword. I believe the blood shed by our boys in France is holy; I believe we are making war on war and that the result of this war will be a great world federation that will establish world peace.

"I thank God that my boy is just as safe in France as in the United States of America, for I remember that my Lord hath said that 'All things work together for good to them that love Him.' The only safe place, after all, for any man or woman is in the discharge of duty, for to such men and women alone is given the promise of the protection of the Almighty. I did not raise my son to be a soldier, but neither did I raise him to be a coward or a slacker, and if he must pay the supreme price on the battle front, the path to heaven is no farther from France than from America.

"And, finally, I thank God because I believe this war will result in the destruction of a traffic more infamous than war itself, the liquor traffic."

One section of Mrs. Armor's address dealt with the food situation. "I do not believe that there is a member of the W. C. T. U. who could not out-Hooverize Hoover in the matter of saving food," remarked Mrs. Armor, "but I would like to say to the President and Congress that we are not concerned merely because the brewers are wasting in beer, grain and other foodstuffs, but we fear the knowledge that this is being permitted by the government will tend to alienate the sympathy and enthusiasm of women who otherwise would be champion conservers. These women think we are alarmists when we tell them of the serious lack of food. They say, 'Why, this cannot be true. If the food condition in the nation were so serious, the administration would not permit food material to be wasted by the brewers.'

"All we demand of the government is that 'It do for us the things we ask of it as freely as we have done that which it has asked of us.'"

Speaking of the need of sending sugar to the soldiers to supply to the blood that element which the scientists say gives courage, Mrs. Armor said she did not believe in sending all the courage-creating sugar abroad. She thought a few barrels ought to be saved for our "spineless" members of Congress, and if it really would have the effect of making them courageous, she would recommend forcible feeding to accomplish that much-to-be-desired result.

Mrs. Armor threw light on the coal shortage, declaring that "we need every inch of space in the cars that the brewers are pre-empting to transport beer."

Other dangers in war time that would be minimized if the drink evil could be eliminated from our national life were enumerated by Mrs. Armor. "The spy is abroad in the land and everyone knows that drink loosens the tongues of men and destroys their judgment. Grave danger is there that over a dinner where champagne is served, even without the participant realizing it, state secrets of tremendous importance may be divulged."

Forceful was the speaker's warning that the open saloon is always a "first aid" to riots and disorders. "It was considered necessary to close the saloons at the time of the East St. Louis riots. Today we are in a world riot. Why not close the saloons all over the land?"

With deep conviction Mrs. Armor stated it as her belief that before we shall achieve victory in this great war we must put away the great national sin. "I believe God waits to bring us to our knees," she declared, in closing, "and when we can fight under a stainless flag—the flag of a nation emancipated from the liquor traffic—we shall be victorious."

Recognition Night

vention with the largest delegation we have ever had. In our delegation we have our five general officers, the editor of our state paper, the secretaries of the Y. P. B. and the L. T. L., superintendents of departments, county presidents and presidents of local unions. This year has been a notable one. We have raised $9,000. We have placed a temperance library in every normal school in the state. We have given the soldiers and sailors more than 10,000 comfort bags; we have distributed millions of pages of literature." Mrs. Boole closed her recital of the year's achievments with a reference to the miracle of November 6, the granting of suffrage to the women of the Empire state.

So full had the evening been of "thrills" it hardly seemed possible to add another, but the District of Columbia W. C. T. U. presented a spectacular climax, when there appeared on the platform a water wagon, drawn by the District W. C. T. U. officers, and carrying Mrs. Shelton, the president, who guided it with white ribbon reins.

Then followed that indispensable feature of the program of the last night of a National Convention, the singing of "Victory" by the beloved National musical director, Mrs. Frances W. Graham, accompanied on the piano by Mrs. Ellen L. Tenney, treasurer of the New York state W. C. T. U. The applause called forth by this ever popular solo subsided only when Mrs. Graham responded. As she sang, "Hats Off to the Flag," a company of girls and women in white waved scores of American flags—a symphony of color and melody that will enrich the Convention reminiscences of all who were present.

What more opportune time for the awarding by Miss Gordon of the Frances Willard star spangled banner, which this year went to New York for the largest pro rata increase in membership.

In accepting the banner Mrs. Ella A. Boole said: "There is nothing we will more highly treasure than this, one of the last thoughts of Frances Willard, because Frances E. Willard was born in New York and went to her heavenly home from New York." Oklahoma for a 20 per cent membership gain received twenty-five subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL. Broom county (N. Y.) W. C. T. U., for a membership gain of 450 per cent, received fifteen subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL; and the local union of Morningside, Pittsfield (Mass.), for 1,200 per cent gain, ten UNION SIGNAL subscriptions.

The time for the adjournment of the Forty-fourth Annual Convention of the National W. C. T. U. had arrived. "We might speak at length about the wonderful days spent in the wonderful city of Washington at this wonderful time," said Miss Gordon, "but as we bid one another goodby we can be comforted with the thought that hearts are near though hands are far."

On motion of Mrs. Sara J. Dorr, president of the Northern California W. C. T. U., the Convention adjourned. With bowed heads delegates and visitors in the great assemblage clasping hands, sang the benedictory song, "God be With you Till we Meet Again," and repeated in unison the Aaronic benediction.

Convention Sidelights

Complimentary remarks concerning the National W. C. T. U. president's ability as a presiding officer were frequently heard. Mrs. Lillian Cole Bethel, author of a text-book on parliamentary law, took occasion, when introduced, to congratulate the Convention on having as a presiding officer such an able parliamentarian, one who, she declared, would grace the United States Senate or House of Representatives. "I have made a study of the subject and never have I seen a presiding officer show such grace and fairness."

Mrs. Edmund Egbert, the first policewoman in Lexington, Ky., for whom the W. C. T. U. of that city is responsible, was among the visitors introduced.

Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, president of the Missouri W. C. T. U., in a collection speech, told of the son of one of her hostesses who asked the privilege of introducing her when she spoke before his school. He urged his schoolmates to keep very still and be very attentive because, he confided to them, "It ain't no fun to be a temperance lecturer." "But," declared Mrs. Burger, "that couldn't be said truthfully at the present time, for today to be a temperance lecturer is a hilarious occupation."

REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE

Adopted by the Convention

LILLIAN STEVENS CAMPAIGN FUND

We urge the carrying out of the financial plan for National Constitutional Prohibition, calling for the payment by each state of a sum equal to $1 per union to the Lillian Stevens Campaign Fund.

FRANCES E. WILLARD MEMORIAL FUND

Notwithstanding the gratifying increase in the contributions to the Frances E. Willard Memorial Fund, it has not reached our goal, which is $2 from every local union. In view of our growing needs it is urged that greater effort be made to reach this standard.

HONORARY MEMBERS

The recommendations of the National president that an honorary member be secured for every active member should be emphasized as a financial aid to local unions.

FIELD KITCHENS

One of the many financial calls for patriotic service is the provision of field kitchens for the French and Italian fronts, and we recommend the purchase of five, at a cost of $700 each, the amount to be apportioned pro rata among the states.

FINANCIAL DRIVES

We urge that states inaugurate systematic "drives" for funds, according to plans approved by the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U.

APPLICATION OF SURPLUS FUNDS

Whenever a special fund for the National W. C. T. U. exceeds the demands of that special purpose, the surplus shall be applied to the next emergency need.

BUSINESS TRANSACTED AT THE CONVENTION

The actual business of the convention was dispatched with dignity and speed. The two amendments to the constitution, proposed at the last convention, were adopted by a practically unanimous vote.

Article VI of the Constitution was amended to read as follows: "The annual or biennial meeting at which officers shall be elected shall be held in October, November or December, unless for good reasons the general officers shall decide upon some other time, in which case said decision must be ratified or endorsed by a two-thirds vote of the official board, and at such place as may be determined upon at the annual or biennial meeting, or by the executive committee."

Article V of the Constitution was amended by inserting after "chairmen of standing committees," "members emeritus of the National W. C. T. U."

The following by-laws were amended to read as follows:

ARTICLE IV

National Lecturers, National Organizers and Evangelists

Section 1. A National lecturer or evangelist must be an educated Christian woman and a member of a local union in the state in which she lives. Appointment as a National lecturer shall be by invitation of the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U., such invitation to be ratified by the Official Board.

Sec. 2. A National organizer must be an educated Christian woman and a member of a local union in the state in which she lives. She must be a state worker who has had experience in organizing, and must be endorsed each year by her state officers, said endorsement being sent by them to the National corresponding secretary. In order to be eligible for re-appointment she must have filled at least one month's engagements during the year and have spoken in at least one state besides her own unless prevented by illness or special W. C. T. U. calls in her own state.

Evangelists

Sec. 7. A new candidate for National evangelist, before she is recommended by the National superintendent of the Evangelistic department to the National General Officers, must present to the National superintendent of the Evangelistic department a certificate showing that she has taken a course of Bible study. She must have filled one month's engagements during the year and have spoken in at least one state besides her own.

Standing Rules

No. 3. National superintendents, organizers, lecturers and evangelists are such by reason of appointment by the National W. C. T. U. In their several states they hold the same relation to the general work of the state as do all other members of the state organization, and they do not outrank the state officers. They should not appeal to the local unions for contributions of money without the consent of the National or state officers, nor interfere in any way with the policy or plan of work of the state unions, in their own or any other state. National workers shall not accept field appointments without the knowledge and approval of state officers whose territory they enter. Violations of any of the above conditions shall be considered sufficient cause for discontinuing the endorsement given the worker by the National W. C. T. U.

PRESIDENT WILSON SENDS REGRETS

It was perhaps hardly to be expected that President Wilson at this very busy time would be able to appear at conventions. Nevertheless every delegate's heart beat a little faster in anticipation when Miss Gordon announced one morning—"A question of privilege. Mrs. Shelton desires to read a message from the President of the United States." The letter proved to be from Mr. Tumulty, the President's secretary, and explained:

"The President finds it out of the question to make any additions to his already overcrowded calendar. As you may well imagine the pressure upon him incident to the opening of Congress is so exceptionally heavy that there is literally not a moment of his time that has not been pre-empted."

RESOLUTIONS REGARDING LEGISLATIVE MATTERS ADOPTED BY CONVENTION

WHEREAS, thousands of United States troops are stationed at the Hawaiian Islands, and as the sale of liquor was introduced in the Islands when they came into possession of the United States,

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED that we urge upon Congress the great need of a federal prohibitory law for Hawaii, not only as a protection for our American troops, but for the removal of a deadly menace to the native peoples, who are peculiarly susceptible to the effects of strong drink.

RESOLVED that we deplore the extensive use of the drug known as peyote among the American Indians and that we work for the passage of the Hayden Bill now pending in Congress, which prohibits its importation, traffic and use.

WHEREAS, the exportation of distilled spirits from the United States into the states or provinces of Africa has been carried on for many years, greatly to the detriment of the native peoples, thousands of deaths having resulted from the use of liquor shipped from this Christian land to the native child races of that far away country, and

WHEREAS, a bill known as H. R. 3137 has been introduced in the first session of the 65th Congress by Representative F. H. Gillett of Massachusetts, providing for the prohibition of such exportation,

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED, that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in convention assembled in the city of Washington, D. C., December 7, 1917, most earnestly and respectfully urges that this bill receive the early and favorable attention of the House committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic to whom it has been referred, and that Congress by a substantial vote will not only lift this disgrace from the fair name of our loved country, but will help to bring in that glad day when the whole earth shall be free from the curse of alcoholic liquor.

RESOLVED, that a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the House Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

PATRIOTIC CONGRESS

The talks given by the National superintendents at the Patriotic Congress were remarkable for the amount of information and inspiration condensed in the brief time allowed them. The following superintendents spoke on the general theme, "How My Department Helps the Nation": Rev. Mary E. Kuhl, Mrs. Jean B. Wylie, Mrs. Minnie B. Horning, Mrs. Lettie Hill May, Mrs. I. W. Gleason, Mrs. Sara Phillips Thomas Bunting, Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, Mrs. Susan McWhirter Ostrom, Mrs. Emma L. Starrett, Mrs. Caroline McDowell, Mrs. Eliza E. Peterson, Mrs. Martha M. Allen, Mrs. Alta C. Bohren, Mrs. Frances B. Heald, Mrs. Carolyn P. Lindsay, Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, Mrs. Adelia Carman, Mrs. Harriet Pritchard, Mrs. Etta Loyne Davis, Mrs. Minnie U. Fuller, Mrs. Mary Davis Tomlinson. Excerpts from these talks will be given next week.

PEACE AND INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION

MRS. WILLIAM J. BRYAN, National Superintendent

Patriotic Congress Address Delivered at Convention

The department which I represent is unique in one particular—we find five minutes quite enough in which to tell of our year's work. "The short and simple annals of the poor" about which we hear would make a large volume when compared with the report of a Peace department in war time.

It matters not now what we may have believed or still believe, whether we were militant, indifferent or pacifist, we are, above all and beyond all, loyal to our dear America. We see, perhaps more clearly than ever before, what our great republic has meant and does mean to this oppressed world, and I am sure I voice the feeling of every woman before me when I say we stand as one, united in support of our government, willing to aid, to uphold, to succor it in the work upon which it has entered.

This department has printed no literature this year. The literature which came to us from the long-time and most efficient superintendent, Mrs. Bailey, was carefully sorted by Mrs. Rooke and she has sent out only that to which no objection, reasonable or unreasonable, could possibly be made. With practically no expenditure, save for correspondence, our quarterly allowance became an abundance of riches. With the approval of the National W. C. T. U., we turned this money back into the National treasury for use in the department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, of which Mrs. Ella Hoover Thacher is National superintendent. No money has been lying idle. It has gone where the need was imperative. I am glad this meets with your approval.

We may make bold to say, however, that we regard this as bread cast upon the water and we are confidently looking to the department of Work Among Soldiers and Sailors, and possibly to other departments whose work will be greatly lightened by the return of peace, to come to our help in the days—which God grant may not be far away—when we will be aiding in bringing better conditions to our land, industrially, commercially, educationally and, I almost said, religiously. The Convention may rest assured that when this time comes this department will have some excellent plans. Whoever may be your superintendent this work will thrive because of its advisers—such fine, resourceful minds—you know them all and can safely rely upon their judgment.

But may we cry, "peace, peace," when there is no peace? I must speak for a moment of the peace which is possible for us to cultivate under any circumstances, however adverse. I refer to individual peace. As time goes on and we feel more and more the burden of this situation, when the pall of bereavement which must come settles down upon us, is it not the time to prove the Divine Power, to call for a more complete indwelling of the Holy Spirit, to re-consecrate ourselves? With the peace which passeth understanding within us, we shall be able to carry peace to the troubled hearts about us, and each W. C. T. U. woman may become a center from which will radiate serenity, consolation and spiritual strength.

I saw yesterday something which illustrates my point. Rising early to attend a meeting of this body, my way led along one of the numerous parks of the city. I heard the soft whirr of wings behind me and a flock of pigeons went past, flying very low. I noted their beauty of form and feather and wondered that they had come so near. After resting a moment on the grass they rose. I saw they were flying to meet a woman for whom they had evidently mistaken me. It was beautiful to see them convoying her to intersecting paths near the center of the park. They surrounded her, circling about her head, beating the air with slow and gentle strokes. As she advanced I saw only her feet and skirt, the upper half of her body was concealed by her fluttering escort. When the pigeons alighted I saw she had brought them food. A flock of sparrows came scurrying from a neighboring street and three squirrels ran down from the trees. The whole scene spoke of confidence and affection. I thought if one is able to inspire these feelings among the dumb creatures, what may we not do among those who are our own, when eye answereth to eye and speech to speech.

But I noted another thing. She did not try to give all the same kind of food. She had grain of some sort for the pigeons, nuts for the squirrels and crumbs for the sparrows—for each the food appropriate to his needs.

Must we not cultivate tact and judgment and mete out the needed things. Whether we seek to bring comfort to those of beautiful plumage or to the busy, comfortably clad middle class, or to the plain but most necessary workers, should we not possess a depth of understanding and a breadth of sympathy that will enable us to bungle not our work, but to give each the thing most needed. I cannot close my report without an appeal to you in a time like this—the appeal must be made to the Higher Power. May we bow for one moment in prayer?

"Oh, Thou, ever present and over-ruling Spirit of Truth, guide thou our steps aright. Help us to weed out hate and to open our hearts to thine own peace. Amen."

VISITATION OF THE TEMPERANCE BOARD OF THE METHODIST CHURCH AND THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE

One of the many delightful features of the Convention was the friendly visitation of delegations of "the brethren". The members of the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church set the fashion one afternoon and later the Anti-Saloon League and companies of Congressmen followed their example. As the Methodist Board, led by Bishop William F. McDowell, filed onto the platform, they were greeted by applause. Bishop McDowell, in a breezy speech, explained the occasion of their visit:

Bishop William F. McDowell

"The Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church has just met in its annual session. We are about to erect in the National Capital a building. Some of the liquor dealers' journals are greatly distressed about it; they are perfectly scandalized that there may come to Washington a sanctified lobby. I can imagine their horror of a lobby that says its prayers before it goes to interview members of Congress; it might well upset the foundations of misgovernment." (At this point Miss Anna Gordon, the presiding officer, quietly suggested that the term should be Mr., not Miss government, and the Bishop laughingly admitted that the point was well taken.)

Bishop McDowell extended to the delegates and all members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union a cordial invitation to make free use of the building of the Temperance Board when it should be erected, as it will soon be, right under the "drippings of the sanctuary," namely, the Capitol. He then introduced the secretary of the Board, Dr. Clarence True Wilson. Dr. Wilson and Mrs. Wilson were greeted with the white ribbon cheer.

Dr. Clarence True Wilson Extends Greetings

Dr. Wilson said in part: "I believe we are on the eve of national prohibition and if we could get it within the year by the constitutional process it would not justify our letting up on war prohibition for a moment. To beseech our women to sweep up the crumbs, our children to go without candy and our families to deprive themselves of sugar, while the brewers are wasting our food substance is absolutely wrong. Our board today has had a great meeting. We came over here because our hearts beat as one with yours for all the great movements that animate you as a convention. Today our board in the name of the 4,000,000 members of the Methodist Church, and a constituency much larger than our membership, has communicated with the President and the Secretary of War, asking that the same provisions shall be made in France for the protection of our soldiers as have been made in America. We have also sent our petition in the name of the Christian citizenship of the land for immediate war prohibition."

Rev. Elmer Williams, familiarly known as "the fighting parson" of Chicago, just elected extension secretary of the Temperance Board, in responding to an introduction, said:

"At my mother's knee I was pledged to eternal hatred of strong drink and the liquor traffic as young Hannibal was pledged by Hamilcar, his father, to eternal hatred of the enemy of his country. And it seems to me that Congress would do well to heed the voice of the nation, as it speaks through your organization, and others, appealing for war prohibition and the submission to the states of a resolution for national prohibition."

Mr. Deets Pickett, editor of the publications of the Board of Temperance, was introduced with his mother, Mrs. Ludie Day Pickett, recording secretary of the Kentucky W. C. T. U.

Dr. Purley A. Baker, Characterizes W. C. T. U. as "Mother Organization of the Temperance Movement"

On Thursday afternoon another company of "the brethren" paid their respects to the assembled W. C. T. U. hosts. Led by Dr. Purley A. Baker, general superintendent of the National Anti-Saloon League, a large company of state superintendents, who had been meeting in executive session, thronged the platform as Mrs. Gordon Wright, president of the Dominion W. C. T. U., was closing her address. "We greet you as the mother organization of the temperance movement," said Dr. Baker, as spokesman. "We were always conscious of the fact that our inspiration came from the greatest organization the world has ever known—the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. We move together in the last final drive for the solution of this mighty problem with which we have both been grappling." Dr. Baker extended to the delegates a cordial invitation to attend the Anti-Saloon League convention, meeting the next week in Washington.

MESSAGES FROM THE ORIENT

Tsune Watanabe, President of the W. C. T. U. of Kobe, Japan

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is an organization with a world-wide vision and the white ribboners of America are never too busily occupied with their own campaigns to have a keen interest in the advance of the temperance movement in other lands. The World's W. C. T. U.'s part in a National Convention program is always awaited with interest.

Japan was well represented at the Convention. Three W. C. T. U. workers from that country brought greetings. Miss Tsune Watanabe, president of the Kobe W. C. T. U. and also the head of the Japan Missionary society, told of the progress being made in the Sunrise Kingdom in temperance activities. Miss Watanabe is the national W. C. T. U. superintendent of the department of Education and has been a leading factor in the wonderful temperance movement. She told of ten homes being conducted by the Japan W. C. T. U., including a boarding home for girls at Kobe, a maternity home in Nagasaki, schools for servants in four different places, and a number of rescue homes. Two monthly magazines, the Woman's Herald and the Children's Herald, are maintained, and an anti-vice campaign is being carried on by means of the press, distribution of literature, lectures and literary contests.

Mrs. Etsu Sugimoto was introduced as "one to whom we lost our hearts at the Indianapolis Convention and who still has them in her keeping." Mrs. Sugimoto referred to the W. C. T. U. of Japan as the daughter of the National W. C. T. U. of America. "I am a granddaughter of your honored union," she remarked naively. Calling attention to the significant fact that coincident with the inauguration of the National Constitutional Prohibition campaign in this country was Japan's purity campaign, she said, "It must have been a case of spiritual telegraphy."

Mrs. Gilbert Bowles of the Friends' Mission, of Tokio, Japan, brought greetings from that veteran W. C. T. U. worker, Madam Kaji Yajima, eighty-six years young. "Every time a state of this country goes dry," said Mrs. Bowles, "the report of the victory, with the number of votes on both sides, is cabled over to us. Just before leaving Japan I heard a prominent business man say, 'I am watching America, watching the way she is dealing with the liquor question.' The anti-vodka edict in Russia greatly impressed Japan. The Sunrise Kingdom is observing closely every step America is taking and there is a saying over there, 'What America can do, we can do.' I believe your victories will greatly hasten the prohibition movement in Japan."

Mrs. Etsu Sugimoto and Miss Kozaki of Japan

Flora E. Strout, World's W. C. T. U. Representative, soon to take up W. C. T. U. Work in Ceylon and Straits Settlements

Miss A. Elizabeth Brown, leader of W. C. T. U. work in Palestine, appealed to the Convention on behalf of the afflicted people of that country, which has been devastated and despoiled by plague and calamities.

The chief address of the afternoon was given by Miss Flora Strout, World's W. C. T. U. representative in Burma for the past seven years, who is soon to go to Ceylon and the Straits Settlements as the World's W. C. T. U. representative. Miss Strout gave a graphic and fascinating account of the educational campaign prosecuted in Burma. Her address will appear in the next issue.

RAMBLERS' REMINISCENCES

Symposium of National W. C. T. U. Organizers and Lecturers

The varied experiences of National W. C. T. U. organizers and lecturers furnish rich material for tales of adventure, romance and prowess. In introducing the members of the board, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, by virtue of her office as National corresponding secretary the head of the board, gave some striking statistics to show the wide extent of territory covered, the large number of meetings addressed and the actual amount of work accomplished by this heroic army of campaigners.

Mrs. Parks presented the following organizers and lecturers, each of whom contributed her share to the delightful "Ramblers' Reminiscences":

Mrs. Ella A. Gleason, Mrs. Effie L. Lawrence, Mrs. Lizzie O. Middleton, Mrs. Margaret B. Platt, Mrs. Helen G. Rice, Mrs. Viola D. Romans, Mrs. Hortense Ropp, Rev. Lee Anna Starr, Miss Ellen M. Stone, Miss Christine I. Tinling, Miss Margaret J. Bilz, Mrs. Ellen A. Dayton Blair, Mrs. Linnie Carl, Miss Rose Adella Davison, Mrs. Fannie Drummond, Mrs. Harriet D. Hall, Miss Louise E. Hollister, Mrs. Emma H. Howland, Mrs. Lora La-Mance, Mrs. Rosetta E. Lawson, Miss May Russell, Miss Roena E. Shaner, Mrs. Marcia A. B. Smith, Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace, Mrs. Amy C. Weech, Mrs. May Laverell Woods, Mrs. Carrie M. Flatter, Mrs. Addie B. Parsels and Mrs. Matilda E. Patterson.

SPECTACULAR NUMBERS ON PROGRAM

Twenty-four winsome lads and lassies in the costumes of a dozen nations furnished a picturesque entertainment Tuesday evening. Had the program not said they were from the Eckington Presbyterian Sunday school, one might have imagined they had just arrived in a ship from Europe or Asia. Flaxen-haired Sweden and Norway, dusky Spain and Italy, quaint Holland and Belgium, sturdy England and Scotland, saucy Ireland, jaunty France and picturesque Japan marched and countermarched around the platform with fascinating grace, circling about Uncle Sam's dignified figure, and finally pledging to him their oath of allegiance, while a Temperance fairy in white sang an appealing message, which won them one and all.

Thursday afternoon the Young People's Branch presented "The Prohibition Dawn." Thirty little lassies, representing the twenty-seven dry states, the District of Columbia, Porto Rico and Alaska, made a striking picture as they stood grouped in the center of the stage, flanked on either side by youths in khaki and blue. Together they sang, "The Nation's Going Dry" and "Prohibition's on the Way."

STEREOPTICON LECTURES PRESENTED AT CONVENTION

The Convention was veritably a "continuous performance," with very brief intervals for eating and sleeping. After the close of the afternoon meeting, if one moved rapidly, one found time to satisfy the "inner woman" at some nearby hostelry and return to Poli's for the stereopticon lecture or motion pictures which on three evenings preceded the regular program. "Picturesque Hawaii" was given by John W. Wadman, D. D., one evening. On another Henry M. Rose, assistant secretary of the United States Senate, entertained the delegates with "Washington, the City Beautiful," and on a third evening "The Man Who Forgot" was given in motion pictures.

DR. HARVEY W. WILEY GIVEN ENTHUSIASTIC WELCOME

RE-AFFIRMS IN ADDRESS AT NATIONAL CONVENTION HIS DISBELIEF IN PATENT MEDICINES AND ALCOHOLIC REMEDIES

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, former Federal Health Commissioner, was introduced by Mrs. Martha M. Allen, National superintendent of Medical Temperance, as one who had been a valuable and greatly appreciated friend of the department. In tracing the history of the effort to secure the elimination of alcoholic beverages from the Pharmacopoeia, Dr. Wiley declared, "And some of us are very glad that whisky and brandy are no longer mentioned as official remedies in the Pharmacopoeia." He explained that the action taken did not refer in any way to its use for solution and tincture. The doctor devoted much time to a denunciation of patent medicines, which he insisted were falsely named, since the derivation of patent is from patio (meaning open) and they are all secret remedies and lie openly. In explaining why he was opposed to patent medicines, Dr. Wiley said medical science is an exact science; so is prophylaxis; the only thing nowadays in which there is any empiricism is the inability to determine with exactness how medicine will react on any individual's system. A physician must study the effect on a patient's system of any drug and govern his future treatment thereby. The trouble with patent medicines is that it is always experimentation and the human body is too valuable to be made the subject of experimentation. The medicine may be a harmless drug acting only on the imagination or it may be, as are the headache remedies, not a cure but merely a deadener of pain, which may give immediate relief but is certain to weaken the organism. On the subject of soft drinks Dr. Wiley asserted most emphatically, "There are only two beverages that human beings should drink: pure milk and pure water."

Enthusiastic applause greeted Dr. Wiley's statement that the Internal Revenue Department has issued an order that our "dear old friend," Duffy's Pure Malt Whisky, can no longer be sold by druggists. The only condition under which it can be sold is to denature it by putting into it carbolic acid. Dr. Wiley contended that the enforced decrease in the use of sugar was in the interests of the health of the community. We had been eating too much and too many sweets.

In answer to a query from Miss Gordon as to the advisability of sending sweets to the soldiers, he replied, "By all means send sweets to the soldiers. They are doing hard labor and their systems will soon burn up the sugar."

When asked in regard to the evil effects of peyote, or the mescal button, concerning which Mrs. Gertrude Bonnin had spoken, Dr. Wiley replied, emphatically, classing it among the poisons, and said, "Secretary Lane and a lot of us have been trying for some time to prohibit peyote in the United States and especially in the Indian reservations."

Music of the Convention

The music of the Washington Convention was of exceptionally high class. The best talent of the Capital City appeared upon the program. Prof. John G. Dailey, composer of "A Saloonless Nation in 1920," led the convention in that prophetic song. Mrs. Newton Baker, wife of the Secretary of War, graciously consented to contribute a musical message. Every mother's heart responded to Mrs. Wayne B. Wheeler's beautiful rendering of "O Mothers, When the Boys Come Home." Miss Janet Lindsay, the gifted daughter of Mrs. Carolyn P. Lindsay, National superintendent, on the last evening of the convention, played two entrancing violin solos. The Nordica Mandolin and Guitar Club and the Boy Scouts' Club furnished delightful orchestral selections on two evenings. The latter club also sang some thrilling patriotic choruses. Long will one of them ring in our ears:

"Tell the boys over there
To never fear,
We're on the job over here."

Other musicians who contributed to the enjoyment of the convention were Mr. Herbert E. Aldridge, Mrs. Viola Schippert, Leroy Gilbert, Miss Belva Hoch, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Waring, Miss Bessie Birch Haycock, the National Quartet, composed of Elizabeth S. Maxwell, Lillian Chenoweth, William E. Braithwaite and Harry Forker, and the Schubert Song Trio, composed of Christine Church, Marion Larner, Marion McCoy.

Convention Sidelights

On the last night of the Convention Mrs. E. L. Calkins, president of the Michigan W. C. T. U., read a telegraphic invitation from the owner of a brewery, the mayor of Detroit, Michigan, which state goes dry next spring, asking that the next national convention be held in his city. "Our opponent in the campaign of last year," remarked Mrs. Calkins, "has flung out a flag of truce."

At the conclusion of Mrs. Gordon Wright's address she was presented with a service pin, showing three stars in honor of her three sons who are in the Canadian army.

Mrs. Frances W. Graham, National Musical Director

So beloved was one state president that when her name was called by the recording secretary at the official roll call, the members of her delegation rose to their feet and sang, "Praise God From Whom All Blessings Flow."

"'D. C.' stands not alone for 'District of Columbia,'" said Mrs. Florence D. Richards, that undaunted campaigner of Ohio, "but it stands also for 'Dry Capital!'" Mrs. Richards, by the way, made a most effective speech when, in asking an offering, she appealed for funds "to purchase freedom from liquor bonds."

Every heart in the Convention responded to Mrs. Culla J. Vayhinger's declaration that the present day woman does not express her emotions in the words of the old-time hymn, "I want to be an angel and with the angels stand," but rather in the twentieth century version of that hymn,

"I want to be a patriot
And with the patriots stand,
A white badge pinned upon my breast
And a ballot in my hand."

A copy of President Gordon's address was presented by the National W. C. T. U. to every member of the Convention.

Chapters from the history of the fight to make the District of Columbia dry were told in interesting fashion by Hon. A. R. Webber, former Congressman from Ohio, who introduced the first bill for a dry District in 1906. He declared that if it had not been for the efforts of the W. C. T. U. at that time the proposed law would never have had a hearing in Congress.

Bishop John W. Hamilton, chancellor of the American University, another guest of distinction, said, "I remember it was Philip Sidney who said, 'Whenever you hear of a good war, go into it.' We are all in the great war against the liquor traffic, but you good women of the W. C. T. U. are in the trenches more truly than any of us. Mr. Gladstone was right when he declared that the war in which you are engaged is against a foe that destroys more than war, pestilence and famine."

Dr. Leigh Colvin, president of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, brought greetings on behalf of the thousands of college students his organization represents. "In the Ohio campaign we had 1,000 college men and women actively at work and we are implanting in the hearts of a great host of young people the conviction that prohibition of the liquor traffic is the supreme question of the present day."

Organization Methods Discussed

Of great value were the discussions in the Convention on practical subjects relating to organization methods. On one afternoon "Increasing Our Membership" was the topic presented for consideration by Mrs. Ella A. Boole and discussed by Mrs. Ella A. George, Mrs. Katharine Lent Stevenson, Mrs. Nelle Burger, Mrs. Mary B. Wood, Mrs. M. M. Claflin and Mrs. Abbie B. Hillerman. On another afternoon Mrs. E. L. Calkins led in a discussion on "How to Use Literature in a Campaign," Mrs. Lenna Lowe Yost, Mrs. Deborah Knox Livingston, Mrs. Whitney, Mrs. Edith Hildreth and Miss Rozette Hendrix contributing to the symposium.

WOMEN PATRIOTS

and unless the army at home does its duty faithfully, the army in the field will be unable to carry to a victorious end this war which you and I believe is the great war that shall bring to the world the thing which is nearest our hearts,—democracy, that those who submit to authority shall have a voice in the government, and that when they have that voice in their government peace shall reign among the nations of men.

The United States government, learning from the weaknesses and the mistakes of the governments across the sea, immediately after declaring war on Germany, knew that it was wise to mobilize not only the man power of the nation, but the woman power. It took Great Britain a long time to learn that—it was more than a year, before she realized it—and it was not until 50,000 women paraded the streets of London with banners saying, "Give us work," "Put us to work," that it dawned upon the British government that they could mobilize women and that women could be made serviceable in the war.

And what is the result? The result is this, that it has been discovered that men and women alike have within them great reserve power, great forces which are called out by great emergencies and the demands of a great time like this, and the women of Great Britain have gone into all lines of industry, of trade, all professions, undertaking every sort of thing that men did before, in order to release the man power to go into the trenches. In much the same way it was discovered that school rooms ought to open their doors to women. You remember years ago men declared, "We cannot admit women to our higher institutions of learning, because they are not intellectually capable of holding up the standards of education." Then they opened the doors and gradually the women went in, and now the thirty-seven per cent of women in the co-educational institutions of this country take eighty-nine per cent of the Phi Beta Kappa prizes on examination! There was no lack of intelligence on the part of the women; there was lack of opportunity for developing the intellect they possess.

It has been discovered that in the great lines of service, even technical work, all over the country women are by the intensive thrust of patriotic desire enabled in a very short time to do vastly better work than men were able to do in a very much longer time under ordinary peace conditions; and now it is declared that in Great Britain the very best men-of-war can be built solely by the labor of women, without the hand of a single man; and the best flying machines are built by the labor of women,—the technical parts and the most scientific parts,—without the help of a man in the construction of the machine, because this power in woman has been called out by the necessity of the times.

The same demand is not yet laid upon us, yet it is realized that it may come, and, profiting by the errors of Great Britain and France, the United States government immediately after war was declared, began to call upon its women, and the Council of National Defense conscripted ten women into its Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense. I was in the South lecturing, and I knew nothing about what was in the minds of the government. I was out on my own task, the task which I would put before any other. I was in the South speaking when I received a telegram from the director of the Council of National Defense, saying the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy desired to see me in Washington. You never saw such a scared human being in all your life as I was. I wondered what I had done! I tried to think over my speeches, and from as much as I could remember of them I could not recall anything treasonable that I had uttered. I did not know what I was being called to Washington for. But you know how it is with people. They hear you say certain things and give them a different construction. I did not know but the anti-suffragists had reported my utterances differently from the way I intended! I could not tell why I should be called to Washington, and therefore I telegraphed back, "I cannot come for a week!" I thought by that time I could get myself steady! The night before I arrived, I was entering a university in North Carolina, where I was to speak, when I was handed a telegram. On opening it I read, "I congratulate you on your appointment." I said to the president of the university, who had delivered the message to me, "I have apparently been appointed to something, but I don't know just what!" I had no idea what they wanted, but when I came to Washington I discovered that I had been appointed—I had not volunteered, nor anything of that sort, you know; I had not the high purpose in me to do that—but I had been conscripted by the national government as chairman of the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense.

I had no more idea what the Women's Committee was expected to do than I had what the army was expected to do, and so I went to the Secretary of the Navy to find out about it. I learned this, and that's all there is to it, that the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense was to be the channel through which the orders of the various departments of the government concerning women's war work were to reach the womanhood of the country; that the Women's Committee was to be a body to conserve and to co-ordinate all the women's societies in the United States which were doing war work, to prevent overlapping, to prevent duplication, and to prevent useless work. This was very necessary, not because our women are not patriotic, but because we are so patriotic that every blessed woman in the country was writing to Washington, or her organization was writing, or somebody was writing for her, asking the government what she could do for the war; and, of course, the government did not know what their women could do. The government had not the least idea, it has not yet the least idea of what women can do.

In the first place, the government is composed of men, and men have no idea in the world what women can do, and they are at their wits' end to set them to work. I think the funniest thing in the world is to see a man at the head of a Red Cross department with a lot of women knitting and making comfort bags and comforters and bandages, and all the rest of it, and have that poor creature looking on and watching these women do their work without the remotest idea of how to direct them to do it. And so the government looked on all the women of the United States without any idea of how to set them to work, or what they could do after they were at work. But the women of these United States were in a far better condition than the men were at the opening of the war, because for the last fifty and more years the women of this country have been getting ready for this time. When thirty or forty years ago the women of this country organized into women's clubs, the newspapers never wearied of ridiculing them; even preachers preached against us, and lecturers had the time of their lives talking about the "new woman" and the women's clubs, laughing at us because we had organized for the purposes of studying this, that, or the other. We generally began with the study of Browning, and we tried to find out what Browning meant when he said something or other,—and we never found out! He didn't know himself when he wrote it! But it kept us a long time guessing, and gradually we began to get away from poetry to history, and from history to science, and finally we got to the United States and we began to study the prevention of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases, the cleanliness of streets, the sewerage problem, the garbage problem, the problem which had to do with the sight of children, with the various defective children; and gradually we traced these conditions largely to the saloon, which, more than any other instrument, has produced these dependents and defectives of society.

And, working along these lines, we became more and more alive to the needs of our time, the conditions of life under which we live; and today the women of this country are a mobilized army ready to serve in whatever capacity the country finds need of women's service.

So, then, when the Council of National Defense laid upon the Women's Committee the responsibility of calling the women of this country together to mobilize women's war work, we knew just exactly how to do it. It was the simplest thing in the world. We simply appointed a temporary chairman in every state, and this temporary chairman was to call together the heads of all state organizations, and these heads of all state organizations of women doing war work were to elect from their own number one woman who should be their permanent chairman, and the heads of these organizations were to be the executive forces of the different states. It took a long time to do this, and in calling together the heads of the various organizations in the states, it was at once possible to find out how many organizations there were. If you want to know all the things that women are organizing, take a look at our list of the organizations of women! If there is anything under the sun which women are not organized to remedy and rectify and build up, you will have an organization of that sort before tomorrow morning!

The purpose of the Women's Committee is not to create any new machinery, nor to take from any association its identity, or its lines of service, but to try to prevent all overlapping of work.

Then the newspapers gave us all sorts of directions. One day we were told to knit, knit day and night. The next day we were told to stop knitting! And then we were told that there was no wool; and then we were informed that there was wool, and that we ought to be ashamed if we used any other kind of wool except grey wool. And so we got all kinds of directions from every group of people. We needed uniform directions, and we needed uniform organization and we had to get it through a uniformly organized channel.

The Women's Committee has no intention of interfering with any society or its work. All the Women's Committee wants to do is to bring women together. And it is not a question of whether you

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, is the nerve-center of civilization; history is being made at this world capital. The Pathfinder's illustrated weekly review gives you a clear, impartial and correct diagnosis of public affairs during these strenuous, epoch-making days.

The little matter of 15c in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 25th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. will act or not, the government has said you must act; it is an order as much as it is an order that men shall go and fight in the trenches. It is an order of the government that the women's war work of the country shall be co-ordinated, that women shall keep their organizations intact, that they shall get together under directed heads to direct and see that there is not a great deal of waste effort, that there is not duplication.

What is the advantage of this? When the government in Washington has any particular thing it wants done, it gives its directions to the chairman of the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense in Washington, and the committee can urge the matter upon every state chairman, who, in turn, will reach the chairmen of the various organizations of the respective states.

I told the gentlemen here in Washington at first, when they feared our women might not be willing to co-operate, "If you put back of the women of this country an incentive big enough, if you appeal to the women as a part of the government's life, not as a by-product of creation, and a kindergarten, but as a great, human, living energy, ready to serve the country, and give them service to perform, the women will respond, and respond as readily as the men." Then I said, "I can give our women no better praise than to say we are equally ready with the men of this country to respond to the call our country may make to us."

What we of the Women's Committee want is your co-operative support, as I know we will have it, and as we have had it, for your National president came to our meeting here, and pledged the loyalty of her association. When we have registered for service through the registration cards, which the government has sanctioned and is expecting us to fill, the government will be able to put its hand upon all women of this country, and no body of men will respond more readily than you who have been giving your lives all these years to the service of your country in seeking the prohibition of the liquor traffic!

I want to say to the ladies who are bragging about all their children that I have one myself. Two weeks ago I made up my mind what I would do for Christmas. I believe that Christmas giving this year to people who do not need gifts is a sin. I thought I should do something by way of celebrating the fact that I am now a voter living in the state of New York, and that women's enfranchisement seems to be so near in this country, and I believe that we all should do something this Christmas in memory of Him who gave Himself for us, by doing for the men and the women and the children who are today the victims of the men who are seeking to overthrow the liberties of the world and the rights of men and of nations. And so I said, "I will take a chance," and for my Christmas giving this year, and for my Christmas service, I have adopted a little girl. I said, "I don't want to adopt a baby, because if I adopted one, I would want to see it and hold it in my lap and be able to know something about it. I want a little child old enough so I can write to her or send her letters and other things." And so my little girl is eight years old, and I am sure there are hundreds and hundreds of women in this country who could take a fatherless child for this coming year as her Christmas gift, instead of the usual gift she bestows on somebody else. That would be a real service, as well as a real comfort to the person who did it.

We have this kind of work to do, all of us, one to the other, and we must remember that more and more sacrifices are going to be demanded. The government is going to ask more and more of us. But I want to say to you women, do not meekly sit down and make all the sacrifices and demand nothing in return. It is not that you want pay for your sacrifices, but we all want an equally balanced sacrifice. From one end of the country to the other, they are asking us to carry home our parcels, and they are making no concessions to us for doing it. We pay just as much for what we buy. They are asking us to conserve food, while they are allowing carload after carload to rot on the side tracks of railroad stations, and great elevators to be consumed and destroyed for lack of proper protection and care. If we must eat Indian meal,—which I hate worse than anything else in the edible line—if we must eat it in order to save wheat, then the men of this country have got to protect the grain elevators and see that the wheat is saved and not destroyed!

We have got to demand that there shall be conservation all along the line. I had a letter the other day giving me a most fearful scorching because of a speech I made in Baltimore recently. I said that we women had Mr. Hoover looking into our refrigerators, examining our bread to see what kind of material we were using, telling us what extravagant creatures we are, that we waste millions of money every year, waste food, and all that sort of thing, and yet while we are asked to have meatless days and wheatless days, I had never yet seen a declaration of a smokeless day! They are asking through the newspapers that we women shall dance, play bridge, have charades, sing and do every conceivable thing under the sun to raise money to buy tobacco for the men in the trenches! Not only have we got to take care of our refrigerators and our bread and use oatmeal and all the rest of it, but we have got to dance for tobacco for the soldiers! The men who want us to do that have a cigar in their mouth at the time they are asking us to do it! And I said that if men want the men in the trenches to have tobacco, let them have a smokeless day and furnish it! Perhaps it would so disturb their nerves to have a whole smokeless day that we could not live with them. If they would conserve one single cigar a day and send it to the men in the trenches, they would have all they would need, the men at home would be a great deal better off, and it would be possible to live with them!

The letter I have referred to said, "You are at last unmasked!" (I never knew I had been masked.) "You have stood before the people of the world as having high ideals, and now you are advocating teaching the men in the trenches to smoke!" I did not suggest teaching the men in the trenches to smoke! What I did say was that if the men in the trenches have got to smoke, and must have tobacco to smoke, I did not propose to have the women of this country dancing in order to raise the money to buy it, while the men look on. They can do their own dancing. If we have to eat cornmeal and other things to send wheat across the sea, they must stop smoking to send smoke across the sea! And I have not the least intention of either dancing or playing cards or doing anything of the sort to raise tobacco money so long as a man in the United States smokes! There is no end to the things that women are asked to do. I know this is true, because I have read the newspapers for the last six months to get my duty before me. I know what we women ought to do, and it is my business as chairman of the committee to tell the women what to do. I pore over the newspapers to obtain information, and if there is any man on earth who has not told us what to do, he is going to do it very soon!

The first thing we are asked to do is to provide the enthusiasm, inspiration, and the patriotism to make men want to fight! And we are to send them away with a smile! That isn't much to ask of a mother.

Every Drop is Wholesome—

The second thing we are to do is to keep a perfect calm after we have furnished all this inspiration and enthusiasm, "keep the home fires burning," keep the home sweet and kind and peaceful and happy, keep society on a level, look after business, buy enough but not too much, and wear some of our old clothes, but not all of them! If we did nothing but wear old clothes, what would happen to the merchants? We must keep the merchants happy. We are to do all this; that's the second thing we are to do.

The third thing we are to do is to keep our eye on our refrigerators, mix our foods, mix bread, put in Indian meal, alfalfa meal, pumpkin seed meal, and any other kind of old meal to mix with our bread! Mr. Hoover tells us that we women can control all these situations; that we buy the food and prepare it. But there is one thing that Mr. Hoover missed, he did not realize that women never cook for women, they always cook for men! If you do not believe it, let the men go away from home and see how much cooking is done while they are away! I say to Mr. Hoover that we women will be glad to mix any kind of meal they will tell us to mix, we will make any kind of bread they want us to make, if they will make the men eat the stuff after we have made it! All we must do is to save enough food out of our refrigerators, and by mixing our bread and other things, to feed the army in the trenches and our Allies.

These three things are all we have got to do! It does not seem like much, does it? But I can tell you this,—we are going to do it! We are going to do every one of these things. We are going to rise

OUR OFFICIAL PAPERS

There was presented to the Convention a recommendation from the Official Board and Executive Committee that a special drive be made to raise the subscription list of THE UNION SIGNAL to at least 50,000 by March 15, 1918, and that each state be apportioned its pro rata of this amount. Not only was this recommendation unanimously and enthusiastically adopted by the convention, but on the morning devoted to the consideration of the official papers the drive was hilariously inaugurated by Mrs. Addie B. Parsels. That "whirlwind orator" from Pennsylvania presented unanswerable arguments for increasing the circulation of THE UNION SIGNAL. By her side as she spoke rested a cedar hope chest, with Miss Prohibition on one side and Uncle Sam on the other. The speediest and most effectice way to bring about a wedding of these two individuals, declared Mrs. Parsels, is to fill the hope chest full of such high class prohibition literature as THE UNION SIGNAL. Pledges were made for new subscriptions to the amount of $16,059.50.

Miss Mildred Moody of New York made an eloquent plea for The Young Crusader, arguing with convincing logic that upon the education of the children through our L. T. L. and our children's paper depends the future welfare of the nation. Over $1,368 in new subscriptions was promptly pledged.

Suffrage States

Uncle Sam and Aunt Columbia had hardly bowed the new prohibition states off the platform when another company began to arrive—the states that during the past year had achieved suffrage. Delegations from North Dakota and Vermont, Arkansas, Nebraska, Rhode Island, Michigan and New York, led by their respective presidents, saluted Uncle Sam and Aunt Columbia. Mrs. Ella A. Boole, speaking for a great army of new New York voters that filled the stage, announced that as the result of the November suffrage victory the electorate of her state had been more than doubled and after January 1 "We women become people. We can vote for the forty-three members of Congress elected from the state of New York. Two members of Congress will probably resign January 1, not on our account, however, and we will probably have a chance to elect their successors. In the spring no-license elections will be held in nearly every city in the state at which we can exercise our new franchise rights."

WOMEN PATRIOTS

as women always have risen to the supreme height of patriotic service. The mothers of this country are ready to give their sons, for whom they walked to the verge of the grave that they might possess. The mothers of this country, the mothers of men, build their own lives into the lives of their sons until they reach manhood—and what there is embraced in that word "manhood." The mother looking into the eyes of the young man whom she held in her arms as a tiny helpless baby, knows that she beholds the most marvelous thing in all the world; that in all the universe of God there is nothing more wonderful than a strong-limbed, clean-hearted, clear-brained young man, just as he stands on the border line of life; he is so wonderful; but, oh, as she gave her life to his making, he is hers, and in an hour his country calls him out, and in another hour he may lie dead. When she looks into his face, that woman knows the meaning of war. This is the "bit" our country asks of its women. A whole lifetime of service, of love, and then it is all swept away from her, and from him, and yet they wonder that women do not want war. We do not want war! We do not want war! And the reason you and I want to see this war fought to a finish, if it takes the last man and the last loaf of bread and the last woman in order to do it, is because we hope after it is done there will be no more war!

We are ready to give our sons; we are ready to give the inspiration and the patriotic fervor; we are ready to keep the home fires burning, and to try to keep the moral and spiritual forces of society balanced, in the absence of our men; we are ready to conserve food—I wouldn't care if this country found it necessary to conscript food and take over all that it needs to feed our men well in the trenches. We would scurry around and find something to eat, and something that was worth eating, if we put our brains to producing it. I am not worrying about what we women will be willing to do. We will be willing to do anything and everything, but, on the other hand, the government and the manhood of the country have got to conserve the food that is already existing in order that we women and our children may not suffer for the lack of food because of the extravagance and improper railroad facilities and other facilities which are essential to carry on the business of this country. This is the work of the women and the work of the men, and by our combined efforts we are going to do these things. We cannot do it in a day.

The Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense is thankful for this opportunity of bringing to you its plan of work, and asks for your co-operation, that we may be what the government would have us be, soldiers at home, defending the interests of the home, while the men are fighting with our gallant Allies—the Belgians, the immortal French, the magnificent and loyal British, the brave Canadians, Italians, and all the rest, who are laying down their lives that this world may be a safe place and that men and women may know the meaning of democracy, which is that we are one great family of God. That, and that only, is the ideal of democracy for which our flag stands!
